Years later, after a seemingly endless flow of changes in direction, he is still meeting with the same type of criticism. Dylan steps in and out of musical forms these days with an unusual ease, echoes of carnival music blend harmoniously with primitive jungle rhythms and Chicago blues, while Dylan the Folksinger and Dylan the Newport Electric Poet still exist. As at Newport, Dylan has not met with much favorable response to his new sound. People are disturbed by the strange changes. The unfamiliarity.

He refuses to stagnate, to be pinned down, categorized: "Art is the perpetual motion of illusion," he once observed. And he truly lives his belief.

I mentioned a line from Idiot Wind: "Your chestnut mare shoots through my head and is making me see stars!" (Dylanologist A.J. Weberman claims that equine references in Dylan songs refer to heroin.) Interestingly, Idiot Wind was written before Dylan's teaming with Jacques Levy, co-writer (with Roger McGuinn) of Chestnut Mare years earlier.

"That's right! Yeah!" He laughed delightfully. "I'm sure it's all connected up y'know, way down the line."

"But yeah, I had a couple of years there, where I went out to be by myself quite a bit of the time, and that's where I experienced those kind of songs, on the Blood On The Tracks album... I'll do anything to write a song..." he laughed. "I used to anyway".

Street Legal seems to backtrack through all the aforementioned albums. It is an acknowledgement of changes, both internal and external.

"You're right. Let's say with a song like True Love Tends to Forget..." He lit a cigarette. "The mood I was in on that song is I mean, that means a lot, if you think about it, y'know. True love tends to forget it isn't like a possession trip, when you've been wronged, that type of thing – I was trying to get the most out of that. I thought that was my best album."

I agreed.

"I hear it sometimes on the radio or a record player and I see that it's badly mixed and it doesn't sound very good, but what can you do? I've got, on Columbia Records alone, 21 or 22 albums out. So every time you make an album, you want it to be new, good and different, but personally, when you look back on them for me all my albums are, are just measuring points for wherever I was at a certain period of time. I went into the studio, recorded the songs as good as I could, and left. Basically, realistically, I'm a live performer and want to play onstage for the people and not make records that may sound really good."

I mentioned how the current show had changed each time that I had seen him, and how much tighter the band had become as the tour progressed.

"Yeah, well it's never gonna be the same two nights in a row." Dylan has made many comments in the press recently about the 1980s. In his Rolling Stone interview with Jonathan Cott he said, "Anyone who's going to be doing anything will have his or her cards showing. You won't be able to get back in the '80s."

What did he mean by that?

"I don't know what I meant by that," he chuckled. "Me and Jonathan, every time he does an interview, we just get drunk. I don't think you should show all of your cards all of the time, I didn't mean that."

He continued: "It's like, when I started out playing – it's hard to put into words – I don't know what the eighties are going to be like. I imagine a lot of the glue is gonna hold a lot of things together which are sort of scattered now. Appearances of people you know, some wearing blue uniforms with badges, they are probably going to be standing side by side with housewives with their hair up in curlers, wanting the same things. All these different elements are going to I think be molded together. I think people are going to be more honest in the '80s."

Like the '60s, I wondered?

"No, never. I don't think so." He answered adamantly.

Dylan remembers the '60s very well. They were years that shaped him, that produced the inspiration for him to create some of the most potent art of the decade. His strange song-poems mirrored the turbulence and chaos of the times. He spoke for an entire generation, it seemed, and then suddenly he wanted no involvement with the movement he had given voice to.

Some say it was the motorcycle accident. That it almost killed him, sent him crashing headlong into a nightmare of his own making. Others just say that he fell in love, settled into a more even existence in which politics and protest had no part. Radical critics like Weberman flatly accuse him of "drifting into indifference during a period when resistance was called for."

"I was always more tied up with the Beat Movement," he admits. "I don't know what the hippie movement was all about, that was a media thing, I think, 'Rent a Hippie' I don't know what that was about. A lot of people, people that I knew, were in the early '60s up 'til '65 or '66. There was a different comradeship. There was drugs, but drugs were something that was just a playful thing or something which wasn't that romanticized. Drugs were always in the folk clubs and in the jazz clubs, but outside of those places I never really saw too many drugs."

"The drugs at the end of the '60s were artificial. They were those.... ah... L.S... acid, all that stuff made in a laboratory. Well I guess it's all made in a laboratory one way or another. I don't know. I was never involved in the acid scene either."

By 1968 the Beatles had released Sgt. Pepper. Rock and roll had moved primarily into studios and electronics began to become more and more a part of the music. Acid rock flourished on the West Coast and the new art form was just becoming self-consciously aware of itself with a little help from its friends (often in the form of a little Kool-Aid). Dylan chose this time to put out the album he had been working on since the cataclysmic accident. John Wesley Harding totally contradicted everything happening musically at the time. The deceptively simple folk melodies only served to draw one's attention even closer to the intensity of the lyrical message.

Eventually, the '60s came to a close, the Beatles broke up, the war ended in a stale-mate and we stumbled into the '70s in a catatonic daze. The music reflected the times. Rock had a few casualties of its own. Madison Avenue and Wall Street moved in as the voice of the people turned into a multibillion dollar industry. A few couldn't handle it, and destroyed themselves by becoming victims of their own myths. Others, like Jagger and Dylan, survived.

"People are always talking about the '60s and now we are almost into the '80s and everybody wants to know what happened back then. Well," he answered himself, "in the '60s, everything that happened you did because you wanted to. You didn't do it because you thought you should do it or because it was the thing to do. Something inside of you told you you wanted to do it. There was a network all across the country, really. Very small, but very close, I still see those people traveling around y'know, they're still hanging in there. But as far as what happened, it will always be felt just the same as the Civil War was always felt into 1870 and 1880. It was just something which was felt by everyone whether they knew it or not and a lot of people in the '60s started all this which is happening now. They just don't realize it, you know."

He put down the guitar, lit another cigarette. "But the '50s gave birth to the '60s too, don't forget, and in the '50s it was even rarer... like in the '60s it was people caught up on all the be-bop and the beat movement, or the subterranean culture that was going on, but it was home-like and it gave you identity."

It is interesting that Dylan's material has always dealt with the opposing forces of black and white, whether on a material level, as during the '60s when songs like The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll clarified the issues of the civil rights movement, or on the spiritual level of his most recent work. Dylan has taken to wearing black and white on stage of late, costuming his entire band in the same. The effect is one of total balance. Yin and yang, darkness and light.

"Well, I think I'm more of an extremist. But no, I'm more active than someone who is balancing," he said. "If you play the game all by yourself and you're the only one playing the game, then you want to balance the game, but if you're playing the game with someone else, you've got to ride up when it's time for someone else to ride down."

Like a see saw?

"Yeah right, and then you get the same kind of balance, but if you're playing by yourself then you've got to move to the middle."

Which you don't do.

"No, I'm uncomfortable in the middle, too easily blown down."

When questioned about his unusual relationship with his record company, of being able to release any product he wants, he became edgy, his answer accompanied once again by the guitar. [As I am writing this, Bob Dylan is in the process of forming his own record company, Accomplice, to be distributed by CBS.]

"CBS doesn't pay me, except for a royalty rate. They don't support these tours for me so they don't have any say. It they supported them, maybe they'd have some say in it."

With Renaldo and Clara, Dylan took a new approach by filming the characters of his dreams. The film was an unconstructed, symbolic comment, a bold and original epic (its original four-hour length was the major complaint from most of its critics), visually combining the same elements Dylan uses in the written word. The actors and actresses, real people from his life, cast in fantasy roles.

American film critics on the whole were not impressed with Dylan's work. They accused him of over-indulgence and blamed his "careless treatment" of people close to him for the break-up of his marriage, which followed shortly on the heels of the film's release. The Village Voice sent an entire battalion of reviewers to see it and they all came back with negative impressions.

However, the film was hailed at last year's Cannes Film Festival as one of the most innovative presentations there, an honor bestowed on Dylan by Europe's most discriminating cinema elite, which must have more than made up for the confused and confusing reviews it received in the US.

Filmed by Sam Shepard, Dylan claims Renaldo was 10 years in the works but has decided that, "For me, film wouldn't be the right thing to do right now. It's not live enough. You're acting for a camera, a director, you can't really see the results."

Renaldo and Clara seemed to be spontaneous.

"That was great! Yeah, but I can't do that no more. It costs too much money for one, to make your own movie, and then if you make a movie for another man who's putting up the money, then he'll want what he wants."

As the '50s gave way to the '60s, the age of the media superstar was born. James Dean gave way to Elvis Presley who gave way to Bob Dylan, each gigantic myths in their own time. While Elvis found his way into Middle America's heart, the chasm James Dean left wasn't filled until Bob Dylan formed a new link in the ever-growing chain of super-anti-heroes.

When compared to the people he once strived to be like, he denies all similarity of public persona.

"It's not as heavy as it probably was to deal with being Elvis Presley. Elvis didn't write any of his songs don't forget, I write all this stuff so I know what I'm saying. I'm behind it so I don't feel like I'm a mystery or anything."

Does he consider himself an artist as opposed to a musician or a songwriter?

"Well yeah, it's like all the artists have had their periods right, and that they've changed. Most people in history that have done anything at all have always been put down. So it don't bother me a bit. I don't care what people say. Whether I'm an artist, or a musician, or a poet, or a songwriter or just anything..."

7 December 1979
Bruce Heiman Interview, Hollywood, CA

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 225-227.

On December 7th, the day before the first of Dylan's two shows in Tucson, Bob was interviewed over the telephone by DJ Bruce Heiman for KMEX, the local Tucson radio station. The subject matter is limited to Dylan's opinion of the activities and views of the American Atheists Association. Dylan, at the time, was in Hollywood. Taken from the circulating tape.

BH: OK. My name is Bruce Heiman. I'm with KMEX radio here in Tucson. OK. We got a press release from the Tucson chapter of the American Atheists and they said in response to your recent embrace of the born-again Christian movement, they plan to leaflet your upcoming concert. They say, recognizing the need to inform those in attendance that the new Dylan cause-celebre is a repressive and reactionary ideology, local members intend to attract attention to the contradictions between the previous content of your art form and the message which your songs now expound.

BD: Uh huh. I still don't quite grasp what you're saying or who's saying it or...

BH: OK. It's the American Atheists here in Tucson.

BD: Is this a group?

BH: Yeah, actually. The American Atheists is a worldwide group headed by Madeleine Mary O'Hara, and they have a chapter here in Tucson, and I think basically what they are talking about is your stand in the past and the type of music you played with the message you tried to get across and the music you're playing today and the different message you're trying to get across.

BD: Yeah, well, whatever the old message was the Bible says, "All things become new, old things are passed away." I guess this group doesn't believe that. What is it exactly that they're protesting?

BH: Well, I think what they're against... there's another statement that they make. It says...

BD: Are they against the doctrine of Jesus Christ, or that he died on the cross or that man was born into sin? Just what exactly are they protesting?

BH: Well the Atheists are against any sort of religion, be it Christianity...

BD: Well, Christ is no religion. We're not talking about religion... Jesus Christ is the way, the truth and the life.

BH: There's another statement they made that maybe you could shed some light on. They said they would like to remind Dylan fans and audiences that one's right to say something does not per se lend any validity to the statement. So, in essence, what they're saying is that you have followers who are going to be at the concert and are going to listen to the message of your music.

BD: Right. I follow God, so if my followers are following me, indirectly they're gonna be following God too because I don't sing any song which hasn't been given to me by the Lord to sing.

BH: OK. So I think that was one thing that they were concerned about. Do you have any idea what they mean... see, they believe that all religion is repressive and reactionary.

BD: Well, religion is repressive to a certain degree. Religion is another form of bondage which man invents to get himself to God. But that's why Christ came. Christ didn't preach religion. He preached the truth, the way and the life. He said He'd come to give life and life more abundantly. He is talking about life, not necessarily religion...

BH: They say that your songs now expound passive acceptance of one's fate. Do you agree with that? I'm not exactly sure what they mean by that.

BD: I'm not exactly sure what they mean by that either. But I don't feel that that is true. But I'm not quite sure what that means – "passive resistance to mans' fate". What is mans' fate?

BH: I don't know. These aren't my ideologies. These are just a group of Atheists.

BD: Well, this ideology isn't my ideology either. My ideology now would be coming out of the scripture. You see, I didn't invent these things. These things have just been shown to me and I'll stand on that faith, that they are true. I believe they're true. I know they're true.

BH: Do you feel that the message of your music has changed over the years from music which talked about war to music that now talks about Christianity?

BD: No. There's gonna be war. There's always war and rumors of war. And the Bible talks about a war coming up which will be a war to end all wars...

Discontinuity in tape.

BD: ...The spirit of the atheist will not prevail. I can tell you that much. It's a deceiving spirit.

BH: Why do you maintain that it won't prevail?

BD: Is it anti-God? Is an atheist anti-God?

BH: Yes. I'm trying to think... I interviewed Madeleine Mary O'Hara a couple of weeks ago and she said that it is anti-religion, anti-God. I think that she was saying that anyone who believes in a supreme being is, to use her word, is stupid. So they are against anything to do with religion.

BD: Uh-huh!

BH: Sometimes it's hard for me to grasp exactly what they are saying.

BD: Well a religion which says you have to do certain things to get to God – they're probably talking about that type of religion, which is a religion which is by works: you can enter into the Kingdom by what you do, what you wear, what you say, how many times a day you may pray, how many good deeds you may do. If that's what they mean by religion, well that type of religion will not get you into the Kingdom, that's true. However, there is a master creator, a supreme being in the universe.

BH: Alright. Now, in another one of their statements they say that: "For years Dylan cried out against the Masters of War and the power elite. The new Dylan now proclaims that we must serve a new master, a master whose nebulous origins were ignorance, foolishness, stupidity and blind faith. The Dylan who inspired us to look beyond banal textbooks and accepted ideologies now implores us to turn inward to the pages of the Holy Bible, a book filled with contradictions, inaccuracies, outrages and absurdities." Now this is what they are saying.

BD: Well, the Bible says "The fool has said in his heart, there is no God..."

BH: OK. They're saying I think, in essence, the movement is a fraud and evasion...

BD: Well, I don't know that movement. Which movement are they talking about? The Atheist movement?

BH: No, the Jesus movement.

BD: Oh! Well, it isn't a fraud. There's nothing fraudulent about it. It's all true. It always has been true. It is true and it will be true.

BH: They're calling upon your admirers, the people who support you, who will attend your concert, to go on and appreciate your art form but to avoid the psychological and social pitfalls – this is their words – or being victimized by your new-found religionist fantasy.

BD: Well, they can't do that. They should know about fantasy more than I. But, they can't do that. You can't separate the words from the music. I know people try to do that. But, they can't do that. It's like separating the foot from the knee.

BH: You're saying that it's all one.

BD: It is all one.

BH: OK, Bob. I appreciate your time, I really do.

April 1980
Bob Dylan's letter to Steve

Source: ISIS #126, p. 23

This single page letter, which is being sold at auction by "R&R Enterprises" (June, 2006), is accompanied by the original envelope, addressed in Dylan's hand to "Steve". The letter was written by Dylan while he was on tour in Toronto, Canada and although it is not dated, we must assume that the letter dates from April 1980, when Dylan was playing four nights at the Massey Hall, Toronto.

Dear Steve –

We are up in Toronto singing and playing for about 3000 people a night in a downtown theatre – The Spirit of the Lord is calling people here in their beautiful and clean city but they are more interested in lining up for Apocalypse Now than to be baptized and filled with the Holy Ghost –

Wanna thank you for that Bible as it is helpful in discovering a few phrases from and shedding more light on what the King James version reads –

God will lift up your heart as you begin to realize that 'He thru Christ has reconsiled [sic] man unto Himself (II Corinthians). You are in basic training and boot camp and I thank God you are and your commitment runs deep and you will be used to minister and break the hold of darkness in those you become face to face with – "Study to show thyself approval"

You will be strong in the Lord and seeing that looks are deceiving, you will work miracles that way – He has called you to be a saint and your responsibility is to him and him alone –

Be praying and not looking back no more – press on toward what is ahead – I send love to you and will pray for strength and more strength for ya – Always In the name of Jesus Christ Son of God, Manifest in the flesh

Bob Dylan

16 May 1980
Pat Crosby Interview, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, p. 229.

This interview was conducted at the Hilton Hotel in Pittsburgh on May 15 1980 prior to the concert at the Pittsburgh Stanley Theater and broadcast on KDKA TV the same day. This taped interview lasts just 3 minutes. There is rumor of a 20 minute tape and possibly video but this is not circulating. The interview section comes after comments by irate fans protesting about Dylan's performance.

PC: How and why did Bob Dylan recently stop singing the older songs and start singing gospel and about the Lord? He said he would talk to us about it...

BD: I can understand why they feel rebellious about it because up until the time the Lord came into my life, I knew nothing about religion; I was just rebellious and didn't think much about it either way. I never did care much for preachers who just ask for donations all the time and talk about the world to come. I was always growing up with "it's right here and now" and until Jesus became real to me that way, I couldn't understand it.

PC: So can you understand people's reaction to you when you come on stage and start singing about Jesus and they want the old stuff?

BD: Oh, yeah, that's right, they want the old stuff. But the old stuffs not going to save them and I'm not going to save them. Neither is anybody else they follow. They can boogie all night, but it's not gonna work.

PC: Do you still hold the same enthusiasm for the older material or is it gone?

BD: Oh, yeah, I love that stuff. I look at it now and I hear it and it amazes me that it was me that even wrote it or performed it.

PC: It was Bob Dylan who sang many years ago that "the times are changing". It is clear that those words are still true.

21 May 1980
Karen Hughes Interview, Dayton, Ohio

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 869-871.

Karen Hughes, the young Australian journalist (see her earlier 1978 interview in Volume 3) conducted this session which was the first formal interview after Bob's conversion. Her article was printed in the New Zealand newspapers The Star on 10 July 1980 and The Dominion on August 2 1980. It was also reprinted in Occasionally 4.

Bob Dylan stretched out his hand and reached for a cigarette from a half-empty pack on the table. "It would have been easier," he sighed "If I had become a Buddhist, or a Scientologist or if I had gone to Sing Sing."

I asked him if many of his friends had forsaken him.

"No REAL friends?" Dylan responded tellingly, blowing cigarette smoke away from my face, in the tiny hotel room in Dayton, Ohio, where we talked as his tour was cutting across America's Bible belt and winding it's way back to Los Angeles, Dylan's home of nine years.

"At every point in my life I've had to make decisions for what I believed in. Sometimes I've ended up hurting people that I've loved. Other times I've ended up loving people that I never thought I would."

"You ask me about myself," Dylan said at the end of an intensive session of questioning, "but I'm becoming less and less defined as Christ becomes more and more defined."

"Christianity," he explained, "is not Christ and Christ is not Christianity. Christianity is making Christ the Lord of your life. You're talking about your life now, you're not talking about just part of it, you're not talking about a certain hour every day. You're talking about making Christ the Lord and the Master of your life, the King of your life. And you're also talking about Christ, the resurrected Christ, you're not talking about some dead man who had a bunch of good ideas and was nailed to a tree. Who died with those ideas. You're talking about a resurrected Christ who is Lord of your life. We're talking about that type of Christianity."

"It's HIM through YOU. 'He's alive', Paul said, 'I've been crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live. Yet not I but Christ who liveth in me'. See Christ is not some kind of figure down the road. We serve the living God, not dead monuments, dead ideas, dead philosophies. If he had been a dead God, you'd be carrying around a corpse inside you."

Dylan speaks of having constant dialogue with Christ, of surrendering his life to God's will much in the same way as Joan of Arc or St Francis of Assisi would have done. It is, he says, the only thing that matters. When you ask about his band, he replies "I think Jim Keltner and Tim Drummond are the best rhythm section that God ever invented."

His view on American politics is, "God will stay with America as long as America stays with God. A lot of people maybe even the President, maybe a lot of senators, you hear them speak and they'll speak of the attributes of God. But none of them are speaking about being a disciple of Christ."

"There's a difference between knowing who Christ is and being a disciple of Christ and recognizing Christ as a personality and being of God. I'm more aware of that than anything and it dictates my very being. So I wouldn't have much to offer anybody who wants to know about politics or history or art or any of that. I've always been pretty extreme in all them areas anyway."

Whether on or off the road Dylan worships whenever he can at the Assembly of God, a fundamentalist, pentecostal, evangelical denomination that believe in the literal Bible and speaking in tongues. He came to Christ through a revelation, a personal experience with Jesus.

"Jesus put his hand on me. It was a physical thing. I felt it. I felt it all over me. I felt my whole body tremble. The glory of the Lord knocked me down and picked me up."

"Being born again is a hard thing. You ever seen a mother give birth to a child? Well it's painful. We don't like to lose those old attitudes and hang-ups. Conversion takes time because you have to learn to crawl before you can walk. You have to learn to drink milk before you can eat meat. You're re-born, but like a baby. A baby doesn't know anything about this world and that's what it's like when you're reborn. You're a stranger. You have to learn all over again. God will show you what you need to know."

"I guess He's always been calling me," Dylan said gently. "Of course, how would I have ever known that? That it was Jesus calling me. I always thought it was some voice that would be more identifiable. But Christ is calling everybody; we just turn him off. We just don't want to hear. We think he's gonna make our lives miserable, you know what I mean. We think he's gonna make us do things we don't want to do. Or keep us from doing things we want to do."

"But God's got his own purpose and time for everything. He knew when I would respond to His call."

18 November 1980
Paul Vincent Interview, San Francisco

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 705-710

This interview took place backstage at the Fox Warfield Theatre, San Francisco on November 18th 1980. It was broadcast the following day on KMEL Radio, with a number of Dylan songs interspersed in the interview. The following is taken directly from the original interview tape rather than the radio broadcast.

PV: Over the past eighteen years or so you've been written about and analysed and criticised and second-guessed and worshipped and idolised by many. There was that fellow back in Greenwich Village who went through your garbage. As time goes on does it ever get easier being Bob Dylan?

BD: (Laughs) Well it's easy being Bob Dylan, it's just being, you know, trying to live up to what people would want Bob Dylan to do that might be difficult, but, uh, it's not really that difficult.

PV: More than once you've been referred to as a legend. I mean you're aware of that fact, whatever that word may mean. Is it difficult living up to those expectations? Is it something you've learned to live with, or is it a burden sometimes?

BD: Well, uh, the things I've done in the past which would lead up to that – some of those things I do – i still do. Some things I don't do. So, uh, as long as I keep it straight in my mind who I am and not get that confused with who I'm supposed to be, I think it'll be alright.

PV: You've said in the past that the songs are already there. I think Woody Guthrie may have said that too, and that your job was to put them down on paper. Is that to say that writing your songs comes easily?

BD: Yeah, the best ones come real easy.

PV: Do you ever find yourself pondering the phrasing of a line for an hour or so?

BD: Hm. Hmmm.

PV: There's been hundreds of analyses of your songs over the years, you're aware of that. Do any of your songs mean something totally different now than may be they did when you wrote them originally, or does the meaning remain just...

BD: The meaning stays the same. They don't change, uh, they change, you know, some bring out certain parts of 'em that may be not so evident years ago, as may be more evident to me now, but uh, they don't change.

PV: Last night for example on Simple Twist Of Fate you did some different lyrics in there. If you change lyrics in songs is it spontaneous or is it planned out?

BD: Uh, let me see. That particular song was recorded, I think, two times, and one time it had one set of lyrics, and another had another set of lyrics, but the difference in lyrics wasn't that, uh, you know, detrimental to the meaning of the song, on that particular song. I may sing some one night and another night depending what's in my – comes to my mind at the time.

PV: But the gist of the song is exactly the same. There's about even people try to pick apart your lyrics and try to... Should they be satisfied with it meaning to them whatever they would like it to mean to them as opposed to what it is you mean?

BD: Yeah, I think so. I think some place there's a, um, road there that what I expect... what I intend it to mean – and what they think it means – probably means something in the middle there... somethin'. Something they know... part of both.

PV: Doing the older songs that you do, do they mean something different in 1980? Does Blowin' In The Wind mean something different in 1980 than it meant in 1962?

BD: No. It's no different. I think it means the same thing.

PV: Your career's been marked by many changes. How much do you concern yourself about how quickly people will accept your changes?

BD: (Pause) Well, you just hope for the best, you know, you just hope people will come and see you and if they don't come see you then I guess it's time to stop.

PV: Some critics have not been kind as a result of the past two albums because of the religious content. Does that surprise you?

BD: Well...

PV: For example, they've said, some have said, that you're proselytising. Is Jesus Christ the answer for all of us in your mind?

BD: Yeah, uh, it's... I would say that, uh-huh. In order to, you know, what we're talking about is the nature of God and, uh, I think you have to... in order to go to God... have to, uh, go through Jesus, yeah. You have to understand that. You have to have an experience with that.

PV: Would you like to have us come away from your shows hopefully thinking more deeply in that direction?

BD: Oh, well, I don't know. You know, I don't give in to what people feel as they leave the shows. Uh, uh.

PV: You're not preaching to us?

BD: No, no I'm not... I'm not... I'm not (pause) I could do a little bit of this and a little bit of that but right now I'm just content to play these shows. I don't have, uh... this is a stage show we're doing, it's not, uh, a salvation ceremony.

PV: I first saw you on the Les Crane Show. It must have been back in, oh, must have been 1964 or so. You did Baby Blue and It's Alright, Ma. Since then you've only done TV a couple of times: Johnny Cash, the John Hammond PBS tribute and one other. Do you have any interest in being exposed on the tube at all?

BD: Uh, no, I really don't (laughing). I don't like... really, it seems funny for me to say, I don't really care for the bright lights that much.

PV: As far as interviews too, you haven't done that many interviews over the years. Is there a reason for that necessarily?

BD: No. No particular reason.

PV: Pennebaker's film, cinema verite documentary of kind of a day in the life of Bob Dylan called Dont Look Back is a great film, I think, and it's very seldom shown. Do you have any rights to that film at all?

BD: I don't know what the situation with that film is, you know.

PV: Because I know it was shown once at a Pennebaker film festival and, other than that first run back in whatever year it came out, you know, since then it hasn't been shown much at all.

BD: I don't know much about that.

PV: When you listen to current music are you influenced at all by what you hear? Do current trends concern you at all?

BD: Yeah, uh, current trends (pause) not so much. There're song-writers that I admire, you know, but, uh...

PV: You've always done your own thing. Back when the Beatles did Sergeant Pepper and the Stones did Satanic Majesties you came out with John Wesley Harding which was in totally... against the grain of the psychedelic...

BD: I wasn't going in that direction of that type of, uh, never was. I tried to keep my music simple.

PV: Your albums are a little more produced these days than they used to be.

BD: (Laughs) If that's what you call it.

PV: Do you still use the same recording techniques?

BD: Oh, I'd say over the course of a year – maybe a period of, uh, six days in the studio. That's probably it. (Laughs). If I can't make a record in six days I don't...

PV: That's the way it's always been too, basically?

BD: Hmmmmm.

PV: How involved do you get personally with the day-to-day business activities of your records and concerts?

BD: Uh – not too much. Not too deep.

PV; Are you aware of radio stations and whether they're playing...

BD: I listen to the radio, of course, you know, but, uh, sometime, and try to pick up different stations in different towns.

PV: We heard that you heard a cut from Saved on a Minnesota radio station and didn't...

BD: (Laughs) A St. Paul radio station...

PV: ...and didn't care for the mix and wanted to...

BD: ...just left it there. The mix... it was mixed wrong or something, I don't know, it didn't sound right to me anyway, so I... I don't know. I must've told somebody at that time who was, uh, working on the album. I know I didn't really say anything to the record company about it. But some people tell me that they saw it in the press that I'd said something about it, but I don't really recall – really making too much of a fuss over it.

PV: You realise that almost anything you say will be made a fuss over because you're saying it.

BD: If you say it to the right people it will, yeah.

PV: Would you like to have a hit single on top 40 radio?

BD: (Laughs) Yeah, sure.

PV: Why not, right?

BD: (Laughs) Yeah.

PV: Did... when writing your songs does that enter your mind at all, or is it just an interesting by-product?

BD: No, I don't (pause) I don't really know what sells and what... Well, of course, we all do know what sells and what doesn't sell – what you need to make a hit record. I think most people in the business know that. But, uh, I don't usually think of just that being the end result because, uh, I really keep my songs and make 'em happen so they last a while, rather than just be a hit record and gone.

PV: Your sets vary from night to night. How planned are your sets?

BD: They're not very well planned. Uh. (laughs)

PV: For example, I understand you did We Just Disagree, you've done Abraham, Martin and John...

BD: Yeah, well, we try stuff out to see what, you know, what feels right and what doesn't. We just... it's just trial and experiment.

PV: When you did Abraham, Martin and John on opening night you and Clydie, I believe, sat at the piano and on the line "has anybody here seen your old friend Bobby, do you wonder where he's gone" the crowd reacted. Could they have been thinking in this case, rather than Bobby Kennedy, could they have been thinking about "where has our old Bobby Dylan gone"?

BD: Sure, they could have, because, you know, they could think any Bobby. They don't necessarily have to relate it to me. They... It's just a name. Uh, yeah, I'm sure some people think... When I first heard that song I didn't really know who the Bobby was in it. I can't remember whether... I didn't put that together for a while. I put together the rest of the names but, uh, for some reason I... Kind of a slow one that for me.

PV: Just digressing for a moment – going back to your Budokan tour – that was a different feel, different look for you too as far as the way you dressed on stage and the way you did the songs. In fact, I remember when you did it here at the Oakland Coliseum you made the statement "you've been reading that this tour is showbizzy and disco but we know better than that". In a way I thought that you were maybe goofing on a bunch of us or maybe on the world with that tour.

BD: No, they always say something that's reported in the newspaper, I don't know who does it but it's always misinterpreted in some way, like the last show we had out was some kind of... it was like a "gospel show". Well it was because, uh, most, uh, most of my stuff, yeah, all my stuff at that time was influenced or written right off the Gospel but, uh, that was no reason to say it wasn't a musical show. And for some people, you know, they... they just went on one side and they forgot to say that it was also... it also had different aspects of it rather than just a... preachin' from the Bible which, uh, you know, a lotta people may read something like that and say "wow, you know, wow, I can read my own Bible I don't have to get it preached at me, you know". That's when they decide not to come. There's also a lot of people just turned of by the Bible, which is a case nowadays too.

PV: Maybe it could be something as simple as people knowing and loving your older songs so much and they mean so much to them that they so much wanted to hear them...

BD: Yeah, that's true. But don't forget now, people say a lot of stuff they don't mean and there's different reasons for saying this and different reasons for saying that. You may say one thing in a certain predicament and you find yourself in another predicament. You may find yourself saying, you know, the totally opposite thing. So when I hear that, oh yeh, people, they expected me to sing the old songs – well I was singing those old songs – we did a tour for it must've been, you know, nine months, singing them all over the world and, uh, there was a lot of complaints about that. I mean, I was just.. that tour... that had more complaints than, uh, than the last tour we did because people said, "well, you know, he doesn't sound like he used to sound and their arrangements are disco and they're slick" well that wasn't necessarily true. That wasn't disco, it wasn't slick and people couldn't see beyond that... uh, beyond... you know, it's like when you have your eye... your hand up in front of your eye you can't see your hand, you know.

PV: You've had those problems before – the Newport Folk Festival way, way back when you did the acoustic set and then came back with Mike Bloomfleld and a bunch of people and did the electric...

BD: I don't know how I keep going, you know (laughing) I just... I don't have any plan (laughing) I'll tell you that much. It's day by day, you know. That's all I can think.

PV: You do some great new songs here in the sets, here at the Warfield too. Are you working currently on the new album?

BD: Um...

PV: ...course, you're performing now. What are your plans on the new...

BD: I don't know. Like I say, I may record an album when, uh, when the time feels right, you know. I'll take whatever I have into the studio and record it.

PV: Financially you could have retired 10-15 years ago.

BD: Financially you can retire... if you just think financially, you can retire when you're born really, but, uh,...

PV: What gives you a feeling of fulfillment now at this point in your life?

BD: Uh, just watching, uh... seeing different growth in people, trying to love as much as I can.

PV: Your religious beliefs may stay the same, do you foresee continuing recording songs of that nature for very much longer?

BD: Well, I don't know. The way things change now, I don't know what's gonna change... this change how... which way it's gonna go. I'm sure it's gonna have some changing. You can't record every album and have it be a Saved type album, because, you know, you just don't get that many kinda songs all in a row like that. So I'm sure there'll be some difference but I don't... couldn't say what it would be.

PV: You have a yacht now. Are you enjoying yachting?

BD: It's not a yacht, it's a sailing ship. It's like an old schooner. Me and this other guy have it. It took about three years to build and it was built from the ground up and, uh... I don't know, you know, it's just there.

PV: There was another story I remember reading in the press that when the yacht was unveiled you weren't there at the unveiling and...

BD: I couldn't make it. I was on the road as a matter of fact. Yeah, we were playing in Cincinnati that night, I think.

PV: They expected you to be there too. You can't please everybody can you?

BD: You can't be in two places at the same time (laughs).

PV: How is it to live with that all the time – everything you say being picked apart, knowing that the world is watching you at all times?

BD: I don't pay no mind to it. I don't you know... it just don't have any concern for me really.

PV: What's in the future for you? That you can talk about?

BD: Well, we're just gonna play these shows and, you know, I'll be doing different things, you know, trying... we'll probably go round the world one of these years again. Uh...

PV: Just for pleasure? Not performing?

BD: No. we'll probably be going to perform and for pleasure. I like to mix business with pleasure.

PV: You're on the road a lot, aren't you?

BD: Yeah! Well, half the year. That's not... you know, some people are on more, some people are on less. 'Bout half the year.

PV: Bob, thank you very, very much. I've certainly appreciated it and I've been looking forward to this for a long time.

19 November 1980
Robert Hilburn Interview, San Francisco, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 231-234.

Robert Hilburn of the Los Angeles Times, clearly a favorite of Dylan since he's been allowed numerous interviews, conducts this one in Bob's hotel room on November 19th 1980, prior to that nights concert at the Fox Warfield. The interview centers around Dylan's conversion to Christianity. It was published in the Los Angeles Times of November 23rd and re-printed in the Boston Globe of 26th November. These two articles are almost identical although the Globe version does mix things around a bit, omits several items and even attributes to Dylan something said by Hilburn in the L.A. Times version. The following year, this article was again reprinted in the Sonlyght Special (Vol. 2, No. 4, April 1981) under the heading "Dylan Stands By Born Again Life".

BOB DYLAN SAYS HE'S TRULY BORN-AGAIN
"There was a presence in the room that couldn't have been anyone other than Jesus"

San Francisco – Bob Dylan has finally confirmed in an interview what he has been saying in his music for 18 months. He is a born-again Christian. Dylan says that he accepted Jesus in his heart in 1978 after a "vision and feeling" during which the room moved; "There was a presence in the room that couldn't have been anybody but Jesus."

He was initially reluctant to tell his friends or put his feelings into songs, but he was so committed to his gospel music by late 1979 that he did not perform any of his old songs during a tour. He said that he feared the old material might be "anti-God".

Believing now that the old and new songs are compatible, Dylan again sings such stinging rockers as Like A Rolling Stone alongside such born-again treatises as Gotta Serve Somebody.

Sitting in his hotel room here before a concert, Dylan, whose family is Jewish, sat on a couch and smoked a cigarette as he discussed his religious experience.

"The funny thing is a lot of people think that Jesus comes into a persons' life only when they are either down and out or are miserable or just old and withering away," Dylan said. "That's not the way it was for me."

"I was doing fine. I had come a long way in just the year we were on the road (in 1978). I was relatively content, but a very close friend of mine mentioned a couple of things to me and one of them was Jesus."

"Well, the whole idea of Jesus was foreign to me. I said to myself, "I can't deal with that. Maybe later." But later it occurred to me that I trusted this person and I had nothing to do for the next couple of days so I called the person back and I said I was willing to listen about Jesus".

Through a friend, Dylan met two young pastors.

"I was kind of skeptical, but I was also open", he said. "I certainly wasn't cynical. I asked lots of questions, questions like, "What's the son of God, What's all that mean – dying for my sins?"

Slowly, Dylan began to accept that "Jesus was real and I wanted that... I knew that He wasn't going to come into my life and make it miserable, so one thing led to another... until I had this feeling, this vision and feeling."

Dylan, the most acclaimed songwriter of the rock era, had been unwilling to grant interviews since the release last year of the gospel-dominated Slow Train Coming album, suggesting that anyone who wanted to know what he felt could simply listen to that work. The album was a passionate testimony to Christian salvation, devotion and doctrine. Though the album became one of Dylan's biggest sellers, many of his own fans felt confused, even betrayed: The man who once urged his audience to question all authority was suddenly embracing what some believed was the most simplistic of religious sentiments; furthermore, some critics argued, Dylan's attitudes were smug. Surely, many insisted, this was just another peculiar turn in Dylan's ever-shifting persona.

Even when he returned last Spring with another gospel album, the less commercially successful Saved, rumors abounded that he had abandoned the born-again beliefs. But Dylan shows on his present tour have refuted that speculation. Ten of his 17 songs on opening night were from the last two albums.

In the interview, too, Dylan stressed that his beliefs are deeply rooted: "It's in my system."

At the same time, Dylan showed that he has not lost his questioning spirit. Asked about the political activism of fundamentalist Christian groups like the Moral Majority, he replied, "I think people have to be careful about all that... It's real dangerous. You can find anything you want in the Bible. You can twist it around any way you want and a lot of people do that. I just don't think you can legislate morality... The basic thing, I feel, is to get in touch with Christ yourself. He will lead you. Any preacher who is a real preacher will tell you that: "Don't follow me, follow Christ."

Dylan still seemed uncertain about discussing his religious views when he began his tour here on Nov. 9, sidestepping questions on the topic at a news conference backstage after the opening show. But once he touched on the subject in the hotel interview, he spoke freely. The interview centers on his new direction in music, but it would be wrong to infer that Dylan has become a "Jesus-freak" stereotype. During the interview, and during other, more informal chats, he spoke with equal zest about various matters, including the decision to do his old material again.

"This show evolved from the one we did last year," he said, "It is probably going to evolve even more. Some people say you should have several acoustic numbers all in a row, just me and a guitar."

RH: Any of your songs that you couldn't sing today? Any song that you couldn't relate to?
BD: I don't think so. I could probably sing them all, even Queen Jane Approximately.
RH: Why didn't you do any of the old songs on the 1979 tour?
BD: I truly had a born-again experience, if you want to call it that. It's an over-used term, but it's something that people can relate to. It happened in 1978. I always knew there was a God or a creator of the universe and a creator of the mountains and the sea and all that kind of thing, but I wasn't conscious of Jesus and what that had to do with the supreme creator.
RH: After you had the vision, I understand you attended a three-month Bible course at a church in Los Angeles?

BD: At first, I said "There's no way I can devote three months to this. I've got to be back on the road soon." But I was sleeping one day and I just sat up in bed at 7 in the morning and I was compelled to get dressed and drive over to the Bible school. I couldn't believe I was there.

RH: But you had already accepted Jesus in your heart?

BD: Yeah, but I hadn't told anybody about it because I felt they would say, "Aw, come on." Most of the people I know don't believe that Jesus was resurrected, that He is alive. It's like He was just another prophet or something, one of many good people. That's not the way it was any longer for me. I had always read the Bible, but I only looked at it as literature. I was never really instructed in it in a way that was meaningful to me.

RH: I had assumed that these feelings came to you at a crisis point in your life, a time when you were desperately needing something else to believe in.

BD: No. I had gone so far that I didn't even think there was anything left. I thought, "Well, everybody has got their own truth." What works for one man is fine as long as it works for him. I had given up looking and searching for it.

RH: But didn't you go to Israel? You seemed to be searching for some religious...?

BD: Not really. If I was searching, it was just to... get down to the root reality of the way things really are, to pull the mask off. My thing was always to pull the mask off of whatever was going on. It's like war. People don't look at war as a business. They look at it as an emotional thing.

When you get right down to it, however, war – unless one people need another peoples land – is a business. If you look at it that way, you can come to terms with it. There are certain people who make a lot of money off of war the same way people make money off blue jeans. To say it was something else always irritated me.

RH: Did you start telling friends about it when you went to the Bible classes?

BD: No, I didn't want to get myself up. I didn't want to reflect on the Lord at all because if I told people and then I didn't keep going, they'd say, "Oh well, I guess it was just another one of those things that didn't work out." I didn't know myself if I could go for three months. But I did begin telling a few people after a couple of months and a lot of them got angry at me.

RH: Do you have any fear that what you're saying now may come back to haunt you in five years – that you aren't really committed?

BD: I don't think so. If I would have felt anything like that, I think it would have come up to the surface by now.

RH: But we've seen so many rock stars get involved with gurus and maharishis and then move on.

BD: Well, this is no maharishi trip with me. Jesus is definitely not that to me.

RH: What did you think about some of the hostile reviews to Slow Train Coming?

BD: You can't look at reviews.

RH: Do you see how people could think some of the messages in the album were heavy-handed?

BD: It's in my system. I don't really have enough time to talk about it. If someone really wants to know, I can explain it to them, but there are other people who can do it just as well. I don't feel compelled to do it. I was doing a bit of that last year on the stage. I was saying stuff I figured people needed to know. I thought I was giving people an idea of what was behind the songs. I don't think it's necessary any more. When I walk around some of the towns we go to, however, I'm totally convinced people need Jesus. Look at the junkies and the winos and the troubled people. It's all a sickness which can be healed in an instant. The powers that be won't let that happen. The powers that be say it has to be healed politically.

RH: What about some of the new songs? Some seem only remotely religious.

BD: They've evolved. I've made my statement and I don't think I could make it any better than in some of those songs. Once I've said what I need to say in a song, that's it. I don't want to repeat myself.

June 1981
Sandra Jones interview, London(?)

Taken from Jean-Pierre Duclos' excellent booklet. 'N'Avez-vous Rien A Lire? – Numero 2'.
Translated from French by J. J. Stevens. April 1984.

BOB DYLAN: 'I AM NO LONGER A REVOLUTIONARY'
by Sandra Jones: Ciné-Revue'

A rock star and poet followed by millions. Bob Dylan was unquestionably the musician who had the greatest influence over young people in the sixties. His most famous songs became the rallying cry for a number of 'revolutionary' movements of the time. Worshipped like a god, followed like a true messenger, he showed the way to the beginning of a new musical age: folk-rock owed its origins to him. Continually running away from home from ten onwards, recording his first album at twenty. Bob Dylan has had an explosive career which is far raptures and, despite a number of voluntary retirements that are shrouded in absolute secrecy, he still regains a world-wide phenomenon today. For the first time in ages (he no longer enjoys hearing the word 'interview' since his awkward altercation with a German reporter), he has agreed to speak to our colleague, Sandra Jones; also for the first time he talks openly about his career and his life, about accusations that trouble him (he is supposed to have beaten his children) and about the fact that he remains a fascinating personality in the music world.

SJ: What was that incredible question, without doubt the stupidest and most irritating of all that you were asked three years ago in Europe? Clearly you've never forgotten it...

BD: Perhaps that's one of the reasons that brought me back here... I want to put the record straight! I'll never forget that obnoxious question. Put yourself in my shoes. I was coolly asked: 'How does it feel to sing in the same Nuremberg stadium where Hitler made those inflammatory statements forty years ago?' If that isn't a stupid question, what is?

SJ: And what did you reply?

BD: I said that I'd come back in a few years time and make him eat his words.

SJ: You've had plenty of time to prepare for your revenge. If you met the same man tomorrow, you'd probably tell him what you really thought.

BD: Don't you worry about that: I'd certainly have a suitable reply for him if he dares to cross swords with me again! He's a German reporter who has achieved some kind of notoriety already, if I'm not mistaken, by delving into 'personal' matters! But I'll see him again and I'll tell him why I couldn't condemn that wretched Hitler and his notorious Nuremberg speech and I'll explain that when I sang in that stadium in 1978 I was really angry at a group of cops who had jumped on some kids. All the kids had done wrong was to approach my trailer.

SJ: If Bob Dylan could go back in time, would he travel the same road, would he leave behind everything he had, to devote his whole life to music?

BD: I don't think I can answer your question with all the honesty it deserves. First, you can never rebuild the past, and that's how it should be. So, it's not humanly possible to answer that question. Over twenty years a man accumulates experiences, mistake and successes. At the end of the day, he finds out that he has changed totally and that he couldn't travel the same road again. With the experience that I've gained, how could I go back to my youth and say I'd do it all over again? Thinking it through, I'm sure I would never have left home. I got on very well with my parents that they would have a folk-singer as a son. And then, what has been termed the rock revolution, didn't really happen at all. It was just the logical conclusion of an explosive situation, a situation caused by an experimental phase that was to bring about a great upheaval in the music world. Folk music and rock music are two closely linked phenomena. It's no coincidence that Elvis Presley was a great folksinger before becoming the king of rock n' roll and that he started his career in Memphis.

SJ: Two of your most well-known songs, 'Blowin' In The Wind' and 'Mr Tambourine Man' have served as anthems for a whole generation. Do you consider yourself to be the leader of this generation, do you feel in some way responsible for it?

BD: It could just as well have been somebody else. Doubtless I was actually the first one to speak directly to those young people and I'm pleased about that. But I've never been their messenger. I don't feel my work has any of those aims. At a particular point in time young people needed to believe in something and music became the religion they adopted. Something that inspired quite a few of them with hope for the future, but perhaps not all of them. I, my friends and all the other singers from that time had a specific function to fulfill and we did fulfill it. During those fantastic times in 1968, what would those young people have been singing if the Beatles and other musicians, of whom I was one, hadn't been there to help them? All revolutions have always had a musical backcloth. History proves that, from the eighteenth century in France through to the Russian revolution of 1917. This phenomenon isn't something new or specific to our time.

SJ: It seems that your last two albums, 'Slow Train Coming' and 'Saved' haven't had the success that your record company anticipated. What do you think of that? Don't you feel that you are somewhat a victim of what is today called 'the backlash' against the values of the sixties, that you are experiencing the indifference of a public that has perhaps become blasé about things?

BD: I'm not aware of the significance (in Europe) of that 'backlash' term you are talking about, although I've heard quite a bit about it. The truth is that I wanted to give my life a new meaning, to make it more spiritual. Today I'm accused of being a follower of religion. But I've always been a follower! My thoughts, my personal needs have always been expressed through my songs; you can feel them there even in 'Mr Tambourine Man'. When I write a song, when I make a record, I don't think about whether it'll sell millions of copies. I only think about making it, the musical end-product, the sound, and the rhythmic effect of the words. It's purely a technical piece of work because the most important thing is to come out with something that's perfect artistically. Even Charlie Chaplin used to say that and I respect him for that judgment.

SJ: In the past, you've had some very hard words to say about drugs and other forms of 'artificial escapes'; was this a conscious stance, or did you adopt this position because of the anti-drug campaign that has spread across the States in the last few years?

BD: I've never done anything I've been told to do or served a cause. Drugs are dangerous and that's why I'm speaking out against using them. My position is perhaps a hard-line one; it's a firm commitment against that type of escape. I hate to see people become the slaves of drugs. I've never taken drugs, even when nobody was interested in my songs, even when I was accused of being too rich to talk about certain things. I think that taking these stands has proved I was right.

SJ: Why did you make a film like 'Renaldo And Clara', which lasted four hours and which was rather baffling to most people?

BD: That was a failure I admit. But I wanted to make a very personal film. No star has the right to hide what is real about his life and his personality. That's the reason for making that film. If I am a legend, as you say, I've set a good example.

SJ: Do you like women, Mr Dylan?

BD: Let's say that I'm envious of women, because I consider that they are the real victors in the greatest battles of the century. I've come to understand that through the women I've loved – Joan Baez; Sara, the mother of my five children; and my most recent companion (the New Zealander Ra Aranga.) They've given me a lot; they've taught me to become a better person. Thanks to them, I've matured.

SJ: But you've been accused of having beaten your wife Sara and your children. It's said she left you to protect them. Is that true?

BD: There is a private Bob Dylan and a public Bob Dylan. One came out of legend and the other loved his life like a man. The one Dylan has no control over the other. It's impossible to know what lies behind all these rumours. What is certain is that the this is the right moment to justify or blame myself. They have only ever been able to imply that I did this or that. All I've said is that that isn't part of my job.

SJ: A few weeks ago you were forty. Do you feel old?

BD: It's only men's minds that grow old and I've held on to the spirit of my younger years. I'm still excited at the prospect of singing to thousands of young people. I still get as much pleasure out of creating something new. I spend hours playing the guitar and harmonica. I don't feel the weight of the years. And, even if I did, I would still be a happy man who loves life.

SJ: Mr Dylan, what is your present 'market' value?

BD: I'm worth one and a half million dollars. The cost of a supersonic plane. Maybe a bit less...

12 June 1981
Yves Bigot Interview, Transatlantic Telephone Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 235-238

Transatlantic telephone interview between Bob Dylan in Detroit and Yves Bigot in Paris. One of three transatlantic interviews Dylan gave that day. This session was broadcast on Radio Europe 1 on June 22 and 23 as part of 2 one-hour specials on Dylan called Rock A My My. The broadcast was just prior to the concert in Paris at Colombes Stade Yves du-Manor on the 23rd. When broadcast, the questions were spoken in French by Michelle Abraham with Dylan's response, whilst just audible, being overdubbed in French.
The French broadcast was translated and transcribed for the Dylan magazine Fourth Time Around but I've chosen to transcribe directly from the tape of the telephone conversation because this is substantially different and, of course, a more accurate record of the original conversation.

YB: Hello Bob!
BD: Yeah.
YB: Where are you calling me from?
BD: I'm calling you from Detroit.
YB: Yeah, you are gonna play there tonight?
BD: Tonight.
YB: Yeah, and how is the tour going?
BD: Oh, it's going pretty good.
YB: Yeah, and behind each one of your tours there has always been a very strong spirit – I mean you don't tour just to promote an album, and behind each of your tours there has been a very strong spirit. Which is the one of this tour, of this year?
BD: Well, I usually tour, you know, between albums, and I've been touring between albums over here for the past few years. You know, so we've kind of been on tour for the past two years. You'll be seeing the result of the shows from the past two years and a few new things, a bunch of things that nobody's heard before.
YB: Yeah and who are your musicians who are with you on this tour?
BD: Well, it's the band I've been working with for the past, in the recent past few years. Jim Keltner playing drums, Tim Drummond, who's playing bass guitar; on guitars I've got Fred Tackett and Steve Ripley, and then on the keyboards I've got somebody by the name of Willie Smith. And I have four backing singers, one girl was with me the last time I was there, her name is Carolyn Dennis. And then I've got some other girls you haven't seen before.
YB: You have written a lot of new songs lately. When can we expect a new album?
BD: Well, very very soon, in fact very soon, maybe in the next few weeks, I hope anyway.
YB: So you've already recorded it?
BD: Yes, it's already been recorded and mixed and pressed I believe and it should be out as soon as they can get it to the stores.
YB: And who produced the album?
BD: A guy named Chuck Plotkin and myself.
YB: The last album you produced yourself was Blood On The Tracks?
BD: Yes, exactly. That's the last album I did produce by myself and this is the next one.
YB: Yes and the sound was very very good on that album. What do you use producers for, when you use them?
BD: Well, the past two albums I used producers to organize everything in the studio for me and to come up with some ideas and who are the musicians, what kind of musicians to use. And to help me sort out the songs and make some sense out of what I do. Just when I come in with a bunch of songs – somebody who come in and oversee that and put it together, and come out with an album. And they'll be responsible for the sound of it. And this time I wanted to do it by myself.

YB: You've always been very interested in rhythms on your last albums and on your last tour there when you came to Europe you used reggae, salsa, and even funk rhythms. Are you very interested in the last developments lately of, you know, jazz....

BD: Oh sure, well, I just use about any kind of rhythm that I can... that I feel, you know, that I feel like I wanna play. Mm, yeah I use a lot of different types of rhythms. Some songs are just old hillbilly kind of rhythm you know, and some songs have like, I guess a 12 bar blues type of rhythm and then between them it's just about anything that happens to find its way into the song. I kind of use all kinds of rhythms just to keep it different.

YB: You use any kind of music, when it's real music... but, I mean, when you can feel any kind of music beat... rock or hillbilly or blue-grass or blues or rhythm and blues.

BD: Yes. if I can feel it I'll play it. If I can feel it I'll do it that way.

YB: You know, some people who study behavior say that one only repeats during his whole life what he thinks and what he wants to say to the world when he's 16 or 17. I think you have proven them wrong over your career but what would you think would be the thread that run throughout all your life or your career.

BD: I didn't quite understand that. The... the career.

YB: Yeah, or through all your life, there is a thing, a constant thing that you wanted to express through all your life.

BD: That I stayed honest, that I tried to be true, and didn't lie to myself or nobody else.

YB: Do you believe in fate or in destiny?

BD: Mm – Well, I do, sure.

YB: Do you believe that everything has been planned for each one of us or do you believe that each time we have to make the choice we are completely free to do that choice but, that we have a destiny?

BD: I do believe that things are planned for everyone of us. But I also believe that we have free will to change it at one time or another, although I'm not so sure about changing the end result.

YB: Yourself, do you feel the same, the same person, the same human being as when you were a little boy, or do you feel different?

BD: Well, you know it's like the French say: Everything changes but it stays the same.

YB: Except you grow wiser, maybe.

BD: I hope.

YB: It's just the experience.

BD: Yeah.

YB: You said once, I think, 2 or 3 years ago, something that touched me very deeply, among all the many things you did, you said that to feel reality you have to be vulnerable and I would like to know if your faith has changed something to that belief.

BD: Er, what was that again?

YB: You said that to feel reality, to be close to it you have to be vulnerable.

BD: Vulnerable? (Not understanding pronunciation).

YB: Oh yeah! Maybe it's the wrong word in English. You have to be touched, you know, by everything in life, everyday, you know.

BD: Aha – I still believe that – yes, I do that.

YB: And, er... you think that... I mean... You don't feel stronger now? Or do you still feel that, you know, you have to have a certain, you know, label of sensitivity?

BD: Well.... [clearly having difficulty understanding the question which, like all the rest is in broken English, with a heavy French accent and on a line subject to a lot of background noise]... I think that's correct, yeah.

YB: I know that you are a Gemini, and I am a Gemini myself, so maybe that's one of the reasons why I was, you know, touched so much by your movie Renaldo & Clara and by the album Street Legal. And you talked very much about personality, about the difference between "that enemy within" as you call him and... Can you tell me a little bit about that? Was it really the theme of the movie?

BD: I think so. I think it was like identity, you know... the identity that is... one identity being... interrolling with the other identity. I think you'd say that about that.

YB: But do you think that much of evil... maybe not evil, but much of violence in the world and in the individual people is caused by this duality?

BD: I do think that, yeah. Sure, when one side takes over another side, one side is feeling stronger at that moment.

YB: And maybe it's when somebody is not who he wants to be also he can become very paranoid.

BD: Sure, it's extremely dangerous.

YB: Did that ever happen to you?

BD: Oh sure, just about every day. (laughs)

YB: And wasn't Renaldo & Clara about all this?

BD: Yes! It was!

YB: And, would you wish to do another tour just like the Rolling Thunder Revue because it was really....

BD: No, you won't see that again.

YB: Why? Because once is enough?

BD: Well, yeah, I think so. You know things just couldn't go on that way.

YB: The times have changed?

BD: That's right. Well, you know, anything's possible, it could happen again. Yeah it could happen. I doubt it would, but it could.

YB: Are you going to do another movie someday?

BD: I would like to. I would really like to do that Yves. I just don't have – I haven't found, what do you call it? A script or something.

YB: How was the experience of doing Renaldo & Clara?

BD: Oh, it was invaluable, an invaluable experience.

YB: What about now – we are going to talk about what is going to happen now – what about the concerts you're going to be playing in France? Is it the first time you're going to play in stadiums? No! You played Forest Hills and many stadiums in the States?

BD: Oh, sure I've played stadiums before.

YB: But, you know, in France it's going to be the hugest concerts ever.

BD: I hope so. I hope it will be that way.

YB: I know, I saw you from a few – ten or twenty meters – at the Bruce Springsteen concert in Los Angeles, at the Sports Arena. And, I think you were impressed.

BD: Oh sure, I was. Listen, Yves, I've a show to do tonight and I've got to get on the bus, otherwise I won't have any way to get there.

YB: Okay, Bob. I thank you very, very much for this interview and for your time and for everything you did. And we are looking forward to welcoming you to France.

BD: Alright, well maybe I'll get to see you when I'm there, get to meet you.

YB: Okay. So do I. Thanks a lot and have a good concert. Goodbye, Bob.

BD: Bye.

12 June 1981
Tim Blackmore Transatlantic Telephone Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 469-471.

Transatlantic telephone interview between Bob Dylan in Chicago and Tim Blackmore in London. One of three transatlantic interviews Dylan gave that day. This session was broadcast on London Capital Radio on June 15.

Announcer: Here we were, Friday night, here at Capital Radio, half past eight it was in the evening. Brr, brr, went the trimphone. "Pick it up, will you". "Accept the call from Mr Bob Dylan". "Well certainly," said Tim Blackmore. Now, first of all, they talked about his current tour which arrives in London in just eleven days from now.

BD: Well, we've just done playing in Chicago. Uh, huh. We've been off the road for about six months.

TB: And how's it looking?

BD: Basically it's about the same. Actually, its er.... the crowds are a little bigger, this time we're playing outdoors – we haven't played outdoors in a few years so that changes the atmosphere some. Summer nights just kind of hang in the air, gets kind of sticky and kind of humid much quicker than it does indoors.

TB: Right, well it's three years since you were here in London and you played the devastating concerts at Earl's Court and also down at Blackbushe. Are you looking forward to coming back to London?

BD: Oh, sure. It seems like they appreciate different things in Europe than they do here. Here they take a lot of things for granted. We've been playing some new songs that nobody has ever heard before. I think people in England react more spontaneously to the stuff that I do than the people here, you know, you sit here for so long and they take you for granted, you know, and anyway, I've taken a lot of my earlier songs from a lot of old English ballads and Irish ballads and stuff like that, so people will probably relate to that a lot more over there than they do here. Here, I'm not really sure if people are aware of where songs like Master Of War or Girl From The North Country, where those songs really originate and come from.

TB: What was particularly exciting... When you played Earl's Court last time was, I think a lot of us who followed your music and had been with you over the years, we were, perhaps, a little worried if you'd be playing the old songs when you came last time and you came in with those tremendous new arrangements. Were you at all nervous about whether people would accept the old songs and new arrangements?

BD: They did in Europe and in England. They accepted them, they didn't much accept them here and they called them – you know, I think at the time they were saying "Oh, Dylan's on a new wave" or "Disco Kick" or something like that, but they, over there, they seemed to.... I didn't think of my songs as disco or they seemed to apply meaning to them which I'd never intended and I didn't find that to be true over there.

TB: Does that mean when you started this tour that you're now doing in America that you've avoided doing re-arrangements of the old songs?

BD: Well. I wouldn't call them re-arrangements of the old songs. I think they are really more true to their character now. The band I've got with me now is, I think, the best band I've ever had. Everybody seems to understand my music more than any band I've ever had – usually I put together bands that wouldn't be together otherwise, but this time it seemed like that this band is just born to be, together with me.

TB: Is there anybody who was in the band that you brought over last time, who'll be coming with you this time?

BD: Well, there's just one girl, that's Carolyn Dennis – she's a really fine singer, she's been with me about three or four years. She's the only one I think that's been with me – most everybody else is new this time over, but I'm sure that you'll like the band.

TB: What's happened since you were here last is you've released the two albums, which really testified to your Christian faith. Are we going to hear more of those songs in your set now?

BD: No, you won't be hearing any more of those songs but what happens, you know, is over a period of time is all of those songs become old songs. And we've just finished a new album and I think is really good. We just finished that in the last month and it's supposed to be ready for release now and we'll be playing some stuff off that album too, and then things that go back as far as Blowin' In The Wind – I'm trying to do as many songs as I can from just all kind of periods of time.

TB: Is this new album something you've done with Jerry Wexler and Barry Beckett again?

BD: No, I did it by myself this time. Me and another guy named Chuck Plotkin – we just -I got tired of making records sort of, you know, that kind of didn't come out the way that I had planned it to be, but this time, this album, it sounds pretty much the way I hear my music, that I intend it to be. I think you'll like it.

TB: Well I certainly look forward to it. Did you have any nervousness about coming here after that gap the previous time?

BD: Hmm. Well, yes, maybe so, maybe I did have a little bit of nervousness – but, you always do. Usually the reception makes me nervous more than the actual performances – I don't get too nervous during the performances, but all the attention and all the media, you know, all that makes me kind of nervous. When you come in at the airport and there's photographers and, you just... people ask you questions. That kind of makes me nervous.

TB: A lot of people listening to you Bob would probably be surprised to hear you say that after what is twenty years of making music before people, that you're still nervous in front of the attention the media gives you.

BD: (laughs) No... I really don't — It just makes me nervous. I don't, you know.... I just feel, like, people put me in a position that I didn't really start out to be in. I like to perform, I like to play, but all the rest of it just kind of confuses me sometimes. I'm kind of camera shy. Anyway, I never did like to have my picture taken.

TB: You don't seem to be microphone shy though, you're talking into this telephone very freely.

BD: Well, that's a different thing because you can't see me. (laughs)

TB: Well, I certainly look forward to seeing you. What do you think the chances would be of you perhaps coming to see us at Capital Radio when you are in London.

BD: Oh, well, I don't know – it depends if we have the time, you know. Maybe you'll come backstage at one of the shows or something and I'll get the chance to meet you.

TB: Well, I would certainly like to do that very much!

BD: OK Tim, listen, I gotta catch the bus.

TB: OK, Well I hope you have a good bus trip and we look forward to seeing you over here in just a couple of weeks time. Good luck with the rest of the tour on your side of the pond.

BD: OK, thank you.

TB: Thank you.

BD: Bye.

12 June 1981
Paul Gambaccini Interview, Transatlantic Telephone Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 239-240.

Transatlantic telephone interview between Bob Dylan in Detroit and Paul Gambaccini in London. One of three transatlantic interviews Dylan gave that day. This session was broadcast on BBC Radio 1 on June 20 in the "Rock On" program.
Taken from the circulating tape.

PG: Who's coming in the backing band this time? What's the music gonna be like?

BD: I 'm bringing the same band that I have been with for the last two years.

PG: You'll be at Earl's Court, which is where you were last time. Were you surprised last time by the friendly response?

BD: Ah, sometimes the response is less than friendly, and sometimes it's friendly, but over the years you just kind of get used to any kind of response.

PG: I know that recently in the States you've been performing a lot of your inspirational material. Will you be doing that in London?

BD: We'll be doing some of it. Most of the stuff comes from all the albums. And then we just finished an album, so we'll be including some new songs too. The name of the new album is Shot Of Love.

PG: Does that continue in the inspirational vein?

BD: Well, you kind of have to decide that for yourself. It's different than the last, it's different than Saved and it's different than Slow Train, and it sounds old but it's new.

PG: Does it feature any of your recent players like Barry Beckett?

BD: No, I didn't do this one down in Muscle Shoals, I did it in California. So Barry's not on this one. I did use my usual band. Actually Ronnie Wood played on one song, so did Ringo.

PG: I've received some very exciting mail on the last couple of albums, because some people who shared your sense of what might be called ministry or message were very excited that you were with them on it and other people had thought, well, what is Bob doing, now?

BD: Yeah, I don't know. Sometimes it takes... you know the older albums don't really mean something to some people until they're hearing the new one and in retrospect they go back and hear something else from the path that'll seem like it takes the steps that leads up to the new one. I think this new album we did is, for me, I think it's the most explosive album I've ever done. Even going back to Blonde On Blonde or Freewheelin' or any of those, Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61, or whatever they were... I think this one is, for it's time right now, will be perceived in the same way and I may be totally wrong in saying that, but I feel that same way about this album as I did about when we recorded Bringing It All Back Home, that was like a break through point, it's the kind of music I've been striving to make and I believe that in time people will see that. It's hard to explain it, it's that indefinable thing, you know, that people can write about, but they can only write about it and around it, you can't really take charge over it, because it is what it is and you can't really expound on it, it itself is the beginning and the end of what it is.

PG: In Blood On The Tracks, which was another of my favorite albums, you were speaking right from the heart. Is that the kind of feeling you have lyrically on this album?

BD: Well no, that was a different sort of thing. That was a break through album for me too in another sense of lyrics. I've done things I've never done before. This is just a different sort of thing, it's like the thing I've always wanted to do. And, for one reason or another, I have always been bound in certain areas where I couldn't have the right structure around some kind of things to make it come off, in a way, because mainly, when I don't do that much talking, so when I 'm playing, you have to be able to communicate with the people around you in order to get your point of view across. And If you have to do too much of that communication it gets confusing and something is lost along the way. And this time that didn't happen. Everybody was pretty much together.

PG: Do you feel then, that you now have accomplished what you want to as an artist, or...?

BD: I think so. I think the next album I do I don't... I think I will do an instrumental album now.

PG: You think so?? [surprised reaction]

BD: Yeah. I've come as far as there is to come and now I 'm gonna start just doing instrumentals.

PG: Are you finding at the moment inspiration from any other artists, as I think you probably found from Dire Straits a couple of years ago?

BD: Oh, yeah well, I just spoke with Mark recently... mm, I've always liked Gordon Lightfoot...

PG: Recently here, Bruce Springsteen's gone down very well. Do you like him?

BD: Yeah, Bruce is a very, very talented guy.

PG: Did you know that Bruce has included This Land Is Your Land in his concert program?

BD: Oh he has? That's amazing! That's good. Well maybe he'll start doing Blowin' In The Wind! Maybe he'll do an album with Bob Dylan songs!

PG: Well, funnily enough, I heard on the radio recently, Manfred Mann's version of With God On Our Side. And I thought that in this current atmosphere where there is so much talk about nuclear disarmament and the talks, missile talks, particularly in Europe, where it is a great concern at the moment, that these songs of yours from the early albums about the nuclear disarmament situation take on a new timeliness. Do you ever think about that?

BD: No. Not really, but it doesn't surprise me. I thought they were timely then, and just as sure they're timely now.

Blowin' In The Wind plays followed by Heart Of Mine.

2 July 1981
Dave Herman Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 241-250.

Conducted at the White House Hotel in London, England on July 2, 1981 by New York DJ Dave Herman. Broadcast by WNEW-FM Radio, New York, July 27 1981. Released on the promotional album DYLAN LONDON INTERVIEW JULY 1981, Columbia AS 1259, September 1981 to help promote the Shot Of Love album. This peculiar official release was packaged to look like a bootleg with white sleeve and facsimile rubber stamp on the front cover. Later, when promoting the Oh Mercy album, Dylan's reluctance to provide an interview for a two-hour syndicated radio special led to this interview being re-used as a filler.

What you can't get from the transcript is Dylan doodling on his guitar throughout the interview although it rather adds to rather than detracts from the ambience.

DH: Last night in Earl's Court, here in London, I guess there were about twenty thousand people in there and when I kind of saw them, I guess it was when you did It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding) and every last one of them in the place was standing on their chair and it was pretty... out front at least there was a pretty special kind of a feeling. I was reminded once again, that you really do have a very... you know, that you play a very special part in the lives of an extraordinary amount of people, you know, all over the world and I gathered that this has always made you a bit uncomfortable, that people hold you in a very special place?

BD: I don't feel uneasy with the part of it, that part of it, but the other part of it, you know the part where you're expected to... go to parties... and... record stores, be somebody all the time, you know. That's what makes me feel uncomfortable.

DH: Or the part that makes people presuming you have somehow a lot of answers that they might not to the larger questions?

BD: Well, if you... the answers to those questions, they've got to be in those songs I've written. Someplace, if you know where to look, I think you'll find the answers to those questions. It's right there in the songs. Better than I could say it.

Herman tries to discourage Bob from playing the guitar.

DH: Maybe that's why, over the years, that you have given so very few interviews, because probably people just come by and, once again, hope that you're gonna come up with some answers that are in the songs. In the lyrics of your songs, and in the music. But you've given, I don't think, more than maybe half a dozen major interviews. You never really talk a whole lot to the press or radio people.

BD: No, I haven't.

DH: Do performers and artists feel that there's some kind of adversaries there, when reporters come in...

BD: Well, performers feel that.., they don't feel they're adversaries, but they do feel that... they feel a lot of times that their points are not taken the right way or they feel imposed upon to answer questions that have really little to do with why they fill halls or sell records.

DH: Well, I got some questions for you that I hope aren't those and I hope that they're also questions that the answers of which aren't really in your songs. For instance it seems to me that... we are sitting in London, and Mrs Thatcher is the prime minister here and back home it seems to be a kind of a new political wave of conservatism sweeping across the world and I wonder if that kind of concerns you at all, if you've noticed the change in the political winds, so to speak?

BD: No. I don't know much change between conservatism or liberalism. I can't see much differences between either of those things.

DH: But there are areas of relative freedom and there are areas of relative repression and I think that in the 1960s, where a lot of us come out of it all, people were much freer to create, much freer to express their ideas at least in the western world, where it just seems to me there might...

BD: You think so?

DH: Well, I don't know. No, I just see... for instance there are groups of people that are boycotting sponsors of television shows that they don't like...

BD: But they don't like them for a specific reason, though. A lot of these people that are boycotting those shows they got children, they show things on those shows, they don't want their children to see. Television now goes into every home, there's not much you can do about it. It's better than outlawing TV-sets.

DH: Can't they just not have their children watch the TV, I mean...

BD: Think about forty years ago, there wasn't any TV-sets, so there was nothing to boycott...

DH: OK, well another thing is, ah, I was just reading recently where it seems that in the United States the abortion question is becoming one of the major political controversies at home.

BD: Well, that is just a diversion, though. Whenever you think about abortion, pro, con, you know, I think you should be thinking about those things, then they put you away with the bigger things, which you're not thinking about. So you get everybody thinking about abortion and they turn your back from it... not to say that abortion is not important! But you can make something so... you know cast a spell on something and make everybody look that way and then you come at them from another direction

DH: But that sounds like it's conspiratorial?

BD: Yeah, it does, doesn't it?

DH: Yeah, it does! I don't think it is, but I don't think people sit in rooms and say well, let's divert them with the abortion issue, and then we can slip this in while...

BD: You actually don't think so?

DH: That it's that calculated? You think it is?

BD: I don't know... Now abortion is important, I personally don't believe in it but..., unless of course somebody needs to have their life saved.

DH: Well, it's not a matter of believing in abortion...

BD: Eat too much candy and you gonna get sick!

DH: But people should have, it seems to me, just the right to make choices about themselves, if it doesn't hurt anybody else... it's like, you know...

BD: (laughs) Well, everybody does have the choice to make about themselves...

DH: Could you kind of just tell me what people mean, what it really means, when people describe themselves as "born-again", which is something we hear a lot about from a lot of people, there are millions of people that say that they're born again.

BD: Yeah. What they mean by saying that is that they're born again by the spirit from above. Born once is born with the spirit from below. Which, when you're born is the spirit that you're born with. Born again is born with the spirit from above, which is a little bit different.

DH: Do you know how it happens to people? Is it a decision that one makes or is it an experience that just comes from nowhere. Is it unconscious, is it conscious?

BD: Well, it happens in all kinds of ways. There's really no one way that it happens I guess. If you talk to this person that tells you that it was unconscious, if you talk to another one that says it was a conscious decision. Some people say they just heard a voice on a lonesome road, other people say they were in the middle of a football game, some people were in the men's room of a Greyhound bus station, you know. Sometime, you don't have to be in any special situation, that it might come up, you know.

DH: Let's talk about Shot Of Love. It's the new album.

BD: You don't wanna talk about Saved? (laughs) No one wants to talk about Saved! (laughs more).

DH: I thought we'd come back into it. I think somebody once said "Don't look back"...

BD: Yeah... (laughs)... Well, Shot Of Love is the new record, we have coming out...

DH: And it's also a kind of a return, it seems to me, to an album of songs that cover a whole lot of different subjects, there are love songs in it, there's a song about Lenny Bruce. As opposed to Saved, which was really a collection of religious songs, it was one theme to that album, and Shot Of Love is a return to a more eclectic album. You know, I am wondering whether that isn't something that just happens haphazardly or whether it's something that's, what do you say, "Saved maybe was too much stuff in one vein or too narrow in scope, and maybe I ought to get back to doing a whole bunch of songs" or whether those were just the songs that came out of you?

BD: Yeah, those were the songs that just wanted to come out. I never know from one album to the next what kind of songs I'm gonna be doing. It amazes me that I even continue to make albums.

DH: What do you mean by that?

BD: It is always a miracle of some kind when I make an album, because... it's so contrary to the way I move. Working in a studio has always been very difficult for me.

Shot Of Love Plays.

DH: You approach record making a lot differently than a lot of people do? Some people spend a year in the studio.

BD: I approach record-making in the way that I learned how to make records when I started recording, when I recorded for John Hammond. And we work the same way.

DH: Which is?

BD: Which is, going into the studio and making a record. Right then and there. I know the other way and I know a lot of people do it the other way and it's successful for them, and, er... but I'm not interested in that aspect of recording. Laying down tracks and then coming back and perfecting those tracks and then perfecting lyrics, which seem to wanna go with those tracks. Songs are created in the recording studio. Where, for me, see I'm a live performer, I have to play songs which gonna relate to the faces that I'm singing to. And I can't do that if I was spending a year in the studio, working on a track, you know. It's not that important to me. No record is that important. I mean the world is gonna go on... who needs these records? You know what I mean?

DH: Well, but the point is though that the record... simply that's why it's called a record, I guess... it's forever. A record is forever too.

BD: A record is forever... well, it is forever.

DH: It's like a book, you know.

BD: It's forever, I guess... but... it sure is...

DH: You're saying that like you never thought about that before.

BD: No, I never did think about that before, but I see in my records..., I mean, gee, I hear records that I made twenty years ago, and I say 'Oh man, God, did I make that record, y'know?'

DH: But that record will be here if the world is a thousand years... I mean, that record is here Bob, long after you're gone, these records will be here and people will listen to them and think... well one thing or another about this guy who made these records, four hundred years ago.

BD: Oh, poor me! (laughs) But, they seem important at the time! You know, they really do. Yeah, they are important, I'm not saying that records aren't important, but... it's also new. I mean, making records is new. Just the fact that we're doing this interview now, through this tape recorder, we couldn't have done this...

DH: There wouldn't have been any radio stations to play it on 75 years ago. The point remains that as an artist there must be some...

(Through the entire interview Dylan has been softly doodling on an acoustic guitar)

I just hope that this guitar... I don't know cause I can't hear it back... I hope it isn't louder than we are, which would make it difficult for people to hear us, I'm afraid. Even though I'm enjoying it immensely...

BD: Well. I'll play it softly then.

DH: Yeah, that'd be great. I'm enjoying hearing it. It's an old guitar. It's really beat up. It's been around the world a few times I guess.

BD: Well, I've carried it around the world a few times and I think somebody else carried it around before that too.

DH: Where were we? Ah... oh yeah, what I wanted to say about a record being forever that... There must be some concern from you as a man and artist that people will be hearing this thing and coming to conclusions about Bob Dylan long after you've gone. There must be something that you'd like to leave in the world for those people who hear these records, something that they'll get, will give meaning to your life after your life is over.

BD: Well, I'm not done yet! And I'm still doing it and I'm still not knowing why I'm doing it. Come on, I mean there's other things that I would really, you know, enjoy doing, besides playing and...

DH: Like what? I mean if any man can do what he wants to do, you can!

BD: Like what? Well, I mean, like become a doctor, you know, yeah I think a surgeon, you know, who can save somebody's life on the highway. I mean that's a man I'm gonna look up to, as being somebody with some talent.

DH: Do you think you could get into med school?

BD: (laughs) Not to say now, that art is valueless. I think art could lead you to God, you know, but...

DH: Is that it's purpose?

BD: I think so. I think that's everything's purpose. I mean if it's not doing that it's leading you the other way. It's not certainly leading you nowhere. It's bringing you somewhere. It's bringing you that way or this a-way.

DH: Well, if it expresses truth and beauty then it's leading you to God?

BD: Yeah? (laughs)

DH: Well, wouldn't you say?

BD: If it's expressing truth I'd say it's leading you to God and beauty also.

DH: I've always thought that those were the only two absolutes that there were.

BD: Well, beauty can be very very deceiving. It's not always of God.

DH: Would you elaborate on that a little bit?

BD: Well, beauty appeals to our eyes...

DH: And to our hearts?

BD: Our hearts are not good. If your heart's not good, what good does beauty do, that comes through your eyes, going down to your heart, which isn't good anyway?

DH: The beauty of a sunset?

BD: The beauty of the beast. The beauty of a sunset? Now, that's a very special kind of beauty.

DH: Well, how about the beauty of the natural world?

BD: Like the flowers?

DH: Yes, and the beasts... and the rain...

BD: All that is beautiful, That's God-given. I've spent a lot of time dealing with the man made beauty, so that sometimes the beauty of God's world has evaded me.

Heart Of Mine plays.

DH: On Shot Of Love is a song called Lenny Bruce, which you perform just at the piano and I love the song, because I loved Lenny Bruce and I was a great admirer of him, when he was alive and working, and of course since his death. But it occurred to me it's a long time since Lenny's gone, I think he went in the summer of 1967, I think it was. Why, after all these years this song about Lenny Bruce?

BD: You know, I have no idea!

DH: Did that song just come to you somewhere...?

BD: I wrote that song in five minutes! It is true, I rode with him once in a taxi cab. I thought it was a little strange after he died, that people made such a hero out of him. That when he was alive he couldn't even get a break. And certainly now, comedy is rank, dirty and vulgar and very unfunny and stupid, wishy-washy and the whole thing.

DH: Some people thought he was rank and dirty and vulgar...

BD: But he was doing this same sort of thing many years ago and maybe some people aren't realizing that there was Lenny Bruce, you know, who did this before and that is what happened to him. So these people can do what they're doing now. I don't know, you know.

DH: Lenny spent a lot of time bad mouthing the church, too. Well, from the point of view of organized churches. Is there a very big difference between the political structure of the various churches, no matter what the denomination might be and what the spirit is all about. Do you think that the Catholic Church, traditional Judaism, or any way that these religions are organized and filled with rites and rituals... Is that part of really of what you feel the truth of the spirit of God is all about?

BD: Well, that's a complicated question! I'm not an authority on Catholicism, you know. Ritual has really nothing to do with spiritual laws. However, if you do walk according to the law, all of the law, well, you'd be a pretty pure person and on a pretty high level. A person who could no doubt move mountains, if you walked according to the law, and most people can't walk according to the law, because it's so difficult, there are so many laws, that govern just about absolutely every area of your life.

DH: Maybe it takes more than one lifetime to get all of that. Is the fact that we come back again and again something that, I'm talking about reincarnation and the fact that maybe we spend more than one... let's say the Hindu way of believing that we get in touch with our own divinity and do walk according to the law, that it takes more than one life? Think that there's a possibility that that might be the way? And what's 60, 70, 80 years?

BD: It's not a whole lot of time, when you think you need another lifetime! (laughs) You want another life time? How many do you want?

DH: Well, you have to pay not to go through this thing twice! (laughs)

BD: That's it.. That's right! Well I figure if you can't learn it here, you can't learn it.

DH: Back to Lenny Bruce, and the fact that it's again yet another Bob Dylan song about, as you even say in the song, an outlaw. A lot of the stuff, a lot of the songs over the years, Lenny Bruce, Outlaw Blues, Joey Gallo, Hurricane Carter, or Absolutely Sweet Marie, "to live outside the law, you must live honest" (sic). A lot of outlaw imagery and outlaws in your work. What is it about "man as outlaw" that intrigues you so, you spend a lot of time on...

BD: Well, it's not, there again, I don't think it's anything conscious. I guess it has to do with where I grew up, admiring those type of heroes, Robin Hood, Jesse James... You know the person who always kicked against the oppression and was... had high moral standards. I don't know if these people I write about have high moral standards, I don't know if Robin Hood did, but you always assumed that they did.

DH: I assume that Joey Gallo did?

BD: In some kind of way you have to assume that he did, in some kind of area. It's like... I've never written a song about some rapists, you know. I think what I intend to do is just show the individualism of that certain type of breed, or certain type of person that would... that must do that. But there is some type of standard I have for whoever I'm writing about. I mean, it amazes me that I would write a song about Joey Gallo.

DH: But you did!

BD: Yeah!

DH: A long one too.

BD: Very long one. How long was that? About a half hour?

DH: About eleven minutes.

BD: Yeah, well I feel that, you know, if I didn't do it, who would? (laughs). But that's an old tradition! I think I picked that up in the folk tradition, when I was singing nothing but folk songs for years. There are many songs, a lot of Irish ballads, Roddy McCorley, names escape my mind at the moment...

DH: There must be a hundred songs about Jesse James?

BD: ...Jesse James, Cole Younger, the US bandits, Billy The Kid,... and then, of course the English ballads had them and the Scottish ballads had them and the Irish ballads. I used to sing a lot of those songs and that just kind of carried over with me into the... whatever this special brand of music that I play now is, it just kind of carried over into that.

DH: People who know you and work with you told me in the last few days, when I was getting ready to talk to you, that they've never seen you more relaxed and content and...

BD: (laughs) People always say that!

DH: No, no. They really don't always say that, and I have a feeling that, you know, you are experiencing that. It's a real nice place to be now on this European tour. Otherwise I don't think we would be sitting here talking. You know, if you were preoccupied with a lotta things or felt out of synch with yourself, I think you probably are feeling pretty centered right now. As your friends were saying.

BD: Well, I know what I have to do and I'm just trying to do it, you know.

DH: The ego's got to play a big part in being a performer. Not everybody can go out there night after night, do what you do, and hear that applause and... How much of a part does that play in... I mean, do you feel a little bit like maybe you're hooked on the stage and on the celebritydom of it all?

BD: No. I don't mind the celebrity part of it.

DH: Could you be an anonymous person?

BD: I try to be an anonymous person, yeah. As far as the applause goes, I get just as much... sometimes it's applause, sometimes it's booing. You get used to it over years. I mean, I've been doing it for so long, whatever the applause is, it doesn't surprise me any more.

DH: But isn't it nicer when it's a big applause than... than one hand clapping?

BD: Yeah, it's a lot more comfortable.

DH: Isn't it nicer when the album, you know, is in the top ten instead of number... hanging around at forty-five or something?

BD: Well, it is and it isn't. Like Slow Train was a big album. Saved didn't have those kind of numbers but to me it was just as big an album.

DH: So it really matters little to you, the acceptance or the rejection on the part of the record buyers?

BD: No, it doesn't. I'm fortunate that I'm in the position to release an album like Saved with a major record company so it would be available to the people who would like to buy it.

DH: Was there a time in your life in the past, when you'd be on the phone: "what did the album do this week? Or is the single... did it go from 8 to 4?" Was there a time when you really got off on that kind of stuff?

BD: Well, you always wanna know what's happening with your record, so the first few weeks, yeah, you'll call up and find out, you know, if it's selling or if it's not selling. Sure.

DH: Has the music business changed in the 15 years or so that you have been making records?

BD: Very much so.

DH: If you were on TV you'd've seen an expression on his face there, actual winds of pain shot through you!

BD: Yeah. Now this last record that we just did was a comfortable record for me to make, because of... you know Chuck? Chuck Plotkin? Well, we worked together on it. OK, up until then... Well, he made the record the way I want to make the record. He understood that. He wanted to make the record in the same way. But the record business is changed because – see, when I went in in what they call, I guess not even in the early days... it was in the sixties really, you went – everybody made records the same way as I did. No matter who you were, Beatles, Rolling Stones, The Animals, The Byrds...

DH: Maybe we should just explain to people that that means all the people who were on the record were in the studio, in the same room at the same time, playing at the same time...

BD: ...and they made the record. You were a group, you were somebody, before you went in and made the record. You were somebody.

DH: Earned the privilege of making a record?

BD: Yeah, yeah, you'd played around, you paid enough dues to make a record. Now, people don't wanna pay no more dues no more. They expect to make a record right away without anybody even hearing them and then you'll find a producer, they have so many producers now, they didn't have that many producers back then, the producer was what they called the A&R man. Now you have all these producers who are in themselves stars. And it's their record. I don't think of myself as being told, you know, what to do all the time, you know.

DH: Are you on one side of the gun control issue or another? Do you think that this business of all the guns we have in America... I notice here in London, the policemen don't even have guns on their hips, you know, they don't carry weapons.

BD: But they have a much lower crime rate over here too. Well, you can't change the States in that kind of way. It's too many people. It didn't get off on the right start... You know the United States is like gun crazy, always has been gun crazy, you know. White man used to shoot the Indians with guns. Guns have been a great part of America's past. So, there's nothing you can do about it. The gun is just something which America has got, you know, lives with. I don't think gun control is making any difference at all. Just make it harder for people who need to be protected.

DH: And you quoted him in a Playboy interview a few years ago,... You said Henry Miller said that the role of an artist is to inoculate the world with disillusion.

BD: Yeah.

DH: Is that what you try to do with your work?

BD: No. I don't consciously try to inoculate anybody, you know. I just have to hope there's some kind of way this music that I've always played is a healing kind of music. I mean if it isn't I don't wanna do it. Because there's enough stuff, so-called music, out there, which is sick music. It's just sick. It's made by sick people and it's played to sick people to further a whole world of sickness. Now, that's not only true of music, this is true in film industry, it's true in the magazine industry. Certainly a lot of it on the television, bill-board signs. You know it caters to people's sickness. There's a lot of that. And if I can't do something that is telling people or... hoping anyway that.. whatever their sickness is, and we're all sick, whatever it is, you can be healed and well and set straight. Well if I can't do that, I'd as soon be on a boat, you know I'd as soon be off, you know, hiking through the woods.

DH: There's a song on Shot Of Love, Every Grain Of Sand, which is about as healing a song as I ever heard from you. It's a beautiful, beautiful song.

BD: Oh, yeah, I wrote that last summer.

DH: Is that what you mean by hopefully healing music?

BD: I would hope so.

Every Grain Of Sand plays.

DH: Well, Bob, is there anything you would like to tell the vast radio audience out there?

BD: I think they know just about anything that I've got to tell them. I think they know it.

13 July 1981
Press Conference, Kurhaus Hotel, Travemünde, West Germany

Source: Endless Road

THE TRAVEMÜNDE PRESS CONFERENCE
by Patrick J. Webster

On July 13th, 1981, in the banqueting room of the Kurhaushotel, Travemünde, Bob Dylan held a rare press conference.

It was a hastily organised affair, Dylan had just seen a completely fabricated "interview" of him in a Danish newspaper, in which he was supposed to have talked about John Lennon's death. Hence, wanting to set the record straight, that afternoon a conference was arranged.

About twenty journalists headed for Travemünde, a small town on the Baltic coast near Lübeck in West Germany, Dylan's base for the Bad Segeberg concerts.

The conference began just before midnight and lasted for some one and a half hours. For the record Dylan was dressed in a black polo shirt, white jeans, dark sunglasses, and a red and yellow striped wool cap, which he is reported to have fingered nervously throughout.

A tape of the conference did emerge and passed into circulation among Dylan collectors. However it was only sixty minutes long and in very poor sound quality.

In terms of its sound quality, on a scale of one to ten the tape would barely register one! But something can be gathered from it. What follows then is a transcript of those parts of the tape that are possible to decipher. It should be stressed that this transcript lays no claim to being a final version, and probably only includes one half of the material on the tape. Should any reader be able to hear more or to make improvements please contact the writer through Endless Road.

Also included are extracts from various press reports of the conference in Germany including questions and answers either not on the tape or not decipherable on the tape. It is possible to see that sometimes these quotes are not precisely what Dylan actually said, but the general sense is more or less accurate. (Some license has been taken in the placing of these quotes, as it wasn't possible to always be sure of their exact place in the conference. I've tried to place them where they make the most sense.)

The whole atmosphere is very relaxed, sprinkled with good humour, in fact much like the conferences in California in 1965. In truth Dylan's comments are seldom very startling. He seems somewhat guarded about Lennon's death and the fears it might have made in him. The comment about "Self Portrait" is fairly outrageous, but was Dylan really being serious? His faith in Christianity seemed as committed as ever, (the King of Kings, Lord of Lords quote) even though the concert comments had been very much toned down in 1981. There is also the revelation that he likes Polka Band music! (But anyone interested should read Toby Thomson's book Page 33 about the radio stations in Minnesota to understand this.) Dylan is very complimentary about Michael Wiehe, the singer he had seen on television the night before, and so on.

Since the mid sixties, apart from the abortive conferences at the Isle of Wight in 1969 and Tokyo in 1978 (and it should also probably be mentioned the Santa Monica interviews in January, 1978 and a kind of mini-press conference back stage at the Fox Warfield theatre in November, 1980), Dylan press conferences have been few and far between. This one at Travemünde is the only major one.

So, in the hope that even in an incomplete form it may be of some use, a transcript is presented here.

(Many thanks to Harald Muller for the patient, meticulous work in translating some of the German newspaper reports.)
Muller

Q: Did anybody actually ask you about John Lennon's death?
BD: No, they didn't ask me anything...
Q: They made the whole thing up?
BD: Yes. they made it all up.
Q: But did anybody beside that Danish journalist talk to you about the death of John Lennon?
BD: No, nobody ever really asked about that.
Q: But will you talk about that?
BD: ...I don't know, you know, what can you say? He was actually killed by someone who supposedly loved him. But what kind of love is that?... That was hero worship in a mad kind of way.
Q: Did that scare you?
BD: Well, no... because I don't write those kind of songs John Lennon wrote. I never wrote those kind of songs... "Imagine". I never liked that song, I mean I know it was a good song... he wrote one song, "Mother" 'Mother you had me, I had you', that's a very personal kind of song... It hits somebody in a special kind of way... I can't even relate to it.
Q: Do you still like to play the old stuff?
BD: I don't know what we'll play tomorrow night, but we could play just about anything. Some nights we play... you gotta kind of feel out the crowd, you know...
Q: Would you play more the newer songs or the older songs over here in Germany?
BD: Well, we've made a new record in the States, so we're gonna be playing some of those songs, and we'll be playing songs from ten years ago, eighteen years ago, we'll be playing songs from most of the albums.
Q: So 50% of your programme will be old songs?
BD: What do you consider old songs? How old do they have to be to be old songs?
Q: I would say five years.
BD: I don't know...

...sure, I guess you call it the devil on earth.
Q: How do you recognise him? (The Devil)
BD: How do you recognise him? Well he's transparent, isn't he? (Laughter)
Q: [Undecipherable question about "Self Portrait"]
BD: Well that was a joke, that album was put out at a time I didn't like the attention I was getting. I never did want attention. At that time I was getting the wrong kind of attention for things I hadn't done. So we released that album to get people off my back, so they would not like me anymore, that's the reason the album was put out, so people would stop buying my records, and they did. (Dylan laughs at this.)

...the cowboy myth in America has gone...
Q: There's a former star from Hollywood called Ronald Reagan.
BD: Oh that cowboy! (Laughter.)

Q: Do you know Robert Shelton?
BD: Yeah, he's writing a book on me...
Q: Do you feel flattered?
BD: Well...
Q: Do you still know Joan Baez?
BD: Who? (Laughter). Someone said she was at a show we did in Paris, she was in the crowd, but she didn't come back to say hello. I felt bad about that.

Q: Do you still see yourself as a protest singer?
BD: No.
Q: But isn't it necessary in today's world, to think about the peace and disarmament movement.
BD: Well, nuclear arms, nuclear disarmament... disarm all nuclear weapons... there's gonna be a battle anyway. The way I feel is that people who want war will fight war whether it's nuclear war or whatever, with spears and other weapons...
Q: Is there any truth in the rumour that you're going to join the peace concert that is going to be held at the end of the peace march from Copenhagen to Paris?
BD: People have jobs to do. everybody has a job, everybody has work, that's cool.

BD: Oh yeah, for sure yeah, a few years ago... Jesus did appear to me and is King of Kings and Lord of Lords and he did die on the cross for all mankind.
Q: How did he appear to you. I mean what did you do at this time in the winter of '79?
BD: Do you really want to know? Mm, well I don't know, I've told the story so many times... Re-born, that's what they call it. re-born. It's pretty scary to think about, so I don't think about it too much... I'm not preaching, ...it's spiritual, it's not complicated.

Q: How does it feel playing with these musicians?
BD: Well this band is the best band I've ever played with, I can get any sound.
Q: Better than the Band?
BD: ...We can do more things than I could do with the Band, this is more rock orientated.
Q: Could you talk a little about the new album, what kind of songs will there be on it?
BD: Well, we'll be playing a bunch of them tomorrow night... I don't know what I can say about it?
Q: Compared to, let's say, the last two.
BD: I think these three albums will give a broader picture...
Q: Do you think it will blur the picture or establish your image as a christian musician?
BD: I've no idea.

BD: ...I like French music, I like French melodies... Charles Aznavour type of melodies.
Q: Do you know any German music?
BD: I know polka, polka band music. I know it very well. I grew up with it. Absolutely... I just love it, most people don't understand it.

Q: Your film "Renaldo & Clara", was a financial disaster, wasn't it?
BD: The press didn't like it, nobody liked it at all...
Q: Most people couldn't understand it... They showed it on TV and some special cinemas... I read this Ratso book, I felt when I read it, I could understand more about you, your film. It was kind of inside you and other people... Do you have any plans for a new film?
BD: No, no plans. Lots of American films don't come to grips... you have to go to clubs and bars where it is... Small towns where people who are never going to be in a movie... But it costs so much to produce and make...
Q: In the past your songs were covered by a lot of other musicians. Is it important for you that still today other musicians play your songs?
BD: That's a good question. I should have thought about it, but if Earth Wind & Fire play "Saved" that would be fine.
Q: Today, who plays the old songs by Bob Dylan the best?

BD: There's a guy in Oslo that sings my songs better than me. Incredible! I don't know the guy, I'd have had him come and play the show tomorrow night. (Laughter) He's quite good.

Q: (He's Norwegian.) What kind of songs does he play, out of which period?

BD: He plays "Baby Blue" and "All Along the Watchtower", couldn't believe it. It wasn't on a record, it was on my television.

Q: Was he copying you, that means playing the same style that you did, or was he doing something different, for example like Jimi Hendrix with "All Along the Watchtower"?

BD: Yeah, no, his heart and soul were in it.

Q: Do you like the versions of Manfred Mann?

BD: Yeah, those are okay... even better than Peter, Paul & Mary!

Q: When you're rehearsing new musicians you don't write down the chords do you, they just have to follow you?

BD: Well, it's easy to play with me, I mean I only play three chords.

Q: Although some musicians have problems following your songs... still when there are only three chords, it's your kind of style of playing.

BD: Oh yeah, I hear my things on other people's records and I know what they're picking up. Stuff I did, like in the late sixties... very common now.

Q: They just have to follow you?

BD: You could play with me. it's very easy to play with me.

Q: What do you think has changed in your lifestyle?

BD: My lifestyle? Well, let's see. I think probably I'm probably the same, doing the same things, going to the same places, nothing more. Life doesn't really change, the scenery changes.

BD: ...Well, with Jesus, you're talking about a supernatural things. It goes beyond... Most people, their concept of God. well God created the earth and sat on the mountains... There are so many religions around, some religions say you have many lives. Some religions say you come back again. Other religions say just sit there and stare at the wall and you'll find total peace. So what? Jesus is not a religion, is not a religion. I could talk about it for days and days...

Q: Who would you like to write a song with?

BD: I don't know. I should know, maybe with Stevie Wonder.

Q: And is there anybody you'd like to record with?

BD: Anybody I'd like to record with, a real person? Mm, maybe one time make a record with Joan Baez. I don't know if she'll ever talk to me again. (Laughter)

Q: How can people relate to you?

BD: In my music I guess. That music comes through me. it just comes you know.

Q: It's you playing it.

BD: Yeah, it's me playing it, it's a big part of me. It's a special part and it's special music too...

Q: But it could come through somebody else?

BD: I can't answer that.

Q: Could you imagine anybody else who could write these songs?

BD: Paul Simon writes great songs. George Harrison great songs, a lot of people, Eric Clapton produces wonderful music.

Q: Is Dylan Thomas still your favourite poet?
BD: He wrote some wonderful poems.

Q: Who's your favourite philosopher?
BD: I don't know.

Q: Once again, who's your favourite philosopher?
BD: Mm, the guy who wrote Thus spoke... someone, he's good.
Q: Nietzsche?
BD: Yes, I like him.

20 & 21 July 1981
Neil Spencer Interview, Munich, Germany

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 873-878.

Neil Spencer, editor of New Musical Express, interviewed Dylan briefly backstage after the first of two shows in Munich on July 20th and then, at greater length the following afternoon in Dylan's fourth-floor hotel suite. The two sessions were published together in the New Musical Express on August 15th 1981 under the title

The Diamond Voice Within

IN THE EMPTY LOT backstage in the athlete's changing area, Bert, a Dutch Dylanologist from Oor magazine, and I are lined up for our brief audiences with Dylan.

"Oh God," comes the unmistakable voice through the open door of the dressing room as an aide reminds him of our impending presence and we catch a glimpse of Dylan pulling on a sock. A minute later and we're shaking hands with the maestro, who seems as nervous as we are, with the air of a man slowly exhaling the potent adrenalin charge of two hours' onstage at the hub of 7,000 people's attention.

His stage threads – black trousers, the satin bomber jacket with its curious golden design – lie limply across a chair, Dylan now wearing a sloppy white sweatshirt, jeans and training shoes. He looks beefier and stronger than all those "wiry little cat" descriptions of history suggest, more sporty; the scene seems almost collegiate. The eyes are large, washed out electric blue, and riveting, still topped by the great burst of locks.

We chat about the show, which Dylan didn't like – "you couldn't hear anything and the audience was kinda strange, you should have been at last night's show" – and about press reaction to the show. Dylan seems to feel the papers give him a hard time whatever he does with the old songs: "You just can't win."

I remark that Maggie's Farm is a popular song in Britain these days, and Dylan and bassman, who's also present, exchange blank looks before the bassie tumbles "Maggie Thatcher" and they break into laughter, me wondering about the slow association after a week playing down on the farm itself.

He'd heard about The Specials' version but wasn't familiar with it. He mumbles something about "punk waves and new waves" as he packs his stuff, before offering "I like George's song."

George?

"Boy, George's song is great." Oh, George Harrison. (It transpires the two spent some time together on Dylan's stay, inspiring him to play Here Comes The Sun at one Earl's Court gig. One wonders whether they discussed Monty Python's Life Of Brian, (which Harrison financed). I mumble something about whether he thinks the old songs seem to get new meanings in the light of changing times and his new beliefs, and Dylan fixes me with a piercing look.

BD: I'm different, the songs are the same. The songs don't mean that much to me actually, I wrote them and I sing them...

NS: There's nothing from Desire or Street Legal though...

BD: We could do a completely different set with completely different songs. They're all old songs, even the ones from Slow Train are old now. I tell you what though, I feel very strongly about this show. I feel it has something to offer. No-one else does this show, not Bruce Springsteen or anyone.

NS: Was he surprised at the amount of hostility the conversion to Christianity had brought?

BD: Not surprised at all. I'm just surprised to hear the applause every time I play. I appreciate that. You can feel everything that comes off an audience... little individual things, that are going on. It's a very instant thing.

Outside the tour bus is ticking over and filling up with musicians and road crew, and one of the gospel quartet is doing a soft shoe shuffle in the rain. Tomorrow, comes the word, is a proper interview, at the hotel Maybe.

I WENT TO SEE THE GYPSY STAYING IN A BIG HOTEL in the centre of the town, where the occasional appearance of a denim clad roadie provides colorful contrast to the assembled grey ranks of German businessmen. Pre-match nerves vanish as I trot out onto the plush turf of Dylan's fourth floor suite. To one side, a TV flickers without sound. Dylan wanders in wearing a black leather jacket and white jeans and we start committing words to the tape. He talks slowly, his speaking voice deeper than you expect from his singing, and not at all like sand and glue. The replies come carefully considered and usually as evasive and non-committal as we've come to expect over the years.

NS: Someone told me you'd been working with Smokey Robinson. Is that right?

BD: No... we were doing a session, along with Ringo and Willy, and he was rehearsing across the street with his new band, a new show. I'd seen him on the street going it so we went out on a break and said hello.

NS: You didn't work with him?

BD: No.

NS: Are you pleased with the new album?

BD: The last time I heard it I was. I haven't heard it since I left for Chicago. Which was the beginning of June. I was satisfied enough to leave town.

NS: The sound is a lot rawer. A much looser sound.

BD: Well, I had more control over this record... That's the type of record I like to make. I just haven't been able to make them.

NS: Why's that?

BD: Well, usually I've been working quickly in the studio and for one reason or another I just get locked into whoever's producing, their sound, and I just wanna do it and get it over with.

NS: Who produced this one?

BD: Chuck (Plotkin) and myself produced it. Bumps Blackwell did Shot Of Love with me, which he helped with a great deal. You remember him?

NS: No, who's that?

BD: Bumps did all the early Little Richard records and Don and Dewey records, he handled all the Speciality records.

NS: That's the rockiest track right? A lot of the rest is bluesy, or some of it has a reggae lilt. Do you still like reggae?

BD: There's not much difference between country, and reggae when you take away the bass and drums; they're very similar.

NS: You've always seemed to have one foot in rock n' roll, Little Richard and that, and the other in the blues, folk, country traditions...

BD: Well, I love it all, whatever might be popular at the moment.

NS: Do you still do everything in a couple of takes?

BD: On this album we did.

NS: I'd heard you like to work in a very spontaneous way.

BD: With this new band we can usually work very quickly with a new tune.

NS: It is nearer your 'Mercurial- Sound' with this band?

BD: Yeah... it's a little hard to reproduce that on stage of course. The only thing we were really able to do that was with The Band on those Bob Dylan And The Band tours in the '60s. Because the sound back then was so raw and primitive the sound systems wouldn't give us anything else. And when The Beatles played you could never hear The Beatles. Even the Stones' people were screaming and there wasn't much sound. You could never hear what they were doing.

NS: I have to ask you about the Lenny Bruce song (Lenny Bruce Is Dead) You said it was very spontaneous.

BD: That was a really quick song for me to write. I wrote that in about five minutes... I didn't even know why I was writing it, it just naturally came out. I wasn't, you know meditating on Lenny Bruce before I wrote it.

NS: It's a very compassionate song.

BD: It is.

NS: It is in the tradition of your songs about folk heroes like Hurricane, George Jackson...

BD: I thought Joey was a good song. I know no one said much about it, I thought it was one of those songs that came off and you didn't hear that much about it.

NS: Looking at the other songs on the album there are a lot of criticisms of people in high places. Would you say that's true?

BD: (Laughs) Yeah that's always true I guess... I don't really know, y'know. I'm not sure it hangs together as a concept because there were some real songs on this album that we recorded, a couple of really long songs, like there was one I did – do you remember Visions Of Johanna?

NS: Sure...

BD: Well, there was one like that. I'd never done anything like it before. It's got that same kind of thing to it. It seems to be very sensitive and gentle on one level, then on another level the lyrics aren't sensitive and gentle at all. We left that off the album. We left another thing off the album which is quite different to anything I wrote, that I think just in a musical kind of way you'd like to hear. And in a lyric content-way it's interesting. The way the story line changes from third person to first person and that person becomes you, then these people are there and they're not there. And then the time goes way back and then it's brought up to the present And I thought it was really effective, but that again is a long song and when I came down to putting the songs on the album we had to cut some, so we cut those. Now what we have left is an album which seems to make its kind of general statement, but it's too soon to say what that general statement is.

NS: There's a reference to "The Politics Of Sin" on Dead Man.

BD: Yeah, well that's what sin is, politics. It just came to me when I was writing that's the way it is... the diplomacy of sin. The way they take sin and put it in front of people... the way that they say this is good and that's bad, you can do this and you can't do that, the way sin is taken and split up and categorised and put on different levels so it becomes more of a structure of sin, or, "These Sins are big ones these are little ones, these can hurt this person, these can hurt you, this is bad for this reason and that is bad for another reason." The politics of sin; that's what I think of it.

NS: Do you still feel politics is part of the illusion?

BD: I've never really been into politics, mostly I guess because of the world of politics. The people who are into politics as a profession, you know, it's... the art of politics hasn't changed much over the years. Were there politics in Roman Times? And are there politics in Communist countries? I'm sure there are.

NS: You feel what the world's facing is more of a spiritual crisis?

BD: Oh Yeah, definitely. Definitely. People don't know who the enemy is. They think the enemy is something they can see, and the reality of the enemy is a spiritual being they can't see, and it influences all they can see and they don't go to the top, the end line of the real enemy – like the enemy who's controlling who you think who's your enemy.

NS: Who's that?

BD: What, who you think your enemy is?

NS: Yes.

BD: You would think the enemy is someone you can strike at and that would solve the problem, but the real enemy is the Devil. That's the real enemy, but he tends to shade himself and hide himself and put it into people's minds that he's really not there and he's really not so bad and that he's got a lot of good things to offer too. So there's like this conflict going, to blind the minds of men.

NS: A conflict in all of us?

BD: Yeah, he puts that conflict there, without him there'd be no conflict.

NS: Maybe the struggle is necessary?

BD: Well that's a whole other subject... yes, I've heard that said too.

NS: When you said. "Strengthen the things that remain" (from When You Gonna Wake Up) what things were you thinking of?

BD: Well the things that remain would be the basic qualities that don't change, the values that still do exist. It says in The Bible, "Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good". And the values that can overcome evil are the ones to strengthen.

NS: People feel that fighting oppression is more important than spiritual interests.

BD: That's wrong. The struggle against oppression and injustice is always going to be there, but the Devil himself is the one who creates it. You can come to know yourself but you need help in doing it. The only one who can overcome all that is The Great Creator himself. If you can get His help you can overcome it. To do that you must know something about the nature of The Creator. What Jesus does for an ignorant man like myself is to make the characteristics and qualities of God more believable to me, 'cause I can't beat The Devil. Only God can. He already has. Satan's working everywhere. You're faced with him constantly. If you can't see him he's inside you making you feel a certain way. He's feeding you envy and jealousy, he's feeding you oppression, hatred...

NS: Do you feel the only way to know the Creator is through Christ?

BD: I feel the only way... let me see. Of course you can look on the desert and wake up to the sun and the sand and the beauty of the stars and know there's a higher being and worship that Creator. But being thrown into the cities you're faced more with man than with God. We're dealing here with man y'know, and in order to know where man's at you have to know what God would do if he was man. I'm trying to explain it to you in intellectual mental terms, when it actually is more of a spiritual understanding than something which is open to debate.

NS: You can't teach people things they don't experience for themselves...

BD: Most people think that if God became a man he would go up on a mountain and raise his sword and show his anger and his wrath or his love and compassion in one blow. And that's who people expected the Messiah to be – someone to set things straight, and here comes a Messiah who doesn't measure up to those characteristics and it causes a lot of problems.

NS: Someone who put the responsibility back on us?

BD: Right.

NS: From your songs like Dead Man and When He Returns it's obvious you believe The Second Coming is likely in our lifetimes.

BD: Possibly. Possibly at any moment. It could be in our lifetimes. It could be a long time. This earth supposedly has a certain number of years which I think is 7,000 years, 7,000 or 6,000. We're in the last cycle of it now. Going back to the First Century there's like 3,000 years before that and 4,000 after it, one of the two, the last thousand would be the millennium years. I think that everything that's happened is like a preview of what's going to happen.

NS: How strict is your interpretation of Christianity? The Original Christians seemed to have a different faith and belief that have got lost.

BD: I'm not much of a historian about Christianity. I know it's been changed over the years but I go strictly according to the Gospels.

NS: Have you seen the Gnostic Gospels?

BD: Some place I have. I don't recall too much about them but I've seen them.

NS: Are you going to make any more movies?

BD: If we can get a short outline we will, I'd like to.

NS: Renaldo And Clara was very symbolist, and your songs on Street Legal were full of Tarot imagery. Have those interests now left you?

BD: Those particular interests have, yes.

NS: Do you now think that 'occult' interests like the Tarot are misleading?

BD: I don't know. I didn't get into the Tarot Cards all that deeply. I do think they're misleading for people though. You're fixed on something which keeps a hold on you. If you can't or don't understand why you're feeling this way at that moment, with those cards you come up with a comfortable feeling that doesn't have any necessary value.

NS: You were also interested in Judaism at one point. You visited Israel and the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem. Do you feel that your interests at that time are compatible with your present beliefs?

BD: There's really no difference between any of it in my mind. Some people say they're Jews and they never go to a Synagogue or anything. I know some gangsters who say they're Jews. I don't know what that's got to do with anything. Judaism is really the Laws of Moses. If you follow the Laws of Moses you're automatically a Jew I would think.

NS: You've always had a strong religious theme in your songs even before you became a Christian.

BD: (Angrily) I don't really want to walk around with a sign on me saying 'Christian'.

NS: It might appear that way to a lot of people.

BD: Yeah, but a lot of people wanna hang a sign on you for whatever. It's like Mick Jagger said. "They wanna hang a sign on you".

NS: In a Playboy interview three years ago you said you agreed with Henry Miller's saying that "the purpose of the artist is to inoculate the world with disillusionment". Do you still agree with that?

BD: (Laughs). That's pretty good for Henry Miller... maybe that would be good for what he wanted to do. Maybe that's the purpose of his art.

NS: Not yours?

BD: Well, what I do is more of an immediate thing; to stand up on stage and sing – you get it back immediately. It's not like writing a book or even making a record. And with a movie – it's so difficult to get anything back working or a movie, you never know what you're doing and the results don't come in until usually years afterwards. What I do is so immediate it changes the nature, the concept of art to me. I don't know what it is. It's too immediate. It's like the man who made that painting there (points to a painting on wall of hotel room) has no idea we're sitting here now looking at it or not looking at it or anything... performing is more like a stage play.

NS: You haven't painted your masterpiece yet, then.

BD: No. I don't know if I ever will, I've given up thinking about it though.

22 July 1981
Andreas Forst Street Interview, ORF-TV Channel 2, Kärtnerstrasse, Wien, Austria

Source: Circulating Tape

The recording is a mess – lots of street noise, lady fans (L1, L2…) asking for autographs and spelling their names(!) to Dylan. Andreas Forst manages to asks a couple of his questions:

AF: Hi, Mr Dylan
BD: (talking to a fan in the background)
AF: Did you like the concert yesterday?
BD: (readying to sign another autograph) Okay.
AF: Did you like the Viennese crowd?
L1: I don't have it, can you write to Abbie?
BD: Sure can.
L2: (to L1) Speak English.
BD: If I can… a little bit
L2: (spelling her name) B-R-O-T-K-E
BD: Okay.
L2: (unintelligible)
BD: Oh, where does she live?
L2: (unintelligible)
BD: Oh, yes? Okay. (taking another piece of paper to sign) To who? Yeah?
L3: (unintelligible)
BD: I've signed it all right here.
L3: Thank you very much.
BD: So. No problem
AF: Will you continue the next year with concerts?
BD: (disinterested) Yeah.
AF: Will you continue to be on the road?
BD: Oh, yeah. We'll be on the road next year.
AF: Did you like your concert in Vienna? It was your first concert…
BD: I was a little bit tired, but it sounded pretty good, yeah.
AF: Are you going to ????????
BD: I'd like to do that. I haven't been invited, though.
AF: 'Cause we are broadcasting from ???????? and a lot of people write us to say they really like to see you.
BD: Oh!
AF: Is it possible that…
BD: Maybe. Sure.
AF: Is it possible: Bob Dylan in Moscow? To play in Moscow?
BD: Sounds quite likely to me.
AF: Thank you very much
BD: Thank you
AF: Thank you, Bob Dylan.

15 March 1982
Induction to Songwriters' Hall Of Fame & Jane Hansen Interview
Hilton Hotel, New York City, New York

Source: Circulating Tape

Acceptance Speech:

BD: I think it is pretty amazing, really, 'cause I can't read or write a note of music. I never could and I will never be able to, so… thank you.

Jane Hansen Interview

BD: It's thrilling. Just thrilling. It's like being in the Baseball Hall of Fame. I've always wanted to be in there, so I guess this is the closest thing to it.

27 March 1983
Comments on John Hammond,
Columbia (Studio) Offices, New York City, New York

Source: Circulating Tape

BD: The fact that John had offered me the contract and an opportunity to record, that was just, uh, you know, a phenomenal thing back then.

5 July 1983
Martin Killer Interview, New Your City

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 251-255.

On July 5th, whilst finishing the final production of Infidels, Dylan is interviewed by Martin Keller of the Minneapolis City Pages. The interview was widely syndicated; this version was published in the New Musical Express on August 6th 1983.

RELIGION TODAY BONDAGE TOMORROW

Bob Dylan goes in search of Robert Zimmerman while recording his new LP in New York. Martin Keller prompts him to rediscover himself in this exclusive interview.

In the early morning hours over the Independence Day weekend, Bob Dylan stands in a friends room at the Empire Hotel, anxiously listening to a ghetto blaster playing a new song from his forthcoming album. Dylan's nasal tones cut through the sounds from the busy New York street below. The lyrics fall in their usual unpredictable cadence.

The words have an even more ironically charged air as darkness begins to lift in an East window. "They say that patriotism is the last refuge to which a scoundrel clings," Dylan croons. "Steal a little and they'll throw you in jail / Steal a lot and they make you a king / There's only one step down from here baby / And it's called the land of permanent bliss / What's a sweetheart like you doing in a dump like this?"

"I guess that's a Byronesque ballad," Dylan says jokingly when the cut Sweetheart Like You ends. "Sort of like Childe Harold in Babylon or Elizabethan rhythm and blues".

Dylan's good humor at four in the morning is matched by his friendly and unusually receptive manner. A month of prodigious mixing and two months of recording shows in his tired face, especially around the eyes. Thirty songs were recorded for the upcoming and, as yet, untitled LP. Sixteen of them are new Dylan compositions, and one of the 14 tunes by others, Willie Nelson's Angels Flying Too Close To The Ground, may or may not end up on the finished product. "All that's left to do is the song sequencing, and then we'll slip it into a sleeve", Dylan says. The record should be out by September, but he is undecided about touring this year. He walks across the room in thick motorcycle boots worn over black slacks, his white cotton shirt open to the last button, exposing his cocoa tan torso.

Dylan plays another new song that will be on the LP called Man Of Peace. He calls the tune a "slow drag blues". Driven by the rhythm section of reggae's, and now rock's, most sought-after sidesmen, drummer Sly Dunbar and bassist Robbie Shakespeare, Man Of Peace builds to a fierce rock climax.

Guitarist Mick Taylor fleshes out the lead track, piling up tension and pressure. Taylor's taut figures are overshadowed only by Dylan's crucial lyrics. Man Of Peace is grounded in familiar Dylan turf, a land where things are not what they seem. The song calls to mind the Thomas Mann novella, Mario And The Magician, where manipulation of people and events occurs even under the most attractive circumstances and good intentions. Yet such appearances are wormy with illusions and deceptions. They could harbor fascism; they could kindle evil. They might even mask art and freedom.

Like the sulphur and smoke that lingers after a fourth of July celebration, questions about Dylan's beliefs have been hanging in the atmosphere ever since his conversion. Many will try to sniff out answers on the new record. "People want to know where I'm at", Dylan says caustically, "Because they don't know where they're at."

Dylan often leaves and enters the room next door, where phones are ringing and people are talking. Soon he returns and we continue.

MK: What role did Mark Knopfler play on this album?

BD: This is the easiest record I ever made because of Mark. He understood the songs so well. Of course he's a songwriter himself, you know, and one of the most sensitive guitar players around. He encouraged me to go to the studio when I didn't feel like it, when I'd rather have been someplace else. Actually we are soul mates. As far as guitar playing goes he never steps all over with fancy licks. Yeah, Mark was incredible. He helped make this record in a thousand ways, not only musically, which in itself would have been enough. Brilliant guy, I can't say enough about him.

MK: Are you satisfied with most of the records you make?

BD: No, no, it's unbearable to hear some of them, for me. I hear them, and I want to shut them off. The sound of my own voice... I can't get used to it, never have gotten used to it. Makes you wanna hide... I like all my records when I make them. It depends on different times. It's not like I sit around and listen to Bob Dylan stuff. I like Freewheelin', and I like my first album. Shot Of Love is my favorite, actually.

MK: Who are your favorite contemporary singers?

BD: Oh, let me see, Joe Cocker, I suppose. Graham Nash can sing. Van Morrison's fantastic. And so is Stevie Wonder, but of all of them, Joe's the greatest.

MK: How has music changed recently?

BD: You know the French say everything changes but stays the same. Actually it has become soulless and commercial. Lot of it is played with drum machines and synthesizers. Personally, I'd rather hear an orchestra and a real drummer. Machines don't have the depth of the human heart. There just isn't anyone home.

MK: A lot of rock n' roll stars are being backed by big corporations for their tours. Are you ever going to do anything like that?

BD: When The Clash do it, maybe, I'll think about it.

MK: There's a refrain in Man Of Peace that says "Sometimes Satan comes as a man of peace". People hearing that may take it to mean you are still involved in Christianity.

BD: So what if they say that?

MK: I'm familiar with expression in a religious context.

BD: You can turn anything into a religious context. Religion is a dirty word. It doesn't mean anything. Coca Cola is a religion. Oil and steel are a religion. In the name of religion, people have been raped, killed and defiled. Today's religion is tomorrow's bondage.

MK: Are there political songs on this record?

BD: I don't write political songs. Political songs are slogans. I don't even know the definition of politics. At one time it could have been a good thing, but right now it's all part of that so-called corruptible crown. Like, you know, the law is a good thing until it's used against the innocent. Politics could be useful if it was used for good purposes. For instance, like feeding the hungry and taking care of the orphans. But it's not. It's like the snake with it's tail in it's mouth. A merry-go-round of sin. Latin America, for example, this is a political issue. All you hear about are US interests in Latin America. But what are those interests? You can't find out. Show me an honest politician, and I'll show you a sanctified whore. You know that old story about the murderer who kills the judge and puts on his robe. But he's still a murderer. Corruption doesn't die, men die.

MK: Is our legacy always going to continue to be war after war?

BD: You know the toy manufacturers that make guns and tanks for small children? They are as much to be held responsible for death and destruction of the planet as any important arms manufacturer. They're just doing it for little people. They're the ones that start the assembly line of death. They light the match. In the end there's a supreme judge they'll have to answer to for this. Don't matter how expensive their suit is or how big their playhouses are. Of course, they'll plead ignorance, "Well, I never knew about it," they'll say. But they won't get off so easy, and there won't be no Nixon to pardon them.

MK: What about all we've been reading about your search for your so-called Jewish roots?

BD: My so-called Jewish roots are in Egypt. They went down there with Joseph, and they came back out with Moses, you know, the guy that killed the Egyptian, married an Ethiopian girl and brought the law down from the mountain. The same Moses whose staff turned into a serpent. The same person who killed 3,000 Hebrews for getting down, stripping off their clothes and dancing around a golden calf. These are my roots.

Jacob had four wives and 13 children, who fathered an entire people. Those are my roots too. Gideon, with a small army, defeating an army of thousands. Deborah, the prophetess. Esther the queen and many Canaanite women. Reuben slipping into his father's bed when his father wasn't there. These are my roots. Delilah tempting Sampson, killing him softly with her song. The mighty King David was an outlaw before he was a king, you know. He had to hide in caves and get his meals at back doors. The wonderful King Saul had a warrant out on him – a "no knock" search warrant. They wanted to cut his head off. John the Baptist could tell you more about it.

Roots man – we're talking about Jewish roots, you want to know more? Check upon Elijah the prophet. He could make rain. Isaiah the prophet, even Jeremiah, see if their brethren didn't want to bust their brains for telling it right like it is, yeah -these are my roots, I suppose. Am I looking for them? Well, I don't know. I ain't looking for them in synagogues with six pointed Egyptian stars shining down from every window, I can tell you that much. But you know, it's sleepy time down south.

MK: Do you believe in reincarnation?

BD: Yeah – I do. I don't think there are any new souls on earth. Caesar, Alexandra, Nebuchadnezzar, Baal, Nimrod. They've all been here time and time again. Spirit talks to flesh – flesh talks to spirit. But you never know which is which. I'm not seeking the truth – nor was I ever. I was born knowing the truth. Everybody is. Trouble is they get it knocked out of them before they can walk.

MK: What do you think about the current philosophy and modern trends?

BD: You turn a deaf ear to all that can save you while pursuing a wall, a strange mirage. Seeking freedom where freedom isn't, and both your feet are caught in a trap, and you're bleeding to death but you can't feel it, 'cause you're high on the drugs of illusion.

MK: I think that's what people look for in your work and what they'll be looking for on this upcoming record – whether you're still talking about those things and how you're talking about them.

BD: I hope so. But no one's gonna buy anything or talk about anything that they don't understand. My work is understood in the blood of the heart. That's what messes all these people up, trying to talk about it. 'Cause they can't talk about it. The most they can do is try to categorize it. They call it folk-rock or white rhythm and blues or country-punk or religious message music. And it means nothing. Most peoples sensibilities are determined by the newspaper they read this morning, whether it be the New York Daily News or the Wall Street Journal. It's all the same. They cut down trees to print them all. What's the difference. It's doing nothing to get you into the world to come. No small wonder everyone's walking around insane. That's why I like the Waylon Jennings song I've Always Been Crazy But It Keeps Me From Going Insane).

When you go into a department store to buy an umbrella, your mind is attacked by fictitious sound – The B52's, The Pretenders or somebody – and you kind of end up drifting in and out while the cash registers ring.

I don't remember that being the purpose of music. The purpose of music is to elevate the spirit and inspire. Not to help push some product down your throat. To those who care now where Bob Dylan is at, they should listen to Shot Of Love off the Shot Of Love album. It's my most perfect song. It defines where I am at spiritually, musically, romantically and whatever else. It shows where my sympathies lie. No need to wonder if I'm this or that. I'm not hiding anything. It's all there in that one song. That's all you can ask.

Late 1983
Robert Hilburn interview for Los Angeles Times

Source: Los Angeles Times, 30 October 1983, pp. U3-4.

BOB DYLAN AT 42-ROLLING DOWN HIGHWAY 61 AGAIN
By ROBERT HILBURN

The times are apparently changing again for Bob Dylan, who startled his fans three years by adopting an aggressive "born-again" Christian stance.

Dylan reportedly has spent much time recently at Chabad Lubavitch, a hard-line Hasidic Jewish center in Brooklyn. ("They and the Rastas aren't that far apart." Dylan has said.) He was also seen wearing a yarmulke and prayer shawl at his son Jesse's bar mitzvah in Jerusalem. And there is none of the proselytizing Christian doctrine of "Slow Train Coming" on his new album, "Infidels."

When asked if he still considers himself "born again," Dylan paused only briefly before responding:

"I don't think it (the issue) is relevant right now. First of all 'born again' is a hype term. It's a media term that throws people into a corner and leaves them there. Whether people realize it or not. all these political and religious labels are irrelevant...

"That ('born-again' period) was all part of my experience. It had to happen. When I get involved in something, I get totally involved. I don't just play around on the fringes."

Does Dylan, who was reared in the Jewish faith, regret anything from the "Slow Train" period?

"I don't particularly regret telling people how to get their souls saved," he said. "I don't particularly regret any of that. Whoever was supposed to pick it up, picked it up.

"But maybe the time for me to say that has just come and gone. Now it's time for me to do something else... It's like sometimes those things appear very quickly and disappear. Jesus himself only preached for three years."

Dylan can be intimidating. Even when he's not trying to turn away curious bystanders with icy indifference, his celebrity status and maverick reputation can be unsettling.

When he ordered an iced tea and a brandy, the waiter in the West Los Angeles restaurant was so flustered that he brought the rock legend brandy in the iced tea.

As he waited for the waiter to bring the right drinks. Dylan seemed anxious—like someone waiting for his name to be called in a dentist's office. By his standards. however, he was open and relaxed.

The man who once seemed to delight in confusing the public with vague, contradictory statements, is apparently now trying to present a clearer picture. He even phoned this reporter after the restaurant meeting to offer some additional thoughts.

"It was right to be vague (in early interviews) because they were trying to dig a hole for you," he said on the phone. "If you took it (all the questions) seriously and gave serious answers, you'd just get hurt. You had to respond in a way that wouldn't hurt you. The press was always battering me around—from the beginning. They just print anything. You can't take it seriously.

"My son will tell me he read that I was at the Palace watching... Van Halen or someone and talking to this guy about his... dog or something. I don't know where they get all that stuff."

Dylan's impatient with people who believe everything they read. Rather than try to deny things, he seems to enjoy simply adding to the confusion of those people. His attitude is underscored by his reaction to one of the latest media tales about him.

A few papers have reported that Dylan has recorded an album of Hasidic music for a small independent label called Mitzvah Records. Efforts by Dylan representatives to track down the company have been fruitless.

When the report was mentioned. Dylan said mischievously, "You can say I'm planning to make 20 records for them. Say, I'm going to make all my records from now on for them."

But Dylan isn't joking about the new "Infidels" album. It is clearly an important work to him.

Dylan usually rushes into a studio and puts an album together in a week or two. On "Infidels." however, he spent nearly a month last spring in New York putting down the basic tracks.

Taking a break to get perspective, he went back into the studio there to pick: the songs that worked best together and ! to touch up a few of the tracks.

"Somehow, I figured I could always get away with just playing the songs live in the studio and leaving," he said. "It got to the point where I felt people expected that from me. Besides, there was always pressure to be doing something else: go on tour or get it out on time.

"But I decided (this time) to take my time like other people do. The extra little bit of time helped. That's going to be my pattern from now on. I'm not going to release a record until I feel it is worked on properly."

The result is likely to be his most acclaimed LP in more than a decade. Working with producer-guitarist Mark Knopfler (from Dire Straits) and an all-star band that includes reggae bassist Robbie Shakespeare and drummer Sly Dunbar. Dylan has come up with some of his most elegant and refined musical textures.

But ideas—not textures—are what have made Dylan the most distinguished songwriter of the rock era. And ideas are hurled at you in the album like pieces of a large, compelling puzzle.

There are moments of romantic tenderness in "Infidels," but the heart of album is a series of critical yet compassionate looks at the state of the nation. On key tunes, in fact, Dylan is again rolling down Highway 61—mirroring, mocking and cajoling a citizenry that seems caught up these days in a strange mix of apathy and alarm.

The difficult thing in assessing new Dylan collections is that some people consider a disappointment anything that doesn't generate the social sparks of his classic '60s period. That's when Dylan chronicled and defined the attitudes of a generation that was wrestling emotionally and ideologically with change.

But Dylan alone can't restore the intensity of that period. Despite an aura of growing sociopolitical discord, the '60s crowd has moved on to other concerns (reference point: "The Big Chill") and the new pop generation is concerned chiefly with fashion and dance.

Dylan's art, however, has continued to reflect the questioning, idealistic spirit of the '60s. His LPs from "Planet Waves" to "Slow Train Coming" compose as thoughtful and absorbing a body of work as anyone produced in the 70s. And "Infidels" maintains those standards.

This is an album about perilous times and betrayed intent. Some of the songs are topical. "Neighborhood Bully" salutes the independence and resolve of Israel in battling for its survival, while "Union Sundown" laments the shortsighted greed of American commerce. The album is most involving, however, in the free-wheeling abstractness of tunes like "License to Kill" and "Man of Peace."

At one point, Dylan sings, "You know, the streets are filled with vipers/Who've lost all ray of hope/You know, it's not even safe no more/In the palace of the Pope." Elsewhere, he prophesizes, "Well, the howling wolf will howl tonight, the king snake will crawl/Trees that've stood for a 1,000 years suddenly will fall." On the issue of perilous times, he said: "That's the state of affairs right now. Maybe that's always been the state of affairs, but it seems especially true now. That's why I picked these particular songs for the album. I don't know if that (subject) appeals to people or not, but I felt I had to do these songs now."

In the midst of this anxiety, Dylan suggests a growing helplessness and confusion across the country.

During the interview, he quipped: "America is a divided nation right now. It doesn't know whether to follow the President or the Green Bay Packers."

The album's key song. "Man of Peace," warns of the false prophets who suggest easy ways out of the turmoil. Against a rollicking country-blues beat. Dylan sings:

Look out your window, baby. There's a scene you'd like to catch.
The band is playing "Dixie." A man got his hand outstretched.
Could be the Fuehrer. Could be the local priest.
You know sometimes Satan, he comes as a man of peace.

In the interview, Dylan amplified on a theme that has also been consistent in his work: attacking hypocrisy and fraud.

"To me, the greatest sinners were the shoddy lawyers, corrupt promoters, professional gossip peddlers—the wolves in sheep's clothing who present themselves as saints, but whose duty is to nobody but themselves.

"Reality is distorted when a sinner is presented as some dirty wino who sleeps in his clothes or some run-of-the-mill whore with two black eyes. It's easy to pull the wool down over somebody's eyes. Most people think Sylvester Stallone is a boxer."

Asked if he is more pessimistic than in the '60s, he said: "I don't think any of my songs have been pessimistic. In every song I've written. I think, there has been a way out because that's just the nature of me."

Still, "Union Sundown" is a disheartening tale of the American Dream being ripped apart by the greed of businessmen and unions—and the effect of that greed on other countries. The song includes these lines:

Democracy don't rule the world
You'd better get that in your head.
This world is ruled by violence
But I guess that's better left unsaid.
From Broadway to the Milky Way
That's a lot of territory indeed.
And, a man's gonna do what he has to do
When he's got a hungry mouth to feed.

Dylan isn't thoroughly satisfied with the song.

"I think that line (about the world being ruled by violence) is absolutely true," he said. "It's not necessarily poetic or anything else. It's just true. I think that song could have been much stronger than it is.

"One thing that bothers me is that America is slowly but surely isolated from other countries—isolated with no friends, nothing. It's very dangerous.

"But I was just trying to keep the song in the area of businesses and industries all being taken away, going somewhere else. I don't think the enemy is going to conquer America with atom bombs or missiles. I think they are just going to buy America or steal America and sell it back to them."

At 42, Dylan has been making records for half his life. Columbia Records is planning to release a five-album retrospective set next year, including two sides of previously unavailable material. But Dylan seemed only remotely interested in that project. He prefers to think about his new music.

Though Dylan has spent considerable time here since the early 70s. he doesn't seem to call any place home. When in the country, he divides his time among Los Angeles, New York and his home state of Minnesota.

While fans and the media don't tend to pry into his life with the obsessiveness they showed in he '60s, Dylan remains a visible target.

"The truth is there's not much that they can really pry into now." he said. "I've sort of got walls up all over the place. They can only get so far. In those days. I was more vulnerable because I was out there so far (emotionally) and I felt totally unprotected. Look what happened to Jim Morrison, He got out there so far and he had to go, he had to leave."

Still, the murder of John Lennon must have a sobering effect on someone who stirs such strong feelings.

"Being in this (rock 'n' roll) position is a dangerous thing," he said. "There's always a feeling that anything can happen with the world being as crazy as it is. Sure, a guy could work in a bank and get run over, too, but entertainers are always a target for love and hate."

Dylan has no plans to tour, but he said he enjoys the road—even though his recent tours have been such controversial affairs. In 1978, some fans didn't like the way he had rearranged the old hits. In his last Los Angeles appearance, fans objected to the absence of the old songs in the gospel-flavored shows.

"There was always some kind of resistance," he said, fingering another glass of brandy during the lengthy restaurant interview. "If it wasn't about religion, it was about style of music. If it wasn't style, it was about the clothes you wore. If it wasn't clothes, it was about the people you knew. There was always something that people didn't like. I've been used to that since I was born."

Will he perform any of the "Slow Train" songs on future tours?

"Yeah. I'll probably do a few of those." he said. "I get letters from people who say they were touched by those (gospel) shows. I don't disavow any of that. I've never made a record yet that I disavow..."

28 February 1984
Grammy Awards Ceremony,
Shrine Auditorium, Los Angeles, California

Source: Circulating tape

Bob Dylan (BD) presents Grammy for the New Song of the Year with Stevie Wonder (SW). The ceremony was hosted by John Denver (JD).

JD: …and now let's get to the Awards. To present our first Awartd of the evening for the Best New Song of the Year, here are two great, great songwriters. Mr Bob Dylan, Mr Stevie Wonder.

[long applause]

SW: You'd better stop that. You're making us feel like stars. Hello? OK. This is a very exciting category, as you know, because this is the one that is solely designated for those writers whose song will be nominated as Song of the Year. And there're five song, and of course you know only one can win. But I think, and I'm sure Bobby feel the same way, that just being nominated in itself in an honor. So. You got it.
BD: The nominees are: [playback starts, Dylan keeps silent]… Oh, "All Night Long" [pause] Lionel Richie.
SW: …Lionel Richie, right. "Beat It"! Michael Jackson.
BD: [prematurely] "Billy Jean" [Billy Jean playback starts] "Billy Jean" Michael Jackson.
SW: "Every Breath You Take" Sting.
BD: "Maniac"…
SW: … Michael Sembello…
BD: … Dennis Matkosky.
SW: …and the winner is… you know what, let's just forget all that stuff. [tears the envelope]. You know what, every year the same old thing happens, right? "And the winner is… blah, blah, blah" But this time we're gonna do things different and unique and special, okay? And the 80s. This is the 80s, right? So, what we wanna do is to get you all to decide… [laughter] Is it song number one [applause], number two [applause], number three, four or five? You are to say. Which one is it? [audience roars]. Oh, it'll never work.
BD: Oh no, we gotta do it the old fashioned way.
SW: Let me look at that, let me see that. [Dylan gives the real envelope to SW; audience laugh].
BD: "Every Breath You Take"
SW: "Every Breath You Take" Sting!

JD: Sting's not here tonight…
BD: Sting's not here tonight. He's out there…
SW: But we'll take the Award with us.
BD: …touring, but we'll take it, yeah!
SW: Congratulations to you, Sting.

[applause]

March 1984
Kurt Loder Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 481-484.

Kurt Loder interviewed Dylan in a Greek Café on Third Avenue, New York City, sometime during March 1984 whist Dylan was filming his part in the Jokerman video. The interview appeared in Rolling Stone on June 21st 1984. Where Bob refers to Nigel Davenport, he really means Nigel Denver, possibly confusing the name with Bob Davenport, both being British folk singers in those days.

KL: People have put various labels on you over the past several years: "He's a born-again Christian"; "he's an ultra-Orthodox Jew". Are any of these labels accurate?

BD: Not really. People call you this, or they call you that But I can't respond to that, because then it seems that I'm defensive, and you know, what does it matter, really?

KL: But weren't three of your albums – Slow Train Coming, Saved and Shot Of Love – inspired by some sort of born-again religious experience?

BD: I would never call it that. I've never said I'm born again. That's just a media term. I don't think I've ever been an agnostic. I've always thought there's a superior power, that this is not the real world and that there's a world to come. That no soul has died, every soul is alive – either in holiness or in flames. And there's probably a lot of middle ground.

KL: Do you belong to any church or synagogue?

BD: Not really. Uh, the Church of the Poison Mind (laughs).

KL: Can you converse and find agreement with Orthodox Jews?

BD: Yeah, yeah.

KL: And with Christians?

BD: Oh, yeah. Yeah, with anybody.

KL: When you meet up with Orthodox people, can you sit down with them and say, "Well, you should really check out Christianity"?

BD: Well, yeah, if somebody asks me, I'll tell 'em. But you know, I'm not gonna just offer my opinion. I'm more about playing music, you know?

KL: Do you follow the political scene or have any sort of fix on what the politicians are talking about this election year?

BD: I think politics is an instrument of the devil. Just that clear. I think politics is what kills; it doesn't bring anything alive. Politics is corrupt; I mean, anybody knows that.

KL: So you don't care who's President? It doesn't make any difference?

BD: I don't think so. I mean, how long is Reagan gonna be President? I've seen, like four or five of 'em myself, you know? And I've seen two of them die in office. How can you deal with Reagan and get so serious about that when the man isn't even gonna be there when you get your thing together?

KL: So you don't think there's any difference between, say, a Kennedy and a Nixon? It doesn't matter at all?

BD: I don't know. It's very popular nowadays to think of yourself as a "liberal humanist". That's such a bullshit term. It means less than nothing. Who was a better President? Well, you got me. I don't know what people's errors are; nobody's perfect, for sure. But I thought Kennedy, both Kennedy's – I just liked them. And I like Martin.... Martin Luther King. I thought those were people who were blessed and touched, you know? The fact that they all went out with bullets doesn't change nothin'. Because the good they do gets planted. And those seeds live on longer than that.

KL: Any thought on abortion?

BD: Abortion? I personally don't think abortion is that important. I think it's just an issue to evade whatever issues are makin' people think about abortion.

KL: Well, I mean, when abortion's used as a form of birth control...

BD: Well, I think birth control is another hoax that women shouldn't have bought, but they did buy. I mean, if a man don't wanna knock up a woman, that's his problem, you know what I mean? It's interesting: They arrest prostitutes, but they never arrest the guys with the prostitutes. It's all very one-sided.

KL: In regard to these feminist sympathies...

BD: I think women rule the world and that no man has ever done anything that a woman either hasn't allowed him to do or encouraged him to do.

KL: What do you tell your kids about things like sex and drugs?

BD: Well, they don't really ask me too much about that stuff. I think they probably learn enough just by hangin' around me, you know?

KL: You had a drug period at one time, didn't you?

BD: I never got hooked on any drug – not like you'd say, uh, "Eric Clapton: his drug period".

KL: Ever take LSD?

BD: I don't wanna say anything to encourage anybody, but, uh, who knows? Who knows what people stick in your drinks or what kind of cigarettes you're smokin'?

KL: Did you get to see any of the original rock n' roll guys, like Little Richard, Buddy Holly?

BD: Yeah, sure. I saw Buddy Holly two or three nights before he died. I saw him in Duluth [Minnesota], at the armory. He played there with Link Wray. I don't remember the Big Bopper. Maybe he'd gone off by the time I came in. But I saw Richie Valens. And Buddy Holly, yeah. He was great. He was incredible. I mean, I'll never forget the image of seeing Buddy Holly up on the bandstand. And he died – it must have been a week after this. It was unbelievable.

Late at night, I used to listen to Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, Jimmy Reed and Howlin' Wolf blastin' in from Shreveport [Louisiana]. It was a radio show that lasted all night I used to stay up till two, three o'clock in the morning. Listened to all those songs, then tried to figure them out. I started playing myself. I had a couple of bands in high school, maybe three or four of them. Lead singers would always come in and take my bands, because they would have connections, like maybe their fathers would know somebody, so they could get a job in the neighboring town at the pavilion for a Sunday picnic or something. And I'd lose my band. I'd see it all the time.

KL: That must have made you a little bitter.

BD: Yeah, it did, actually. And then I had another band, with my cousin from Duluth. I played, you know, rock 'n' roll, rhythm & blues. And then that died out, pretty much, in my last year of high school.

After that I remember I heard a record – I think maybe it was the Kingston Trio or Odetta or something like that – and I sorta got into folk music. Rock & roll was pretty much finished. And I traded my stuff for a Martin that they don't sell anymore, an 0018, maybe, and it was brown. The first acoustic guitar I had. A great guitar. And then, either in Minneapolis or St. Paul, I heard Woody Guthrie. And when I heard Woody Guthrie, that was it, it was all over.

KL: What struck you about him?

BD: Well, I heard them old records where he sings with Cisco Houston and Sonny [Terry] and Brownie [McGhee] and stuff like that and then his own songs. And he really struck me as an independent character. But no one ever talked about him. So I went through all his records I could find and picked all that up by any means I could. And when I arrived in New York, I was mostly singing his songs and folk songs. At that time I was runnin' into people who were playing the same kind of thing, but I was kind of combining elements of Southern mountain music with bluegrass stuff, English ballad stuff. I could hear a song once and know it So when I came to New York, I could do a lot of different stuff. But I never thought I'd see rock & roll again when I arrived here.

KL: Do you still look back on some of it as protest material? Or did you ever see it as protest material?

BD: I think all my stuff is protest material in some kinda way. I always felt like my position and my place came after that first wave or maybe second wave of rock & roll. And I felt like I would never have done the things I did if I just had to listen to popular radio.

KL: Is it true that Like A Rolling Stone was done in one take?

BD: Yeah, one take. It's amazing. It sounds like it's so together. That was back in the days when we used to do, oh, man, six, eight, ten tunes a session. We used to just go in and come out the next day.

KL: It always seemed to me that you were sort of infallible up until Self Portrait in 1970. What's the story behind that album?

BD: At the time, I was in Woodstock, and I was getting a great degree of notoriety for doing nothing. Then I had that motorcycle accident, which put me outta commission. Then, when I woke up and caught my senses, I realised I was just workin' for all these leeches. And I didn't want to do that. Plus, I had a family, and I just wanted to see my kids.

I'd also seen that I was representing all these things that I didn't know anything about. Like I was supposed to be on acid. It was all storm-the-embassy kind of stuff -Abbie Hofman in the streets – and they sorta figured me as the kingpin of all that. I said: "Wait a minute, I'm just a musician. So my songs are about this and that." So what? But people need a leader. People need a leader more than a leader needs people, really. I mean, anybody can step up there and be a leader if he's got the people there that want one. I didn't want that, though.

But then came the big news about Woodstock, about musicians going up there, and it was like a wave of insanity breakin' loose around the house day and night You'd come in the house and find people there, people comin' through the woods, at all hours of the day and night, knockin' on your door. It was really dark and depressing. And there was no way to respond to all this, you know? It was as if they were suckin' your very blood out. I said: "Now, wait, these people can't be my fans. They just can't be." And they kept comin'. We had to get out of there. This was just about the time of that Woodstock Festival, which was the sum total of all this bullshit And it seemed to have something to do with me, this Woodstock Nation and everything it represented. So we couldn't breathe. I couldn't get any space for myself and my family, and there was no help, nowhere. I got very resentful about this whole thing, and we got outta there.

We moved to New York. Lookin' back it really was a stupid thing to do. But there was a house available in MacDougal street, and I always remembered that as a nice place. So I just bought this house, sight unseen. But it wasn't the same when we got back. The Woodstock Nation had overtaken MacDougal Street also. There'd be crowds outside my house. And I said: "Well, fuck it I wish these people would just forget about me. I wanna do something they can't possibly like, they can't relate to. They'll see it and they'll listen and they'll say: "Well let's go on to the next person. He ain't sayin' it no more. He ain't givin' us what we want," you know? They'll go on to somebody else." But the whole idea back-fired. Because the album went out there, and the people said, "This ain't what we want", and they got more resentful.

KL: What's your latest stuff like?

BD: I just write 'em as they come, you know? They're not anything different from what I've ever written about, but they're probably put together in a way that other ones aren't put together. So it might seem like somethin' new. I don't think I've found any new chords or new progressions or any new words that haven't been said before. I think they're pretty much all the same old things, just kinda reworked.

KL: Do your old songs still mean the same to you as when you wrote them?

BD: Yeah. Sittin' here, it's hard to imagine it, but yeah. Once you lock into that stuff it's like it was just written yesterday. When I'm singin' the stuff, sometimes I say: "Wow! Where'd these lyrics come from?" It's amazing.

March 1984
Kurt Loder Interview (Full), New York City

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 711-722.

This is the full text of the Kurt Loder interview as published in Rolling Stone No. 424 on June 21st 1984.

KL: People have put various labels on you over the past several years: "He's a born-again Christian"; "he's an ultra-Orthodox Jew." Are any of these labels accurate?

BD: Not really. People call you this or they call you that. But I can't respond to that, because then it seems like I'm defensive, and, you know, what does it matter, really?

KL: But weren't three of your albums – Slow Train Coming, Saved and Shot of Love – inspired by some sort of born-again religious experience?

BD: I would never call it that. I've never said I'm born again. That's just a media term. I don't think I've ever been an agnostic. I've always thought there's a superior power, that this is not the real world and that there's a world to come. That no soul has died, every soul is alive, either in holiness or in flames. And there's probably a lot of middle ground.

KL: What is your spiritual stance, then?

BD: Well, I don't think that this is it, you know – this life ain't nothin'. There's no way you're gonna convince me this is all there is to it. I never, ever believed that. I believe in the Book of Revelation. The leaders of this world are eventually going to play God, if they're not already playing God and eventually a man will come that everybody will think is God. He'll do things, and they'll say, "Well, only God can do those things. It must be him."

KL: You're a literal believer of the Bible?

BD: Yeah. Sure, yeah. I am.

KL: Are the Old and New Testaments equally valid?

BD: To me.

KL: Do you belong to any church or synagogue?

BD: Not really. Uh, the Church of the Poison Mind [Laughs].

KL: Do you actually believe the end is at hand?

BD: I don't think it's at hand. I think we'll have at least 200 years. And the new kingdom that comes in, I mean, people can't even imagine what its gonna be like. There's a lot of people walkin' around who think the new kingdom's comin' next year and that they're gonna be right in there among the top guard. And they're wrong. I think when it comes in, there are people who'll be prepared for it, but if the new kingdom happened tomorrow and you were sitting there and I was sitting here, you wouldn't even remember me.

KL: Can you converse and find agreement with Orthodox Jews?

BD: Yeah, yeah.

KL: And with Christians?

BD: Oh, yeah. Yeah, with anybody.

KL: Sounds like a new synthesis.

BD: Well, no. If I thought the world needed a new religion, I would start one. But there are a lot of other religions, too. There's those Indian religions, Eastern religions, Buddhism, you know. They're happening, too.

KL: When you meet up with Orthodox people, can you sit down with them and say, "Well, you should really check out Christianity"?

BD: Well, yeah. If somebody asks me. I'll tell'em. But, you know, I'm not gonna just offer my opinion. I'm more about playing music, you know?

KL: Your views apparently seemed clear to many record buyers. Were you frustrated by the commercial resistance – both on record and on the road – to your fundamentalist-influenced music?

BD: Well, after the'78 gospel tour, I wanted to keep touring in'79. But I knew that we'd gone everywhere in'78, so how you gonna play in'79? Go back to the same places? So, at that point, I figured, "Well, I don't care if I draw no crowds no more." And a lotta places we played on the last tour, we filled maybe half the hall.

KL: And you don't think that was because of the material you were doing?

BD: I don't think so. I don't think it had to do with anything. I think when your time is your time, it don't matter what you're doin'. Its either your time, or it's not your time. And I didn't feel the last few years was really my time. But that's no reason for me to make any kinda judgment call on what it is I'm gonna be. The people who reacted to the gospel stuff would've reacted that way if I hadn't done, you know, Song to Woody.

KL: You think so?

BD: Yeah, I know it. I can usually anticipate the stuff- what's going on, what's the mood. There's a lotta young performers around. And they look good and they move good, and they're sayin' stuff that is, uh, excitable, you know? Face it, a lotta that stuff is just made and geared for twelve-year-old kids. It's like baby food.

KL: Your latest album, Infidels, is hardly subteen fodder. Some critics have even detected a new note of conservatism in some of the songs – even outright jingoism in Neighborhood Bully, -in which the metaphorical subject is said to be "just one man" whose "enemies say he's on their land." That's clearly a strong Zionist political statement, is it not?

BD: You'll have to point that out to me, you know, what line is in it that spells that out. I'm not a political songwriter. Joe Hill was a political songwriter; uh, Merle Travis wrote some political songs. Which Side Are You On? is a political; song. And Neighborhood Bully, to me, is not a political song, because if it were, it would fall into a certain political party. If you're talkin' about it as an Israeli political song -even if it is an Israeli political song – in Israel alone, there's maybe twenty political parties. I don't know where that would fall, what party.

KL: Well, would it be fair to call that song a heartfelt statement of belief?

BD: Maybe it is, yeah. But just because somebody feels a certain way, you can't come around and stick some political-party slogan on it. If you listen closely, it really could be about other things. It's simple and easy to define it so you got it pegged, and you can deal with it in that certain kinda way. However, I wouldn't do that'cause I don't know what the politics of Israel is. I just don't know.

KL: So you haven't resolved for yourself, for instance, the Palestinian question?

BD: Not really, because I live here.

KL: Would you ever live in Israel?

BD: I don't know. Its hard to speculate what tomorrow may bring. I kinda live where I find myself.

KL: At another point in the song, you say, "He got no allies to really speak of," and while "he buys obsolete weapons and he won't be denied... no one sends flesh and blood to fight by his side." Do you feel that America should send troops over there?

BD: No. The song doesn't say that. Who should, who shouldn't – who am I to say?

KL: Well, do you think Israel should get more help from the American Jewish community? I don't want to push this too far, but it just seems so...

BD: Well, you're not pushing it too far, you're just making it specific. And you're making it specific to what's going on today. But what's going on today isn't gonna last, you know? The battle of Armageddon is specifically spelled out: where it will be fought and, if you wanna get technical, where it will be fought. And the battle of Armageddon definitely will be fought in the Middle East.

KL: Do you follow the political scene or have any sort of fix on what the politicians are talking about this election year?

BD: I think politics is an instrument of the Devil. Just that clear. I think politics is what kills; it doesn't bring anything alive. Politics is corrupt; I mean anybody knows that.

KL: So you don't care who's president? It doesn't make any difference?

BD: I don't think so. I mean, how long is Reagan gonna be president? I've seen like four or five of'em myself, you know? And I've seen two of'em die in office. How can you deal with Reagan and get so serious about that, when the man isn't even gonna be there when you get your thing together?

KL: So you don't think there's any difference between, say, a Kennedy and a Nixon? It doesn't matter at all?

BD: I don't know. It's very popular nowadays to think of yourself as a "liberal humanist." That's such a bullshit term. It means less than nothing. Who was a better president? Well, you got me. I don't know what people's errors are; nobody's perfect for sure. But I thought Kennedy – both Kennedys – I just liked them. And I liked Martin... Martin Luther King. I thought those were people who were blessed and touched, you know? The fact they all went out with bullets doesn't change nothin'. Because the good they do gets planted. And those seeds live on longer than that.

KL: Do you still hope for peace?

BD: There is not going to be any peace.

KL: You don't think it's worth working for?

BD: No. It's just gonna be a false peace. You can reload your rifle, and that moment you're reloading it that's peace. It may last for a few years.

KL: Isn't it worth fighting for that?

BD: Nah, none of that matters. I heard somebody on the radio talkin' about what's happenin' in Haiti, you know? "We must be concerned about what's happening in Haiti. We're global people now". And they're gettin' everybody in that frame of mind – like we're not just the United States anymore, we're global. We're thinkin' in terms of the whole world because communications come right into your house. Well that's what the Book of Revelation is all about. And you can just about now that anybody who comes out for peace is not for peace.

KL: But what if someone genuinely is for peace?

BD: Well, you can't be for peace and be global. It's just like that song Man of Peace. But none of this matters, if you believe in another world. If you believe in this world, you're stuck; you really don't have a chance. You'll go mad'cause you won't see the end of it. You may wanna stick around, but you won't be able to. On another level though, you will be able to see this world. You'll look back and say, "Ah, that's what it was all about all the time. Wow, why didn't I get that?"

KL: That's a very fatalistic view, isn't it?

BD: I think it's realistic. If it is fatalistic, it's only fatalistic on this level, and this level dies anyway, so what's the difference? So you're fatalistic, so what?

KL: There's a lyric in License to Kill: "Man has invented his doom / First step was touching the moon." Do you really believe that?

BD: Yeah, I do. I have no idea why I wrote that line, but on some level, it's like just a door into the unknown.

KL: Isn't man supposed to progress, to forge ahead?

BD: Well... but not there. I mean, what's the purpose of going to the moon? To me, it doesn't make any sense. Now they're gonna put a space station up there, and it's gonna cost what – $600 billion, $700 billion? And who's gonna benefit from it? Drug companies who are gonna be able to make better drugs. Does that make sense? Is that supposed to be something that a person is supposed to get excited about? Is that progress? I don't think they're gonna get better drugs. I think they're gonna get more expensive drugs.

Everything is computerised now, its all computers I see that as the beginning of the end. You can see everything going global. There's no nationality anymore, no I'm this or I'm that. "We're all the same, all workin' for one peaceful world, blah, blah, blah." Somebody's gonna have to come along and figure out what's happening with the United States. Is this just an island that's gonna be blown out of the ocean, or does it really figure in things? I really don't know. At this point right now, it seems that it figures into things. But later on, it will have to be a country that's self-sufficient, that can make it by itself without that many imports.

Right now, it seems like in the States, and most other countries, too, there's a big push on to make a big global country – one big country – where you can get all the materials from one place and assemble them someplace else and sell'em in another place, and the whole world is just all one, controlled by the same people, you know? And if its not there already, that's the point it's tryin' to get to.

KL: In Union Sundown, the Chevrolet you drive is "put together down in Argentina by a guy makin' thirty cents a day." Are you saying he'd be better off without that thirty cents a day?

BD: What's thirty cents a day? He don't need the thirty cents a day. I mean, people survived for 6000 years without having to work for slave wages for a person who comes down and... well, actually, it's just colonization. But see, I saw that stuff firsthand, because where I come from, they really got that deal good, with the ore.

KL: In Minnesota, in the Iron Range, where you grew up?

BD: Yeah. Everybody was workin' there at one time. In fact, ninety percent of the iron for the Second World War came out of those mines, up where I'm from. And eventually, they said, "Listen, this is costing too much money to get this out. We must he able to get it someplace else." Now the same thing is happening, I guess, with other products.

KL: What was it like growing up in Hibbing, Minnesota, in the fifties?

BD: You're pretty much ruled by nature up there. You have to sort of fall into line with that, regardless of how you're feeling that day or what you might want to do with your life, or what you think about. And it still is like that, I think.

KL: Were you aware of any anti Semitism there when you were a kid?

BD: No. Nothing really mattered to me except learning another song or a new chord, or finding a new place to play, you know? Years later, when I'd recorded a few albums, then I started seeing in places: "Bob Dylan's a Jew," stuff like that. I said, "Jesus, I never knew that." But they kept harping on it; it seemed like it was important for people to say that – like they'd say "the one-legged street singer or something." So after a period of time, I thought, "Well, gee, maybe I'll look into that." I don't know. I never noticed it occurring with any other artists; I mean, I've never seen it about Barbara Streisand or Neil Diamond. But it has occurred with me. As a kid, though, I never felt anything, like, I had to fight my way through schoolyard crowds, you know. As long as I had a guitar, I was happy.

KL: Was Hibbing an oppressive place? Did it just make you want to get out?

BD: Not really. I didn't really know anything else except, uh, Hank Williams. I remember hearin' Hank Williams one or two years before he died. And that sort of introduced me to the guitar. And once I had the guitar, it was never a problem. Nothing else was ever a problem.

KL: Did you get to see any of the original rock & roll guys, like Little Richard, Buddy Holly?

BD: Yeah, sure. I saw Buddy Holly two or three nights before he died. I saw him in Duluth, at the armory. He played there with Link Wray. I don't remember the Big Bopper. Maybe he'd gone off by the time I came in. But I saw Ritchie Valens. And Buddy Holly, yeah. He was great. He was incredible. I mean, I'll never forget the image of seeing Buddy Holly up on the bandstand. And he died – it must have been a week after that. It was unbelievable.

Late at night, I used to listen to Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, Jimmy Reed and Howlin' Wolf blastin' in from Shreveport. It was a radio show that lasted all night. I used to stay up till two, maybe three o'clock in the morning. Listened to all those songs, then tried to figure them out. I started playing myself.

KL: How did you take to the guitar?

BD: First I bought a Nick Manoloff back. I don't think I could get past the first one. And had a Silvertone guitar from Sears. In those days, they cost thirty or forty dollars, and you only had to pay five dollars down to get it. So I had my first electric guitar. I had a couple of bands in high school, maybe three or four of'em. Lead singers would always come in and take my bands, because they would have connections, like maybe their fathers would know somebody, so they could get a job in the neighboring town at the pavilion for a Sunday picnic or something. And I'd lose my band. I'd see it all the time.

KL: That must have made you a little bitter.

BD: Yeah, it did, actually. And then I had another band with my cousin from Duluth. I played, you know, rock & roll, rhythm & blues. And then that died out pretty much, in my last year of high school.

And after that, I remember I heard a record – I think maybe it was the Kingston Trio or Odetta or someone like that – and I sorta got into folk music. Rock & roll was pretty much finished. And I traded my stuff for a Martin that they don't sell anymore, an 0018, maybe, and it was brown. The first acoustic guitar I had. A great guitar. And then, either in Minneapolis or St Paul, I heard Woody Guthrie. And when I heard Woody Guthrie, that was it, it was all over.

KL: What struck you about him?

BD: Well, I heard them old records, where he sings with Cisco Houston and Sonny [Terry] and Brownie [McGhee] and stuff like that, and then his own songs. And he really struck me as an independent character. But no one ever talked about him. So I went through all his records I could find and picked all that up by any means I could. And when I arrived in New York, I was mostly singing his songs and folk songs. At that time, I was runnin' into people who were playing the same kind of thing, but I was kinda combining elements of Southern mountain music with bluegrass stuff, English-ballad stuff. I could hear a song once and know it. So when I came to New York, I could do a bit of different stuff. But I never thought I'd see rock & roll again when I arrived here.

KL: Did you miss it?

BD: Not really, because I liked the folk scene. It was a whole community, a whole world that was all hooked up in different towns in the United States. You could go from here to California and always have a place to stay, and always play somewhere, and meet people. Nowadays, you go to see a folk singer – what's the folk singer doin'? He's singin' all his own songs. That ain't no folk singer. Folk singers sing those old folk songs, ballads.

I met a lot of folk singers in New York, and there were a lot of'em in the Twin Cities. But I ran into some people in England who really knew those songs. Martin Carthy, another guy named Nigel Davenport. Martin Carthy's incredible. I learned a lot of stuff from Martin. Girl From The North Country is based on a song I heard him sing -that Scarborough Fair song, which Paul Simon, I guess, just took the whole thing.

KL: Could folk ever become big again?

BD: Well, yeah, it could become big again. But people gotta go back and find the song's. They don't do it no more. I was tellin' somebody that thing about when you go to see a folk singer now, you hear somebody singin' his own songs And the person says, "Yeah, well, you started that." And in a sense, it's true. But I never would have written a song if I didn't play all them old folk songs first. I never would have thought to write a song, you know? There's no dedication to folk music now, no appreciation of the art form.

KL: Do you notice that you've influenced a lot of singers over the years?

BD: It's phrasing. I think I've phrased everything in a way that it's never been phrased before. I'm not tryin' to brag or anything – or maybe I am [laughs]. But yeah I hear stuff on the radio, doesn't matter what kinda stuff it is, and I know that if you go back far enough you'll find somebody listened to Bob Dylan somewhere, because of the phrasing. Even the content of the tunes. Up until I started doin' that stuff, nobody was talkin' about that sort of thing. For music to succeed on any level... Well, you're always gonna have your pop-radio stuff, but the only people who are gonna succeed, really, are the people who are sayin' somethin' that is given to them to say. I mean, you can only carry Tutti Frutti so far.

KL: Like the current rockabilly revival?

BD: The rockabilly revival was just about spirit and attitude.

KL: Were you aware of punk rock when it happened – the Sex Pistols, the Clash?

BD: Yeah, I didn't listen to it all the time, but it seemed like a logical step, and it still does. I think it's been hurt in a lotta ways by the fashion industry.

KL: You've seen the Clash, I understand?

BD: Yeah, I met them way back in 1977, 1978. In England. I think they're great. In fact, I think they're greater now than they were.

KL: You mean since Mick Jones left?

BD: Yeah. It's interesting. It took two guitar players to replace Mick.

KL: How about Prince – have you ever run into him in Minneapolis?

BD: No, I never have.

KL: Have you met Michael Jackson yet?

BD: No, I don't think so. I met Martha and the Vandellas.

KL: Do your kids tell you about new groups "You gotta check out Boy George"?

BD: Well, they used to, a few years ago. I kind of like everything.

KL: Are your kids musical?

BD: Yeah, they all play.

KL: Would you encourage them to go into the music business?

BD: I would never push'em or encourage'em to. I mean, I never went into it as a business. I went into it as a matter of survival. So I wouldn't tell anybody to go into it as a business. Its a pretty cutthroat business, from what I've seen.

KL: What do you tell your kids about things like sex and drugs?

BD: Well, they don't really ask me too much about that stuff. I think they probably learn enough just by hangin' around me, you know?

KL: You had a drug period at one time, didn't you?

BD: I never got hooked on any drug – not like you'd say, uh, "Eric Clapton: his drug period."

KL: Ever take LSD?

BD: I don't wanna say anything to encourage anybody, but, uh, who knows? Who knows what people stick in your drinks, or what kinda cigarettes you're smokin'?

KL: When people like Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin started dropping away, did you look upon that as a waste?

BD: Jimi, I thought was a big waste. I saw Jimi... Oh, man, that was sad when I saw him. He was in the back seat of a limousine on Bleecker Street, just... I couldn't even tell then whether he was dead or alive.

KL: Do your old songs still mean the same to you as when you wrote them?

BD: Yeah. Sittin' here, it's hard to imagine it, but yeah. Once you lock into that stuff, it's like it was just written yesterday. When I'm singin' the stuff, sometimes I say, "Wow! Where'd these lyrics come from?" It's amazing.

KL: Do you still look back on some of it as protest material? Or did you ever see it as protest material?

BD: I think all my stuff is protest material in some kinda way. I always felt that my position and my place came after that first wave, or maybe second wave, of rock & roll. And I felt like I would never have done the things I did if I just had to listen to popular radio.

KL: At one point, didn't you disassociate yourself from the protest form?

BD: Well, you see, I never called it protest. Protest is anything that goes against the ordinary and the established. And who's the founder of protest? Martin Luther.

KL: Is it true that Like a Rolling Stone was done in one take?

BD: Yeah, one take. It's amazing. It sounds like it's so together. That was back in the days when we used to just go in and come out the next day.

KL: Wasn't Another Side of Bob Dylan the result of an all-night session, too?

BD: Well, that was pretty quick, too. But that was easier to do; it was just me. But we used to do the same thing when there was a band in there. I don't think a song like Rolling Stone could have been done any other way. What are you gonna do, chart it out?

KL: How do you maintain a balance between the requirements of the modern recording studio and the fact that a lot of your best stuff in the past has been done very quickly?

BD: Right now, I'm changing my views on that. But I plan to do a little bit more acoustic stuff in the future. I think my next album is probably just gonna be me and my guitar and harmonica. I'm not saying all of it will be that way, but I'm sure a few songs will be. I know they will be.

KL: What's your latest stuff like?

BD: I just write'em as they come, you know? They're not about anything different than what I've ever written about., but they're probably put together in a way that other ones aren't put together. So it might seem like somethin' new. I don't think I've found any new chords or new progressions, or any new words that haven't been said before. I think they're pretty much all the same old thing, just kinda reworked.

KL: I heard an outtake from the Infidels sessions called Blind Willie McTell. Is that ever going to come out? It's a great song.

BD: I didn't think I recorded it right. But I don't know why that stuff gets out on me. I mean, it never seems to get out on other people.

KL: There's a lot of interest out there. You could put all your unreleased stuff out in, like, a twenty-volume set or something.

BD: Yeah, like The Basement Tapes. But it doesn't occur to me to put it out. If I wrote a song three years ago, I seldom go back and get that. I just leave'em alone. I never really liked The Basement Tapes. I mean, they were just songs we had done for the publishing company, as I remember. They were used only for other artists to record those songs. I wouldn't have put'em out. But, you know, Columbia wanted to put'em out, so what can you do?

KL: You don't think that album has a great feeling to it? That material really has an aura.

BD: I can't even remember it. People have told me they think it's very Americana and all that. I don't know what they're talkin' about.

KL: So, then, it wouldn't occur to you to put out, say, the 1966 tapes of the Royal Albert Hall concert in London, another great bootleg?

BD: No. Uh-uh. I wouldn't put'em out because I didn't think they were quality.

KL: That stuffs great. I'm amazed you wouldn't want to see it done legitimately and really do the tapes right.

BD: Well, but you see, Columbia's never offered to do that. They have done that with The Basement Tapes and the Budokan album. But they've never offered to put that out as a historical album or whatever. And believe me, if they wanted to do it, they could.

KL: Speaking of the Budokan album...

BD: The Budokan album was only supposed to be for Japan. They twisted my arm to do a live album for Japan. It was the same band I used on Street Legal, and we had just started findin' our way into things on that tour when they recorded it. I never meant for it to be any type of representation of my stuff or my band or my live show.

KL: That was when the critics started saying you were going Las Vegas, wasn't it?

BD: Well, I think the only people who would have said somethin' like that were people who've never been to Las Vegas.

KL: I think it was the clothes you wore at the time. They said it made you look like Neil Diamond.

BD: Well, it just goes to show you how times have changed since 1978, if you could be criticised for what you were wearing. I mean, now you can wear anything. You see a guy wearing a dress onstage now, it's like, "Oh, yeah, right". You expect it. I've seen a lot of stuff written about me. People must be crazy. I mean responsible people specially on that Street Legal tour. That band we assembled then, I don't think that will ever be duplicated. It was a big ensemble. And what did people say? I mean, responsible people who knew better. All I saw was "Bruce Springsteen" because there was a saxophone player. And it was disco – well, there wasn't any disco in it.

KL: It always seemed to me that you were sort of infallible in your career up until Self Portrait, in 1970. What's the story behind that album?

BD: At the time, I was in Woodstock, and I was getting a great degree of notoriety for doing nothing. Then I had that motorcycle accident which put me outta commission. Then, when I woke up and caught my senses, I realized I was just workin' for all these leeches. And I didn't wanna do that. Plus, I had a family, and I just wanted to see my kids.

I'd also seen that I was representing all these things that I didn't know anything about. Like, I was supposed to be on acid. It was all storm-the-embassy kind of stuff -Hoffman in streets – and they sorta figured me as the kingpin of all that. I said, "Wait a minute, I'm just a musician. So my songs are about this and that. So what?" But people need a leader. People need a leader more than a leader needs people, really. I mean, anybody can step up and be a leader, if he's got the people there that want one. I didn't want that, though.

But then came the big news about Woodstock, about musicians goin' up there, and it was like a wave of insanity breakin' loose around the house day and night. You'd come in the house and find people there, people comin' through the wood, at all hours of the day and night knockin' on your door. It was really dark and depressing. And there was no way to respond to all this, you know? It was as if they were suckin' your very blood out. I said, "Now, wait, these people can't be my fans. They just can't be." And they kept comin'. We had to get out of there.

This was just about the time of that Woodstock Festival, which was the sum total of all this bullshit. And it seemed to have something to do with me, this Woodstock Nation, and everything it represented. So we couldn't breathe. I couldn't get any space for myself and my family, and there was no help, nowhere. I got very resentful about the whole thing, and we got outta there.

We moved to New York. Lookin' back it really was a stupid thing to do. But there was a house available on MacDougal Street, and I always remembered that as a nice place. So I just bought this house, sight unseen. But it wasn't the same when we got back. The Woodstock Nation had overtaken MacDougal Street also. There'd be crowds outside my house. And I said, "Well fuck it. I wish these people would just forget about me. I wanna do something they can't possibly like, they can't possibly relate to. They'll see it, and they'll listen, and they'll say,'Well let's go on to the next person. He ain't sayin' it no more. He ain't givin' us what we want' you know? They'll go on to somebody else." But the whole idea backfired. Because the album went out there, and the people said, "This ain't what we want" and they got more resentful. And then I did this portrait for the cover. I mean, there was no title for that album. I knew somebody who had some paints and a square canvas, and I did the cover up in about five minutes. And I said, "Well I'm gonna call this album Self Portrait.

KL: Which was duly interpreted by the Press as: This is what he is... Yeah, exactly. And to me, it was a joke. But why did you make it a double-album joke?

BD: Well, it wouldn't have held up as a singe album – then it really would've been bad, you know. I mean, if you're gonna put a lot of crap on it, you might as well load it up!

KL: In the Sixties, there was feeling that this society really was changing. Looking back, do you feel it changed that much?

BD: I think it did. A lot of times people forget. These modern days that we know now, where you can get on an airplane and fly anywhere you want non-stop, direct, and be there – that's recent That's since what, 1940? Not even that – after the war, it was. And telephones? Forget it. I mean, when I was growin' up, I remember we had a phone in the house, but you had to dial it; and I also remember there was a party line of maybe six other people. And no matter when you got on the phone, you know, there might be somebody else on it. And I never grew up with television. When television first came in, it came on at like four in the afternoon, and it was off the air by seven at night. So you had more time to... I guess, to think. It can never go back to the way it was, but it was all changing in the Fifties and Sixties. My kids, they know television, they know telephones. They don't think about that stuff, you know? Even airplanes: I never rode on an airplane until 1964 or somethin'. Up till that time, if you wanted to go across the country, you took a train or a Greyhound bus, or you hitchhiked. I don't know. I don't think of myself as that old, or having seen that much, but...

KL: Do you have MTV at home?

BD: No, I don't get that. I have to go to the city to see MTV. And then, once I do find a set that has it, I'll just watch it for, you know, as long as my eyes can stay open. Until they pop out, I'll just watch it.

KL: What do you make of video? Do you think it's all that important?

BD: Uh, to sell records, yeah. But videos have always been around. David Bowie's been makin''em since he started. There was one thing I saw on a video, and I thought it was great. Then I heard the record on the radio, and it was nothin', you know? But video does give you something to hook on to.

I was just talkin' to Ronnie Wood the other night. He went to the Duran Duran show at the Garden, and he said it was really funny, because they had a great big screen up over the stage with huge close-ups of the band members. And every time they showed a close-up of somebody in the band, the audience would just go crazy – they'd go mad, you know? So while they were showing a close-up of somebody in the band the guitar player'd be playing a lick. So he'd think they were doing it for him. Then he'd play the same lick again to get the same response – and get nothing.

KL: I remember you were trying to get together with Ronnie and Keith [Richards] the other night. How'd it go?

BD: It was pretty subdued actually. But I always like to see Keith or Woody or Eric or... There's a few people I like to see whenever I can. People who play like that. It has to do with a style of music, you know?

KL: Do you ever collaborate?

BD: Yeah, but usually it never happens. It's, "Okay, that's great, we'll pick that up later and finish it." But nothin' ever really gets finished.

KL: Are your best friends mostly musicians?

BD: My best friends? Jeez, let me try to think of one [laughs].

KL: There must be a few.

BD: Best friends? Jesus, I mean, that's...

KL: You've got to have a best friend.

BD: Whew! Boy, there's a question that'll really make you think. Best friend? Jesus, I think I'd go into a deep, dark depression if I were to think about who's my best friend.

KL: There have to be one or two, don't there?

BD: Well, there has to be... there must be... there's gotta be. But hey, you know, a best friend is someone who's gonna die for you. I mean, that's your best friend, really. I'd be miserable trying to think who my best friend is.

KL: What do you do with your year, aside from doing an album and maybe a tour?

BD: Well I'm happy doin' nothin' [laughs].

KL: Do you spend a lot of time in Minnesota?

BD: I get back there when I can, yeah. I got some property outside of St Paul back in'74, a sort of farm.

KL: Do you actually farm on this farm?

BD: Well, it grows potatoes and corn, but I don't sit on the tractor, if that's what you mean. I'm usually either here or on the West Coast or down in the Caribbean. Me and another guy have a boat down there. Jokerman kinda came to me in the islands. It's very mystical. The shapes there, and shadows, seem to be so ancient. The song was sorta inspired by these spirits they call jumbis.

KL: Do you still have that house in California, that big, strange-looking place?

BD: That's a story – you could write a baroque novel offa that. I had five kids, and I just couldn't find a house that was suitable. I liked this area because there was a public school in the neighborhood, and the kids could ride their bikes to it. So I bought this house on about an acre of land, past Malibu. And my wife looked at it and said, "Well its okay, but it needs another bedroom". So I got somebody to design another bedroom. You had to file plans, and they had to be passed – that's the way the red tape is out there. So we had architects come in and right away they said "Oh, yeah, Bob Dylan, right. We'll really make somethin' spectacular here." Anyway, it took six months to get the plans passed just to put on another room. I mean, one room... Jesus! So I went out there one day to see how the room was progressing, and they'd knocked down the house! I asked the guys who were workin', "Where's the house?" And they said they had to knock it down to restructure it for this bedroom upstairs.

KL: Sounds like somebody was making a lot of money off you.

BD: Ain't that the truth? I mean, has it ever been otherwise? So, one thing led to another, and I said as long as they're knocking this place down, we're just gonna add more rooms to it. And anytime some craftsman came by – hitchhiking to Oregon or coming back down to Baja -we'd say "Hey, you wanna do some work on this place?" And they'd do woodwork, tilework, all that kinda thing. And eventually it was built. But then they closed the school out there, and the kids moved away, and Sara moved away, and, uh... So I was stuck with this place. As a matter of fact, I've never even put anything on the living room floor. It's just cement.

KL: Since you've spent a lot of time in the Caribbean, you must be familiar with Rastafarianism.

BD: Not really. I know a lot of Rastas. I know they're Bible-believing people, and it's very easy for me to relate to any Bible believing person.

KL: Well, what if someone is born in a place where there are no Bibles – the Tibetan mountains, say. Could they still be saved?

BD: I don't know. I really don't. Allen Ginsberg is a Tibetan – a Buddhist, or something like that. I'm just not familiar enough with that to say anything about it.

KL: Speaking of Allen Ginsberg, doesn't the Bible say that homosexuality is an abomination?

BD: Yeah, it does. It says that.

KL: And yet Ginsberg's a good guy, right?

BD: Yeah, well but that's no reason for me to condemn somebody, because they drink or they're corrupt in orthodox ways or they wear their shirt inside out. I mean, that's their scene. It certainly doesn't matter to me. I've got no ax to grind with any of that.

KL: Were you up in Minnesota when they tried to pass that antiporn law in Minneapolis? The contention was that pornography is a violation of women's civil rights. What do you think?

BD: Well pornography is pretty deeply embedded. I mean, it's into everything, isn't it? You see commercials on TV that millions of dollars have been put into, and they look pretty sexy to me. They look like they're pushing sex in some kinda way.

KL: In a way, that's the real pornography, because the point isn't to get you off sexually, it's to sell you something.

BD: Yeah, it's to stick the idea in your brain. But it's too far gone. I mean, if you start makin' laws against porno magazines and that kinda stuff, well, then where do you draw the line? You gotta stop the prime-time television shows also.

KL: Any thoughts on abortion?

BD: Abortion? I personally don't think abortion is that important. I think it's just an issue to evade whatever issues are makin' people think about abortion.

KL: Well, I mean, when abortion's used as a form of birth control...

BD: Well, I think birth control is another hoax that women shouldn't have bought, but they did buy. I mean, If a man don't wanna knock up a woman, that's his problem, you know what I mean? It's interesting: They arrest prostitutes but they never arrest the guys with the prostitutes. It's all very one-sided. And the same with birth control. Why do they make women take all them pills and fuck themselves up like that? People have used contraceptives for years and years and years. So all of a sudden some scientist invents a pill, and it's a billion-dollar industry. So we're talkin' about money. How to make money off of a sexual idea. "Yeah, you can go out and fuck anybody you want now; just take this pill." You know? And it puts that in a person's mind: "Yeah, if I take a pill..." But who knows what those pills do to a person? I think they're gonna be passé. But they've caused a lot of damage, a lot of damage.

KL: So it's the man's responsibility? Vasectomy's the best way?

BD: I think so. A man don't wanna get a woman pregnant, then he's gotta take care of it. Otherwise, that's just ultimate abuse, you know? But the problem is not abortion. The problem is the whole concept behind abortion. Abortion is the end result of going out and screwing somebody to begin with. Casual sex.

KL: But the abortion question is: Is it taking a life? Is it a woman's decision?

BD: Well, if the woman wants to take that upon herself, I figure that's her business. I mean, who's gonna take care of the baby that arrives – these people that are callin' for no abortion?

KL: In regard to these feminist sympathies...

BD: I think women rule the world and that no man has ever done anything that a woman either hasn't allowed him to do or encouraged him to do.

KL: In that regard, there's a song on Infidels called Sweetheart Like You, in which you say, "A woman like you should be at home... takin' care of somebody nice."

BD: Actually, that line didn't come out exactly the way I wanted it to. But, uh... I could easily have changed that line to make it not so overly, uh, tender, you know? But I think the concept still woulda been the same. You see a fine-lookin' woman walking down the street, you start goin', "Well, what are you doin' on the street? You're so fine, what do you need all this for?"

KL: A lot of women might say they're on the street because they're on the way to their jobs.

BD: Well, I wasn't talkin' to that type of woman. I'm not talkin' to Margaret Thatcher or anything.

KL: Are you in love at the moment?

BD: I'm always in love.

KL: Would you ever marry again? Do you believe in the institution?

BD: Yeah, I do. I don't believe in divorce. But I'm a strong believer in marriage.

KL: One last question. I think a lot of people take you for a pretty gloomy character these days, just judging by your photos. Why reinforce that image by calling this latest album Infidels?

BD: Well, there were other titles for it. I wanted to call it Surviving in a Ruthless World. But someone pointed out to me that the last bunch of albums I'd made all started with the letter s. So I said, "Well, I don't wanna get bogged down in the letters." And then Infidels came into my head one day. I don't know what it means, or anything.

KL: Don't you think when people see that title, with that sort of dour picture on the front, they'll wonder, "Does he mean us?"

BD: I don't know. I could've called the album Animals and people would've said the same thing. I mean, what would be a term that people would like to hear about themselves?

KL: How about Sweethearts?

BD: Sweethearts. You could call an album that. Sweethearts.

KL: With a big smiling picture?

BD: Yeah.

Although the full transcript of the Kurt Loder interview doesn't circulate, John Bauldie added two further excerpts from it in Rod MacBeath's article "Looking Up Dylan's Sleeves" in the Telegraph no. 53.

On page 33 of #53, there's an additional couple of questions by Loder on Saved and Dylan's response.

On pp. 40-41, there's a much fuller response to Loder's question on the meaning of Infidels.

KL: Did the title of that album reflect the way you felt about yourself?

BD: Do you think you're saved?

BD: The title of that album could have been another title. Titles are tricky things. We could have called that album Solid Rock and had a picture of Moses standing with the Ten Commandments, you know what I mean? We could have done a lot of things. But I thought the cover was wonderful. In fact, we wanted to have it posted up on Sunset Boulevard, you know, and it caused a big stir. Big bloody hand reaching down. Tony Wright did it. He's a very good artist. Very good artist. Saved. A person never knows if he's saved or not. It's not for one person to say. I know people who say they are saved, and at a certain moment you may be. But that moment changes from day to day. But at any particular time and place, yeah. You may feel that that's the case, saved from the fire of damnation.

On Infidels, Loder asked Dylan why he had chosen that title and Dylan responded -

BD: I don't know. There were other titles for it. I wanted to call my next album, whenever I made it, Surviving In A Ruthless World. I wanted to call it that. Before we even went into the studio, "The next album I do I'm gonna call Surviving in a Ruthless World". But something was holding me back from it, because for some reason... somebody pointed out to me that the last bunch of albums that I made all started with the letter S. And I'd say, "Is that right?" There must be a story or something. I didn't want to do another one beginning with S just f for superstitious reasons. I didn't want to get bogged down in the letter S whatever the letter S stands for. And this Infidels came out, just came into my head one day, I guess. This was after we had that album done that it just came in my head that this is the right title for this album. I mean, I don't know any more about it than anybody else really. I did it. I did the album, and I call it that, but what it means is for other people to interpret, you know, if it means something to them. Infidels is a word that's in the dictionary and whoever it applies to... to everybody on the album, every character. Maybe it's all about infidels.

On the possibility preferred by Loder that people would interpret the album title as being aimed at them, Dylan said:

BD: I don't know. I could have called the album Animals, and people would have said the same thing. I mean, what would be a term that people would like to hear about themselves?

28or29 May 1984
Michael Carwood interview

Source: Step into the Arena

Michael Carwood heard Dylan in Verona, and asked him about his Slane concert
INFIDEL BOB KEEPS THE FANS' FAITH

THE TIMES may be a-changin', but 43-year-old Bob Dylan is still a major attraction in Europe. I was one of almost 40,000 who braved the cold and rain of the ancient Italian city of Verona on Monday and Tuesday last week to witness the return of perhaps the most influential rock songwriter of the past two decades.

It is his first tour in eight years and follows the release of the highly acclaimed "Infidel" album which sees Dylan back in great rocking mood. The success of "Infidels" has obviously attracted a whole new generation to Dylan's music for there was quite a few young fans interspersed with ageing hippies who came to relieve their youth with their idol from the 'sixties.

The 2,000 year old amphitheatre with its marvelous acoustics, proved a magnificent setting and as darkness descended you could feel the atmosphere increasing. Carlos Santana and his band deserve much of the credit for this. They were in superb form and their special blend of rock, latin rhythms and soul was just what the doctor ordered to take minds off the chilling winds and thundery showers that at one stage threatened this spectacular outdoor show.

By the time Dylan walked out on stage the fans were like alcoholics waiting on a drink. Yet his entrance was so low key it almost caught most of them by surprise. Dressed in a black leather jacket and blue denim jeans and wearing a straw hat, he hardly seemed to have changed at all. His pale, unshaven face is certainly wearing its age well and as the fans greeted him with a roar usually reserved for football teams, you could almost see a half smile break out on his face.

With the sound problems of the first night at last sorted out, he looked almost relaxed in front of a backing quartet that included such notables as Ian McLagen, the ex-Faces keyboard wizard and former Rolling Stones guitarist Mick Taylor as they swept into "Jokerman" from the latest album. The overall group sound was rather loose but then Dylan, I suspect, isn't the easiest of artists to back and anyway the fans didn't seem to notice.

By the time he launched into "Just Like A Woman" he was in control. In an arena where in Roman times the Emperor enjoyed himself by feeding Christians to the lions, Dylan too was in total command as he fed his message to the masses. It didn't seem to matter that few among his audience were English speaking . He came, he sang and he conquered.

When he took a brief breather and allowed bassist Gregg Sutton to take over on vocals for the old Muddy Waters' classic "I got my mojo working", the backing quartet suddenly seemed much more together but then Dylan returned and began an acoustic set which apart from allowing his fellow musicians a break, also turned out to be the highlight of the show.

He began with "It ain't me babe" which was followed by "It's alright ma" and the best of all, "Don't think twice". It was greatly appreciated but alas, was all too brief.

The band returned and they rocked well into the early hours of the morning with "Maggie's Farm", "Masters of War" and "Like a Rolling Stone" before he said good night with a moving version of "Blowin' in the Wind" with, it seemed, almost the entire audience holding up lighted matches or lighters. In the darkness, way past the midnight hour, it was a breathtaking sight.

Earlier that day he had told me how much he was looking forward to his second visit in Ireland. "In my early folk days I was influenced by Irish traditional music, especially the Clancy brothers and the McPeake family from Belfast. Indeed I still listen to them from time to time." He explained, adding "I enjoyed my last visit there."

His Irish date at Slane Castle on July 8 is the last date of the European tour, after which he is considering some dates in the U.S.

Talking about his choice of songs Dylan admitted he prefers the old ones. He said, "Blowing in the Wind" was a special song for him, though he said that if he just had to sing one song it would be "Song to Woody".

Although he wouldn't admit it, it was quite obvious he dislikes meeting the press. You could be forgiven for thinking his lack of co-operation and crisp one worded replies was just plain rudeness on his part. But one of his closest aides, Monaghan man Jim Callaghan, who is in charge of Dylan's security, insists it's shyness.

"You have no idea how shy the man is" he told me. "I have never quite met anyone like him," he added.

He is also very insecure. He admits he doesn't feel safe and when asked what he most looks forward to, he stressed, "Waking up in the morning. I just can't wait to start another day".

Inevitably the subject of John Lennon was introduced and Dylan's assessment of the former Beatle is interesting: "He was true to his work and his cause. He played his heart out".

He hinted that his religious beliefs have changed again, though he seemed reluctant to go too deep into the subject. When it was suggested that, because there were not many religious songs in his programme on this tour, his beliefs may have changed slightly since the "Saved" album, "maybe" was his only reply.

When pressed in what direction, he added, "In different ways," but still was reluctant to elaborate, though he did say truth and mercy are the most important qualities a person could have.

But still he had no mercy for the press. Are you bored with interviews, he was asked. "Oh no, I love them", he replied with a broad grin. When somebody else asked if he could think of anything worse he retorted immediately "Oh yes, going fishing".

29 May 1984
Verona Press Conference, Hotel Ville Cortine, Sirmione, Italy

Source: Talkin' Bob Dylan…(1984), pp. 3-11.

Q: Have you changed your religious beliefs since the last tour, since you toured here three years ago?
BD: Since when?
Q: I wondered if your religious beliefs have changed since the 'Saved' album three years ago?
BD: Hmm, well, maybe, slightly.
Q: In what way?
BD: In... er... different ways.
Q: You don't sing that many of the so-called religious songs on this tour?
BD: What... would... I should do more? Would you like me to do more?
Q: Well, I don't know really, I just wanted to...
BD: Yeah.
Q: ...know if, it seems like through the latest album that your religious...
BD: Well, every tour is different you know, and each show is different. It's always, uh, they change, from this year to last year. Probably two years ago, you would have seen a different show.
Q: Why not a US tour? You are going to the United States after Europe?
BD: Mmm, probably.
Q: How did the collaboration between you come together?
CS: Grace.
Q: I mean what started it?
CS: Grace.
Q: When and why did you decide to go on this tour?
BD: Well you know, you don't have any control, you just play it where you're booked.
Q: Doesn't that make you feel like a prisoner?
BD: Yeah sure, uh-huh.
Q: How do you feel after the concert of last night?
BD: I was pretty tired last night, I didn't get too much sleep.
Q: Did you like the concert you made?
BD: Sounded alright. We had some sound problems. Should be even better tonight, they should have them fixed by now.
Q: Bill Graham said that rock music today is a question of entertainment more than before. Do you think that's right, do you feel the same way?
BD: Well, there's an element of entertainment in rock music
Q: What about the social and political matters? Are they as strong for you as they were?
BD: Oh yeah, it's always been strong for me.
Q: What about what you mentioned before, about problems with the sound; a lot of people think they would like to listen to you alone with the acoustic guitar.
BD: Yeah.
Q: Carlos, do you play for yourself or for the public?
CS: I would like to answer another question by answering this one at the same time. A little while ago somebody asked us about religion and this kind of stuff. About two years ago in Buffalo, New York, a critic wrote down something that ex.. spelled out a lot of things. He said, it doesn't matter to me where Bob Dylan or Pete Townsend or Santana or George Harrison or anybody gets their inspiration, as long as I get it from them. That to me sums up a lot of the things. When I play, I play mainly for inspiration. It's like a bird you know, you have to fly, the wings of inspiration. Bob Dylan inspired me, John Coltrane inspired me, and when I play, I play for myself, but I also play to touch the hearts of the listeners.

Q: What do you feel when you're on stage?

BD: Well some nights you feel, you know, you feel good, other nights you feel not so good. You try to make it so nobody really knows how you feel.

Q: What do you feel, not how do you feel?

BD: What do you feel? Well it depends, you know, it depends on a lot of feelings, on many things. Depending on what song you sing, you know, you feel differently about everything. Every song takes you to a different feeling, you feel differently on every song.

Q: Do you like a press conference?

BD: I'd rather do things, you know, one on one, you know.

Q: Once you wrote a song about dodging lions in the coliseum. Last night you played in the Verona Coliseum, did you see any lions around?

BD: Yeah, well I felt that there could have been some there, one time.

Q: Feel more safe now?

BD: Not really.

Q: Did you enjoy the audience?

BD: Oh it was great. Great crowd you know.

Q: Your approach now is very much rock n' roll, isn't it? I mean. this is the smallest band you've ever toured with?

BD: Probably, uh-huh.

Q: How long have you been rehearsing?

BD: Awww, about two or three days.

Q: Was that to save money? For what reason, just three days?

BD: Oh, that's a lot, three days!

Q: Why did you choose these musicians?

BD: No particular reason, really. They just understand my songs you know, know how to play them.

Q: What was the exact problem with the sound?

BD: Oh, monitor problems. I'd like to tour with an Italian band when we come back.

Q: The Times They Are A Changin'...which direction at the moment, do you feel... what's happening in the States where you come from?

BD: Are they changing? Oh, in many ways, changing, they're changing every day. By the time you say how they've changed, they've already changed again... yeah.

Q: What are your feelings about Reagan?

BD: Hmm, my feelings? Well, he's the President. I've never met him, I don't know, I've never met him.

Q: Have you got any special thing to say to the teenagers of today?

BD: Mmm, nothing that they wouldn't hear at the show.

Q: Why are we here then?

BD: Who? Why am I here, I don't know why I'm here.

Q: Where do the musicians come from, Allen, Sutton?

BD: Where are they from?, well, Gregg is from New York, and Colin's from Britain.

Q: How did you feel when you were playing 'Blowin' In The Wind' at the end?

CS: To me it was very special. Usually when you play with somebody like Bob, who is a law unto himself, you have to learn how to get used to it.

Q: What do have in common?

CS: I think basically we're both hungry, we both feel cold, we both feel inspired, we both...

BD: We both eat, we both sleep.

Q: Bob, you agree?

BD: Yeah.

Q: I want to resolve one problem. How when you came to Rome in the beginning of the 1960's, how did it end up, what was the conclusion of that?
BD: Mmmm, the conclusion, I don't remember (laughter)... Sophia Loren... is she here?
Q: Is it true you had a very nice time in Italy the first time, nobody trying to...
BD: Yeah it was great the first time, nobody bothered me at all.
Q: (from female reporter!) What did you do when you ran away from home?
BD: I was trying to... find her! (mistranslated as 'He was trying to find himself!')
Q: What does it mean to escape?
BD: Well, you never escape and you can't run away.
Q: We've come from Ireland. Has traditional Irish folk music had any influence on your writing?
BD: Oh yeah, very much so, mmm.
Q: Like who?
BD: Uh... McPeake Family, and The Clancy Brothers... have you heard of the McPeake Family?
Q: Yes indeed, from Belfast.
BD: Mmm, I used to listen to them all the time.
Q: (undecipherable)
BD: Yeah, once in a while.
Q: Have you any reminiscences about Ireland?
BD: Sure. Well, I've got a lot of reminiscences I'd rather not say.
Q: Why have you never written songs about the Irish political situation?
BD: I'm not really that familiar with it.
Q: Joan Baez said 15 days ago that you never really were interested in politics, is that true?
BD: Well… that's true.
Q: Do you think that you have disappointed some people who've seen you as a sort of political prophet, and especially the younger generation?
BD: Mmmm, perhaps.
Q: Last night there didn't seem to be many thirty year olds, but there were a lot of very young people there, how do you explain this?
BD: I don't know.
Q: Is there anything that you know for sure?
BD: Huh? (suggestion from the press.. 'nothing')... Nothing!
Q: Is it true that you prefer to play your old songs, or new songs?
BD: Yeah.. I prefer to play the old songs. But you know, once a song is written it's already old.
Q: After twenty years of success and public life, what is it that still turns you on, brings you feelings?
BD: Oh, you know, just waking up in the morning. I just can't wait to see another day.
Q: Bob, you once said that your old songs played with the acoustic guitar were flat and boring, and you wouldn't want to play them no more?
BD: I never said that, no...no.
Q: In the 60's you said they were flat and boring, now you've started playing them again, what has changed?
BD: I don't know, something must have changed though.
Q: Since you admired Woody Guthrie so much, did you ever... during the 60's, feel like a Woody Guthrie, a man with his guitar against the establishment, did you ever feel like Woody Guthrie?
BD: Yeah, I feel like Woody Guthrie right now!
Q: Did you get angry at the old story about the man who went through your garbage to prove you sold yourself out to capitalism?
BD: Hmm… a little bit.
Q: Allen Ginsberg said you sold yourself out, but only to God?

BD: Uh, that's hard to say. I don't know how much God would pay for me.
Q: How much has your own experience of other people's art influenced your own personal attitude?
BD: Well,... other people's art? I'm influenced by other people's art, but I'm more influenced by... just life.
Q: You think your art influences other people's lives?
BD: Oh, I think so, yeah...No… maybe... what did he say? did he say life? I think my art influences other people's heart!
Q: Personal lives?
BD: Oh, that'd be for them to say.
Q: Would you like your art to influence other people's personal life?
BD: Umm... I don't think I've ever taken it that far.
Q: Do you consider rock n' roll music being an art form at all?
BD: Well, some people say it is. You know, it depends, some people say it's not.
Q: What do you think?
BD: I think it is.
Q: I understand that had been recording with Mick Taylor & Jack Bruce in 1982. What became of those recordings, and was it the material that later became 'Infidels'?
BD: I'm not sure what happened to that... stuff.
Q: What kind of songs were they?
BD: Maybe one of Jack Bruce's songs, I don't know.
Q: Let's be serious. Since we're all here, other than the concerts and the music, what is it you have to tell us?, what do you want us to know?
BD: Nothing!... I'm just here to play the show!
Q: Do you talk in the same way to your children?
BD: Eh, what's that question? They never ask me stuff like this!
Q: You give the impression that you are totally bored with what's going on here, and that you really don't want to be here?
BD: No, that's not true, this is exciting!
Q: You enjoy the press conference?
BD: Very much.
Q: What was the last, book you've read, the last film you've seen, the last record you listened to?
BD: Okay, let's see... the last record, I think I heard a Grace Jones record last time.
Q: And the book and film?
BD: ...and the book... I've read the Bible.
Q: A film?
BD: ...and a film was... uh... 'Shane'.
Q: Could you please let us know three things in which you believe?
BD: Love truth and mercy.
Q: Bob, have you a private life? I mean, can you go in the streets alone and buy your bread like everybody?
BD: Yeah, I definitely buy bread, (laughing) definitely.
Q: Carlos Santana, why is this association with Dylan, playing with Bob on stage?
BD: (interrupts) Carlos and I go way back into the 60's. This isn't anything new. We're from the same era, this music's all from the same era.. right?
Q: What do you remember about John Lennon?
BD: Oh… John Lennon, oh... Well, he was true to his work, you know. True to his, his cause. He played his heart out, you know... very well.
Q: Did you ever imagine yourself as you are now when you were twenty?
BD: Yeah.
Q: And how would you describe yourself now?
BD: Just me!

Q: When you pick songs for your tours, do you pick your own favorite songs or are they part of the concert?

BD: Well yeah, they're usually the same. The ones that I wanna play and the ones that people wanna hear. I never had a problem picking songs.

Q: What is your favorite song? If you had to sing one, what would it be?

BD: Which one would you come to hear me do? The one they'd come to hear me do.

Q: (translating)... he wants to know the answer precisely...

BD: That's...okay... 'Song To Woody'.

Q: What do you think of electronic music?

BD: Huh?

Q: What do you think of electronic music?

BD: I don't care for it personally.

Q: What did you experience, and what did you think of Jimi Hendrix?

BD: Oh, I loved… I loved Jimi Hendrix. But you know, of all the big guitar players, there's only a handful... Carlos is up there with all of them.

Q: What I really want to know is what you experienced when Jimi Hendrix did 'All Along The Watchtower'?

BD: Oh, that was a good version, I liked that yeah, yeah.

Q: What do you feel when you sing and people go crazy for your old songs and don't go crazy the same way for new songs?

BD: Yeah, it's disappointing sometimes, but what can you do, you know?

Q: You say you have to do it?

BD: You gotta do it, I mean you can just...

Q: You're still very productive these days. To my ears, the 'Infidels' album is the best one for a long time. Are you in a more proactive phase, with an optimistic outlook... (undecipherable)...

BD: I didn't get that?

Q: (translating) He would like to know if you would prefer to be free to go sightseeing and walk around the streets of Verona and Sirmione, and if you'd prefer that rather than being here?

BD: No it doesn't matter.

Q: About your film 'Renaldo & Clara'. Was the film successful in the sense that it was a kind of exorcism for you, that it was a way for you to exorcise your personal demons and to resolve your contradictions... and your masks?

BD: A few of 'em (laughs).

Q: If you don't like the questions, what about a thirty second photo session outside?

BD: Not me, I don't particularly like people to know what I look like.

Q: What would you do if you met yourself in the street?

BD: I don't know, I'd probably cross the street!

Q: Do you worry about what the critics say about your music and your songs? Do you want to achieve things that are better than what the critics think?

BD: Yeah, I do. Just some critics like you and some don't, you know. That's just, I guess, the way it is.

Q: Is there something that bores you more than a press conference?

BD: To what?

Q: Is there anything that bores you more than a press conference?

BD: Going fishing (laughs).

Q: When you were in Copenhagen the first time, in '66, you started the press conference by asking a lot of questions, like how long does it take to go on horseback to Hamlet's castle...

BD: Yeah…

Q: You may not remember that?

BD: Oh, I do.

Q: Why did you ask that question, as I was there?
BD: I needed to know.
Q: Did you go riding on a horseback?
BD: No.
Q: What do you remember from Copenhagen? You play next week in Copenhagen. What do you remember from Copenhagen? You've been there two or three times.
BD: Isn't there a... there's water around there, huh? yeah.
Q: Bob, just recently you wrote that democracy does not rule the world?
BD: Right.
Q: That's not very optimistic, but I'd like to hear your comments?
BD: Well it might not be optimistic, but it's realistic. I'd rather be a realist than an optimist.
Q: What can we do about it?
BD: I don't know... I'm not sure. Well, but we like the world ruled by violence. We don't want the world ruled by democracy.
Q: What is different in this European tour, can you already feel something different in this?
BD: That's something different?
Q: Well, I ask you?
BD: Hmm, I know there is...
Q: Have you started working on a new album?
BD: Yeah, yeah, I just started.
Q: Which musicians are you using...
Q: One last word Bob Dylan, the last word?
BD: Yeah, what is it, what's the word?
Q: You have to say it!.
BD: I have to say it? Oh, the last word… God! I'd like to add, I'm just grateful that anybody. showed up at all, at the shows, at the shows and at the press conference.

31 May 1984
Press Conference, Hamburg, Germany

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 473-479.

In the summer of 1984 Dylan undertook an ambitious tour with Carlos Santana. Joan Baez sang on the same bill at a number of concerts but they only sang on stage together at Hamburg and Munich. There were only two press conferences during the tour, at Verona and Hamburg.

This press conference took place in the Clubhouse of St. Pauli Stadium in Hamburg in the middle of Joan Baez's performance. If you listen to the tape, you can hear her singing in the background. Dylan and Carlos Santana are present from the beginning and Baez joins part way through almost as if by accident and, listening to Dylan's contribution, she offers to do a "serious press conference". There were persistent rumors that Bob Dylan and Joan Baez did not see eye-to-eye during this tour and the "between-the-lines" comments do nothing to refute this. Dylan looks tired and even sick and complains of lack of sleep and he is not very attentive to the questions.

Like many press conferences the live tape can be very confusing in places, particularly where there are foreign languages, sound drops and various interruptions. To assist me in getting the best possible transcript, I have used the circulating tape but have also leant heavily on the booklet Talkin' Bob Dylan (1984) by, I believe, Gavin Diddle.

CS = Carlos Santana; JB = Joan Baez; PC = Question from conference floor.

PC: Mr. Dylan, you sing a lot of the old songs. Do you still have the old feelings when you sing them?

BD: Oh absolutely.

PC: No?

BD: More so now.

PC: What do you want to say when you sing the old songs, or is it just a compliment for the public?

BD: I wanna say this what's in the songs, you know. A few of the songs I've changed the lyrics to, bringing them more up to date, you know.

PC: How do you feel being on stage again with Joan Baez?

BD: I haven't been on the stage with Joan yet. It hasn't happened yet, but I'm sure it will be a wonderful experience.

PC: Are there other singers you would like to sing with?

BD: Mm, sure... Elvis Presley.

PC: Will you keep the band you have now on tour, or is it just for this tour?

BD: Well, what.. that's hard to say, you know.

PC: Do you think you have been lucky to get that band?

BD: This band? Oh, I'm always lucky to get any band.

PC: It is said that your '77 concert in Nuremberg was one of your most beautiful. What do you feel... how do you feel coming back to Germany?

BD: Well, we just got here today, you know, so it's still hard to tell. I just woke up a little while ago.

PC: Why did you decide to make a European tour?

BD: No particular reason... it's just, you know, you know, doing this, you just play all over, all over the place.

PC: Do you think it's possible the two of you, you will sing with Joan Baez?
BD: Well, it's possible. I'm not sure if it's likely, but it's possible.
PC: Mr. Santana, I saw you in Verona playing with Bob Dylan and I... (inaudible)
CS: Yeah, the real food is when we play music, and especially with another musician like Bob. The audience, they should be commended, they stayed for more than four, five hours it seems, like, in the cold, and they didn't want us to go, and I didn't want to go. But hopefully next time, we won't go, and if somebody needs to go, they can go, and the rest of the people who want to play should play; because we have, I feel like we have a deep reservoir, you know, of inspiration. And people who run out, they should go home, and people who do have inspiration left to play, they should stay and play.
PC: I have a question. Will you keep this formation you have now?
CS: I beg your pardon... that was to Bob or for me?
PC: To you... will you stay with this formation?
CS: You mean with the band? Sure, I love to. I love these musicians. They're all individuals, great individuals in their own right, they inspire me all the time, so... ah, a great family, thank you.
PC: How did you get together with Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare for the last record?
BD: Mm, it just happened.
PC: You wrote a song I And I...
BD: I And I...!
PC: You write rastafarian music too?
BD: Is that?... Could be.
PC: Is touring still such a big thrill for you as it was in the early days?
BD: What?
PC: Is touring still such a big thrill for you as it was in the early days?
BD: Oh yeah.
PC: Thrill or bore?
BD: Eh?
PC: A thrill or a bore?
BD: Oh it's a thrill.
PC: You look a bit tired.
PC: Bob Dylan, could you try to explain the stupid reactions to Slow Train Coming and Sla... uh, Saved? That... the stupid reaction we had, for example, here in the press?
BD: Ah, who's that singing (Baez can be heard performing in the background)? Slow Train was a big album, yeah. I don't know what was in the press here about it, but Slow Train did all right. I think Saved was a little light, you know. Some are big, some aren't, you know.
PC: Mr Dylan, how do you feel about the American Freeze Movement and the German Peace Movement here and in the world?
BD: Well, I heard about that, yeah.
PC: So what do you feel about it, I mean what do you know about it?
BD: Ah... is there missiles here?... There's miss... yeah, yeah (sighs deeply), ah well, I'd probably... I probably wouldn't want them in my backyard either, you know.
PC: Do you consider any political activities for yourself? I mean as you were a protest singer?
BD: No. I might have been a protest singer, but I've always... never been, you know, into politics, whatever.
PC: In rock n' roll and reggae, there's a lot of politics?
BD: Yeah, there might be, there might be some. Well, you can make anything politic... political, you know. You can turn a love song, you know, a love song can be political too.
PC: Do you wish your lyrics would have any effect?
BD: Was that to me?
PC: Yes.

BD: To have effect... oh sure!
PC: Could you specify that please?
BD: The effect?... Well, they affect me, so I don't know, maybe they affect somebody else... (sighs).
PC: Did you sleep last night?
BD: No. You know how it is on these tours. So much going on, you know, it's just so hard to get some sleep.
PC: I presume you two will play together with Joan Baez tonight. Has there been any time to... to practise before. Would it be just like friends playing the first time together?
CS: I'm sorry, can you repeat the question again? I thought you were asking him. This is... What did you say?
PC: Did you practice before? You are playing together; do you improvise?
CS: All the time as much as possible. We rehearse the band enough time to get acquainted with... I'm a believer that freedom comes from discipline, so first you gotta have discipline, consistency and regularity in your rehearsal, and once you become acquainted with each other, then you can do anything that you want to, because you have confidence... in what you're there for, and in what the musicians can do. So yeah, I rehearsed enough to... when I come here I can maintain a standard as a professional, yeah.
PC: The question was, whether or not you rehearsed with Joan Baez before you played with her today?
CS: No, I never... But it was fun, I was delighted.
PC: Is it fun to play with Bob Dylan too?
CS: Oh, it's a deep honor to play with Bob Dylan. Mm, I mean, I'm looking forward to making it even more fun. At least for my part, for him you know, and for the rest of the audience, you know. That's all we can do, is really to serve and enhance and make people happy & touch 'em, the way you people touch us, which are our convictions, and your beliefs.
PC: Mr Dylan, how many songs does it take you to wake up on stage?
BD: Oh, maybe six.
PC: How many do you play, five?
BD: (Laughs).
PC: Mr Dylan, do you have any aims?
BD: Who?... oh-oh...
PC: Mr Santana, why are you wearing a hat like that?
CS: For the same reason you're wearing a dress like that, or a... pants like that. It's... they're neat, nice colors, keep my head warm.
PC: That's all?.
CS: So far.
BD: OK? Is there any more questions?
PC: I didn't get my answer.
PC: Do you listen to any contemporary rock music now? What kind of music do you listen to?.
BD: Let's see... listen... is that for Carlos or me?
PC: For you Mr Dylan.
BD: Oh. What music do I listen to?
PC: Yeah.
BD: Oh, I listen to just about anything.
PC: There's been happening a lot, say, for the last five years in rock music. What do you think about it. Do you follow the new...
BD: Yeah, well...
(Applause as Joan Baez arrives)
BD: This woman can really talk, so all...

PC: Why can't you?
BD: I don't know. I've never, uh, practiced it.
PC: What means pleasure to you?
BD: Huh?
PC: What means pleasure to you?
JB: (to Dylan) What do you want to do?
BD: What do I like to do? Oh... I like to dance and I like to sing.
JB: This an open press conference? Can anybody ask anybody what they want?
PC: Bob's a bit sleepy.
JB: How long has it been going on?
PC: Twenty minutes.
JB: Really?
PC: Did you like the Hamburg audience?
JB: They're superb.
PC: And in comparison to the Italian audience, what's the difference?
JB: To the which?
PC: Italians.
JB: They're a little less hysterical, but they're certainly as bright.
PC: Did you expect to see more young people in the audience?
JB: My German audiences are, like, are young. This is a young audience, I think, for me, you have to remember, young for Bob too.
JB: Happy Birthday Bob!
PC: How do you come along together, the two of you?
JB: Pardon?
PC: How do you get along with each other?
JB: I don't know, I haven't seen him in two years, and before that, I hadn't seen him in five years. We probably don't get along too well if see each other more, (laughs). How do we get along Bob?
BD: Oh, fabulous.
PC: A question to all three of you, whoever wants to answer. Do you think you will get the next generation of audience and public? You are looking into the audience, maybe looking into the audience, maybe it's the 30's or 40's, no?
JB: It's not. I would assume that it would be, and I would think it would be for Bob, and I would think it might be for Carlos. But you better look again. There's some of course our age...
BD: There's a lot of people our age.
PC: Yeah.
JB: But in the audience there're also a lot of very young people.
PC: But it's difficult for them to find a babysitter when they're going to go to a festival?
BD: That's true, that's right.
PC: Miss Baez, would you comment on the American Freeze movement? I asked Bob Dylan that question before.
JB: I think the American Freeze Movement is the only movement big enough to call an actual movement, and I think that the useful thing about it... see ya Bob... the useful thing about it is that it, umm, helps some people who are very frightened of talking about disarmament in any way that sounds like unilateral, and so it introduced middle class middle class America to talking about disarmament. People who are too terrified to think about it before. The thing about it that isn't... that I'm not quite comfortable with is that it isn't enough. Now it doesn't really... if you can do it from your living room, it's probably not gonna stop... World War III.
PC: What you just said is that more knowledge or awareness of nuclear threat is needed?
JB: Yeah, and that's useful. Definitely.
PC: But that's something you can do from your living room?

JB: Yes, and then the problem is that it's not just... We could dismantle everything magically in a period of six months, but if we didn't change our basic assumptions that we all work on, which are that it's okay to kill each other, then we could build them all up again in... a year, or however long it takes.
PC: Bob, which period in your career are you most satisfied with?
BD: Mm, this one right now.
PC: You make music for so long a time, is it not the moment for you to give it up? What's the end to your career?
BD: Huh? I hope it's not... Oh, every day.
PC: Bob, are you Christian or Jewish?
BD: Well, that's hard to say.
PC: Some more?
BD: It's a long story.
PC: I'd like to know it.
BD: It'd take too long to tell you.
PC: Mr. Dylan, you wrote... rumor has it that you wrote some songs for The Clash and The Psychedelic Furs, is that true? Why did you choose those two new bands, er... to write a song for?
BD: Is that a question, was that a question?
PC: It is, yes.
BD: Do I like the Psychedelic Furs?
JB: Why did you write songs for them? Did you write songs for them?
PC: The Psychedelic Furs told in an interview that you sent them a song.
BD: Oh, I can't remember.
JB: If anybody is interested in a serious press conference, I'd be happy to stay for ten minutes, okay?
BD: Joan's gonna stay and answer some more questions.
JB: That's right. Whichever you like.
PC: Joan Baez, you know him for a really long time. Why is it so difficult to have some answers?
JB: I've known Bob for a long time, and I've never tried to understand him... and I've never shared a press conference with him (laughing).
PC: You'll never do it again?
JB: No, I'll never do it again (laughing).
PC: Is he like that in private life?
JB: I don't know that either. Literally, I never see him.
PC: Carlos Santana, have you played together with Joan Baez – first time on stage now in Hamburg?
CS: We played before. She took the time to invite me to perform for some prisoners in Soledad, and, um, we had a lot of fun. I enjoy being and playing and offering and receiving from Joan Baez.
PC: Do you have the same sort of political engagements as Joan Baez?
CS: No.
PC: Same spiritual?
CS: Same spiritual, uh. We have different ways of doing it, but I'd rather change the world by being an example, rather than by opening my mouth and just pointing out fingers and stuff like that.
JB: I open my mouth a lot, he's right!
PC: Joan Baez, what do you think about Jackson, the candidate?
JB: Jesse Jackson?
PC: Yeah.
JB: Well, I started off when Jesse started to run, I didn't like Jesse, just because I knew him years ago and I didn't trust him. But he started to say things, I liked almost every thing he said. He was refreshing, he wasn't lying, he even admitted when he made a mess, you know, which is very rare. So, I think he's... was a refreshing element in the campaign.

PC: Will he play an important part in either getting his vote to Hart or to Mondale?

JB: He probably will. Quite honestly, for the last few weeks I have not even followed that... chase.

PC: Do you think he'll damage the Democrats chances?

JB: I don't know, I don't know, I'm very poor at predicting party politics.

PC: Do you endorse any candidates?

JB: No I never have.

PC: Did you ever get an invitation to The White House?

JB: Well, I've been to The White House a couple of times, but not under this administration. (laughing). If there are no more questions, thank you. That was fine.

PC: For your common part of the show tonight, do you have any certain titles, or will you improvise?

JB: For which common part?

PC: Will you have a common part on the stage with Bob Dylan?

JB: I hope so, I have, this is the first I've seen... of Bob.

PC: Since two years really? And Fritz Rau told us it had been... he had no close call when he tried to bring you together, is that right?

JB: Yeah, basically, Bob was touring with Carlos...

PC: You trust him, but...

JB: No, no, it's true, Bob was touring with Carlos, and I had invited Bob myself to come to Europe. He said no, he's working with Carlos. Then it turned out we're in the same place, and, so we decided to try, the three of us.

PC: You have come to Hamburg, sometime, er, why do you think... uh, here come only sixty thousand... er... sixteen thousand people, and in Munich will be forty thousand or so?

JB: I don't know. I don't know the answer to that.

PC: How does this reunion feel to you?

JB: A little ridiculous for starts! (laughs). We'll see what... we'll see if we can develop a little as the evening goes along. So I'd better go and see if I can... catch him and practice the songs.

PC: This moment?

JB: This moment.

PC: Thank you, good luck.

JB: Thank you, (laughs), Thank you.

CS: Thanks.

13 June 1984
Robert Hilburn Interview, West Berlin

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 257-260.

On June 13th 1984, in West Berlin, the day of the Waldbuhne concert, Dylan gave his fifth interview to Hilburn. The bulk of the interview took place in Dylan's hotel room immediately after the show. In view of their regular meetings, Dylan appears well at ease in Hilburn's company. The interview was published in the Los Angeles Times of August 5th 1984.

West Berlin – Bob Dylan has gone in less than a decade from being the most acclaimed figure in American rock to the most controversial. He has been mocked by reviewers and written off by some longtime admirers.

Many of his fans from the '60s were confused by the songwriter's late '70s embracing of born-again Christianity, and even felt betrayed by the dogmatic pronouncements that followed the Slow Train Coming and Saved albums.

Dylan – who played to wildly enthusiastic audiences in sold-out arenas during his 1974 reunion tour with The Band – stared, out at empty seats in the 2,500 capacity halls during his 1979 gospel tour. Some of those on hand even booed. Dylan has kept a low U. S. concert profile since then.

But there was no trace of hostility in Europe. His summer tour with Santana as opening act, has been a huge success attracting up to 70,000 fans in some cities.

Much of the audience has followed Dylan since the '60s and cheered most for the classic tunes, including Blowin' In The Wind and Like A Rolling Stone. But they listened politely to the new ones – including a couple from the "born-again" period.

(Dylan raised as a Jew has avoided defining his current religious beliefs. There are signs he has returned to Judaism, although at least one person close to him insists that he's simply taken a lower "born-again" profile.)

The fans here also spoke generously of Dylan as a philosopher & poet, an artist worthy of respect and attention even if he never makes another album. One scholarly looking, middle aged man at his concert here mentioned Picasso and Hemingway, in describing Dylan's artistic status.

In his hotel suite after the Waldbuhne concert, Dylan said he has learned to adjust to the highs and lows of his career.

"The reaction on the (U.S.) Slow Train tour was disheartening at times. But it doesn't wound you because you get used to the ups and downs. You get to where the praise doesn't mean anything because it's often for the wrong reason, and it's the same with the criticism. Besides, I don't think I'll be perceived properly till 100 years after I'm gone. I really believe that. I don't think anybody has really caught on to Blonde On Blonde yet."

Dylan's unorthodoxy reached humorous levels during the European Tour. Consider this dispatch by London Express writer Garth Pearce. He opened his coverage of the tour by saying that the shows could best be described as "unpredictable".

He wrote: "In Verona, Italian National Television was there to record just one song, Blowin' In The Wind, for a news program... (and) Dylan forgot to sing it. But a few nights later in Rotterdam, he not only delivered the song, but surprised everyone by dividing the audience into two groups and urging them to sing along to the chorus".

Pearce also described the confusion around the offstage Dylan. "Executives of the giant record company (CBS) have yet to meet their star" he wrote from Brussels late in the monthlong series of dates. "They suffer from the ignominy of never knowing where he is. "This is because Dylan refuses to stay at any of the lavish, well-protected hotels that have been selected in advance for the tour... When finally persuaded to make a brief appearance before television camera and the press in Germany, he spent most of the time giggling or uttering monosyllabic answers."

Dylan does move at his own chosen speed. He guards his privacy and mistrusts the media. He can be cold and elusive during interviews, but he is also capable, when relaxed, of opening up and exhibiting the insight and warmth that have characterized his most memorable songs.

In discussing his new, well-received (and generally secular) Infidels album last October in Los Angeles, Dylan appeared unusually open. In his hotel suite after the Waldbuhne concert, he was equally engaging. Without a new album to talk about, the conversation centered on his musical development.

At 42, Dylan still exhibits a renegade edge. Backstage at the Waldbuhne, he had paced nervously and had grumbled about the state of contemporary pop-rock. Before going on stage, Dylan looked like a renegade, sitting in a trailer and nibbling at some fruit. He wore a leather jacket and jeans.

"Music crosses every boundary there is. I just wish there was more to (American) music now. To me, it's at an all time low. All that promise from the '60s has been lost. Everyone is chasing after that sterile synthesizer sound – all those drum machines. The (human) heart doesn't beat like those machines. It's out of touch. The best music is people expressing themselves – and you don't always find that on records anymore. The best singers I've heard in recent years are on the street on New York and New Orleans. There's nothing self-conscious about them. But you don't see them, cause they don't fit on cable TV."

About the outpouring of response from fans on this tour, he said:
"A lot of the people who came to see me grew up with me. They are basically my hardcore fans. They might not agree with all the changes they've seen happen, but they've gone through phases too. I might not agree with what they've gone through either. But they're still the ones that really dominate the mood of a crowd".

In the more comfortable hotel setting, he softened his tone. He admitted enjoying Bruce Springsteen's Nebraska album, and singled out The Clash and U2 for praise. He also said he'd like to record with Willie Nelson. Mostly though, Dylan is discouraged by the mechanical anonymity of most British synthesizer groups and by the heartless commercialism of so many U.S. acts. He misses much of the raw roots music – blues, country and folk, that inspired him and formed '50s – '60s rock.

"We're constantly being bombarded by insulting and humiliating music, which people are making for you the way they make these Wonder Bread products" Dylan said, sitting in a straight-backed chair and softly strumming a guitar.

"Just as food can be bad for your system, music can be as bad for your spiritual and emotional feelings. It might taste good or clever, but in the long run it's not going to do anything for you. Haven't you ever been in your car and turned on the radio and you just couldn't find anything?"

Dylan believes that music has a therapeutic value:
"It puts you in tune with your own existence. Sometimes you really don't know how you feel, but really good music can define how you feel. It can make you feel not so much alone. That's what it has always done for me – people like Hank Williams, Bill Monroe, Muddy Waters, Robert Johnson... I'm afraid roots music is going to be obsolete the way we're going. I hope people go back to it. But most people (who make records) don't care about feeling. They just want success".

But wasn't Dylan after success too when he left Hibbing, Minn. eager to be the next Elvis Presley:
"Sure you want success, but there really wasn't that much to be had in those days. The business wasn't so big. I never wanted to be as big as Elvis – I read that somewhere, but I never said that. I never would have dreamed that. When I left home, I was off to see the world, I was caught up in the excitement of it all. I wasn't so much after success, but after excitement. At a certain point though, I realized I had found something musically that no-one else had found. I just stumbled onto it because I had been doing the regular stuff for a long, long time."

By "regular stuff", Dylan meant the purist tradition that dominated folk circles in the early '60s.
"When I started, I combined other peoples styles unconsciously... I crossed Sonny Terry with the Stanley Brothers with Roscoe Holcombe with Big Bill Broonzy with Woody Guthrie... all the stuff that was dear to me. Everybody else tried to do an exact replica of what they heard. I was doing it my own way because I wasn't as good technically as, say, Erik Darling, or Tom Paley. So I had to take the songs and make them mine in a different way. It was the early folk music done in a rock way, which was the first kind of music I played. On the first album, I did Highway 51 like an Everly Brothers tune because that was the only way I could relate to that stuff."

Dylan feels lucky to have entered the pop scene during the '60s, a period of enormous musical and social upheaval:
"You can only pull out of the times what the times will give you. You create out of your experience. If your experiences are the same as the guys' next door and he ain't doin' nothin', then you aren't going to be doing much either. Everything happened so quick in the '60s. There was just an electricity in the air. It's hard to explain – I mean, you didn't ever want to go to sleep because you didn't want to miss anything. It wasn't there in the '70s and it ain't there now. If you want to really be an artist and not just be successful, you'll go and find the electricity. It's somewhere..."

17 June 1984
Antoine De Caunes Interview, Stade De L'Ouest, Nice, France

source: Talking Bob Dylan 1984 by Gavin Diddle, pp. 22-25.

ADC: How do you see yourself today? How does it feel to be Bob Dylan in 1984?

BD: Just like '66.

ADC: It can't be exactly the same.

BD: Well, sort of the same.

ADC: Can't you be a little bit more explicit about it?

BD: Well, you have more experience, whatever your experience has been that's who you are.

ADC: Who do you like who's working in the singer/songwriting field today?

BD: Who do I like? Oh there's a bunch of people, er, Tom Waits is pretty good, er, Jonathan Richmond, have you heard of him?

ADC: Yeah.

BD: I think he's pretty good.

ADC: There's this guy who's always speaking about you, Elvis Costello.

BD: Elvis Costello, he's pretty good.

ADC: You like his lyrics?

BD: Yeah, I like "Everyday I Write the Book."

ADC: In the sixties and the seventies superstars were people like you, Lennon, Bowie and Jagger. Today it seems that it's more people like Michael Jackson, do you see a difference in quality, or in what people expect and demand from a star, what do you think?

BD: Well, yeah, you have to make new exciting videos, that's the big difference. I don't know.

ADC: All through your career you've always shown a strong sense of humour mixed with insolence and disrespect, is it more often to be insolent when you were a kid starting out, or when you were world famous, almost an institution?

BD: Yeah, it was easier but it's still not so hard.

ADC: When did you prefer it, at your beginnings or... when was it more funny for you?

BD: More funny?

ADC: Yeah.

BD: It's always been funny.

ADC: It still is?

BD: Yeah.

ADC: Who do you feel most close to these days, Pat Garrett or Billy the Kid? Don't say Alias.

BD: No. Well you know they're both the same man.

ADC: Did the fact that people call you a genius have any influence on your working?

BD: Well it's hard to be called a genius you know, and the problem is that you start to believe it. If you see it in the newspaper you know you start saying, genius, well, how do I act now? But I never believed that.

ADC: Do you have the same overbearing need to write today as in the days when you said if I didn't write I'd go crazy?

BD: Yeah. When your laying down trying to go to sleep thoughts go through you mind you know. You get up and go write them down.

ADC: In any case do you still take the same pleasure in writing?

BD: Well you see I write because I need something to sing. Sometimes it's painful, you know you're up days and nights, walking around you know, trying to finish this or do that, get this right, get that light right. Oh man, you know, it's never smooth, it's always uppity down you know.

ADC: How do you explain that since the beginning the French have always been fanatically enthusiastic about the words to you songs, when they usually have the reputation not to get the words to any English and American songs?

BD: Well, I studied a lot of French poets, you know when I was starting out. Apollinaire, Rimbaud, and those guys.

ADC: But the way they appreciate it do you think it might be because of the mark left by Surrealism on the tradition of French poetry?

BD: Yeah, probably, I mean I just came last. You know you just take what the last thing was. And I just came along at that Existential period of time, at that end.

ADC: Where you aware of the Surrealists when you started to write?

BD: I wasn't aware of it until I drifted into them pretty natural, it came out of the Beat poets, and then drifted into the surrealistic poets. But I did that naturally. I didn't say, I'm gonna do this or that, it just happened.

ADC: Have you felt changes in your writing technique, and if so in what periods?

BD: I think I changed in the late sixties, and then I changed probably in the late seventies.

ADC: And you will change in the late eighties?

BD: I don't think so, I don't think so. I hope so but I'm not sure I can anymore, you get tired at changing after a while.

ADC: Your initials B.D. means in French 'comic strip', would you take that as a compliment?

BD: Oh yeah, sure. B.D.? Well a lot of things in life are like that.

ADC: What do you think of the way young people might perceive music through video tapes?

BD: Well in one sense it sells records but then in another sense probably if people can sit at home and see the person singing why would they go out to see him you know. They're not gonna look as good even when they go see him. They're gonna see him sweat and see him in different angles, they're gonna see a lot of things they don't see on the video, so, you can't be so pretty. It makes you look real sanitized on the video. In reality it's never that way.

ADC: By the way who was the beautiful blonde in the "Sweetheart" video who was playing the Mick Taylor solo.

BD: That was Mick Taylor, wasn't it?

ADC: No!

BD: Did he change himself blonde? Oh I don't know, there's so many of them, they just come and go all the time. I don't know which one that was.

ADC: Did you feel affected in anyway at what happened in rock from '77 on. And do you think there is a link at what happened in rock music in the U.K. and in America?

BD: In the late seventies? Er, well I'm not too aware that anything too important happened in the late seventies. Except maybe The Clash, Sex Pistols, outside of that I can't think of anything.

ADC: Well you know in Europe it was the beginning of a new movement in rock music.

BD: Yeah? I didn't know that.

ADC: It didn't feel the same in the States?

BD: No I don't think so...

ADC: It's been quite a while since we've had an angry song from you, last one was maybe "Hurricane" on "Desire" or would you say "Neighborhood Bully" on "Infidels".

BD: Well you know you can only carry anger so far, a lot of angry songs can seem like very soft melodic love ballads. There could be a lot of anger beneath those.

ADC: It's evident that whatever style of music you play your taste is for real and true music, music that doesn't compromise, would you compare that definition to anyone playing today?

BD: Oh, I don't know. Yeah, the people that I mentioned, usually you know a singer/songwriter, a person who performs by himself, it's much easier for him to do that than for someone in a band, or a band. Because one person can just do it by himself, he can do anything he feels like, he doesn't have to be democratic or go voting on which direction to take. It's very rare to find a group who all think together, who are all competent to decide what they're doing.

ADC: What are you projects for your next recording? I heard it could be an acoustic one.

BD: Well I think I'm gonna do a few acoustic things.

ADC: Not the whole recording?

BD: I don't thing so. Maybe two or three songs with guitar and harmonica.

ADC: Is there anything you used to dream of as a child that you've not been able to do or achieve, despite the fact you're Bob Dylan?

BD: Oh, I don't know, maybe go to Disneyland. I don't think about that stuff.

ADC: In 1963 you wrote "A Hard Rain's a Gonna Fall", do you think that one day it might finally fall and if not, how do you see yourself in ten years?

BD: I don't know, I couldn't see myself now ten years ago. Usually you can see where other people are gonna be at ten years from now but yourself it's hard to see.

ADC: And what about the rain?

BD: It's starting to fall, it has been falling for a while actually.

ADC: Thank-you very much Bob.

BD: Thanks.

The Antoine De Caunes interview was aired on French TV channel, Antenne 2, on 30th June 1984.

27 June 1984
Mick Brown Interview, Madrid, Spain

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 879-883.

This interview, conducted by Mick Brown, appeared in the 'Week In Focus' section of the Sunday Times on July 1st 1984. It took place a few days earlier, June 27th, in a café in Madrid the day after Bob's concert at the Estadio del Rayo Vallecano.

Dylan:
'Jesus, who's got time to keep up with the times?'

This week Bob Dylan comes to Britain. The folksinger-cum-folk hero of the 1960s has not always had a good reception here, in 1965 purists attacked him for "going electric". in 1981 his new-found evangelism left many of his fans cold. What should they expect this time? Last week Mick Brown had an exclusive interview.

Bob Dylan tugged at a cigarette, stroked the beginnings of an untidy beard and gazed pensively at the stream of traffic passing down the Madrid street. "What you gotta understand," he said at length, "is that I do something because I feel like doing it. If people can relate to it, that's great; if they can't, that's fine too. But I don't think I'm gonna be really understood until maybe 100 years From now. What I've done, what I'm doing, nobody else does or has done."

The messianic tone grew more intense. "When I'm dead and gone maybe people will realise that, and then figure it out. I don't think anything I've done has been evenly mildly hinted at. There's all these interpreters around, but they're not interpreting anything except their own ideas. Nobody's come close."

But a lot of people, it seems, still want to. Bob Dylan may no longer sell records in the consistently enormous quantities he once did – a fact to which he will allow a tinge of regret – but his capacity to hold his audience in thrall seems undiminished.

By the time Bob Dylan arrives in Britain this week for performances at St. James's Park, Newcastle, on Tuesday and Wembley Stadium on Saturday, he will already have performed to almost half a million people throughout Europe – half a million people singing the chorus of Blowing In The Wind, an Esperanto that is as much a testament to Dylan's abiding influence and charisma as the insatiable interest of the world's press in his activities.

This interest is equaled only by Dylan's determination to keep his own counsel whenever possible. As Bill Graham, the tour's garrulous American promoter and Dylan's closest adviser, keeps reminding you, Bob "is not your everyday folksinger."

All the German magazine Stern had wanted to do was touch base for five minutes in return for a front cover. Dylan declined. The press conference that he had been persuaded to hold in Verona, attended by 150 excitable European journalists, had been a fiasco: photographers barred, and the first question from the floor – "what are your religious views nowadays?" – met by Dylan irritably brushing the table in front of him, as if to sweep aside that and all other questions to follow.

"I mean, nobody cares what Billy Joel's religious views are, right?" he tells me with a wry smile, "what does it matter to people what Bob Dylan is? but it seems to, right? I'd honestly like to know why it's important to them."

One expects many things of Bob Dylan, but such playful ingenuousness is not one of them.

Dylan protects himself well, not with bodyguards but with a smokescreen of privacy and elusiveness of the sort that encourages speculation and myth. Meeting him involves penetrating a frustrating maze of "perhapses" and "maybes", of cautions and briefings – suggestive of dealing with fine porcelain – culminating in a telephone call summoning you to an anonymous cafeteria filled with Spanish families who give not a second glance to the figure in a Hawaiian shirt and straw hat who at last comes ambling through the door.

He is surprisingly genial, youthful for his 43 years, lean, interested and alert, who treat the business of being Bob Dylan with an engagingly aw-shucks kind of bemusement.

It was in striking contrast to the apparition Dylan had presented the previous night, on stage in front of 25,000 people in a Madrid football stadium, his black smock coat, high boots and hawkish profile suggesting some avenging backwoods preacher.

The emphasis in his performance has shifted from the overtly evangelical songs heard in Dylan's last visit to Britain three years ago. Now it spans every phase of his 21-year career. The themes of social protest, personal love and religious faith have never been more of a piece. Dylan remains what he has always been, an uncompromising moralist. And to hear songs such as "Masters Of War", "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" (about nuclear war), and "Maggie's Farm" (about rebellious labor) invested with fresh nuances of meaning, not to say vitriol, is to realise that, while the sentiments may have become unfashionable in popular music, they are no less pertinent. Nobody else is writing songs like Bob Dylan. Nobody ever did.

"For me, none of the songs I've written has really dated," he says. "They capture something I've never been able to improve on, whatever their statement is. A song like "Maggie's Farm" – I could feel like that just the other day, and I could feel the same tomorrow. People say they're 'nostalgia', but I don't know what that means really. A Tale Of Two Cities was written 100 years ago; is that nostalgia? This term 'nostalgia', it's just another way people have of dealing with you and putting you some place they think they understand. It's just another label."

Labels exercise Bob Dylan greatly. People have been trying to put them on him since he started, he says, "and not one of them has ever made any sense."

The furore about his religious beliefs puzzled him most of all, "like I was running for Pope or something." When the word first spread that he had eschewed Judaism and embraced Christianity, and he toured America in 1979 singing overtly religious songs, the most hostile reception came not from rock audiences but when he played university campuses, "and the so-called intellectual students showed their true monstrous selves."

"Born-again Christians" is just another label, he says, he had attended Bible school in California for three months, and the book was never far from his side, but the idea that faith was a matter of passing through one swing door and back out another struck him as ridiculous. "I live by a strict disciplinary code, you know, but I don't know how moral that is or even where it comes from really. These things just become part of your skin after a while; you get to know what line not to step over – usually because you stepped over it before and were lucky to get back."

Was he an ascetic? Dylan lit another cigarette and asked what the word meant. "I don't think so. I still have desires, you know, that lead me around once in a while. I don't do things in excess, but everybody goes through those times. They either kill you, or make you a better person."

By this time in the conversation it did not seem awkward to ask: did he believe in evil?

"Sure I believe in it. I believe that ever since Adam and Eve got thrown out of the garden that the whole nature of the planet has been heading in one direction -towards apocalypse. It's all there in the Book of Revelations, but it's difficult talking about these things to most people because most people don't know what you're talking about, or don't want to listen."

"What it comes down to is that there's a lot of different gods in the world against the god – that's what it's about There's a lot of different gods that people are subjects of. There's the god of Mammon. Corporations are gods. Governments? No, Governments don't have much to do with it anymore, I don't think. Politics is a hoax. The politicians don't have any real power. They feed you all this stuff in the newspapers about what's going on, but that's not what's really going on."

"But then again, I don't think that makes me a pessimistic person. I'm a realist. Or maybe a surrealist. But you can't beat your head against the wall forever."

He had never, he said, been a Utopian: that was always a foreign term to him, something to do with moving to the country, living communally, and growing rice and beans. "I mean, I wanted to grow my own rice and beans – still do – but I never felt part of that movement."

But he could still look back on the 1960s with something approaching affection. "I mean, the Kennedys were great-looking people, man, they had style," he smiles. "America is not like that anymore. But what happened, happened so fast that people are still trying to figure it out. The TV media wasn't so big then. It's like the only thing people knew was what they knew; then suddenly people were being told what to think, how to behave, there's too much information."

"It just got suffocated. Like Woodstock – that wasn't about anything. It was just a whole new market for tie-dyed T-shirts. It was about clothes. All those people are in computers now."

This was beyond him. He had never been good with numbers, and had no desire to stare at a screen "I don't feel obliged to keep up with the times. I'm not going to be here that long anyway. So I keep up with these times, then I gotta keep up with the 90s. Jesus, who's got time to keep up with the times?"

It is at moments such as this that Dylan – once, misleadingly perhaps, characterised as a radical – reveals himself as much of a traditionalist; an adherent of biblical truths; a firm believer in the family and the institution of marriage – despite his own divorce from his wife, Sara; a man disenchanted with many of the totems and values of modern life, mass communications, the vulgarity of popular culture, the "sameness" of everything. Personally he had been reading Cicero, Machiavelli and John Stuart Mill. Contemporary literature? "Oh yeah, I read a detective story, but I can't remember what it was called."

"At least in the 1960s it seemed there was room to be different. For me, my particular scene, I came along at just the right time, and I understood the times I was in. If I was starting out right now I don't know where I'd get the inspiration from, because you need to breathe the right air to make the creative process work. I don't worry about it so much for me; I've done it; I can't complain. But the people coming up, the artists and writers, what are they gonna do, because these are the people who change the world."

Nowadays, he admits, he finds writing harder than ever. A song like "Masters Of War" he would despatch in 15 minutes, and move onto the next one without a second thought. "If I wrote a song like that now I wouldn't feel I'd have to write another one for two weeks. There's still things I want to write about, but the process is harder. The old records I used to make, by the time they came out I wouldn't even want them released because I was already so far beyond them."

Much of his time nowadays is spent travelling. He was in Jerusalem last Autumn for his son Jesse's Bar-mitzvah – "his grandmother's idea," he smiles. Israel interests him from "a biblical point of view," but he had never felt that atavistic Jewish sense of homecoming. In fact he lives principally on his farm in Minnesota, not far from the town of Hibbing where he spent his adolescence. Then there is the domed house in Malibu, California, originally built to accommodate his five children – good schools nearby, he says – but which he has seldom used since his divorce, and a 63 ft sailing boat with which he cruises the Caribbean "when I can't think of anything else to do."

He had never contemplated retirement: the need to make money was not a factor – he is a wealthy man – but the impulse to continue writing was. "There's never really been any glory in it for me," he says. "Being seen in the places and having everybody put their arms around you, I never cared about any of that. I don't care what people think. For me, the fulfillment was always in just doing it. That's all that really matters."

As the conversation had progressed, more and more people had realised who the man in the straw hat was. A steady stream had made their way to his table, scraps of paper in hand. Dylan had signed them all, with a surprisingly careful deliberation – almost as if he was practising – but his discomfort at being on view was becoming more apparent. As peremptorily as he arrived, Bob Dylan made his excuses and left.

1 or 2 July 1984
a Parisian café, Paris, France

Source: The Telegraph, #41, Winter 1991 plus countless Cohen interviews 1988-92.

Brief Encounter
LEONARD COHEN

As Leonard Cohen slaved over a hot stove in LA recently, preparing a tasty lunch for Q Magazine's Adrian Deevoy, the hungry reporter mentioned Bob Dylan's name en passant, to which Cohen replied:

"A lot of people want to write Bob Dylan off. I'm not one of them. Doesn't matter if Bob takes a 10-year rest. Doesn't matter. First of all, if Bob never sang again he's got a catalogue of work that will ensure his reputation into the next millenium. But I don't think that's the case anyway. I think he is Picasso. I think he's resting. And the guy has a perfect right to rest, to coast, and one of these days you're going to hear from his again. He puts a record out every year and I buy 'em all. Well, I try to get them free from my record company. I listen to them all. I can't honestly say I truly enjoyed his last two albums but I give the guy the total benefit of the doubt. I say he's working on something and these are just notes. Just sketches. Something's going to come up and you'll hear him talking about himself or the world again and it's gonna turn you around. I just know it's gonna be that way.

The last time we met for any great length of time was after a concert he'd done in Paris. We met in a café in the 14th Arrondissment and we had a real good writers' shop talk. We really went into the stuff very technically. You couldn't meet two people who work more differently. He said, 'I like this song you wrote called Hallelujah.' In fact, he started doing it in concert. He said, 'How long did that take you to write?' And I said, 'Oh, the best part of two years'. He said, 'Two years?' Kinda shocked. And then we started talking about a song of his called I And I from Infidels. I said, 'How long did you take to write that?'. He said, 'Ohh, 15 minutes'. I almost fell off my chair. Bob just laughed."

7 July 1984
Martha Quinn interview for MTV,
Wembley Stadium backstage, London, England

Source: Step Into The Arena

The present transcription covers merely the broadcast version, not a complete 35min interview.

MQ: Will this tour help you reach a new generation?

BD: I don't reach anybody. They find me. They find me. It's not for me to go out and reach somebody. If they can find me, they find me, and if they don't, they don't. That's the way it's always been. I don't think it's gonna change now just because I'm such an old man and it's nineteen-eighty… what is it?

MQ: …four, Bob! Four.
How do you feel about being a rock n' roll legend, and who else do you consider legendary?

BD: All the early rock n' roll people who aren't around any more, Buddy Holly, Gene Vincent, Woodie Guthrie, is legendary, and a lot of people that you don't have too much information about are really legendary. Somebody like Robert Johnson and a couple more would all be legendary. Jimi Hendrix is legendary.
When people sense that you've come through a certain heat and are still functioning in a semi-coherent type of way, I'm sure they treat you as a legendary figure, but if you go to buy a loaf of bread or you go into a restaurant to order a meal and the check comes and you say, "Hey, wait a minute, I don't need this, I'm a legendary person, right, this is not for me," they don't buy that.

MQ: What kind of audiences came out to see you?

BD: Mostly foreign audiences. In France we had mostly French audiences, and then in Spain we had a lot of Spanish audiences. In Germany they were German audiences…

MQ: How about Italy?

BD: Italy! They were mostly, probably Italian!

MQ: Is there any difference between your protest songs and personal songs?

BD: I think all my songs deal with social and political issues. That's why they call me a protest singer. They all deal with that.

MQ: What do you think of your new audience, those people who weren't born when you brought our 'Blonde on Blonde'?

BD: Well, you can't look at old and new fans, you won't see everyone as an equal.

MQ: Do you always take the same pleasure by playing these old songs?

BD: Yeah!

MQ: Do they still mean a lot for you?

BD: They always mean a lot, you know.

MQ: When I ask musicians which of their records they prefer they usually say "the latest" – what would you say?

BD: Well, I like the latest one, but I thought, uh! The one before that was my personal favorite, then some of the other records I like a lot…

MQ: Like?

BD: That Freewheelin' album. 'Bringing It All Back Home,' I like that I haven't heard them in a long time though. Well, I mean my personal favorite was the "Shot of Love" record but it didn't seem to sell too much. I think it politically, I think it, I don't know… I'm probably the only person that feels that way you know… one of the few.

When you're talking to me about my records and what I do, I personally have, you know, preferences that other people don't have I know what people wanna hear, you know, I know what they think they wanna hear, so I decide I don't care how people think I'm gonna make this record, you know. I'm gonna make this record, that's what I think, and everybody says, well, okay, let 'em think that. I ain't gonna buy that record, 'cause I don't think that, you know, 'Shot of Love' to me, I think, was a great record.

MQ: Now at first Bob didn't really want to go to Europe (South America was his first choice).

BD: Bill Graham is about the only promoter I know that can get people down in South America and he tried to do it, in, er…, at the last moment and, er, I was sort of set my mind mentally to do something, so, er…, we did this 'cause the other one didn't come off.

8 July 1984
Bono Vox Interview, Dublin, Eire

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 723-730.

This interview was conducted at Slane Castle, Dublin immediately prior to Dylan's concert. Bono (BV) is conducting the interview and Van Morrison (VM) contributes here and there. Both Bono and Van Morrison were to be guests at the concert, Van Morrison performing It's All Over Now, Baby Blue and Bono joining Dylan on stage for Blowin' In The Wind. The interview appeared in the Irish music paper Hot Press. (issue of 26 August 1984).

BV: You have been to Ireland before, haven't you?
BD: Yeah, I was in Belfast and in Dublin, and we traveled around a little bit too.
BV: Have you ever spent any time here? Have you ever been here on holiday?
BD: Yeah, well, when I was here, we traveled by car, so we stayed in different places – but Irish music has always been a great part of my life because I used to hang out with the Clancy Brothers. They influenced me tremendously.
BV: Yeah, they have so much balls as a sound, you know, when they sing, it's like punk rock.
BD: Yeah, they were playing clubs as big as this room right here and the place – you couldn't put a pin in it, it would be so packed with people.
BV: You could smell their breath?
BD: Yeah!
BV: I bet you could. They blow you over with their lungs! God, I'd love to sing like that.
BD: Yeah, I spent years with them running around, 61, 62, 63.
BV: Greenwich Village?
BD: All over the place, I played on the same bill with them once.
BV: Get their autographs? (laughs)
BD: No, I didn't get their autograph. But you know one of the things I recall from that time is how great they all were – I mean there is no question, but that they were great. But Liam Clancy was always my favorite singer, as a ballad singer. I just never heard anyone as good, and that includes Barbara Streisand and Pearl Bailey.
BV: You got to be careful here!
BD: He's just a phenomenal ballad singer.
BV: Yeah, you know what I envy of you is that my music, and the music of U2 is like, it's in space somewhere. There is no particular musical roots or heritage that we plug into. In Ireland there is a tradition, but I've never plugged into it. It's like as if we're caught in space. There's a few groups now who are caught in space...
BD: Well, you have to reach back.
BV: We never did play a 12 bar.
BD: You have to reach! There's another group I used to listen to called the McPeake Family. I don't know if you ever heard of them?
BV: The McPeake Family! I'd love to have heard of them, with a name like that.
BD: They are great. Paddy Clancy recorded them. He had a label called Tradition Records, and he used to bring back these records; they recorded for Prestige at the time, and Tradition Records, his company. They were called The McPeake family. They were even more rural than the Clancy Brothers. The Clancy Brothers had always that touch of commerciality to them – you didn't mind it, but it was still there, whereas the McPeake Family sang with harps. The old man, he played the harp – and it was that (gestures) big – and the drums.
BV: Were they a real family?

BD: Yeah, they were a real family; if you go to a record store and ask for a McPeake Family record, I don't know, I'm sure you could still get them in a lot of places.

BV: Have you heard of an Irish group that are working now in this middle ground between traditional and contemporary music called Clannad? Clannad is Gaelic for family, and they've made some very powerful pieces of music, including a song called "Theme From Harry's Game". It's from a film, and it knocked over everyone in Europe. It didn't get played in the US. It's just vocal and they used some low-based frequencies in it as well – it's just beautiful. They're a family, they come from Donegal, and have worked from that same base of traditional music.

BD: There's a group you have here, what's it called, Plankston?

BV: Planxty.

BD: They're great!

BV: Another rock n' roll band!

BD: Yeah, but when I think of what's happening – I think they're great.

BV: There's another group called De Dannan. The name De Dannan has something to do with the lost tribes of Dan. You heard of the disappearing tribe of Dan? They say they came from Ireland.

BD: Yeah, I've heard that, I've heard that.

BV: I'm not a musicologist or expert in this area, but it would appear that this is true. Also, you know they say the Irish musical scale has no roots in Europe whatsoever, rather it comes from Africa and India. The Cartesian people, the Egyptian people, what gave them supremacy in the Middle East was the sail they developed. I forget what they call it, I forget the name of the sail, but this sail allowed them to become successful sea farers and traders and they dominated as a result of their trading, and that same sail which was used on those boats, is used on the West of Ireland.

BD: Is that right?

BV: Bob Quinn made a film called Atlanteans in which this theory was elaborated. He suggests that the Book of Kells, which is a manuscript, part of it has it's roots in Coptic script, not in Europe. It's not a European thing at all – it's linked from Africa, Spain, Brittany and Ireland, because that was a sea route. I'm not an expert. I shouldn't be talking about it really. But it's of interest when you think of it.

BD: Sure it is.

BV: I might be able to send you over some tapes of that actually.

BD: I'd like to have them. You know Planxty? I also like Paul Brady a lot.

BV: Yeah, he's great. He's a real song writer. Tell me – have you ever approached a microphone, not with words, but just to sing? I had to do this as a necessity once when some lyrics of mine were stolen – and I learnt to sing on the microphone just singing and working the words into it later. I find when I put a pen in my hand it gets in the way! Do you have words first?

BD: I do at certain times.

BV: In Portland, Oregon a number of years ago two pretty girls walked in the dressing room, smiled and walked out with some of our songs, in a brief case.

BD: I used to have that happen to me all the time, except they used to take clothes!

BV: Is that right?

BD: They used to take all my best clothes, but never took my songs.

BV: After that we had to go in to record our second LP, October, without any songs – there was a lot of pressure, having to sing under that stress without any words, I found out a lot of things about myself that I didn't even know were there. I'd wondered, had some of the things that have come out of you ever been a surprise to you?

BD: That usually happens at concerts or shows I'm doing, more than recording studios, Also, I never sit around, I usually play... I'll play my guitar, rather than just have something to say, to express myself. I can express it better with my guitar.

BV: I wondered had the songs that you were writing ever frightened you in some way?

BD: Oh yeah, I've written some songs that did that. The songs that I wrote for the Slow Train album did that. I wrote those songs. I didn't plan to write them, but I wrote them anyway. I didn't like writing them, I didn't want to write them. I didn't figure... I just didn't want to write them songs at that period of time. But I found myself writing these songs and after I had a certain amount of them, I thought I didn't want to sing them, so I had a girl sing them for me at the time, and what I wanted to do was... she's a great singer...

BV: Who is this?

BD: A girl I was singing with at the time, Carolyn Dennis her name was. I gave them all to her and had her record them, and not even put my name on them. But I wanted the songs out; I wanted them out, but I didn't want to do it because I knew that it wouldn't be perceived in that way. It would just mean more pressure. I just did not want that at that time.

BV: But are you a trouble maker? Is there something in you that wants trouble that an album like Slow Train stirs up? Do you wanna fight? Do you wanna box!?

BD: I don't know! I mean, I wanna piss people off once in a while, but boxing or fighting – it would be an exercise to do it. You know, I love to do it, but not with anything at stake.

BV: Chess, do you play chess?

BD: Yeah, I play chess. Are you a chess player?

BV: I am a chess player.

BD: I'm not that good actually.

BV: I'll challenge you to a game of chess.

BD: I don't have it right now actually, I just don't have one on me, but the next time you see me!

BV: Oh, you can get these little ones you know, that you can carry around.

BD: Yeah, I take them on tour all the time, but nobody in the band will play me.

BV: Really?

BD: Yeah, they say it's an ego trip. They say I want to win, I don't want to win, I just like to play.

BV: When you put out a record that causes trouble – is it part of an overall plan, or do you just do it?

BD: No, I don't ever put out a record to cause trouble – if it causes trouble, it causes trouble, that's apart from me. If it causes trouble, that's other people's problem. It's not my problem. I'm just not going to put out a record that I just feel – you know, if I feel like I'm inspired to make a statement, I'll make that statement. But what happens after I do it, I don't care about that.

BV: What's your opening game?

BD: My opening game, you mean king's pawn up two – and all that? I don't know.

BV: You just takes it as it comes.

BD: Yeah. I don't really play that seriously.

BV: Well, I thought I did until I played Adam's brother Sebastian – he was only about 13 years old and he beat me!

BD: Somebody may have a chess game here.

BV: I'd love to play.

They search for a chess board; Van Morrison enters.

BV: You haven't used any synthesizers on your records so far?

BD: No, I've never used those machines.

BV: The Fairlight Music Computer – have you heard of that?

BD: Fairlight?

BV: Van, what do you think of electronic music?

VM: I like the music Brian Eno plays.

BV: He speaks very highly of you. He's producing our record right now.
VM: Say hello.
BV: (to Bob) Do you know Brian Eno?
BD: Brian Eno? I don't know Brian Eno, but I know some of his work.
BV: When you're working with a producer, do you give him the lee-way to challenge you?
BD: Yeah, if he feels like it. But usually we just go into the studio and sing a song, and play the music, and have, you know...
BV: Have you had somebody in the last five years who said "That's crap, Bob"?
BD: Oh, they say that all the time!
BV: Mark Knopfler, did he say that?
BD: I don't know, they spend time getting their various songs right, but with me, I just take a song into the studio and try to rehearse it, and then record it, and then do it. It's a little harder now though to make a good record – even if you've got a good song and a good band. Even if you go in and record it live, it's not gonna sound like it used to sound, because the studios now are so modern, and overly developed, that you can take anything good and you can press it and squeeze it and squash it, and constipate it and suffocate it. You do a great performance in the studio and you listen back to it because the speakers are all so good, but, ah, no!
BV: All technology does is – you go into a dead room with dead instruments and you use technology to give it life that it doesn't have, and then it comes out of the speakers and you believe it. What I've been trying to do is find a room that has life in itself.
BD: Yeah.
BV: A 'living' room.
BD: The machines though, can even take the life out of that room, I've found. You can record in St Peter's Cathedral, you know, and they still make it sound like, eh,...
BV: Somebody's backyard.
BD: Yeah.
BV: That's a good idea. I'd love to record in a cathedral.
BD: You know the studios in the old days were all much better, and the equipment so much better, there's no question about it in my mind. You just walked into a studio, they were just big rooms, you just sang, you know, you just made records; and they sounded like the way they sounded there. That stopped happening in the late Sixties, for me anyway. I noticed the big change. You go into a studio now and they got rugs on the floor, settees and pinball machines and videos and sandwiches coming every ten minutes. It's a big expensive party and you're lucky if you come out with anything that sounds decent.
BV: Yeah, records haven't got better, have they?
BD: No, you go in now, you got your producer, you got your engineer, you got your assistant engineer, usually your assistant producer, you got a guy carrying the tapes around. I mean, you know, there's a million people go into recording just an acoustic song on your guitar. The boys turn the machines on and it's a great undertaking.
BV: There's a system called Effanel which Mick Fleetwood from Fleetwood Mac brought to Africa. It was built for him because he wanted to get some real African drummin', for Tusk. We've used that system. It comes in a light suitcase, very small, no bullshit studio, and it just arrives, you can literally bring it to your living room.
VM: I think all the same they'll go back to 2-track eventually.
BV: There's a guy called Conny Plank, who lives in Germany. He's a producer I think. He produced Makem and Clancy and some Irish traditional bands, also orchestral and funnily enough a lot of the new electronic groups, DAF, Ultravox, and so on. He used to record orchestras by just finding a position in the room where they were already balanced and he applies this in his thinking, in recording modern music: he finds a place in the room where it's already mixed.

VM: I don't know, when I started we didn't think about that! You didn't even think about recording... (laughs)
BV: You didn't even think!
VM: You didn't even know what was on the cards. One day you were in the room, they turned the tape on. After about eight hours or so, they'd say, 'OK, tea break, it's over'.
BD: Yeah, next song, next song!
VM: And that was that – it was an album.
BD: Yeah, you'd make an album in three days or four days and it was over – if that many! It's that long now... it takes four days to get a drum sound.
BV: Do you know the Monty Python team, they're comedians, British comedians, Monty Python and the Holy Grail. They have a sketch that reminds me of you guys – sitting back talking of days gone by: "You tell that to the young people of today and they'd never believe you". But you can't go backwards, you must go forward. You try to bring the values that were back there, you know, the strength, and if you see something that was lost, you got to find a new way to capture that same strength. Have you any idea of how to do that? I think you've done it by the way... I think Shot Of Love, that opening track has that.
BD: I think so too. You're one of the few people to say that to me about that record, to mention that record to me.
BV: That has that feeling.
BD: It's a great record, it suits just about everybody.
BV: The sound from that record makes me feel like I'm in the same room as the other musicians. I don't feel like they're over there. Some of our records, I feel like they're over there because we got into this cinema type sound, not bland like FM sound, but we got into this very broad sound. Now we're trying to focus more of a punch, and that's what we are after, this intimacy... I've never interviewed anybody before, by the way. I hate being interviewed myself.
VM: You're doing a good job!
BV: Is this OK? Good! What records do you listen to?
BD: What records do I listen to? New records? I don't know, just the old records really. Robert Johnson. I still listen to those records that I listened to when I was growing up – they really changed my life. They still change my life. They still hold up, you know. The Louvain Brothers, Hank Williams, Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Charlie Patton, I always liked to listen to him.
BV: I just bought Woody Guthrie's Bound For Glory. I'm just a beginner when it comes to America. I mean, it's changed me. When you go the US, coming from this country, it's more than a different continent...
VM: It's shell shock.
BV: Yeah, coming from troubled Ireland, it's the real shell shock! I'm just getting acquainted with American music and literature. Do you still see Allen Ginsberg?
BD: I run across Allen from time to time, yeah, Gregory Corsos's back now, he's doing some readings, I think he's just published a new book.
BV: I've just been reading this book Howl.
BD: Oh, that's very powerful. That's another book that changed me. Howl, On the Road, Dharma Bums.
VM: (to Bono) Have you read On the Road?
BV: Yes I have, I'm just starting that. You have a reference in one of your songs to John Donne, 'Rave On John Donne'. Have you read his poetry?
VM: I was reading it at the time.
BD: (to Bono) You heard the songs – Brendan Behan's songs?
BV: Yeah.
BD: Royal Canal, you know the Royal Canal?
VM: His brother wrote it. His name is Dominic.

BD: Oh, Dominic wrote Royal Canal?
BV: You know Brendan's son hangs out around here in Dublin. He's a good guy, I believe.
BD: I know the solo lyrics to the Royal Canal. I used to sing it all the time.
BV: How does it go?
BD: 'The hungry feeling came over me stealing, as the mice were squalling in my prison cell' (sings).
BV: That's right, yeah!
BD: (continues) 'That old triangle went jingle jangle, all along the banks of the Royal Canal'.
BV: That's right, when did you read that?
BD: (and still more) 'In the female prison there's seventy women. It's all over there that I want to dwell. And that old triangle goes jingle jangle, all along the banks of the Royal Canal'.
BV: Have you been to the Royal Canal?
BD: No, I used to sing that song though. Every night.
BV: Our music – as I was saying earlier – it doesn't have those roots.
VM: Yeah, there was a break in the lineage. I sussed that out when I went to see Thin Lizzy years ago, the first night in LA. and I was watching at the back of the stage and I realized that the music was a complete cut in the connection between the end of the Sixties and the middle of the Seventies – a severing of the traditional lineage of groups.
BV: I like to know more about roots music. I'm hungry for a past.
VM: You know you should listen to some of that stuff.
BV: I will. I've been listening to some gospel music, you know, like the Swan Silvertones, and stuff like that.
BD: That's US stuff though.
VM: US stuff, but the British stuff you should listen to, you know, like some of the old stuff, like the Yardbirds.
BV: Yeah, I've got some of their tapes recently, some real good tapes.
BD: You can still hear the McPeakes. The next generation may not be able to though. Who knows? I would hate to think that. Listen we're gonna have to get ready to play. Are you gonna stay for the show?
BV: Certainly, that's what I'm here for actually.
BD: To record it, Ha!

8 July 1984 (published 17 May 2001)
Bono Quoting Dylan Re: Irish Music

Source: USA Today, 17 May 2001

Times change, but Dylan leaves a lasting imprint
By Edna Gundersen, USA TODAY

Jeff Zelevansky, AP
The mystique of Bob Dylan persists today, as generations of musicians continue to pay homage.

Bob Dylan has never had a No. 1 single in a span of 453 songs recorded on 42 albums. His album sales average 1.53 million a year, respectable but certainly modest by 'N Sync standards. Yet, as Dylan turns 60 on May 24, he is considered, by Time and a wide variety of pundits and historians, the most influential musical artist in the latter half of the 20th century. His songs recycle in uncountable covers, from remakes of the career-triggering Blowin' in the Wind to versions, by four different artists, of To Make You Feel My Love from 1997's Grammy-winning Time Out of Mind. Things Have Changed, from the film Wonder Boys, won an Oscar and Golden Globe this year for best movie song.

Lines that branded Dylan a poet and counterculture valedictorian in the '60s are imprinted on the culture: "When you got nothing, you got nothing to lose"; "a hard rain's a-gonna fall."; "to live outside the law you must be honest." Some lyrics — "you don't need a weather man to know which way the wind blows" and "the times they are a-changin'" — appear in Bartlett's Familiar Quotations.

The Bob Dylan file

Born: Robert Allen Zimmerman May 24, 1941, in Duluth, Minn., to Abram and Beatrice.

Musical influences: Woody Guthrie, Hank Williams, Little Richard, Odetta, Buddy Holly, Johnny Cash, Jimmie Rodgers, Leadbelly.

Personal: Married to Sara Lowndes, 1965-77. Adopted her daughter, Maria. They had four children — Jesse, Anna, Samuel and Jakob (of The Wallflowers). According to new book Down the Highway, Dylan secretly married backup singer Carolyn Dennis in 1986; they had daughter Desiree Gabrielle, now 15, and divorced in 1992.

Catalog: Released 42 albums, not including two Traveling Wilburys collaborations. Recorded and released 453 songs, mostly originals. Has sold 60 million albums worldwide, including 9.9 million in U.S. in the past decade. Had 15 top 10 albums, including his latest, 1997's Time Out of Mind. Top 10 singles include Like a Rolling Stone, Positively 4th Street, Rainy Day Women #12 & 35 and Lay Lady Lay.

Controversy: Banned from singing Talkin' John Birch Society Blues on the Ed Sullivan Show in 1963. Inflamed folk purists by going electric at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival, then was routinely booed during his fabled 1966 tour. Rainy Day Women #12 & 35 banned in USA for purported drug references ("Everybody must get stoned"). Caused a stir when he revealed his conversion from Judaism to Christianity in three albums. Introduced the Beatles to marijuana.

Health scares: Holed up for months after a motorcycle accident July 29, 1966, near Woodstock. Fell seriously ill in May 1997 with pericarditis, a swelling of the sac around the heart, brought on by a fungal infection.

Honors: Oscar and Golden Globe for best song from a film, for Things Have Changed, 2001. Seven Grammys, including album of the year for 1997's Time Out of Mind. Kennedy Center Honors recipient, 1997. Lifetime achievement Grammy, 1991. Inducted into Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, 1988.

He has survived radically shifting trends, despite a career-long habit of being out of step with the times. At 20, he sang with the confidence and conviction of a septuagenarian bluesman. He was so much older then. At 60, he's still hitting the road with the restlessness of a teen. In pop culture years, he's ageless.

Dylan's continuing impact is most keenly felt in music's creative community. He's regarded as pop's unrivaled liberator for breaking the three-minute song barrier, ignoring moon-June-spoon lyric formulas and charting a chameleon course — from folkie to rocker to country crooner to holy roller — that paved the way for David Bowie, Elvis Costello and Madonna.

He has demonstrated that the nasal intonations of an unconventional voice, often dismissed as a croak or worse, could outshine (or certainly outlast) the most pristine pop songbirds.

Across three generations of musicians, he is exalted, not just as his generation's spokesman, a folk rebel or a pop experimenter, but as a teacher. It's another side of Bob Dylan — the knotty professor, whose dog-eared back pages contain the blueprints for numberless musical progeny.

"Everybody owes a debt" to Dylan, says Bruce Springsteen. "He really did change the face of popular music, particularly in how a singer could sound and what topics you could take on. Everything from hip-hop lyrics to Marvin Gaye to Anarchy in the U.K. can be traced in some fashion back to his breakthroughs."

Tom Petty, Dylan's frequent collaborator and a bandmate in retro-rock's all-star Traveling Wilburys, says, "He's very spontaneous and gives musicians a lot of room. Whatever he does, there's always a good, durable song involved that can take many arrangements and interpretations."

Sundry '60s peers enjoyed parallel ascents but still took cues from the maverick wordsmith.

"I got good grades on all my papers, but it took Dylan to get me to write," says Stephen Stills. "All of a sudden, I was thinking in complete sentences and using my whole vocabulary. Hey, nad've rhymes with grieve! He woke me up."

Billy Joel says he was motivated to join Columbia Records because the label had signed an outlaw folkie with a creaky voice. "Before Bob, they had Broadway showtunes, Mantovani-type records and Sing Along With Mitch. They had the foresight to sign this guy who didn't sound like anybody and seemed to be from another era."

Inspired by Dylan's graceful melodies, Joel eventually abandoned hopes of penning Dylanesque prose and detoured into classical music. "Bob's a consummate wordsmith," Joel says. "Nobody wrote like him. I really stunk at it, because I'm too bloody literal. That's why I don't like words anymore."

Though Dylan mined Americana, his sway extended beyond U.S. borders. Paul McCartney, who soaked up Dylan's 1962 debut at his parents' home in Liverpool, says The Beatles took cues from his subsequent electric forays. "He helped us free up artistically," he says. "He had an influence on everyone. Dylan and Chuck Berry belong on the list of America's great poets."

British glam-rock pioneer David Bowie, who toasted the bard on 1972's Song for Bob Dylan, notes, "Dylan taught my generation that it was OK to write pop songs about your worst nightmares."

U2 singer Bono taught himself guitar while listening to Dylan.

"His voice has been a bee buzzing around my ear since I can remember being conscious," he says. "It's an unusual voice, not always soothing, sometimes nagging, but it reminds us of the possibilities for music and its place in the world."

Shaped by punk rock, the quartet had disregarded its Irish roots until Dylan sent them excavating. During their first encounter, Dylan probed Bono about Ireland's folk balladeers, then recited Brendan Behan's Banks of the Royal Canal.

"U2 kind of came from outer space, where punk was ground zero and you didn't admit to having roots. Bob scolded me, 'You're sitting on all this stuff. You should check it out.' As we fall over ourselves toward the fast and furious future, Dylan feels like the brakes, reminding us of stuff we might have lost, like our dignity."

Just liked by women

Dylan crossed the gender line, joining Joan Baez and Joni Mitchell as major forces shaping female singer-songwriters. Stevie Nicks says flatly, "He's a total mentor." "What I love about Bob is the fact that no one's ever been able to really figure him out," says Bonnie Raitt. "With every reinvention, you never know if it's a genuine shift or just him slyly ducking out of view. No one has had a more profound cultural and political impact on our generation."

Until she played his tunes, Sheryl Crow envisioned a future as a side musician, not a songwriter. "Playing Dylan's songs empowers you," she says. "It bolsters you to say what your spirit needs to say. Even though Dylan has been completely deified, he's taken all the spiritual journeys we plebeians go through. In his search you can see the patterns of humanity."

At 15, Aimee Mann, roused by Blood on the Tracks, took a stab at emulating his writing.

"My attempts were horrifying," she says. "The characters were lost and bedraggled street people I knew nothing about. But he was the only great lyricist around, and I wanted to be him."

"Here's a guy who did bluegrass, folk, country, rhythm and blues," says Shawn Colvin. "No territory was sacred. There's a valuable lesson in that. Bob Dylan took an idiom and made it personal."

Dylan gospel spread to unlikely corners, imprinting rap and punk as well as country, blues and folk. Billy Gibbons of Texas boogie-band ZZ Top says Dylan's passion for American roots music "opened our own musical curiosities. Although ZZ Top may well be thought of as something more akin to Howlin' Wolf, Dylan's remarkably insightful word combinations and rhyme stimulated fresh ways of expressing inner feelings in a sort of secret blues language."

Chuck D of the pioneering rap group Public Enemy cites an early hip-hop street phrase ("I'm chillin' like Bob Dylan") as evidence of Dylan's clout in urban music. "He is stenciled on a lot of aspects of my career — his ability to paint pictures with words, his concerns for society," he says. "He taught me to go against the grain."

Positively forthright

Ditto for Jim Lindberg of Pennywise, a hot punk outfit that owes some of its fire to Dylan's spark.

"I liked his stripped-down approach from the start," he says. "It doesn't rely on stage theatrics or a disposable message. Dylan's music is meant to appeal to your heart and brain, not your crotch."

Pop neophytes willing to learn will find priceless instruction in Dylan's songs, Lindberg says.

"People lack the courage to express themselves honestly now," he says. "Standing by your convictions is one thing we've lost since Dylan's generation."

Billy Joe Armstrong of pop-punk trio Green Day picked up pointers from Dylan's stylish vitriol. "His lyrics could tear someone apart in four minutes. I wouldn't want to be at the other end of a song like that."

Ryan Adams of alternative country act Whiskeytown fell under Dylan's spell after finding lyrics his mother had jotted during college. Countering detractors who say Dylan is no master of warblers, he says, "There is a seductive quality to Dylan's voice, and it changes as scenarios call for different registers, almost the way theater works. Nobody has that voice. Even on our homogenized McDonald's planet, where cheerleaders are icons, anyone can do a Dylan impersonation."

Young stars, whether weaned on grunge or rap or hair bands, eventually gravitate to the godfather of troubadours. Black Crowes singer Chris Robinson says, "From very early on, the music Bob made sounded important to me." Rising singer/songwriter Pete Yorn says he and his teen peers shared a knee-jerk respect for Dylan that deepened with exposure to his records and shows.

Yorn's Cliff Notes on Dylan: "His pacing is subtle. There's no fat in his songs. Whether it's his own experience or a story he's telling, he puts it across in a way that moves people."

When Canadian singer/songwriter Ron Sexsmith first heard Blowin' in the Wind, he envisioned a folkie Jethro Clampett. He quickly changed his tune. "Dylan improvises like a jazz artist," he says. "He wasn't after perfection. He'd record a song and it would never be the same again. I've tried to carry on that tradition."

Dylan's '60s contemporaries are quick to credit him with revolutionizing all forms of music. He beguiled a young Judy Collins with his Woody Guthrie persona at Gerde's Folk City in 1962. She's covered dozens of his tunes and stole a compositional technique: "He has a trick of taking an ancient song and setting a new melody to it. He makes you feel as though you already know the song. And he'll use a very simple melody to carry the weight of complicated lyrics."

Paul Simon, also hatched in the folk scene, praises Dylan's gifts but chose to steer clear of his trail.

"My reaction was, 'Don't do what he does. He's got it covered.' You've got to go your own way or you're just in a shadow."

That shadow is too immense to sidestep, says John Mellencamp, a zealous disciple who was in grade school when his older brother played him a Dylan record.

"Bob put down a huge footprint," he says. "He has brought more beauty into this world than the rest of us combined. He showed us how beautiful sorrow could be and how ridiculous the world looked to him."

The self-described crank generously insists Dylan has yet to make a bad record. "He's never let me down. I love Woody Guthrie and Hank Williams, but I got news for those guys: This young kid beat you."

8 July 1984
David Hammond & Derek Bailey interview, Slane Castle area, near Dublin, Ireland

Source: The Telegraph 18, Winter 1984, pp. 58-62

DH: We're doing a picture about the Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem and just wanted to have a little chat with yourself. Why'd you think they became so enormously popular and successful in America in the 1960s?

BD: Ah, mainly because of the, you know, the dynamics they sang with, and the subject matter they sang about and... they just reached a lot of people, you know, with their exuberance and their attitude – mostly it was attitude.

Other than that, I mean, they're all great singers. They were all so different, too, weren't they? The times I remember the Clancy Brothers most was not mostly in the clubs where we played, but in those bars. There was a bar called the... the White Horse bar, and they were in there... you could always go there any time, and they'd be singing, you know, Irish... the Irish folk songs, I... actually I learnt quite a few there myself. But Liam was... for me, I never heard a singer as good as Liam ever. He was just the best ballad singer I'd ever heard in my life – still is, probably. I don't think I can think of anybody who is a better ballad singer than Liam. Tommy [Makem] was alright, too, but Tommy would sing one of those rousing songs or... you know mostly... but Liam always sang those ballads which always would get to me.

DH: At that time in the Village, when you were knocking about in the 1960s... were they...?

BD: Plus we had the same girlfriend!

DH: Do you think that... were they influential on your own career?

BD: Oh yeah, enormously so. And my... yeah, because I was... you were around them all the time and they just sang so many songs all the time, you couldn't help but... The first album I made, there was one song on it that was an old song from... I'd heard on an old banjo record someplace, but I did that song the way the Clancy Brothers, I thought, would have done it, you know, if... you know, in their style on the very first record I made. It's something which... just that rousing sort of rendition of...

DH: You were a young man from a very large continent; they came from a very small island. What was important to you in the songs themselves and the subject matter of the songs?

BD: Well, I'd never heard those kind of songs before, although I... close up, you know. I'd heard them on record but I hadn't heard them close up. All the legendary people they used to sing about – Brennan on the Moor, or Roddy McCorley, or these people they... I wasn't aware of them, when they existed... but it was as if they'd just existed yesterday.

DH: They became heroes in your life, is it?

BD: Oh, yeah, I would think of Brennan on the Moor the same way as I would think of Jesse James or something, you know, they just became very real to me.

DH: You appear to have been fond of them personally, you know, and are you still fond of the material that they sing?

BD: Oh yeah. I saw them a few years ago – about four years ago. I saw Liam and Tommy play – they had a different band then. I don't think Tom... Tom Clancy or Paddy was there. I think another brother was... but it was a different band. And then I ran into Liam in an airport somewhere last year, I can't remember where. I run across them from here time and time again, you know.

DH: When you come to Ireland on a time, an occasion like this, do you hear echoes of their music in your imagination?

BD: Yeah, yeah, I can see where they, where they get it all from, you know. Then, you know, there are a lot of melodies which I heard them sing close up that I took and I made some myself, you know, I wrote some of my own songs to some of the melodies that I heard them do. That happened too.

DH: Would you put it as strong as saying that every time Bob Dylan sings there's a trace of the Clancy Brother?

BD: That wouldn't be an overstatement, you know. There's some truth to that, yeah. Oh yeah, it was great... I mean, all night long we'd just sing... oh, there'd be some poets there, too, and just get up with a bottle of beer or ale or something, and just recite a poem, and even that was music. You know, that was musical too.

DH: There were stories going about as well, they were telling stories at the same time now. Did you find the stories thrilling?

BD: Yeah, I found it all thrilling. I did. It was just, you know, I'd never heard anything like it... yeah, it was completely thrilling. It was over... it was just something which happened in that period of time and I never really felt that again. I mean, I don't know, maybe they still do that in some place in America, but I don't know where.

DH: Do you regard it as a little, kind of, little paradise in your life... that period in your life? It seemed to be to them... when they look back in the Village at that time in the sixties, there seemed to be a kind of encapsulated....

BD: Well, yeah. Looking back on it now it feels that way. But when it was happening, it was all happening so fast that you didn't really think about it, you know. It just seemed to be... just where you were... you found yourself in that situation, that position... and that's just the way it was. But it went by so fast that nobody really thought about it. I don't recall thinking... thinking, you know, making any thoughts in my head about it. I suppose I thought it would have gone on forever, you know, I don't know. Everybody just seemed to disappear. I've gone back to that bar and it's not the same. You know they're out there and....

30 July 1984
Dylan On Dylan,
The Bert Kleinman Interview, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 485-498.

Dylan gives a major interview for Westwood One to form part of a three hour radio special called Dylan On Dylan which was broadcast throughout America. The conversation is interspersed with his songs. It is conducted at the Ritz-Carlton hotel in New York by Bert Kleinman (BK) and Artie Mogul (AM) (who signed Dylan up with Witmark in 1962) sometime during the Summer of 1984, shortly after Dylan's return from the European tour, but was not broadcast on FM until later in the year, commencing on November 13 and then at different times at different locations through the U.S.

Released on Dylan on Dylan, Westwood One (Radio Station Discs), November 17 1984.

Dylan's answers, minus questions, but interspersed with commentary and some music, were featured in the U. K. on the Roger Scott (Capital Radio) Show on November 25 1984.

BK: Is it true that you taught yourself guitar and harmonica?

BD: Ah! Well, nobody really teaches themselves guitar and harmonica, you know, when you don't know anything first, like, you get a book or something and you learn. What I remember is I learnt a couple of chords out of some books and then just going out to watch people, you know, to see how they're doing it, how they're playing those chords and... wherever people are playing you just... you don't really go so much to hear 'em, you just go to see how they're doing what they do, you know, try to get up as close as you can and just see what their fingers are doing. You know, in that early stage it's more like a learning thing, you know, and that sometimes can take... you know, years, you know, like many years: sometimes it takes people many years, sometimes it takes... But to me I kind of picked it up rather quickly, but I didn't really play with that much technique. And people didn't really take to me because of that, because I didn't really go out of my way to learn as much technique as some other people... I mean I know people that made a complete profession and livelihood out of playing John Lee Hooker chords, just hammering on, you know, on the E string, and that was all, and they could play it in such a beautiful way it looked like a ballet dancer. You know, and everybody had a different style, you know, they had styles and they had techniques, especially in folk music. You know, there was your Southern Mountain banjo, then flat picking, there's your finger-picking techniques, and just all of these different runs, you know, different styles of ballads...

House Of The Rising Sun plays

BD: Folk music was a world... it was very split up. There was a purist side to it. You know, many people didn't want to hear it if you couldn't play a song exactly the way that... Aunt Molly Jackson played it, you know, they didn't wanna hear it But I just kinda blazed my way through all that stuff (laughs). I would hear somebody do something and it finally get to pass a certain point that you'd say, well, what do you want from that. I mean, you can learn... you might wanna learn, the song or the lyrics, or you might want to see how they're playing it, you might wanna pick that up, that style they're playing. I don't know, I just stayed up day and night just barnstorming my way through all that stuff. And then I heard Woody Guthrie one time... before I got to New York I heard Woody Guthrie and then it all came together for me.

Woody Guthrie plays.

BK: Do you remember the first Woody Guthrie record you heard?

BD: Yeah, I think so. The first Woody Guthrie song I heard, I think, was probably called Pastures Of Plenty. Pastures Of Plenty and Pretty Boy Floyd and another song that he... he used to write a lot of his songs from existing melodies, you know, a couple of the ones maybe... Grand Coulee Dam. They just really impressed me.

BK: Got to you?

BD: Oh yeah. Because they were original. I mean, they just had a mark of originality on them, well the lyrics did. I just learned all those songs. I just heard them and I learned them, all of the records, you know, I learned them all, all the songs of Woody Guthrie that I could find. Anybody that had a Woody Guthrie record or that knew a Woody Guthrie song. And in St. Paul at the time, where I was, there were some people around who not only had his records but that knew his songs. So I just learned them all. Some of the best records that I heard him make were these records that he made on the Stinsom label, with Cisco Houston and Sonny Terry. I don't know if Leadbelly was on there or not. I learned Leadbelly too. I learned a bunch of his stuff and learned how to play like that. But one of the biggest thrills I ever had actually was when I reached New York... whenever it was... I got to play with Cisco Houston. No... I didn't really... I don't know if I actually... yeah I did get to play with him at a party or something. But, I used to watch him; he used to play at Folk City, you know, the night club at Folk City. He was an amazing looking guy; he looked like Clark Gable. He was like a movie star.

AM: He reminded me a little of Tennessee Ernie actually.

BD: Yeah.

AM: Also very unheralded.

BD: Oh, completely. Completely, like one of the great unsung heroes of all times, you know. One of the great American figures, and no one... you know, you can ask people about him and nobody knows anything about him.

Talkin' New York plays

BK: When do you think you started to develop something that was uniquely yours? You were talking about playing Woody Guthrie.

BD: Yeah, well, I was doing Woody stuff... well, New York would do that to you. I was playing all Woody Guthrie stuff. When I came to New York, that's all I played was Woody Guthrie songs. Well, about six months after that, I mean, I'd stopped playing all Woody Guthrie songs. I used to play in a place called Cafe Wha, and it always used to open at noon. It opened at noon and closed at six in the morning and it was just a non-stop flow of people. Usually they were tourists, you know, who were looking for beatniks in the Village. There'd used to be maybe five groups that played there. I used to play with a guy called Fred Neil, who wrote the song Everybody's Talking the song that was in the film Midnight Cowboy. Fred... I don't know where he was from... I think he was from Florida.

BK: Coconut Grove, I think.

BD: Yeah, but he had a songwriter to deal with in Nashville so he used to make that scene, from Coconut Grove to Nashville to New York. And he had a strong, powerful voice, almost a bass voice. And a powerful sense of rhythm. And he used to play most of the songs that somebody like Josh White would play and I would just play harmonica with him once in a while, and get to sing a song. You know, when he was taking a break or something and so I'd get to sing a song once and play harmonica the rest of the time.

That was his show. He would be on for maybe half an hour and then a conga group would get on, called Los Congeros, with twenty conga drummer players and bongos and steel drums. And they would play for maybe a half hour. And this girl, I think her name was Judy Rainey, she used to play sweet Southern Mountain Appalachian ballads, with electric guitar and a small amplifier. And then another guy used to sing on there named Hal Waters who used to sort of be a crooner. He used to sing sorta like Leon Bibbs, remember him? He used to sing and then there'd be a comedian and he'd go up for maybe fifteen or twenty minutes, then an impersonator. And that'd be the whole show, that'd be like all the... this unit would just go around non-stop so you'd know when you went on after whoever it was. And then you could eat there, you got fed there, which was actually the best thing about the place.

AM: How long a set would you do?

BD: I'd do... oh, you know, about half hour, forty minutes and then go back on – the comedian only did about... I tell you, was hooted off the stage. If they didn't like you back then, I mean, you couldn't play. If they liked you, you played more. If they didn't like you, you didn't play at all. You'd play one or two songs and people would just boo or hiss, or something, you know.

BK: This wasn't your own stuff you were singing then?

BD: No, I didn't start playing my own stuff until... until... much later.

Blowin' In The Wind plays.

BK: Well, where did you start to perform your own stuff?

BD: Well, I just drifted into it, you know. I started singing, writing my own songs some place or somewhere. I always kinda written my own songs but I never really would play them. Nobody played their own songs; the only person that I ever heard do that was Woody Guthrie. And then one day I just wrote a song, and it was the first song I ever wrote that I performed in public was the song that I wrote to Woody Guthrie. And I just felt like playing it one night. And I played it.

Song To Woody plays

BK: Was writing something that you'd always wanted to do or was it basically from the Woody thing?

BD: No, not really. It wasn't a thing that I'd wanted to do ever. I wanted just a song to sing, and there came a certain point where I couldn't sing anything. I had to write what I wanted to sing 'cause what I wanted to sing nobody else was writing. I couldn't find it anywhere. I mean, what I felt like, what I felt was going on, nobody was writing, you know, I couldn't find that song someplace. If I could I probably would have never started writing.

The Times They Are A-Changin' plays

BK: The writing wasn't something that came easy to you? Because, I mean, it is a craft you do very well and you talk about it so casually.

BD: Well, yeah, it is, it does come easy. But then, after you make so many records and the years kinda just go by, it's like sometimes you just don't know anymore whether, am I doing this because I want to do it or because you think it's expected of you. Do you know what I mean? So you'd start just saying, well, I've gotta write a song, it's time to write a song. And you'll try to do something but it just won't come out right. At those kinda times it's best just to go sing somebody else's song.

Master Of War plays

BK: Was it a lot of work writing? Was it a labor at that point, or did it just...

BD: Not really, it was something I used to do. You'd sit up and write... You'd just sit up all night and write a song, or, in those days I used to write songs a lot of the times in cafes. Or at somebody's house with the typewriter. A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall, I wrote in the basement of the Village Gate. All of it, the basement of the Village Gate at Chip Moncks'. You know Chip? He used to have a place down there in the boiler room, an apartment that he slept in...

BK: The Greenwich Hotel.

BD: Er, next to the Greenwich Hotel. But his place was literally in the basement of the Village Gate. He used to do the lights there, I think. And I wrote A Hard Rain 's A-Gonna Fall down there. I'd write 'em at peoples houses, you know, or at peoples apartments, wherever I was, you know.

BK: Were you much of a polisher. I mean, did you write it and then pore over it or it pretty much happen...

BD: Pretty much I'd just leave them the way they were...

All I Really Want To Do plays followed by Gates Of Eden.

BK: With lyrics like that it's not surprising that a lot of people in what was called the establishment considered Bob Dylan a threat when he started out in the early '60s. But at the same time he was an underground sensation, a young poet hailed as an enigmatic spokesman for the new generation. The media hopped on the bandwagon and Dylan was even hired to sing on the Ed Sullivan Show. The song he was to sing was a talking blues about the John Birch Society but at the last minute CBS said "no way" and Dylan just left.

BD: Yeah, I don't know why I walked out that show. I could have done something else but we'd rehearsed that song, you know, so many times and everybody had heard it. I mean, we'd just rehearsed it, you know, for maybe days, you know, and when they run through the show they just, you know... put you on and you'd run through your number and you're off, and it always got a great response and I was looking forward to singing it, and I was looking forward to singing it because it had got such a great response and Ed Sullivan seemed to really like it (laughs) as I remember.

BK: It probably was the sponsor who objected.

BD: I don't know who objected, but it was showtime, you know, and... er, just before I was going out to sing it they came in and there was this big huddle. I could see people talking about something and I was just getting ready to play, you know, and somebody stepped up in and said that I couldn't sing that song. They wanted me to sing a Clancy Brothers' song and it didn't make any sense for me to sing a Clancy Brothers' song on nationwide TV at that time. So... I just left.

Maggie's Farm plays

AM: Do you remember that time we were all down in San Juan, Puerto Rico, at the CBS record convention and – it was being held at the San Juan Hilton or whatever they call it – San Juan Hilton... Carib Hilton, I guess – this huge CBS record convention, and it was just as Bob was beginning to hit, and the President of CBS at the time was a fabulous man named Goddard Lieberson and they wouldn't let Bob in the hotel because he was not wearing, I think, a tie or a jacket.

BD: Yeah, or a shirt.

AM: And Lieberson, to his credit, told the manager either he comes in the hotel or I'm pulling the whole convention out of here. Have I told the story right?

BD: Yeah, he was a big supporter of mine, Goddard Lieberson, as was John Hammond. Without those people like that I don't think nothing would have happened for me. If I was to come along now, in this day, with all these people that are running the record companies now, they would see somebody like me, they would, you know, bar the door I think. But you had people back then that were more entrenched in individuality, or something.

AM: And also not as insecure in their jobs.

BD: No, no, they ran things, you know, they made decisions and it stuck. Now, I mean, it is like everybody chats with somebody else. It's like well, I'll tell you tomorrow. Call me back later. Yeah, we almost got a deal, stuff like that., you know

Subterranean Homesick Blues plays

BK: Did you get along with Lieberson OK?

BD: Oh yeah, he was great. He even used to come to some sessions of mine. He'd always stop in and say hello, you know.

BK: Did they ever get any pressure though? I mean, there were people considered your music almost subversive. Although I always considered it very American.

BD: I guess they did... I don't know. But they, they... like I said, they seemed to run things. You know, other people may have been talking under their breath or something, you know, behind their back, and things like that. But at this time their big acts were Mitch Miller, you know, and, er, Mitch miller was the biggest. Andy Williams, Johnny Mathis was big... I didn't really begin to sell records anyway until the second record – I think the second record made the charts – went up the charts, the second record I did.

AM: First single to make the charts was Subterranean Homesick Blues. Made the bottom of the charts.

BD: That was my fourth record or something.

BK: Ahem, yeah.

AM: But I think the Freewheelin' album made the charts, but it was Subterranean Homesick Blues.

BK: That was an amazing single though, when you think of what the singles were like at the time.

BD: They made some good records then, that were, you know, were good pop records. Not on Columbia though. Phil Spector was doing a lot of stuff at that time, and Jerry Lieber and Mike Stoller I think were doing it; these are big...

BK: Did you listen to a lot of pop stuff at that time?

BD: Yeah, I listened to a lot of pop stuff, but it never really influenced what I was doing to any great degree. It had earlier or the earlier stuff did, like the really earlier stuff, the old Hillbilly stuff or when rock n' roll came in after Elvis, you know, Elvis, Carl Perkins, Buddy Holly, those people.. Chuck Berry, Little Richard, that stuff influenced me and all those people faded away. Yet, nostalgia to me isn't really rock n' roll. Because when I was a youngster the music they were playing... the music I heard was Frankie Lane, Rosemary Clooney, Denis... what's his name? Your Hit Parade. Denis Day? Or Dorothy Collins and, er... the Mills Brothers, all that stuff. You know, when I hear stuff like that it always strikes a different chord than all the rock n' roll stuff does. The rock n' roll stuff I had a conscious mind at that time, but ten years before that it was like Mule Train, you know, and... Johnny Ray knocked me out, Johnny Ray was the first person to actually really knock me out.

BK: What was it? What was it about Johnny Ray, do you think?

BD: Well, he was just so emotional, wasn't he? I ran into him in an elevator in Australia. He was like one of my idols, you know. I mean, I was speechless. There I was in an elevator with Johnny Ray. I mean, what do you say, you know?

Positively Fourth Street plays

BK: When you started to move from the pure folk style into a more electric style, was that a tough one?

BD: Now we're getting into a touchy subject (laughs).

BK: Because today, I mean, you go on stage and both of those things co-exist. I mean, nobody thinks twice.

BD: Yeah, they always did co-exist, you know.

BK: I'm not talking about so much that, but at least what it seemed like from the outside. I mean there were people who were trying to tell you how to make your music.

BD: Oh, there's always people trying to tell you how to do everything in your life, you know. If you listen to that, I mean, you can... if you ask somebody's opinion... if you really don't know what to do and you really don't care that you don't know what to do, just ask somebody's opinion. You know, you'll get a million different opinions. If you don't want to do something, just ask somebody's opinion and they'll just verify it for you, you know. The easiest way to do something is just don't ask anybody's opinion. I mean, if you really believe in what you're doing – I've asked people's opinion and it's been a great mistake, in different areas. I have, I mean, in my personal life, I've asked people what do you think about doing this and they've said... Oh wow! You know, and then you end up usually not really using it or else doing it wrong.

AM: As a matter of fact, I think an artist has to make an innate decision about their...

BD: Yeah, you know what's right When those times come you know what's right, you know. A lot of times you might be farming around and not knowing what's right you might do something dumb, but that's only because you don't know what to do in the first place. But if you know what's right and it strikes you at a certain time you can usually believe that instinct If you act on it then you'll be successful at it I mean, whatever it is.

Like A Rolling Stone plays

BK: Recording is a whole other thing from being on stage, and you, from what I've read, try and record as spontaneously as possible.

BD: I have, yeah, I have. I don't do that so often anymore, but I have. I usually just take a song in the studio, because recording a song bores me, you know. It's like working in a coal mine. Well, I mean, it's not really as serious as that, I mean, you're not completely that far underground! Literally, in a literal sense, but, you know, you can't just... you know... you could be indoors for months and never know it you know. I mean, what you think is real is just not anymore. I mean, you're just listening to sounds all the time and your whole world just is working with tapes and things, and... I've never liked that side of it Plus I've never got into it on that level. When I recorded I just went in and recorded the songs I had, you know; that's the way people recorded then. But the people don't record that way, and I shouldn't record that way either because they can't even get it down that way anymore. To do what I used to do, or to do what anybody used to do you have to stay in the studio a longer time to even get that right Because, you know, technology has messed everything up so much.

BK: It's messed it up?

BD: Yeah, yeah, it's messed it up.

BK: Well, what...

BD: Technology is giving you a false picture... anybody who got anything to do falsely. Like you listen to the records that are done now they're all done in a technology sort of way. Which is a conniving kind of way. You can dream up what you want to do and just go in and dream it up, you know, and do it But you go see some of that stuff live and, you know, you're gonna be very disappointed, because... er... well, I mean if you want to see some of it live. You may not want to, you know. But, I think it's messed it up, but it's progress you know. You can't go back the way it used to be. For me it's messed things up. For a lot of people... a lot of people it's messed things up for, and then for a lot of other people it's a great advantage for. In other words you can get something right now; it doesn't have to be right but you can get it right, you know. It can be totally wrong but you can get it right And it can be done just with sound and... we were just recording something the other night and we were gonna put some handclaps on it, you know. And the guy sitting behind the board, he was saying – "Well do you guys wanna go out there and actually clap? I mean, I got a machine right here that could do that." And "oh, what's his name," you know... and his name was Roland or something, you know (laughs). But it, you know, we went out and clapped instead, you know. Not that it was any big deal, we could have had some machine do it But that's just a small example of what, what... everything is just machine orientated you know.

Just Like A Woman plays

BK: You talk almost, you say, like – I don't really know how to put it – that, you know, like the world's gone here and like you're old-fashioned.

BD: Well, I feel I am old-fashioned, but I don't feel, you know, like I'm old-fashioned in the way that I'm not modern-fashioned. You know, I feel that... you know, on a certain level there is no old-fashioned and there's no new-fashioned; it's... it's, there really is... nothing has changed, you know. I don't like I'm old-fashioned in the kind of way where I feel that I'm a passe person, you know, that's sitting somewhere, you know, out in Montana, and just watching it snow, you know. But even if I was, you know, I mean I'm sure that would be OK.

AM: Yeah, Bob, but you cant go to a concert like Wembley and get that kind of...

BD: Well, OK, but, I mean, look, you say old-fashioned, but life is like that You don't get that many years to live, right? So if you wanna keep up with things, I mean how long can you keep up with things to see what's new? And even when you're keeping up with things, what are you keeping up with? You try to keep up with what? Who buys lots of records nowadays? Twelve year old kids? Who buys Michael Jackson's records? Twelve year olds, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, maybe eighteen, twenty year olds, you know... I don't know who buys 50 million records of somebody. You know, I don't know... you can't, like, compete with a market that's geared for twelve year olds, you know, or fourteen or fifteen year olds. You have rock n' roll critics that are forty years old writing about records that are geared for people that are ten years old and making an intellectual philosophy out of it, you know.

BK: And you don't listen to that stuff?

BD: No, I don't listen to that stuff, and I don't listen to those critics. I've come up with a lot of people who should know a whole lot better, that at one time did and who've made a career out of writing about rock n' roll. Writing about rock n' roll, I mean, you know, how indecent can you be? You know, I'm not saying that it's all bad, people have to express themselves and so rock n' roll gives them a thrill, or did give them a thrill. Well, most of the people that I can think of as rock n' roll authoritarian people are people who have documented down what I remember growing up with as it started – right? So everybody knows where the roots of rock n' roll are. Everybody knows who does what, but to make such an intellectual game out of it is beside the point You know, it's not gonna really going to add anything to the history of popular music. It's just going to feed a lot of cynical people and self-righteous people who think they've got a claim on the rock n' roll goldmine, or whatever it is, you know. And I find that very distasteful.

Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35 plays

BK: Do you have... I'm not going to ask you which ones... but are there any things that you look back on and say, "Jesus, boy, that was a good one."?

BD: Oh yeah. I look at those... the songs you're talking about. I look at those songs. I can't write those songs today. I couldn't write those songs. No way. I look at those songs, 'cause I sing 'em all the time.

BK: You wonder where it came from.

BD: I wonder not only when and where it came from but how it or... yeah, where it came from, how it's constructed. Most of the songs I look at that way. Even the simpler songs. I look at that way. I couldn't do that now, and I don't even try, you know. I'd be a fool to try. I mean, there's no way I could try. There's a lot of good song-writers though. What I've done I've done all alone, you know, but song-writers, there's a lot of good ones, a lot of good song-writers, of my age, of my era.

AM: Like who, Bob?

BD: Randy Newman writes good songs, Paul Simon's written some good songs, I think America is a good song, I think The Boxer is a good song, I think Bridge Over Troubled Waters is an excellent song. I mean, he's written a lot of bad songs too, but everybody's done that, bad songs. Let's see, who do I think's good... some of the Nashville writers... Shel Silverstein writes great songs. Really, you know. Like he's one of my favorite song-writers. You know, you express the... whatever it is you're expressing, you're expressing it out of the amount of knowledge and light and inspiration you're giving on it, you know. If you're given this much, well that's what... then you just make that much out of it. If you're just given an inch, you know, then you've just got to make that as much as you can.

All Along The Watchtower plays

BK: Have you ever tried your hand at any of the other arts?

BD: Yeah, painting.

BK: Really. Do you do much of it?

BD: Yeah, not so much in recent years, but it's something I would like to do if I could... you've got to be in the right place to do it; you have to commit a lot of time to it. I'm gonna do this for a while, because one thing leads to another and you tend to discover things as you go along. So it takes time to develop it, but I know how to do it fundamentally enough so that once I get into the rhythm of it I could do it if I could hang with it long enough...

BK: Do you take time for yourself?

BD: Oh yeah, all my time's for myself. I don't have any public time. People think that's public time but that's really only... that's my time.

BK: That's a great place to be.

BD: Well, I mean, that's the place you were at when you were born. That's the place you should be. I mean, what's there to make you not be in that place? Because, you know, because you have to be part of the machine... so what if you're not part of the machine?

Lay, Lady, Lay plays

... I don't know if I've ever been happy to tell you, I mean, you know, talking straight. I don't know... I mean happy? I mean, I don't consider myself a happy, er... well, I don't consider myself unhappy, But I've never really thought of life in terms of happiness and unhappiness. It's just never occurred to me.

BK: Do you think of it in terms of growth?

BD: No. I never think in terms of growth. I tell you what I do think though, that you never stop at anywhere, there's no place to stop at. You know them places at the side of the road that you can stop (laughs) they're just an illusion.

BK: The road goes on.

BD: Yeah, you've got to get back on the road. And that's all them places to stop at... that's all they are, I mean, you may want to stop, you know, but you can't stay there.

BK: When you say, I mean when you talk about going along the road, isn't that in a sense growth? Or at least it's movement, I guess, from point A to point B, to point C, to point D.

BD: Well, that's growth, yeah. But what's growth? I mean, everything grows, that's just the way life is, life just grows, you know. It grows and it dies. It lives and it dies. But wherever you get to a plateau, you get, you know... that's not it, you got to go to the next one. You can't stay nowhere; there's no place to stay – there's no place that will keep you.

BK: Because of boredom or just because that's the way it is?

BD: No, that's the nature of things, you know.

BK: So you see yourself just moving onward and...?

BD: I see everybody like that way. I see the whole world that way. That which doesn't do that is stuff which... it's dead., you know.

BK: Ha. What's that line? Those that are not busy being born are...

BD: Busy dying. What a line!

BK: Didn't somebody write that one?

BD: Classic line that.

It's All Right, Ma plays

You know, people say, well isn't it great to be able to do what you do? Well, it is to a degree but they forget that an artist... a touring artist, anybody that is out touring... playing live from town to town night after night. Do you think that's easy. It's not easy. Do you think that people are having a ball. I mean, people say, talk to you and... "howya doin'," I say "I'm in Schenectady" (Laughter). You know, "Oh yeah, well, you're having a great time, you know. I'm stuck here in Orlando". But it's not, you know, I mean, you just have to get up and you, you know, like it's... you have to do what you're supposed to do. So you have to do that. But, I know that when I get off the road, oh man! For the first two or three or four weeks even, maybe if it's that long... I mean, for the first week anyway until it gets boring being off the road. But for the first week off the road, I mean, you can get up any time you want, you know! You don't have to go to sleep at this hour and get up at that hour, and get yourself lined up to do this, and, you know, be here in that certain place, and have to go through this and go through that, and then get back and get the proper amount of sleep and eat right, you know, and you're afraid to get sick, you know, afraid you're gonna hurt yourself someplace along the line. All those things, like, you know... they just disappear on the last show, then you can do anything you want. I mean, it's a high feeling.

BK: You go sailing?

BD: (Pause) Yeah.

BK: I mean do you want to talk about anything you like to do other than... that's personal...

BD: I like to do a lot of things but I don't want to talk about the things I like to do.

BK: OK.

BD: I'll talk about things I don't like to do!

BK: You said that you consider yourself a pretty regular kind of a guy. I mean, you said you're just like anybody else?

BD: Well sure. I mean, you know, I breathe the same air as everybody does, and I have to do the same things most people do. Yeah!

BK: So, you don't feel very like... 'cause, a lot of lyric... perhaps the earlier songs there's a sense of separation.

BD: Oh, well, I mean, you know, there's always a sense of separation. I mean, even in the later songs. There wouldn't be any point to it if there wasn't any sense of separation. I mean, if I was just going out, if I was just saying... if I didn't have anything different, you know, to say that people could quite, you know... if it didn't come from some place where somebody wasn't really looking at it that way, then what would be the point of it? You know, I could do a Ronnettes album.

Tangled Up In Blue plays.

AM: I think the most interesting thing you've said so far, Bob...
BD: Have I said anything interesting?
AM: One thing that was exceptionally interesting to me was that when you said that you started writing because nobody was writing the songs you wanted to sing.
BD: That's when I started writing. That's why I'm still writing.
BK: So you can write... you do it for you.
BD: I wish somebody would come along and give me some songs that I could do. I mean, it would be such a burden taken off my shoulder, you know. I mean, it's heavy man! (laughs).
BK: To write all those songs, and you're Bob Dylan, and they expect... there still is a lot of expectation. Have you been able to get beyond that, of worrying about what people expect out of you?
BD: Who expects what? I mean, anybody that expects anything from me is insane... is just a borderline case, you know. Nobody in any kind of reality is going to expect anything from me. I've already given them enough: what do they want from me, you know? You can't keep depending on one person to give you everything.

Gotta Serve Somebody plays

You know, like my thing is usually done with... OK I've gotta write this song. The song will be with a lyric or with a rhythm, or whatever it is for the song. But, and then you make the record. But for me, it's never been about making records, I can make good records. But for me... I have to go out and play, you know, and er... I'm not about all that stuff like videos and things. I mean, I wouldn't mind making videos, but it's nothing for me to try and really attempt to do... it's because everything is fake you know... you do, it's like making a movie, it's all fake, you know, they can do this take again, that take again. So, it's all on how good it looks... anybody can make a video. Anybody. All you need is a camera. Whatever you want. What kind of a camera do you want? 16mm or video camera, anybody can do it. And anybody can make a good one, and... er... people will like it. Show people what's done in a technological kind of way and they're not going to know what to think about it so they're gonna like it... you can, you know, dress it up in so many different kinds of ways. So many different kinda ways that people don't know what to think. Nobody's gonna sit there and say "oh this is bullshit", you know, nobody's gonna sit there and look at something on video or television and say "this is awful," you know, or "this don't make any sense at all". You know, whoever's gonna say that, you know, and say "stop making those stupid things". It's been a long time since I even seen one, but the last time I saw one, I mean I was appalled, you know. And then when you go see some of these groups, and I've seen some of them,... a few of the group... they aren't anything, you know, like, they're just nothing. And that's because they go for the faking thing so much, but, in the other arena, I mean, you have to do it live or you just don't do it You can't do it. I've always played live since I started out, I've always played live in front of a crowd and that's the only place that counts for me. It don't count on a video or a movie or... I don't care about being a movie star or video star or any of that stuff, you know.

Jokerman plays

My shows are usually at... I'm usually in a numb state of mind before a show, none whatsoever, and I have to kick in at some place along the line, usually it takes me sometimes one or two songs, sometimes it takes me much longer now. Sometimes it takes me to the encore! (Laughter). If I get an encore.

BK: The band, I would imagine, has an effect on that.

BD: Oh, absolutely. I've played with some bands that have gotten in my way so much that it's just been a struggle to get through the show. Oh yeah... at certain times it just gets ridiculous, you know.

BK: I'd imagine the flip side too. There's probably bands that turn you on?

BD: Yeah, this last group we had was, I thought, were good.

BK: Rolling Thunder was an interesting tour; it was different for you. It wasn't just the performing but the whole idea of the thing. There was a spontaneity to it.

BD: Yeah. There definitely was a lot of spontaneity to that.

BK: Was it scary or exciting?

BD: A little of both. We were doing double shows on the Rolling Thunder shows. We'd be in a hall say for fourteen hours. Rolling Thunder shows were six hours long.

BK: That had to be people loving to make music.

BD: Well (Laughs), there were so many people. You know, that the people in the audience came and went; there'd be people lined up outside when other people left the show. People would bring their lunch, you know, or dinner or something.

AM: Like a Grateful Dead concert?

BD: Yeah, yeah.

BK: Was that your idea? Did it come from you?

BD: No, that just happened. We started out with a small show and it just evolved into the...

BK: That's an amazing thing to me, that you're able to maintain that... a lot of people when they get to a certain place in the business...

BD: I thought the Rolling Thunder shows were great. I think someday somebody should make a movie about them.

BK: And call it...?

BD: Rolling Thunder!

BK: (Laughs). You've been smiling a lot and laughing a lot here. You don't do that much on stage. But you say you really enjoy yourself. You look so serious.

BD: Well, those songs take you through different trips, you see. I mean, you know, what's there to smile about if you can't... how are you gonna sing A Hard Rain 's A-Gonna Fall, or Tangled Up In Blue, or With God On Our Side, or Mr Tambourine Man, or Like A Rolling Stone, or License To Kill, or Shot Of Love, or Poisoned Love, you know, any of that. How can you sing that with a smile on your face? I mean, it'd be kind of hypocritical.

You Go Your Way And I'll Go Mine (live version) plays

You'll do things what you know on certain nights are just great. You'll know they're great and you get no response. And then you'll go someplace else and, you know, and it'll be... you just don't have it that night, you know, you just don't have it, I mean. For a variety of reasons. You don't have it and you're just kinda going through it... and it's really always got to be consistent. You get to get it to a place where it can be consistent. I mean, that's just the way it's gotta be. You got a place where it's consistent, but it's that level where it stays on... it can get great, which is really, you know, triple consistent But usually, I've done things that I was, you know, like I might have had a temperature of 104, you know, or I might have been kicked in the side that day and couldn't hardly stand up. I have done shows where I could hardly stand up, you know, where it's been painful to stand there. And that's kind of humiliating in a way, because you know that there's no way that you can be as good as you wanna be., you know. I mean, you just know it... I mean, there's no way you'd know you can... not all you wanna be, but you could be. You know that this isn't... you're not gonna, before it even starts you know you're not gonna be as good as, not you wanna be, you can be, you know. I remember one time, only two... one time I've ever wanted to replay a show, that was in Montreal, we played a show in Montreal, in 1978. I had a temperature of 104, couldn't even stand up... and the promoter said, well you gotta play this show. And we played the show and I didn't have nothing, nothing! And there was a response... you thought, you'd think the Pope was there (laughs). And I've played other shows where I've had everything happening, I mean, I just rewrote the book. Nothing – no response.

Knocking On Heaven 's Door (live version) plays

When I do whatever it is I'm doing there is rhythm involved and there is phrasing involved. And that's where it all balances out in the rhythm of it and the phrasing of it It's not in the lyrics. People think it's in the lyrics; maybe on the records it's in the lyrics, but in a live show it's not all in the lyrics, it's in the phrasing and the dynamics and the rhythm. It's got nothing whatsoever to do with the lyrics, I mean, it does, it does have something to do with the lyrics – the lyrics have to be there, sure they do. But, you know there was this Egyptian singer Om Khalsoum, have you ever heard of her? She was one of my favourite singers of all time, and I don't understand a word she sings! And she'd sing one song – it might last 40 minutes, same song, and she'll sing the same phrase over and over and over again, in a different way everytime. And no US or Western singer, I think, that's in that kind of category, you know... except possibly me (laughs). But on another level, do you know what I mean?

Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35 (live version) plays

To me it's not a business, you know, and to the people who have survived along with me, it's not a business, It just isn't. It's never been a business and never will be a business. It just is just a way of surviving, you know, it's just what you do, you know. It's like... It's just like somebody who's been trained to be a carpenter, that's what they do, it's what they do best, you know. And that's how they make a living I guess.

BK: Were you ever going to be anything else, by the way? Were you ever going to be like an insurance salesman?

BD: I was never gonna be anything else, never. I was playing when I was twelve years old, and that was all I wanted to do – was play my guitar. I was always going to these parties where all these biggest guys were, you know, and it was a way, you know, of getting attention and whatever. It starts out that way but I didn't know where it was going to lead. Now that it's lead me here, I still don't know where it is.

BK: You sound like... like obviously you're older than you were in the sixties, but also to have a degree of self-knowledge and certainty about where you're going as a person.

BD: I don't know where I'm going as a person. No.

BK: No, really.

BD: No, but I hear contentment That's what I hear, much more contentment. Well, in certain areas, yeah, maybe, well, I sure hope so.

Like A Rolling Stone (live version) plays

I don't know what's gonna happen when I'm not around to sing anymore. I hope somebody else comes along, you know, who could pick up on what I'm doing and learn exactly what it is... that makes it quite different. I keep looking for that somebody that's gonna pick up on that either... not necessarily to cover me, but to take it a step further.

I've already taken it as far as I can take it, maybe I won't see that person. I don't know. But somebody, sometime will come along and take it another step further. No one who I have seen has taken what I have done any step further. I don't say that in a bragging sort of way, it just hasn't gone any further, you know.

BK: But there is something... that's why you go back to the stage.

BD: Yeah, for me, I mean, I'm just thankful I can play on the stage and people come and see me, you know. Because I couldn't make it otherwise. I mean, if I went out to play and nobody showed up that would be the end of me. I wouldn't be making records I'll tell you that I know that. I only make records because people see me live. So as long as they're coming along to see me live I'll just make more records, you know.

Blowin' In The Wind (live version) plays.

March 1985
Bill Flanagan Interview, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 261-271.
TWM #884(2595)

Interview conducted by Flanagan for use in his book on rock and roll songwriters called Written In My Soul which he was in the process of compiling. Flanagan was formerly a reporter for the Boston Globe and Rolling Stone. Extracts from this interview were used in the concert program for the Spring '92 American tour.

BF: In Don't Fall Apart On Me Tonight (Infidels) you wrote, "It's like I'm stuck inside a painting that's hanging in the Louvre." In I And I (Infidels) you said, "If she wakes up now she'll just want me to talk / And I got nothin' to say, 'specially about whatever was." People come to you with so much expectation, do you have a hard time finding people who can relate to you normally?

BD: No, not really. I don't know how other people write their songs. I write them lots of different ways. Once they get put into a perspective, they all fall into the same dimension. But they really come out of different dimensions. Sometimes you'll write a song where you'll just stick with it and get it done. You'll feel that it's not coming from anyplace, but it's for you to do. There's nothing to base it on. You're in an area where there isn't anybody there and never was. So you just have to be real sensitive to where you're walking at the time. Not try to go one way or the other, just stay balanced and finish it. Every Grain of Sand is a song like that. Writing that song was like, "This is something that I'm going to have to stay steady with." Otherwise it could get out of hand. You must keep it balanced. And there's no footnotes around. It's the kind of an area where there's no precedent for it.

A lot of times you'll just hear things and you'll know that these are the things that you want to put in your song. Whether you say them or not. They don't have to be your particular thoughts. They just sound good, and somebody thinks them. Half my stuff falls along those lines. Somebody thinks them. I'm sure, when I'm singing something, that I'm not just singing it to sing it. I know that I've read it. Somebody's said it. I've heard a voice say that. A song like Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight sort of falls into that category: "I'll take you to a mountaintop and build you a house out of stainless steel." That kind of stuff just passes by. A guy's getting out of bed saying don't talk to me; it's leaving time. I didn't originate those kinds of thoughts. I've felt them, but I didn't originate them. They're out there, so I just use them.

BF: Are there thoughts that go by that you resist writing about?

BD: Everything I've written about I can relate to. There's a lot of stuff I hear that I wouldn't write about, because it don't mean anything to me. You hear people talk every day, and most of it goes in one ear and doesn't even come out. Or it goes in then out the other. Bill Monroe once said he got his best thinking done when people were talking to him. I always liked that. Not a whole lot of real thought goes into this stuff. It's more or less remembering things and taking it down. Sometimes you're just taking notes on stuff and then putting it all together. Sometimes it's just the opposite. A lot of people ask, "What comes first, the words or melody?" I thought about that. It's very rare that they don't come together. Sometimes the words come first, sometimes the melody comes first, but that's the exception. Most of the time the words and melody come at the same time, usually with the first line. With me it's usually the first line. I know Bob Seeger writes from hooks and titles. A lot of people do that. They come up with a line that sums up everything and then they have to go backwards and figure out how to fill it in. With me

I usually start right at the beginning and then wonder where it's going. I sometimes fill in the middle and the end at some other time, but I don't usually work backwards.

BF: What do you mean when you say that with something like Every Grain of Sand, you have to be careful to not let it get out of hand?

BD: You're not conscious of it. In a song like that, there's no consciousness of any of this stuff having been said before. "What's this like?" Well, it's not like anything. "What does it represent?" Well, you don't even know. All you know is that it's a mood piece, and you try to hold onto the mood and finish. Or not even finish, but just get it to a place where you can let it go. Because those kinds of things you'll never finish if you don't do them all at one period of time. I've done a lot of stuff where I said, "I'll finish it next week." Well, next week never comes. And then you go back and look at the stuff and say, "Wow, this is great." but you can't get connected to it again.

The saddest thing about songwriting is when you get something really good and you put it down for a while, and you take for granted that you'll be able to get back to it with whatever inspired you to do it in the first place – well, whatever inspired you to do it in the first place is never there anymore. So then you've got to consciously stir up the inspiration to figure what it was about. Usually you get one good part and one not-so-good part, and the not-so-good wipes out the good part.

BF: Would you ever sit on something for months or years, waiting until you could connect to it again?

BD: No, I don't have any expectations, if I'm putting something down, that it'll be something great if only I can get back to it. I keep it in front of me for a while, and if I don't have it done by a certain time... I'll go back and it'll still be there, but I won't be able to relate to it.

BF: Mr. Tambourine Man can be interpreted a hundred ways, but it could be about a specific real thing: wanting to keep going when you've been out all night and everyone else has gone home, and the only other person left awake is some guy standing on the corner banging a tambourine. Do all your songs have a literal reality to you?

BD: Well, songs are just thoughts. For the moment they stop time. Songs are supposed to be heroic enough to give the illusion of stopping time. With just that thought. To hear a song is to hear someone's thought, no matter what they're describing. If you see something and you think it's important enough to describe, then that's your thought. You only think one thought at a time, so what you come up with is really what you're given. When you sit around and imagine things to do and to write and to think – that's fantasy. I've never been much into that. Anybody can fantasize. Little kids can, old people can, everybody's got the right to their own fantasies. But that's all they are. Fantasies. They're not dreams. A dream has more substance to it than a fantasy. Because fantasies are usually based on nothing, they're based on what's thrown into your imagination. But I usually have to have proof that something exists before I even want to bother to deal with it at all. It must exist, it must have happened, or the possibility of it happening must have some meaning for me.

I'm not going to write a fantasy song. Even a song like Mr. Tambourine Man really isn't a fantasy. There's substance to the dream. Because you've seen it, you know? In order to have a dream, there's something in front of you. You have to have seen something or have heard something for you to dream it. It becomes your dream then. Whereas a fantasy is just your imagination wandering around. I don't really look at my stuff like that. It's happened, it's been said, I've heard it: I have proof of it. I'm a messenger. I get it. It comes to me so I give it back in my particular style.

BF: That's what I mean about songs having a literal reality: the images aren't just random.

BD: Right. It does have a literal reality. I don't think it could stand up if it didn't. Because other people can identify with it, and they know if it's true or not.

BF: You've changed the lyrics to Tangled Up in Blue since you first recorded it on Blood on the Tracks.

BD: That was a peculiar record. I always wanted it to be the way I recorded it on Real Live, but there was no particular reason for it to be that way, because I'd already made the record. That was another one of those things where I was trying to do something that I didn't think had ever been done before. In terms of trying to tell a story and be a present character in it without it being some kind of fake, sappy attempted tearjerker. I was trying to be somebody in the present time while conjuring up a lot of past images. I was trying to do it in a conscious way. I used to be able to do it in an unconscious way, but I wasn't into it that way anymore. That particular song was built like that, and it was always open to be cut better. But I had no particular reason to do it because I'd already made the record. However, there's a version we used to do on stage with just electric guitar and a saxophone – keeping the same lyrics, thinking that maybe if I did that to it would bring it out in an emotional way. But it didn't hold up very well that way. So I changed the lyrics, to bring it up to date. But I didn't just change it 'cause I was singing it one night and thought, "Oh, I'm bored with the old words." The old ones were never quite filled in. I rewrote it in a hotel room somewhere. I think it was Amsterdam. I wanted to sing that song so I looked at it again, and I changed it. When I sang it the next night I knew it was right. It was right enough so that I wanted to put it down and wipe the old one out. That was another of those songs where you're writing and you've got it, you know what it's about, but half of it you just don't get the way you wanted to. Then I fixed it up, and now I know it's where it should be. I think it makes a big difference, too.

BF: One immediate difference is that it's no longer clear if it's only one guy telling the story. It now starts off in the second person, and goes into the first person when he meets the woman in the bar. The earlier section is now isolated, and the events it described may have happened to someone else.

BD: Yeah, exactly. See, what I was trying to do had nothing to do with the characters or what was going on. I was trying to do something that I don't know if I was prepared to do. I wanted to defy time, so that the story took place in the present and past at the same time. When you look at a painting, you can see any part of it or see all of it together. I wanted that song to be like a painting.

BF: Have you ever put something in a song that was too personal? Ever had it come out and then said, "Hm, gave away too much of myself there"?

BD: I came pretty close with that song Idiot Wind. That was a song I wanted to make as a painting. A lot of people thought that song, that album Blood on the Tracks, pertained to me. Because it seemed to at the time. It didn't pertain to me. It was just a concept of putting in images that defy time – yesterday, today, and tomorrow. I wanted to make them all connect in some kind of a strange way. I've read that album had to do with my divorce. Well, I didn't get divorced till four years after that. I thought I might have gone a little bit too far with Idiot Wind. I might have changed some of it. I didn't really think I was giving away too much; I thought that it seemed so personal that people would think it was about so-and-so who was close to me. It wasn't. But you can put all these words together and that's where it falls. You can't help where it falls. I didn't feel that one was too personal, but I felt it seemed too personal. Which might be the same thing, I don't know. But it never was painful. 'Cause usually with those kinds of things, if you think you're too close to something, you're giving away too much of your feelings, well, your feelings are going to change a month later and you're going to look back and say, "What did I do that for?"

BF: But for all the power of Idiot Wind, there's part of it that always cracked me up. You talk about being accused of shooting a man, running off with his wife, she inherits a million bucks, she dies, and the money goes to you. Then you say, "I can't help it if I'm lucky." (Laughter.)

BD: Yeah, right. With that particular set-up in the front I thought I could say anything after that. If it did seem personal I probably made it overly so – because I said too much in the front and still made it come out like, "Well, so what?" I didn't really think it was too personal. I've never really said anything where I thought I was giving away too much. I mean, I give it all away, but I'm not really giving away any secrets. I don't have that many secrets. I don't find myself in that position.

BF: What about Ballad in Plain D [an early song in which Dylan described, in painful detail, his breakup with Susan Rotolo]?

BD: Oh! Yeah. That one... That one I look back and I say, "I must have been a real schmuck to write that." I look back at that particular one and say, of all the songs I've written, maybe I could have left that alone. But if that's the only one I look back and say maybe I shouldn't have written, I think that's a pretty good record. That's maybe five hundred to one.

BF: Now, you had temporarily split with your wife before Blood on the Tracks. That album must be at least somewhat about that.

BD: Yeah. Somewhat about that. But I'm not going to make an album and lean on a marriage relationship. There's no way I would do that, any more than I would write an album about some lawyers' battles that I had. There are certain subjects that don't interest me to exploit. And I wouldn't really exploit a relationship with somebody. Whereas in Ballad in Plain D, I did. Not knowing that I did it. At that time my audience was very small. It overtook my mind so I wrote it. Maybe I shouldn't have used that. I had other songs at the time. It was based on an old folk song. But I know what you mean. If you're going through some relationship and it's not working out well and that's the way you feel, no matter what else you see or what else you do you keep getting back to that: "Oh, I feel lousy." So you try to take it out and write a song about it. A lot of people can't do that. They have nobody to sing it to. So a person in my position says, "Well, I got this available information, this is the way I really feel; I think I'll write it and say how I feel." I don't do that. I don't like feeling those kinds of feelings. I've got to think I can do better than that. It's not going to positively help anybody to hear about my sadness. Just another hard luck story.

BF: In Nikos Kazantzakis's Report to Greco, he wrote that, like every man, as his life drew to a close he had to drag the cross he had made up his own Calvary – and that the work a man leaves behind on that ascent is just the blood on the tracks. Did you read that, or was that just a cosmic connection?

BD: Must have been, I hadn't read that. All the words have been used; it's just how we put them together. And even that – though we might think we've come up with something super, fantastic, I think if you look in the right place you'll find somebody else has done it.

BF: Blood on the Tracks was such a powerful work that it's amazing that you followed it with an album, Desire, on which you collaborated with a second lyricist, Jacques Levy. Why didn't you try to sustain what you'd tapped into with Blood on the Tracks? Why not try to keep it going?

BD: I guess I never intended to keep that going. It was an experiment that came off. I had a few weeks in the summer when I wrote the songs. I wrote all the songs for Blood on the Tracks in about a month and then I recorded them and stepped back out of that place where I was when I wrote them and went back to whatever I was doing before. Sometimes you'll get what you can out of these things, but you can't stay there. Co-writer. That was probably an album where I didn't have anything and I wasn't even thinking about making a record. I think I ran into Jacques downtown and we went off and just wrote some songs. The people from the Hurricane Carter movement kept calling me and writing me. And Hurricane sent me his book, which I read and which really touched me. I felt that the man was just innocent, from his writings and knowing that part of the country. So I went to visit him and was really behind him, trying to get a new trial. So that was one of the things I brought to Jacques, too. I said, "Why don't you help me write this song and see if we can do something?" So we wrote Hurricane, and then we just wrote a bunch of others. An album came out of it.

BF: Have you been in touch with Hurricane Carter recently?

BD: No, I haven't seen him since the seventies. He got re-incriminated or whatever. I heard a lot of stories, good and bad, about what really happened. It just got a little out of hand, a little too complicated. But as I understand, he was set up again. They knew what buttons to push [note: Shortly after this conversation, Hurricane Carter's conviction was overturned.]

BF: Anything you've ever tried to write about and been unable to do?

BD: Yeah. Anything I try to write about, I can't do it. If I try to write about something – "I want to write about horses" or "I want to write about Central Park" or "I want to write about the Cocaine industry" – I can't get anywhere with that. I have to always take it out. It's like that Hurricane song. I wanted to write a song about Hurricane Carter, I wanted to spread the message. It really doesn't come out about Hurricane. Really, the essence of it is never what it's about. It's really about you. Unless you're standing in somebody else's shoes you just don't know what it feels like. You don't know what it's about. You can go to a movie and say, "What's this about?" A movie is something that gives the illusion of stopping time. You go someplace and you sit there for a while. You're looking at something. You're trapped. It's all happening in your brain and it seems like nothing else is going on in the world. Time has stopped. The world could be coming to an end outside, but for you time has stopped. Then someone says, "What was it about?" "Well, I don't know. It was about two guys who were after the same girl." Or, "It was about the Russian Revolution." Well, yeah, that was what it was about, but that wasn't it. That's not what made you stay there and stare at the screen, at a light on the wall. In another way you could say, "What's life about?" It's just going by like a movie all the time. It doesn't matter if you're here for a hundred years, it still goes by. You can't stop it. So you can't say what it's about. But what you can do is try to give the illusion of the moment of it. And even that's not what it's about. That's just proof that you existed. What's anything about? It's not about anything. It is what it is.

BF: Jackson Browne said that he thought Every Breath You Take was kind of unfair to the woman to whom it was directed, 'cause the song is told so powerfully from Sting's point of view and it's so inescapable.

BD: Oh, I don't think so. That was a good song. Sort of reminds me of Stand By Me. You can take any side you want. You don't have to tell the other person's side. There's no law that says you have to do that. I think he said whatever he had to say in that song pretty bluntly and right to the point. He didn't try to make it cute or clever or anything. He did it and was gone. I think that was a really good song.

BF: Do you think it's appropriate to write in the voice of a killer, as Bruce Springsteen did in Nebraska?

BD: I'm not too familiar with that particular song of Bruce's. But it's not inappropriate to put yourself in somebody else's place. That's a quite common thing to do. Folksingers used to do that all the time, and I've done a bit of that, too. House of the Rising Sun is written from a woman's point of view, and up until Eric Burdon did it, men used to sing it from a woman's point of view. That was something that you just did. If you go back and listen to the Stanley Brothers or the Country Gentlemen or Jim and Jesse, any of the bluegrass groups, there's quite a few songs where they put themselves into the first person. I've done that myself. I've written songs from the first person. I haven't recorded too many of them, but I have done it. That's legitimate.

BF: Sure. What I'm wondering about is, once you get in that person, once you give that person a voice, do you have a moral responsibility not to give voice to evil, not to say, "Why'd I kill all these people? I guess there's just a meanness in this world?"

BD: Is that what Nebraska says?

BF: Yes.

BD: I don't know. I don't know why you give a voice to one person and not another. But everybody's got a voice and there's somebody who can get inside of everybody and be their lawyer. Why not write a song for the guy who killed all the people at the McDonald's out in San Diego? I'm sure he's got a voice, too. And if he talked from the grave I'm sure he could get a lot of people to feel sorry for him, to sympathize with him. It depends on what your cause is. Is your cause to just go out and randomly shoot people? Kinky Friedman, I think, wrote a song about the guy who went up on the Texas tower and did that. But it's hard to tell. Usually you do that if somebody's been given a bad rap and you sort of know it. But I don't know what Bruce's intentions were. That song was about Charlie Starkweather? Well, I grew up in the same area as Charlie Starkweather and I remember that happening. That affected everybody out there. And everybody pretty much kept their mouth shut about it. Because he did have a sort of a James Dean quality to him. He was in the papers a lot. I must have been about seventeen or eighteen when that happened. I don't recall how most people felt about it. Nobody glorified him, though.

BF: Did you see Badlands, Terence Malick's movie about it?

BD: Yeah, I love Martin Sheen, I think he's a fantastic actor. But that didn't really remind me of Charlie Starkweather. I don't think it had anything to do with Charlie Starkweather. I went through that period of time and I remember it firsthand. I remember what the impact of that was. I don't think there's any way you can elevate Charlie up above what he did or what happened.

BF: Mark Knopfler told me that you wrote a song called Prison Guard about a complete skunk, and Mark took that song to be a sort of reaction to Nebraska.

BD: Oh, yeah, Mark heard that song. (Smiles.) I did write a song like that but I never recorded it. I didn't think I needed to record it. It was a talking thing about this prison guard who's just sort of a rough character. He doesn't mind throwing people off the fourth tier and busting anybody's head in. And then it goes on to describe his family and his town. Then when I got done I just thought it was pretty pathetic. The whole picture was just too pathetic. I don't know what was in my mind when I was doing that.

BF: But it wasn't inspired by or a takeoff on Nebraska?

BD: Uh. I don't know what inspired it. No. It was more or less one of these things where somebody in a uniform can get away with something that somebody who's not wearing a uniform can't.

BF: Masters of War is a very harsh song: "I'll stand o'er your grave 'til I'm sure that you're dead." Neighborhood Bully is equally hard, yet a lot of critics expressed surprise at its militancy. I don't understand why so many people assume you're a pacifist. The critic Mark Rowland said you were always more concerned with justice than politics.

BD: (Laughs.) Yeah. I don't know why people choose to think whatever they think. Is pacifism a philosophy? I'm not really sure what it is.

BF: If someone strikes you, you turn the other cheek.

BD: That's not pacifism, though. Turning the other cheek is an aggressive move, actually. There is some strategy where if someone pushes on you, you can go with their push and make their strength work against them. Pacifism. I know I'm not comfortable with those words and I wonder if other people are as comfortable with those broad terminologies like pacifism, rightism, leftism, militarism, republicanism. In this country a Republican is one thing: you can go to Ireland and say you're a Republican you'll get a different reaction. You can use all these words here. It's pretty safe to say anything you want to say. But whether there's any meaning to it or not, I don't know. I don't comprehend those terms simply because I don't think other people do. They talk about humanism and secularism, everything's got an ism. Not that I'm so stupid that I can't understand what they mean, but I don't think anybody else knows what they mean. To be perfectly honest, I don't think people know what they're talking about when they use all these words. They have no idea what they're saying. It's like saying, "I saw a house yesterday." Oh yeah, I saw one, too. But it probably wasn't the same one you saw. But I hear that a lot. People seem to think they know all about me. Maybe they don't. Maybe everything I've done has been one side of something. One part. Certainly nothing that I've written defines me as a total person. There's no one song that does that. Nothing I do really should surprise anybody. It seems like I've been doing it for so long I can't remember when I wasn't doing it. There's nothing I could say that isn't documented somewhere in the past so you could think, "Yeah, he would say something like that."

BF: It's funny. When I was growing up people would always say, "Bob Dylan, oh, he writes a lot of songs against the Viet Nam War" and I had all those albums and I'd always say...

BD: Which ones? (Laughs.)

BF: Right, 'cause the songs they'd cite – like Hard Rain and Blowin' in the Wind – all predated Viet Nam. I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine has that very powerful image, "I dreamed I was amongst the ones that put him out to death." It's human nature to point at other people. It's rare an artist takes the position of saying, "We're all capable of being the villain."

BD: Well, I don't mind taking that position. Because that's just a true statement. We're all sinners. People seem to think that because their sins are different from other people's sins, they're not sinners. People don't like to think of themselves as sinners. It makes them feel uncomfortable. "What do you mean sinner?" It puts them at a disadvantage in their mind. Most people walking around have this strange conception that they're born good, that they're really good people – but the world has just made a mess of their lives. I had another point of view. But it's not hard for me to identify with anybody who's on the wrong side. We're all on the wrong side, really.

BF: You integrate your faith into the songs more subtly than at the time of Slow Train Coming.

BD: Now I'm just writing from instinct. I do that most of the time anyway. I just write from instinct and however it comes out is how it comes out. Other people can make of it what they choose to. But for me I can't expound too much on what I'm doing because I really don't have any idea what I'm doing. But I'll tell you one thing, if you're talking just on a scriptural type of thing, there's no way I could write anything that would be scripturally incorrect. I mean, I'm not going to put forth ideas that aren't scripturally true. I might reverse them, or make them come out a different way, but I'm not going to say anything that's just totally wrong, that there's not a law for.

BF: One of the nice things about Sweetheart Like You is that anyone brought up with the Bible will hear that song one way, but the song will still work on a different level for someone else.

BD: Oh, I think so, yeah. Because the Bible runs through all U.S. life, whether people know it or not. It's the founding book. The founding fathers' book anyway. People can't get away from it. You can't get away from it wherever you go. Those ideas were true then and they're true now. They're scriptural, spiritual laws. I guess people can read into that what they want. But if you're familiar with those concepts they'll probably find enough of them in my stuff. Because I always get back to that.

BF: Do people you know recognize themselves in your songs?

BD: Oh, yeah, a lot of people do. They tell me they're so-and-so. They used to anyway. "Einstein disguised as Robin Hood" would be in the hallway. A lot of people would tell me they were this person or that person. Not so much anymore. It used to be more common than it is now.

BF: Did people sometimes get it right?

BD: No. Not really. But a lot of people can identify with the feelings I have and what I describe something as. I don't think it's anything more than that.

BF: A reporter for Time magazine named Jones went around saying that he was the inspiration for Ballad of a Thin Man. He got some articles written about him. I thought, "Geez, what a thing to brag about!"

BD: Yeah, there were a lot of Mister Joneses at that time. There obviously must have been a tremendous amount of them for me to write that particular song. It wasn't just one person. It was like, "Oh, man, here's the thousandth Mister Jones."

BF: Let's talk about the mechanics of writing. Do you write on guitar or piano, and does the music come into your head before you go to your instrument?

BD: Yeah, a lot of times riffs will come into my head. And I'll transpose them with the guitar or piano. A lot of times I'll wake up with a certain riff, or it'll come to me during the day. I'll try to get that down, and then lines will come from that. Or it could come on any instrument I can play. Electric guitar is different from acoustic guitar. Banjo style is really good, you can write good songs on the banjo. These are all real instruments. Then they have all the technological instruments, these little keyboard things. They give you all kinds of sounds. Those are – sort of – okay.

BF: You're not completely sold?

BD: They sound real good, but I haven't been too successful at using any of that stuff. But I write with a combination of instruments. My melodies are usually very simple. They have to be simple. Otherwise I couldn't remember them. If they were a little more complicated I couldn't remember them. So they have to be simple. And that's really about it. And then I write lines down. I have notes scribbled all over the place. Sometimes I'll go out and say, "Whatever else I do today, I'm going to write down all the lines that seem interesting to me. Either that I think of or that I overhear." I'll try to stay committed to that for a certain period of time. Because most of the time you don't do that. The stuff that goes by, you think of and then say, "Okay, I thought about it. Big deal. Who cares?" Or you'll hear something amusing and then forget that, too. Sometimes I'll make an effort to just go out and get that stuff and see if it means anything. And sometimes it does. I'll just put it somewhere and then get back to it sometime. Usually if it has meaning for me, it's important. There's a lot of great things you hear that aren't really that relevant. That's really about it. There's no real complicated deep genius quality to it.

BF: That's easy for you to say, you've written all these great songs.

BD: Well, I think it has more to do with instinct. There's nothing studied about it. I think you just have to trust your own instinct.

BF: You sang at Martin Luther King, Jr. 's March on Washington. Did you ever meet him?

BD: No. I heard him speak but I never met him.

BF: Did you know John Coltrane?

BD: I've seen John Coltrane. Yeah. I watched him play. I've seen him, I've seen Monk, Miles a lot, Horace Silver. I did some sessions once with Don Cherry and Billy Higgins. I really don't know what happened to that stuff. There were a lot of jazz guys around in the coffeehouse scene in the Village. The folk music and jazz clubs and poetry were all kind of the same thing back then. I used to see those guys a lot. What they had that I picked up on in my singing – I can hardly even call myself a singer – was a sense of phrasing and dynamics.

BF: I heard Bill Cosby say one night that when he was starting out as a comic in the Village he'd walk back and forth across the street and hear you playing in one club and John Coltrane in another. Were you conscious of how much ground was being broken?

BD: No. Nobody was really conscious of what was happening. But there were a lot of different people on the street. I remember when Bill Cosby came to town. He used to work at the club I worked at. He was a stand-up comedian then. He was just another one of the guys, another entertainer. He got work a little faster than most people, I think, but I'd already started playing. I used to eat with Bill all the time.

BF: You're famous for going into the studio and recording very quickly to catch the moment. But a couple of your recent albums, Slow Train and Infidels, were more labored over.

BD: See, when I started to record they just turned the microphones on and you recorded. That was the way they did it back in the sixties. Whatever you got on one side of the glass was what came in on the controls on the other side of the glass. It was never any problem. What you did out front was what you got on the tape. And it always happened that way. Whether you played by yourself or played with a band didn't really matter - there'd be leakage and that stuff, but you were pretty much guaranteed that whatever you did on that side of the glass was going to be perceived in the same kind of way. That was never any problem. So what happened to me was, I kept working that way through the seventies. I didn't realize things had changed! (Laughs.) I really didn't. I don't think I knew you could do an overdub until 1978. I just didn't think about it. Maybe I was so outside of it that I hadn't realized that. The problem is, you can't record that way anymore. If you go into a studio now, the technology is so different that you might have a live sound that you want and you'll put that live sound down, but it won't sound that way on the other side of the glass. So then you have to contrive the sound to make it sound the way you really want. In other words, if you want to sound a certain way, whatever that way is, it'll never happen in the studio.

There's a kind of an outdated thing called "live excitement in the studio." It doesn't happen anymore, because people don't record that way. A lot of people put things down one track at a time. Things are so advanced that you'll be able to phone in your parts pretty soon. Anyway, the problem with it is that no matter what you do, it's not going to come out that way anyway. People try. Some people use a certain studio because it used to have a certain sound. But they might have changed all the equipment in the place, so it's not going to have that sound anymore. I like the old sound, but it's done. It's never going to come back. So you just have to deal with what the modern way is. A lot of my records have been made because it's – quote – time to make a record. "When's your new record going to be delivered?" "Oh, next month." Time for me to go in and make a record. I never used to think about it during the year. I had other things to do. Some of the seventies records were made on just one block of time. "This month I'm going to block all this time out, write the songs, record the songs, mix 'em, press 'em, get a cover together, and it's all out in a month or two." It took me a long time to get off that particular style. I didn't really enjoy it that way.

Sometimes I've never done the songs before – I'll just write 'em and put 'em somewhere. Then when I'm making a record I'll need some songs, and I'll start digging through my pockets and drawers trying to find these songs. Then I'll bring one out and I've never sung it before, sometimes I can't even remember the melody to it, and I'll get it in. Sometimes great things happen, sometimes not-so-great things happen. But regardless of what happens, when I do it in the studio it's the first time I've ever done it. I'm pretty much unfamiliar with it.

In the past what's come out is what I've usually stuck with, whether it really knocked me out or not. For no apparent reason. I've stuck with it, just from lack of commitment to taking the trouble to really get it right. I didn't want to record that way anymore. Now I'm recording more than I used to record. About two years ago I decided to get serious about it and just record. Because I do need records out and I do have deadlines and commitments. It's been a big struggle to come up with them at certain times. So rather than do that, what I do now is just record all the time. Sometimes nothing comes out and other times I get a lot of stuff that I keep. I recorded this album [Empire Burlesque] for a long time. I just put down the songs that I felt as I wanted to put them down. Then I'd listen and decide if I liked them. And if I didn't like them I'd either re-record them or change something about them. I wanted to be the first one to judge it rather than put them out there to the people and have them do it.

BF: Does the producer make a big difference?

BD: I produce my own records, really. I don't even know what a producer does. Producers usually get in the way. They're fine for picking you up at the airport and making sure all the bills are paid at your hotel. If they're really good producers, they'll find songs for you to sing that really make sense for you. But the producers I have aren't even really like producers. They make a record sound right, but I haven't run into any that know any more about what I'm doing than I do.

BF: You've mentioned a couple of times how much you value conciseness but you're more responsible than anyone for breaking out of tight, structured song forms.

BD: Yeah. Well, I come out of that folk music/rock & roll structure. So that's the only kind of structure I really deal with. I don't consider myself a pop songwriter like Burt Bacharach/Hal David, even Lionel Richie. I think you have to be too relaxed a person, you have to have too much patience (laughs) to do that sort of thing. But I don't know what I've done. I usually think of myself as last. When I think of songwriters I don't really think of myself. I think of other people. I know I'm doing it, too. But it gives me more of a kick to see somebody else do it. I need to do it. Like that Jonathan Richman. I get a kick out of that. I'd rather listen to that. Whereas my stuff, I need to do it, I have to do it, I'm inside it all the time. So I've got a get out of it. When I hear my old stuff I just think of how badly it was recorded.

BF: Has there ever been a time when you didn't want to write, to perform? There've been periods when we didn't hear from you.

BD: I've tried to get away from it, but I never could. It's all I've ever done, really. I'm still hearing stuff that was made in the fifties and the sixties that maybe I heard once and forgot about or maybe I never heard.

BF: Do you ever think maybe you'd like not to be tuned into it all the time, not receiving? Maybe the muse could give you a break?

BD: No. That would scare me. I wouldn't know what else to do. I would be lost.

The Wicked Messenger #884(2595) 27 June 1993 add this information:

[Re: Jesse Winchester's album on Rhino R2 70085) Bill Flanagan's liner notes are entitled LOOKING FOR JESSE and are dated June 1988. Here is the section relating to Dylan:-

> "A few years ago, I wrote a book about rock's best singer/songwriters, and Bob Dylan said to me, Have you talked to Jesse Winchester. You can't talk about the best songwriters and not include him. I agreed, but Jesse Winchester was still a hard man to find. A while later, I was having dinner with T-Bone Burnett and he said, 'Is Jesse Winchester in your book? He's one of the greats'. Elvis Costello said the same thing."

17 June 1985
Rockline Interview, Hollywood, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 499-509.

A live broadcast interview conducted by Bob Coburn in Hollywood, California during the month of June 1985 which was transmitted on peak-time nationwide radio achieved by linking up with a host of local radio stations all across the U.S. and Canada through the Global Satellite Network. This interview takes the form of a telephone chat-show where Bob answers questions from various callers (C1, C2, C3, etc.) with Coburn showing remarkable agility at keeping things moving. This was Dylan's first chat-show in almost twenty years, since the Bob Fass show of 1966. The interview is interspersed with tracks from his then new album Empire Burlesque. The quality — to quote Paul Williams — "Dumb show, dumb questions and Dylan responds with dumb, weary answers".

Taken from the circulating tape.

BC: Hello again. I'm Bob Coburn, your host for Rockline, brought to you by Budweiser, the king of beers. Tonight, Rockline has a very special evening with Bob Dylan. As always we have plenty of phone lines but just one number to remember in the U.S.: that number is toll-free, 1800 222 ROCK, that's 18002227625. And one number for Canada too, toll-free as well 1800 344 ROCK, that's 1800 344 ROCK. Empire Burlesque, the new release by Bob Dylan rekindles the wit, spirit and leadership that Dylan embodied in the sixties and early seventies. This album sizzles with emotions, stimulates with intellect and satisfies musically. And Rockline welcomes Bob Dylan. Nice to have you here tonight.

BD: Nice to be here.

BC: Now this is amazingly the first American release that you've given us with printed lyrics, and the first one you've self-produced. Why did it take it so long to get to that point?

BD: Well, I put the lyrics on so nobody would mistake the words, which so often they do that you know.

BC: Aha, and why wait so long to self-produce? Did you finally feel that you could do it better than anybody else? The way that you want it this time.

BD: Yeah, I did. I did.

BC: That's really it? Er, thirty releases, most of them have been really landmark releases. How do you feel about this current release? Is this one of your best do you think?

BD: I like it.

BC: You like it; well, we're going to hear a bunch of songs from it tonight. And we'll put you on the air with Bob Dylan too... right, now a song from Empire Burlesque – Tight Connection To Your Heart.

Tight Connection To My Heart plays.

BC: It's an evening with Bob Dylan tonight on Rockline. I'm Bob Coburn and our first phone call for you tonight, Bob, is from Chicago. Doug, this is Bob Dylan.

C1: Hi Bob, how are you?

BD: Oh, I'm doing alright.

C1: Oh good. I've just got to say that I think your new album is fantastic, and I was just wondering like if you're going to tour, and if so then who's going to be in your band?

BD: Oh, I don't know. I don't know just yet. I might use some old people I've used and probably some new people.

BC: You are going to go on tour though?

BD: Oh yeah, I always do.

BC: Yeah, it seems like it. Well there was a period quite a few years ago where, you know, sometimes you didn't, but that has changed. Any players on the album you think might be in there? You've got some big stars on the album, Mick Taylor and Ron Wood.

BD: Well Mick was with me on the last tour I did, and there's always talk about Sly and Robbie...

BC: As the rhythm section. We'll wait and find out. Thanks for the call Doug. Now we have a call from Knoxville, Tennessee. Alan, you're on the show.

C2: Hi Bob, I wanted to say thanks for the last twenty three years of music and I really do love your new album.

BD: Well, thank you.

C2: I was wondering what poets you feel, like, have had the most influence on your writing?

BD: Hm, John Keats; I used to read him quite a bit. Now let's see, the French poet Arthur Rimbaud and, er, all those guys in the 50's, Ginsberg and Corso and those guys—

BC: Anything else Alan?

C2: No. I think that's it.

BC: Alright. Thanks for the call. There's a joke that's been running around Sylvester Stallone starring as Arthur Rimbaud.

BD: Oh yeah.

BC: We'll talk to Ronald. He's in Carlisle, Ohio, in Dayton. Hi there.

C3: Hi there Bob. I just want to say that it's a great honor for me to talk to one of the great Christian rock artists of the century. And was it a big inspiration for you to have Jimi Hendrix record your song All Along The Watchtower?

BC: Was that a big thrill for you or, what were your feelings at the time?

BD: Oh yeah, that was a big thrill. He recorded All Along The Watchtower and another song off John Wesley Harding called Drifter's Escape, I think. And he recorded Like A Rolling Stone. But he made All Along The Watchtower something different, you know. When we play it now in person its more like how Jimi would have played it.

BC: What were you going to say there, Ronald?

C3: Yeah, it is. I thought it was really a great song.

BC: When that album came out it wasn't received as one of your best records, but, in retrospect, now it appears to be one of your strongest albums – John Wesley Harding. What do you feel about that?

BD: Really, I don't know if it really was one of the strongest albums, it was OK you know.

BC: You just think that is an OK record?

BD: I do, yeah.

BC: Huh, interesting. Thanks for the call Ronald. We'll turn our view to Brooklyn now... Rich, you're on the Rockline.

C4: Hello, I'll get right to my question. I'd like to know who are the women on the back of the Infidels album cover and the latest album cover?

BD: Hm, let's see. Well, the women?

BC: Well, there's one woman on the back.

BD: Oh yeah, there's half a woman! That's a picture that was taken at a party somewhere. As you can see by my expression in the picture I don't really know who she is even (laughs).

BC: It's a drawing on Infidels.

BD: Oh, that picture. Who is that?

BC: What were you saying there Rich?

C4: Yeah, I can't hear you. Could you speak up a little bit?

BC: Oh, OK. We'll try and accommodate you, all right. Do you remember who those people are? This is just a drawing.

BD: Hm, well the woman is someone I knew... (laughs). The man I think I was wishing to be me, I guess.

C4: The striking resemblance to Joan Baez, especially the sketch on the last album cover.

BD: Oh yeah! It does kind of look like her, but it's not her though.

BC: It's not her. Good try though, Rich.

C4: Oh, by the way, I just had one more small question. What do you think of Joan Baez's imitation of you during her concerts?

BD: Well, I think Joan is fabulous, you know. Anything she does usually sounds pretty good.

C4: OK, thanks a lot. Nice talking to you, Bob.

BC: Thanks for the call Rich. Our numbers are toll-free in Canada and the US. From the album Infidels that we were just kind of looking at the back of. This is Neighborhood Bully by Bob Dylan on Rockline.

Neighborhood Bully plays.

BC: Infidels — Neighborhood Bully by Bob Dylan, my guest tonight, for the full ninety minutes tonight, on Rockline, and we wouldn't have it any other way. We have a call from Toronto... John, you're on the Rockline.

C5: Hi Bob. You worked with Mark Knopfler on a couple of albums. How did that come about?

BD: Well, I met Mark on the Slow Train album, and we just kept in touch over the years you know.

BC: Did you get in touch with him and say, hey, come play on my record, or did he call you? How did it happen?

BD: The first time it was Jerry Wexler who did that, and then the second time I ran into him in New York, and he had just released the previous album to his latest one.

BC: He certainly has his own style, but people in the beginning especially were saying he sounds a lot like Bob Dylan. Did somebody say that maybe you two should get together?

BD: Well no, not really. Jerry recommended him to play on that album, and, you know, I went down to see him and I thought he sounded sort of like me, not really but a little bit.

BC: Yeah, just a touch maybe. He's a great player. Thanks for the call John.

BD: Er, I don't play anything like guitar like he does, though.

BC: Yeah. He can really play some leads. Thanks for the call John, we do appreciate it. We have another call from Chicago; they're cooking there tonight... and we'll talk to Rich. Hi Rich.

C6: Hi, Bob. Yeah. This is Rich Ingle from Chicago. How you doing?

BD: I'm doing alright.

C6: Good. Er, I'd like to ask you about a tape I've heard which sounds like it comes off an acetate from the Self Portrait sessions, and on the tape you do the song Yesterday. What I'd like to know is, was George Harrison at the session and did he play on that with you?

BD: Well, I don't remember that.

C6: Er, maybe I can help refresh your memory. Also on that session you did the song Da Do Ron Ron.

BD: Hmm.

C6: You don't remember it yet?

BD: Well it must have been an old one (laughs).

C6: It sounds like it's from Self Portrait. It sounds like that period. You also did an electric version of Song To Woody and Mama You Been On My Mind.

BD: Oh! well, maybe George was playing on that; we did do some sessions.

C6: Did you do an album together that you didn't release or something?

BD: I don't think so.

C6: No. How about that new song that he has out that you wrote — I Don't Want To Do It.

BD: Oh yeah, he dug that up somewhere.

C6: Was that from around that time?

BD: Yes it was.

C6: OK Bob. I just wanna tell you that I think that the new album is great and just keep up the great work.

BD: Well, thank you.

BC: Thanks for the call there Rich. Do you have tons of material that's never been released? I know you recorded over twenty songs for Empire Burlesque. Is there a lot of backlog material?

BD: Well, there's a lot of stuff, you know, that's just laying around in parts. Some are songs and some are just parts: lots of that kind of stuff.

BC: Well, I'd like to see some of that stuff. We'll talk to Michael now. He's in Norfolk, Virginia. You're on the show Michael.

C7: Good evening Bob. How you doing?

BD: I'm doing fine.

C7: Er, What have you been listening to recently? Any good music?

BD: Hm, you ever heard of a group called Fishbone? I thought they're pretty good.

C7: You been listening to any jazz?

BD: Oh yeah.

C7: Tell me something, did you ever record any tunes as Blind Boy Grunt?

BD: I'm sure I did. (Laughs). That was a few years ago I think.

C7: OK Bob. I just wanna say thanks for the thrill.

BC: Thanks for the call Michael, we appreciate it. We'll talk to Peter now in Santa Monica. How you doing Peter?

C8: Oh, I'm doing great. I'm very excited to talk to Bob.

BC: Well take advantage of it, you're on the air.

C8: Oh great. The question I wanted to ask is that I consider you one of the people who have proven that one person can change the world, make a difference in the world. First of all I want to ask you if you agree with that and, if no, respond to that.

BD: Oh yeah, I do agree with that I don't know if I've ever done anything like that but a lot of the great changes in the world were brought about by one person for sure.

C8: Aha, do you think that in the sixties it happens, you know, there was that energy – you know, everybody was listening to your music and it promoted them to do things. Whereas here in the eighties there's more of a hope that one person can't do as much. Do you feel that that's what's happening?

BD: Well maybe, but that'll probably change.

C8: Alright, I want to identify myself as Peter Landecker, the person who's doing this show about you. And I wanted to ask you... I've put together this show which is a collection of your words and music. The thing I'm concerned about is when people see this show – a collection of your words and music – and they're going to leave the theatre, what kind of a feeling would you want them to leave with?

BD: I don't really know, 'cause I do my own shows. So somebody else who's doing them, you know, I don't know what they're doing.

BC: We'll take a time out and return with Bob Dylan our guest for the full ninety minutes on Rockline... We're gonna play a song now that was done by the Textones. It's on Bob's new album. He wrote it, of course. It's called Clean Cut Kid.

Clean Cut Kid plays.

BC: Clean Cut Kid by Bob Dylan on the Rockline. My guest for the full ninety minutes tonight. Ron Wood of Stones fame on guitar on that track, sounding good. We're going to talk to somebody in Little Rock, Arkansas right now, and this is Rust. Is that correct?

C9: That's right. Hello there Mr. Dylan. I want to say one thing first before I ask my question. I want to tell you that you're number one on the top of my list of musicians, for the simple reason that when I was twelve years old I listened to you and I picked up the harmonica and I'm still playing and I'm twenty eight years old. Well, my question is here -that I've been thinking about for a while is – have you ever planned to take any of your private works and poetry and maybe simultaneously with autobiography write a book?

BD: No, I never did plan that. I haven't had time. I've been asked about it though. Maybe one of these days you know.

C9: Aha, and I think that producing your own LP there is a great accomplishment and I hope to hear a lot from you in the future because I think that you're one of the best, sir.

BD: Well thank you.

BC: Alright. That's a from the heart call and we appreciate it there, Rust and thanks for the call. We'll talk to somebody in Milwaukee now, his name is Randy. Randy, meet Bob Dylan.

C10: Hi Bob. Listen, in 1976 I bought your first album and Hurricane struck me, like, first, but Isis has always haunted me and I wanted to know what you meant by the song Isis.

BD: Hm... Well, it's kind of like a journey, you know, like sort of a journey type trip. I wrote that with another person and I think half the verses were mine and half the verses were his, and it just sort of ended up being what it was. I don't really know too much in depth what it would mean.

BC: Who did you co-write that with?

BD: Jacques Levy.

BC: Jacques Levy, and the basis I guess is Egyptian mythology, Isis being a goddess. Is that what it stemmed from?

BD: (Laughs) I guess so.

BC: You're not sure. Anything else on your mind there Randy?

C10: Well, um, Like A Rolling Stone is like my favorite song and I appreciate him writing that. And I want to tell him that.

BC: Right. We appreciate that. We'll talk to Philip now. He's in... I believe in Illinois. Where you calling from Phil?

C11: I'm calling from Indiana.

BC: OK, sorry about that. You're on the air.

C11: Yeah, hi Bob. I was wondering how did you get involved in the USA for Africa.

BD: Oh, Ken Cregan had called and asked me about it.

BC: And who is Ken Cregan? What does he do?

BD: Well, he put that together. He's the manager of Lionel Richie. That's how I got involved.

BC: Did you have any hesitation or say "Yeah, I'll be there". What was your reaction?

BD: Oh, I said I'll be there.

BC: And you were. We're gonna listen to a song that's Randy's favorite cut. How can we not play Like A Rolling Stone by Bob Dylan on Rockline.

Like A Rolling Stone plays.

BC: A song that's burned into the mind of anyone who went through the sixties, Like A Rolling Stone, originally on Highway 61 Revisited. So many of your songs, Bob, have been re-recorded by other people, yet I don't think I've ever heard another version of that. Have you? Is there another version of that?

BD: Yeah. Jimi Hendrix did it, and a couple of others did it.

BC: Oh yeah, that's right. Boy, that's a song that you'd better do something really fine with, 'cause that one you don't mess with. That one's sacrosanct almost. We'll talk to Jeff now. He's in Knoxville, Tennessee. Jeff, you're on the Rockline.

C12: Well, what I wanted to ask you Bob was what possessed you to change your name from Robert Zimmerman to Bob Dylan.

BD: Hm, that's an interesting question. I really can't say. It's been so long. I think I was just playing somewhere one night and the club-owner asked me what my name was, and that was the name that came into my mind. I don't think there was really anything really profound about it.

BC: Are the stories that it was taken from the poet Dylan Thomas true?

BD: Well, I think I'd heard... (laughs)... I'd heard that story and I knew who Dylan Thomas was, but I'm not sure if I was familiar with his poetry or not.

BC: Yeah. Interesting, Jeff. Did you have another question?

C12: Well, the second part of my question was, what's your favorite album and your favorite song? That's what I wanted to know.

BD: Favorite album? I think the Robert Johnson album. I listen to that quite a bit still.

BC: Some of that old blues stuff, huh. Do you have a favorite of any of your records? Is there one that stands out as your all-time album?

BD: Hm, I like 'em all you know when I make 'em. And then I don't listen to them too often after they're released.

BC: Time to move on I guess. Thanks for the call. We'll talk to Ken now, he's in Cleveland... Hi.

C13: Hi, how you doing Bob?

BD: I'm doing alright.

C13: Alright. I'd just like to comment, the Young Rascals also did Like A Rolling Stone. Also my favorite song is your 115th Dream on Bringing It All Back Home. That brings me to my question. Right before the release of that album there was a rumor and album called Bob Dylan In Concert, and the rumors are that there was a disagreement between you and Columbia over what would be on the album and it was never released. Any chance of us hearing it ever?

BD: Hm, that must've been... that may have been the second album. They asked me to change a few songs I think.

C13: The John Birch Society Blues material?

BD: Yeah, I think so. I think they requested that I drop that from the record.

C13: Do you think in these less prudent times that it could come out?

BD: (Laughs) Yeah. It probably could now.

C13: Well, you gonna shoot for it, maybe?

BC: (Laughs) Definite ulterior motive there. Fire off a letter to the record company and see what you can get going there, Ken.

BD: They have the rights to that. They could release it.

C13: Well, you know, I'll bet you'll have a little more push in the matter than I would.

BC: You might have a point there. Thank you for the call Ken. We appreciate it. It's Jim's turn. He's in Toronto. Hi Jim.

C14: Oh hi. First of all I've got to say that this is like talking on heaven's line. You're it to me. You're the end all. I guess what I want to ask you about is, is creative desire in general. But, to pose it, I'm an artist and I'm just starting out, and I want to know how you think your music has changed from the beginning when you had to give in to some kind of commercial ideas, compared to now where basically you're set and you can record whatever you want. Has that affected you?

BD: Well, I've just about all the time recorded whatever I want, erm, you know, but my music, my musicianship, is so limited that I just work within that round. I stay pretty much to that so I can do most anything I wanna do within that small framework.

C14: It hasn't really ever changed then, from when you first started out?

BD: No, I don't think so.

C13: The other thing I wanted to ask you, and I've read an awful lot about you, and I've also read about other artists in general because I am an artist – a painter. Er, you don't seem to have gone through, at least to my knowledge, any kind of really trying times that most of the other artists have – that have reached the kind of heights and success that you have. I'm talking artistically not commercially. Is there anything I'm missing? Is there anything that sort of changed your direction in life, that made you, you know, gave you the creative desire that made you so prolific?

BD: No, I can't say what it is you know. A lot of times I even think about stopping. But sometimes it just keeps coming so, so long as it does, I just keep bringing it out.

BC: Yeah, don't stop please. Jim's hit on a really good point, in that in the early days you sounded like you had been around and really paid the dues, but were only eighteen years old, back in the early days when you left Minnesota and went to New York. You don't know what you had? That explains it all. Bob Dylan says, if you want somebody you can trust, Trust Yourself.

Trust Yourself plays

BC: A couple of Heartbreakers on that song, Mike Campbell and Benmont Tench. Bob Dylan's Trust Yourself from Empire Burlesque. Our calls are toll-free in the U.S. and Canada... Still plenty more time for you to talk to Bob Dylan tonight on Rockline. I'm Bob Coburn. Marie called from Pittsburg. Hi.

C15: Hi, first I'd like to wish you a happy birthday, a little belated.

BD: Well, thank you.

C15: I was wondering, are you going to do any more movies, you know, like Dont Look Back or Pat Garrett, or that?

BD: Oh, I sure hope so (laughs).

BC: A little tongue in cheek there. Do you seriously have any plans for doing anything, or are you going to avoid that?

BD: Well, somebody sent me a script the other day. I don't know what makes them think I could to it, but it's a fairly interesting script.

BC: Ha, so don't rule that out. Thanks for the call Maria. Well talk to Brian now. He's in Warren, Ohio. You're on the show Brian.

C16: Hi, how you doing Bob?

BD: I'm doing alright.

C16: I notice you've been touring a lot in Europe, or have you been and, er... what do you like better, the European audiences or the American, and why?

BD: Well, mostly they're all the same. Sometimes you feel, like, you know, in a foreign country – you wonder how people can understand what you're saying. But it seems like they can. But, you know, I guess, maybe it's when you go over to Europe and play, I mean you've gone so far to do it, maybe people appreciate it differently.

BC: But there's really no discernible difference, you know, the crowds are the crowds.

BD: Well, yeah, it's just whether you're playing in an indoor arena or outdoors. There's difference in those kind of different kinda places you play. There's a different kind of vibe in the air.

BC: We're gonna play another song right now from Empire Burlesque. This one is a bit lengthy but we definitely wanted to get this on tonight. This is a song that's a tour de force from the latest LP Empire Burlesque – Bob Dylan on Rockline: When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky.

When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky plays.

BC: When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky is the name of that song. Bob Dylan, reunited with Al Kooper who worked on so many of the earlier Bob Dylan LP's. Nice to hear him back in the fold again, so to speak. That's from Empire Burlesque. We'll take a brief time out and return with more, with Bob Dylan on Rockline... It's a very special evening with Bob Dylan tonight on Rockline. I'm Bob Coburn. We're back on the phone lines, a call from Virginia, we have Tommy on the line. Tommy, you're on the air.

C17: Er, yeah, Mr Dylan, let me first start by saying that I really enjoy your music, and er, your music is very deep and prophetic, very much like the late John Lennon. And I was just wondering what inspired you to write the song Like A Rolling Stone.

Pause.

BC: Do you remember the inspiration for that?
BD: Well, it was just a riff really. It was like the, you know, the La Bamba riff. I just...
BC: You mean Richie Valens.
BD: Yeah. I was just fooling with that I think.
BC: What were you going to say there Tommy?
C17: I was thinking, was there any significance to the time period or anything? Did it tell a story?
BD: Well, yeah, you know. It was so long ago I can't really remember the inspiration for it, but...
C17: OK. I really appreciate talking to you. It's been a great honor.
BC: Thanks for the call Tommy. You know it's hard to say what a song means because it means what it means to the person that hears it. You know, that's the beauty... that's called art.
BD: Yeah, it means what it means.
BC: Yeah. Let's talk to David. He's in Sierra Madre... David how are you tonight?
C18: I'm pretty good. Me and my buddy Pete would like to wish you a late happy birthday there. And, I was wondering, are you ever going to release the soundtrack to the movie Renaldo and Clara?
BD: I think that is released. Well, maybe four songs from it. But that's a good idea. I'd like to release that, but I don't know, you know, the record company usually have their own idea what they like to release and what they don't.
C18: Well, I watched the four hour version a couple of times.
(Dylan laughs)
and I wonder, was there any kind of particular meaning behind that movie: I never really caught it. I just went to see the music, you know.
BD: Well, there was, but it's hard to put it into words. I can't think I put it into one line.
C18: You probably can't explain it in the time that we've got.
BD: No.
BC: Well, thanks David; nice talking to you. OK Bob, we'll talk to George now in Detroit. George, meet Bob Dylan.
C19: Hi Bob, how you doing?
BD: I'm doing alright.
C19: How are your kids?
BD: Fine.
C19: That's good. A guy a couple before me already asked my question about what a song means to you. I was going to ask you about a personal favorite song of mine, an old one, It's Alright, Ma (I'm Only Bleeding). I was wondering if, you know, that was the situation in the sixties that caused you to write that or if you could view that as your own personal philosophy on life?... I think that's a very strong song, when I listen to it.
BD: Well, I still do that song. It's still very relevant to me.
C19: Do you play it in concert?
BD: Yes, I do.
C19: Oh wow. I hope you come around soon to Detroit.
BD: Well, I hope I do and I hope you come.
C19: I'll be there, front row, me and all my friends. We're big fans of yours, Bob.
BC: That brings up a good point. How do you pick what you play live, out of thirty albums? Is it the closest to the heart, or new material? What do you do?
BD: Well, usually you just kind of go over the stuff that you can remember, you know, and then once in a while somebody will suggest something else, that, you know, sometime it might be, you might have to go... I've had people in my bands actually say, let's do this song, and they've taught it back to me.

BC: Really! Interesting. Boy you really do remove yourself from it when time goes by, don't you?

BD: Well, you know, there's so many songs, sometimes on the old records we used to make – I hate to think of them as what you call filler songs – but sometimes you'd do a song, just write it in five or ten minutes and do it, and not think much more of it. But it sticks in your mind after, and it sticks in other peoples minds and you think well maybe we'll play it, you know.

BC: Yeah. Let's take a Canadian call. We'll talk to Rick. He's in Kitchener. Hi Rick.

C20: Hi. How are you Bob?

BD: I'm alright.

C20: I'd just like to say that John Wesley Harding was a great album by you and that if I didn't happen to hear that song Frankie Lee and Judas Priest I probably wouldn't be calling you right now. It's a super album. Now, there's one other question I'd like to ask... In 1980 when you played Massey Hall you did four concerts in a row and they were filming it every night. I was wondering is there any sort of documentary or anything coming up on that.

BD: Hm, well, they do a lot of filming at different shows sometimes. I don't remember that...

C20: Well, we were there for four nights and I've never seen you perform so great. It was just unbelievably super fantastic as they say. And I just want to thank you. I really appreciate all you've done for the last twenty years of music, for me and other people in general.

BD: Well, thank you for saying that.

BC: Thanks Rick we appreciate it. We're gonna play a song now that... and I'm glad that you mentioned this when we first met before the program tonight Bob, because Blonde On Blonde is, I guess, my favorite Bob Dylan album. Everybody's got their own favorite. You wanted us to play Obviously Five Believers. Why? Why do you still want us to play that song?

BD: I just like it.

BC: You just like that song; here it is.

Obviously Five Believers plays.

BC: Some pretty nasty blues harmonica there Bob Dylan. Obviously Five Believers from Blonde On Blonde.

BD: That's not me though...

BC: That's not you, though? Who is it?

BD: That's Charlie McCoy.

BC: Alright, good harmonica from McCoy there; the real McCoy. We'll take a brief time out and come back with Bob Dylan on Rockline... Now it's been quite a long time since there was a song on one of Bob's albums that just features Bob, his guitar, and his harmonica. There's one on this album Empire Burlesque, it's called Dark Eyes and we'll listen to it now.

Dark Eyes plays

BC: Dark Eyes is the name of that. I listen to the words that you write and it leaves me breathless. I know that you work hard on what you write, but does it come easy to you or do you really have to sit down and force yourself?

BD: That particular song just sort of came, well, I won't say easy, but it's all in one piece like that.

BC: Amazing. Let's talk to Mike. He's in Batesville. Mike, how are you tonight?

C21: Pretty good. Bob, you're the greatest. OK my question is – Why was Carla Olson of the Textones chosen for the video of Sweetheart Like You instead of Mark Knopfler who really played on it?

BD: Well, when we did the video it was impossible to get Mark to play because he was on tour.

BC: Oh, so that answers that. You just couldn't get him. Thanks for the call Mike. We'll talk to Carl now. We're about to run out of time, so I'm gonna move it up a little bit here. Carl's in Berlin, Connecticut. Carl, you're on.

C22: Thank you. Oh Bob I was just wondering, between your first and second album you seemed to go through a transition. Obvious, you got to write only two songs on your first album and then you wrote all of them on the second album, I believe. What was the story behind that?

BD: I don't think I was writing too many songs on the first album I did. If I did, I probably didn't think they were good enough to record. Then by the second one I think I'd been writing for a longer period of time.

BC: Thanks for the call Carl. We have time for one more. It's Michael in... California. Hi Michael.

C23: Howdy. Hi Bob. Er, what have your feelings been lately on your influence on other musicians?

BD: Well, you know, I don't have any feelings about it. It's nice to, to see that but... I don't know. You don't really think about it too much. I don't.

BC: A lot of other people do though, that's for sure. I want to say to everybody, thanks for the calls tonight. We really appreciate it. There's one thing that I want to say as we wrap up. first of all thanks for being here; it's been a real thrill and a real pleasure.

BD: Oh, it's been real nice to be here.

BC: Thank you for coming. Er, the way that I look at it, rock n' roll was really influenced by three people. Three people changed the way that rock was. That's Elvis Presley, the Beatles and Bob Dylan. Thank you for being here.

August-September 1985
Cameron Crowe Interview (for Biograph)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 885-906.

Cameron Crowe's extensive series of interviews culminated in the production of the Biograph booklet which is reprinted below.

About the Biograph project, to quote Dylan,

> "There's some stuff that hasn't been heard before, but most of my stuff has already been bootlegged, so to anybody in the know, there's nothing on it they haven't heard before... All it is, really, is repackaging, and it'll just cost a lot of money. About the only thing that makes it special is Cameron's book."

The first glimpses of Bob Dylan come from friends and classmates in his hometown of Hibbing, Minnesota. Most of them had a frame of reference that didn't stretch much farther than the small, gray mid-western mining town where they lived. Young Dylan, born Robert Zimmerman on May 24th, 1941 looked mighty different around Hibbing. The explosive film Blackboard Jungle had touched his life and so had the late-night rhythm and blues stations from Chicago. When most of the other kids in Hibbing were still riding bicycles, Dylan was thinking about leather jackets and motorcycles. He hounded the local record store for the newest singles from Hank Williams, Hank Snow, Jimmy Reed, Chuck Berry, Howlin' Wolf. John Lee Hooker and others. Soon Dylan had formed his own bands, The Golden Chords, The Shadow Blasters, Elston Gunn & The Rock Boppers. When he took the stage for a high school talent show, fellow students were shocked at the slight kid who opened his mouth and came out wailing with a fully-realized Little Richard howl. He would not be long for Hibbing, Minnesota.

"My family settled in Hibbing I think in about '46 or '47. My father had polio when I was very young. There was a big epidemic. He lost his job in Duluth and we moved to the Iron Range and moved in with my grandmother Florence and my grandfather who was still alive at the time. We slept in the living room of my grandma's house for about a year or two, I slept on a roll-a-way bed, that's all I remember. Two of my uncles, my father's brothers, had gone to electrical school and by this time had gotten electrician licenses. They had moved from Duluth to up here where they operated out of a store called Micka Electric, wiring homes and things... my father never walked right again and suffered much pain his whole life. I never understood this until much later but it must have been hard for him because before that he'd been a very active and physical type guy. Anyway, the brothers took him in as a partner, my uncle Paul and my uncle Maurice, and this is where he worked for the rest of his life. Later, they bought the store and started selling lamps, clocks, radios anything electrical and then much later TV's and furniture. They still did wiring though and that was their main thing. I worked on the truck sometimes but it was never meant for me. This was not a rich or poor town, everybody had pretty much the same thing and the very wealthy people didn't live there, they were the ones that owned the mines and they lived thousands of miles away:"

"I always wanted to be a guitar player and a singer." Bob Dylan said recently on a break from sessions for a new album. "Since I was ten, eleven or twelve, it was all that interested me. That was the only thing that I did that meant anything really. Henrietta was the first rock n' roll record I heard. Before that I'd listen to Hank Williams a lot. Before that, Johnny Ray. He was the first singer whose voice and style, I guess, I totally fell in love with. There was just something about the way he sang When Your Sweetheart Sends A Letter... that just knocked me out. I loved his style, wanted to dress like him too, that was real early though. I ran into him in the elevator in Sydney, Australia late in '78 and told him how he impressed me so when I was growing up... I still have a few of his records."

After high school graduation in 1959, Dylan traveled first to the Minneapolis/St. Paul area. He enrolled in classes at the University of Minnesota but ended spending more time in the nearby Bohemian district known as Dinkytown, where he played in a coffee house, The Ten O'Clock Scholar. Dylan was taken in by the artistic community and it was there that he first became acquainted in the rural folk-music of artists like Big Bill Broonzy, Leadbelly, Roscoe Holcomb, and the great Woody Guthrie. "By that time, I was singing stuff like Ruby Lee by the Sunny Mountain Boys, and Jack O'Diamonds by Odetta and somehow because of my earlier rock n' roll background was unconsciously crossing the two styles. This made me different from your regular folk singers, who were either folk song purists or concert-hall singers, who just happened to be singing folk songs. I'd played by myself with just a guitar and harmonica or as part of a duo with Spider John Koerner, who played mostly ballads and Josh White type blues. He knew more songs than I did. Whoa Boys Can't Ya Line 'M, John Hardy, Golden Vanity, I learned all those from him. We sounded great, not unlike the Delmore Brothers. I could always hear my voice sounding better as a harmony singer. In New York, I worked off and on with Mark Spoelstra and later with Jim Kweskin. Jim and I sounded pretty similar to Cisco and Woody."

"Minneapolis was the first big city I lived in if you want to call it that," remembered Dylan. "I came out of the wilderness and just naturally fell in with the beat scene, the Bohemian, BeBop crowd, it was all pretty much connected... St. Louis, Kansas City, you usually went from town to town and found the same setup in all these places, people comin' and goin', nobody with any place special to live. You always ran into people you knew from the last place. I had already decided that society, as it was, was pretty phony and I didn't want to be part of that... also, there was a lot of unrest in the country. You could feel it, a lot of frustration, sort of like a calm before a hurricane, things were shaking up. Where I was at, people just passed through, really, carrying horns, guitars, suitcases, whatever, just like the stories you hear, free love, wine, poetry, nobody had any money anyway. There were a lot of poets and painters, drifters, scholarly types, experts at one thing or another who had dropped out of the regular nine-to-five life, there were a lot of house parties most of the time. They were usually in lofts or warehouses or something or sometimes in the park, in the alley wherever there was space. It was always crowded, no place to stand or breathe. There were always a lot of poems recited – 'Into the room people come and go talking of Michelangelo, measuring their lives in coffee spoons'... 'What I'd like to know is what do you think of your blue-eyed boy now, Mr. Death. T.S. Eliot, e.e. cummings. It was sort of like that and it kind of woke me up... Suzie Rotolo, a girlfriend of mine in New York, later turned me on to all the French poets but for then it was Jack Kerouac, Ginsberg, Corso and Ferlinghetti – Gasoline, Coney Island of the Mind... oh man, it was wild – I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness that said more to me than any of the stuff I'd been raised on. On The Road, Dean Moriarty, this made perfect sense to me... anyway the whole scene was an unforgettable one, guys and girls some of whom reminded me of saints, some people had odd jobs – bus boy, bartender, exterminator, stuff like that but I don't think working was on most people's minds – just to make enough to eat, you know. Most of everybody, anyway, you had the feeling that they'd just been kicked out of something. It was outside, there was no formula, never was 'main stream' or 'the thing to do' in any sense. America was still very 'straight', 'post-war' and sort of into a gray-flannel suit thing, McCarthy, commies, puritanical, very claustrophobic and what ever was happening of any real value was happening away from that and sort of hidden from view and it would be years before the media would be able to recognise it, and choke-hold it and reduce it to silliness. Anyway, I got in at the tail-end of that and it was magic... everyday was like Sunday, it's like it was waiting for me, it had just as big an impact on me as Elvis Presley, Pound, Camus, T. S. Eliot, e. e. cummings, mostly expatriate Americans who were off in Paris and Tangiers. Burroughs, Nova Express, John Rechy, Gary Snyder, Ferlinghetti, Pictures From The Gone World, the newer poets and folk music, jazz, Monk, Coltrane, Sonny and Brownie, Big Bill Broonzy, Charlie Christian... it all left the rest of everything in the dust... I there knew I had to get to New York though, I'd been dreaming about that for a long time."

Dylan mapped out his strategy. Then performing as a solo guitarist and singer, he was playing at a St. Paul local coffee house and pizza parlor called The Purple Onion. The Purple Onion was located next to the main highway heading out of town. It was owned by Bill Danialson, who took a liking to Dylan and occasionally allowed him to sleep in the back room. It was a particularly heavy winter in the Midwest and Dylan's plan was to play at the club until the snow subsided enough for him to hitch-hike East. It never happened.

Recalled Dylan, "I just got up one morning and left. I'd spent so much time thinking about it I couldn't think anymore. Snow or no snow, it was time for me to go. I made a lot of friends and I guess some enemies too, but I had to overlook it all. I'd learned as much as I could and used up all of my options. It all got real old real fast. When I arrived in Minneapolis it had seemed like a big city or a big town. When I left it was like some rural outpost that you see once from a passing train. I stood on the highway during a blizzard snowstorm believing in the mercy of the world and headed East, didn't have nothing but my guitar and suitcase. That was my whole world. The first ride I got, you know, was from some old guy in a jalopy, sort of a Bela Lugosi type, who carried me into Wisconsin. Of all the rides I've ever gotten it's the only one that stands out in my mind. People hitch-hiked a lot back then, they rode the bus or they stuck out their thumb and hitchhiked. It was real natural. I wouldn't do that today. People aren't as friendly and there's too many drugs on the road."

It would be several months before Dylan actually arrived in New York. He stopped first in Madison, Wisconsin and fell in with the folk and blues community there. Then he moved on to Chicago, where he had some phone numbers to try and ended up staying there for a couple of months. Eventually Dylan got a ride to New York with a couple college kids. "They needed two people to help drive to New York and that's how I left. Me and a guy named Fred Underhill went with them. Fred was from Williamstown or somewhere and he knew New York."

Dylan and Underhill were dropped off on the New York side of the George Washington Bridge and immediately took a subway to Greenwich Village. It was the worst New York Winter in 60 years and the snow was knee-deep. "Where I came from there was always plenty of snow so I was used to that," said Dylan, "but going to New York was like going to the moon. You just didn't get on a plane and go there, you know. New York! Ed Sullivan, the New York Yankees, Broadway, Harlem... you might as well have been talking about China. It was some place which not too many people had ever gone, and anybody who did go never came back."

The frail-looking Dylan was a voracious learner. Once in New York, he was at the center of all the action. It was chance to actually see and sometimes meet the artists he'd come to admire, including Woody Guthrie. Dylan listened to everybody and took it all in. "I was lucky to meet Lonnie Johnson at the same club I was working and I must say he greatly influenced me. You can hear it in that first record, I mean Corrina, Corrina... that's pretty much Lonnie Johnson. I used to watch him every chance I got and sometimes he'd let me play with him. I think he and Tampa Red and of course Scrapper Blackwell, that's my favorite style of guitar playing... the harmonica part, well I'd always liked Wayne Raney and Jimmy Reed, Sonny Terry... 'Lil Junior Parker, 'told you baby, bam bam bam bam, once upon a time, bam bam bam bam, if I'd be yours, bam bam bam bam (foottap) li'l girl you'd be mine... but that's all right... I know you love some other man'... but I couldn't get it in the rack like that or adjust the equipment to an amplified slow pace so I took to blowing out... actually Woody had done it... I had to do it that way to be heard on the street, you, now, above the noise... like an accordion... Victoria Spivey, too, oh man, I loved her... I learned so much from her I could never put into words," Dylan soon developed a style that would synthesise many different folk influences. At the time it was a bold move. Even the stodgiest standards sounded different Dylan's way. Some purists didn't appreciate the irreverence. "I could sing How High The Moon or If I Gave My Heart To You and it would come out like Mule-Skinner Blues."

"There was just a clique, you know," said Dylan, "Folk music was a strict and rigid establishment. If you sang Southern Mountain Blues, you didn't sing Southern Mountain Ballads and you didn't sing City Blues. If you sang Texas Cowboy songs, you didn't play English ballads. It was really pathetic. You just didn't If you sang folk songs from the thirties, you didn't do bluegrass tunes or Appalachian Ballads. It was very strict. Everybody had their particular thing that they did. I didn't much ever pay attention to that. If I liked a song, I would just learn it and sing it the only way I could play it. Part of it was a technical problem which I never had the time nor the inclination for, if you want to call it a problem. But it didn't go down well with the tight-thinking people. You know, I'd hear things like 'I was in the Lincoln Brigade' and 'the kid is really bastardising up that song'. The other singers never seemed to mind, although. In fact, quite a few of them began to copy my attitude in guitar phrasing and such."

Performing first at Village clubs like the Gas Light, The Commons, Café Rienzi and later Gerde's Folk City, Dylan had a quirky stage presence, equal parts humor and intensity. He also took several jobs as a guitarist or harmonica player. One session was a record date with noted folk artist Carolyn Hester. Rehearsing for the Hester session at the house of a friend, Dylan first met the distinguished Columbia Records producer and talent-scout John Hammond (Aretha Franklin, Bessie Smith, Billie Holiday and later Bruce Springsteen). Hammond kept young Dylan in mind.

Dylan was soon to receive one of the most important reviews of his life, possibly the last one that meant as much. Noted New York Times folk critic Robert Shelton had raved about Dylan's shows at Gerde's Folk City, in an unprecedented review, for Dylan was merely the opening act and not the main headliner ("... there is no doubt he is bursting at the seams with talent") Nineteen year old Dylan read and re-read the review, showing it to friends and re-reading it again. By the next morning, Dylan was fresh and ready for his Hester session. The crinkled review was still in his hand. It was only the second time he's worked in a major studio, the first being a short stint on harmonica for a Harry Belafonte record earlier that summer. Hammond signed Dylan that afternoon.

"I couldn't believe it", said Dylan. "I left there and I remember walking out of the studio. I was like on a cloud. It was up on 7th Avenue and when I left I was happening to be walking by a record store. It was one of the most thrilling moments in my life. I couldn't believe that I was staring at all the records in the window, Frankie Lane, Frank Sinatra, Patty Page, Mitch Miller, Tony Bennet and so on and so on. I, myself, would be among them in the window. I guess I was pretty naive, you know. It was even before I made a record, just knowing that I was going to make one and it was going to be in that window. I wanted to go in there dressed in the rags like I was and tell the owner, 'you don't know me now, but you will'. It never occurred to me that it could have been otherwise. I didn't know that just because you make a record it has to be displayed in a window next to Frank Sinatra, let alone they have to carry it in the store. John Hammond recorded me soon after that."

Dylan's first album was recorded in a matter of hours. The session was over when they ran out of tape and Hammond estimated the entire cost at $402. These were, indeed, the good old days. All of the material was recorded and it's important to note that Dylan would maintain that spirit of studio spontaneity for the next twenty years. Most of the music included in this collection was recorded in two or three takes.

"You didn't get a lot of studio time then," he said, "Six months to make a record... It wasn't even conceivable. My early records, all the way up to the late seventies, were done in periods of hours. Days, maybe. Since the late sixties, maybe since Sgt Pepper on, everybody started to spend more of their time in the studio, actually making songs up and building them in the studio. I've done a little bit of that but I'd rather have some kind of song before I get there. It just seems to work out better that way."

Much was made in subsequent years of the fact that Dylan had only one of his compositions (Song To Woody) on that album, "I just took in what I had," he explained, "I tried a bunch of stuff and John Hammond would say, 'Well, let's use this one' and I'd sing that one and he'd say. 'Let's use that one'. I must have played a whole lot of songs. He kept what he kept, you know. He didn't ask me what I wrote and what I didn't write. I was only doing a few of my own songs back then, anyway. You didn't really do too many of your own songs back then. And if you did... you'd just try to sneak them in. The first bunch of songs I wrote, I never would say I wrote them. It was just something you didn't do."

The first album was released just before Dylan's 21st birthday, and it sold an unremarkable 5,000 copies. While the executives fretted over whether their "rising young star" was still a sound investment, Dylan was taking large steps in finding his songwriting voice. His live show strengthened and deepened as he added more of his own material. He was able to take an audience from laughter to thoughtful silence in a handful of sharply chosen words. Dylan's second album featured Dylan compositions and it was a success.

Along with the applause, remained the traditionalist doubters, as always. Blowin' In The Wind, first published in Broadside Magazine in 1962, did much to silence the opposition. It was an indisputably strong song, simple and timeless from the first listening. It would become the fastest selling single in Warner Brothers history in the hands of Peter, Paul and Mary, and the first to bring a new social awareness to the pop charts. To this day it's Dylan's most covered composition, from Bobby Darin' to Marlene Dietrich. When folk music found it's largest audience it was because of this song.

The songs that followed during this period stung and inspired and often took their stories directly from newspaper or word of mouth accounts. The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll was the actual story of a Baltimore maid mistakenly murdered by a drunken socialite. The socialite escaped with a six-month sentence. Dylan wrote of the brutal injustice with a masterful touch, never did it approach the heavy-handed. It was exactly this delicate quality that made Dylan's social commentary so original and his imitators so obvious.

"When I started writing those kinds of songs, there wasn't anybody doing things like that," said Dylan. "Woody Guthrie had done similar things but he hadn't really done that type of song. Besides, I had learned from Woody Guthrie and knew and could sing anything he had done. But now the times had changed and things would be different. He contributed a lot to my style lyrically and dynamically but my musical background had been different, with rock n' roll and rhythm and blues playing a big part earlier on. Actually attitude had more to do with it than technical ability and that's what the folk movement lacked. In other words, I played all the folk songs with a rock 'n' roll attitude. This is what made me different and allowed me to cut through all the mess and be heard. People with no definition of feeling and that sort of thing, and there were too many of them... I remember when protest song writing was big, Phil Ochs came to town, Tim Hardin was around, Patrick Sky, Buffy St. Marie, but there never was any such thing. It was like the term 'Beatnik' or 'Hippie'. These were terms made up by magazine people who are invisible who like to put a label on something to cheapen it. Then it can be controlled better by other people who are also invisible. Nobody ever said, 'Well, here's another protest song I'm going to sing.'... Anyway, the guy who was best at that was Peter LaFarge. He was a champion rodeo cowboy and some time back he'd also been a boxer. He had a lot of his bones broken. I think he'd also been shot up in Korea. Anyway, he wrote Ira Hayes, Iron Mountain, Johnny Half-Breed, White Girl and about a hundred other things. There was one about Custer, 'the general he don't ride well anymore'. We were pretty tight for a while. We had the same girlfriend. Actually, Peter is one of the great unsung heros of the day. His style was just a little bit too erratic. But it wasn't his fault, he was always hurting and having to overcome it. Johnny Cash recorded a bunch of his songs. When I think of a guitar poet or protest singer, I always think of Peter, but he was a love song writer too."

His work made a subtle, if pointed shift with Another Side of Bob Dylan. "Tom Wilson, the producer, titled it that," noted Dylan. "I begged and pleaded with him not to do it. You know, I thought it was overstating the obvious. I knew I was going to have to take a lot of heat for a title like that and it was my feeling that it wasn't a good idea coming after The Times They Are A- Changin', it just wasn't right. It seemed like a negation of the past which in no way was true. I know that Tom didn't mean it that way, but that's what I figured that people would take it to mean, but Tom meant well and he had control, so he had it his way. I guess in the long run, he might have been right to do what he did. It doesn't matter now."

Wilson recalled at the time, "I didn't even particularly like folk music. I'd been recording Sun Ra and Coltrane and I thought folk music was for the dumb guys. This guy played like the dumb guys but then these words came out. I was flabbergasted. I said to Albert Grossman, who was there in the studio, I said, 'if you put some background to this, you might have a white Ray Charles with a message.' But it wasn't until a year later that everyone agreed that we should put a band behind him. I had to find a band. But it was a very gradual process." Wilson takes the credit for Dylan going electric. "It came from me."

The album, recorded in two nights, proved that Dylan was never simply a revolutionary or even a political singer in the conventional sense. These were songs about the politics of love. Throughout all the styles, periods and influences of his work, one of Dylan's only constants has been the love song. At composing them there are few as talented. He's approached the subject from all sides, from It Ain't Me, Babe and To Ramona to Lay Lady Lay and Sweetheart Like You.

So strong was Dylan's impact on the folk stages of America in the early sixties that when he chose to move back to his original high school roots in rock and roll, even to dress differently, there was an almost immediate uproar. For some time press conferences, articles and interviews were filled with pointed questions like, "Does it take a lot of trouble to get your hair like that?" "How do you feel about selling out?" and "How many folk singers are there now?" (Dylan's chain-smoking replies were, "No, you just have to sleep on it for about twenty years", "I don't feel guilt", and "136" respectively). Asked about his music, he said, "It's mathematical... I use words like most people use numbers. That's about the best I can do."

The songs were, as he once said, about objection, obsession or rejection. They had also begun to cry out for instrumentation. While touring England, Dylan had met and heard the new wave of English pop bands, from The Beatles to The Animals, The Pretty Things, Manfred Mann, The Stones, The Who. By January, Dylan was recording his breakthrough Bringing It All Back Home album. Half the album would feature a hard-edged rock and blues backing, the other half form-bending solo acoustic music. The Byrds own electrified hit version of Mr. Tambourine Man, taken from a Dylan demo tape, had become a single. Dylan was reaching a level of popularity beyond even his own expectations. But there were still many folk purists in Dylan's audience and all signs were pointing to a showdown.

It would come in the Summer of 1965, at the Newport Folk Festival. Never one for complacency, Dylan had shown up at the folk music capital of the world in a black leather jacket, plugged in his Fender electric and began the prestigious Sunday night showcase performance (the bill included Pete Seeger, and Peter, Paul and Mary) with an earsplitting Maggie's Farm. Dylan, fresh from having recorded Like A Rolling Stone, blasted through the set with a vengeance. The reaction, by most accounts, was somewhat less than generous. The purists booed.

"I didn't really know what was going to happen," Dylan shrugged at a San Francisco press conference in December '65. "They certainly booed, I'll tell you that. You could hear it all over the place. I don't know who they were... they've done it just about all over... I mean, they must be pretty rich to go some place and boo. I mean, I couldn't afford it if I was in their shoes."

Typically, the controversy fuelled one of Dylan's most famous periods. At this point he was writing whole batches of songs in long, all-night sessions – in coffee houses, homes of friends, on napkins and tablecloths. Dylan was firing on all cylinders. The prolific artist was even coming in with songs he'd written on the way to the studio. Within minutes they became records with only one criteria – feel. A story from Al Kooper's fine book Backstage Passes helps recall the atmosphere. Then-guitarist Kooper, an early Dylan fan, had wandered into the empty studio where a session was due to begin. He asked producer Tom Wilson for a spot in the band and Wilson advised Kooper to be there, guitar in hand, when Dylan arrived. Dylan soon appeared with guitarist Michael Bloomfield in tow and Kooper was casually switched to organ. Kooper did not play organ, but the musician kept quiet and improvised when Dylan counted off his newest song, Like A Rolling Stone. After the take, Wilson objected to the organ playing. Dylan asked that it be turned up. The next take, released five days later, bumped off The Beatles Help to become Dylan's first number-one single. At almost six minutes, it was then the longest hit in history.

Country artist Johnny Tillotson stopped Dylan in the street to tell him Like A Rolling Stone had gone to number one. Dylan was amazed. It was less than five years from the day he'd stared in the window of the record store on 7th Avenue and the weight of that fact didn't escape him.

Perhaps only Elvis Presley before him had been able to stir up public emotions and at the same time redefine popular music. Before Dylan, Chuck Berry had been one of the only popular artists to sing his own songs. After Dylan, singer-songwriters were no longer akin to ambidexterity – interesting, but not necessary. "I didn't know it at the time but all the radio songs were written in Tin-Pan-Alley, the Brill Building," Dylan recalled. "They had stables of songwriters up there that provided songs for artists. I heard of it but not paid much attention. They were good song writers but the world they knew and the world I knew were totally different. Most of all the songs, though, being recorded came from there, I guess because most singers didn't write there own. They didn't even think about it Anyway, Tin-Pan-Alley is gone. I put an end to it. People can record their own songs now. They're almost expected to do it. The funny thing about it though is that I didn't start out as a songwriter, I just drifted into it. Those other people had it down to a science."

Dylan's concerts in the mid sixties grew to be strange and mysterious affairs. With Mike Bloomfield off touring as part of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band. Dylan had settled on a new band featuring drummer Levon Helm and a stunning new blues-and-rock guitarist, Jamie (Robbie) Robertson. (Called Levon and The Hawks, the group would years later rename themselves and go on to their own success as The Band). Dylan himself was exploring the inner-limits of his songwriting ability and the outer limits of his stage presence. The result was an amazing series of performances in 1965 and 1966.

Dylan onstage and the tumultuous '66 tour of the British Isles are well documented in this collection. Following wrestlers and carnivals into halls where rock had never been before (or since), every stop was another drama. Another show on the same tour was released in underground circles as The Royal Albert Hall Concert and it's still a cherished recording. The show actually took place in Manchester but an amazing bit of audience-and-artist dialogue (Audience member: "Judas!" Dylan: "I don't believe you... you're a liar.") was taken from the Albert Hall concert days later. These concerts with Bob Dylan and The Band are now thought to be highlights in rock history but they booed at the time.

Remembers Robbie Robertson today, "That tour was a very strange process. You can hear the violence, and the dynamics of the music. We'd go from town to town, from country to country and it was like a job. We set up, we played, they booed and threw things at us. Then we went to the next town, played, they booed, threw things, and we left again. I remember thinking, 'This is a strange way to make a buck.'"

"I give tremendous credit to Bob in that everybody at the time said, 'Get rid of these guys they're terrible': They said it behind our backs, and they said it with the group standing right there. Dylan never did anything about it. He never once came to me and said, 'Robbie, this is not working...' The only reason tapes of those shows exist today is because we wanted to know, 'Are we crazy?' We'd go back to the hotel room, listen to a tape of the show and think, 'Shit. That's not bad. Why is everybody so upset?'"

(It's an interesting footnote to music history that along an early English tour, Dylan would visit the home of John Lennon and the two would pen a song together. "I don't remember what it was, though," said Dylan. "We played some stuff into a tape recorder but I don't know what happened to it. I can remember playing it and the recorder was on. I don't remember anything about the song.")

Lennon would later comment on their relationship. "I've grown up enough to communicate with him... Both of us were always uptight, you know, and of course I wouldn't know whether he was uptight because I was so uptight, and then when he wasn't uptight, I was -all that bit. But we just sat it out because we just liked being together."

Back in the States, Dylan had reached household name status. Not only was he an unlikely hit-singles artist, Bob Dylan was now a culture hero and a conversation piece. He was a genius. He was a sellout. He was a poet, he wasn't a poet. He was straight. He had to be on something. It's conceivable that the artist himself never scheduled a moment to reflect on all the commotion. He continued writing and touring, even while recording Blonde on Blonde in Nashville. It has remained as one of the most artful albums in modern music, and one that came closest to Dylan's truest musical intentions. He told Ron Rosenbaum in a '78 Playboy interview, "It's that thin, that wild mercury sound. It's metallic and bright gold, with whatever that conjures up. That's my sound. I haven't been able to succeed in getting it all the time."

Those present for the Blonde on Blonde sessions remember it as an unlikely setting for greatness. Compared to the circus-quality of the live shows, this was a twilight zone of complacency. While struggling songwriter and then-janitor Kris Kristofferson cleaned the ashtrays, Dylan recorded with a band that was made up of traditional Nashville studio musicians and several New York favorites like Robertson and Kooper. "Blonde on Blonde was very different from what we were doing out on the road," said Robertson. "This was a very controlled atmosphere. I remember the Nashville studio musicians playing a lot of card games. Dylan would finish a song, we would cut the song and then they'd go back to cards. They basically did their routine, and it sounded beautiful. Some songs pushed it somewhere else, like Obviously Five Believers where we had four screaming guitar solos."

"The sessions happened late at night," recalled Kooper. "The afternoons were mostly for songwriting." Dylan sometimes worked on his hotel piano, other times at a studio typewriter. Songs like Visions Of Johanna (original title: Seems Like A Freeze-Out) and Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands would make it to acetate stage and Dylan would often take the discs with him on the road to play for others. "How does this sound to you?" he would ask. "Have you ever heard anything like this before?" Usually they hadn't.

Dylan's singing – once the quality Woody Guthrie liked best about him – had also gotten more expressive. Part rocker, part wounded romantic, part cynic and part believer, he had learned to make records now, and the rush was felt on radios all over the world. Like A Rolling Stone, Positively 4th Street and I Want You were classic singles as well as songs. John Lennon said in a Rolling Stone interview in 1970, "You don't have to hear what Bob Dylan's saying, you just have to hear the way he says it."

More than a few artists, from Bruce Springsteen to David Bowie, have been saddled with the phrase "the new Bob Dylan" at one time or another in their careers. But for Dylan himself, there weren't many examples to look at. As his momentum doubled and redoubled, the still somewhat frail Dylan charged forward. He amped and pushed himself to the limits of personal stamina. He worked constantly, rarely ate, rarely stopped. Like James Dean before him, Dylan left behind a wake of peers who stood in awe of his talent and in fear for his safety and health.

Late in July of 1966, their worst fears nearly came true. While joyriding in Woodstock, the back wheel locked on Dylans Triumph 500. He was thrown from the seat and drilled into the pavement, suffering a concussion, a number of facial cuts and several broken vertebrae in his neck. It could have been much worse. Amid macabre Deanish reports that he was either dead, paralyzed, cryogenically frozen or retired, Dylan quietly recuperated for several months. It was much-needed time to regroup but long after the wounds healed, he would still be working to regain his personal equilibrium.

While Dylan laid low at his then-home in upstate New York, The Band was recording at the nearby basement tape studio they had dubbed Big Pink. Dylan was writing a wide range of new songs and the idea was to record them at a leisurely pace, possibly as demos for other artists. The sessions stretched through several months of the down-time, and over the period Dylan and The Band recorded a large group of songs that ran from the seminal I Shall Be Released to the jaunty story-telling of Million Dollar Bash, to a number of songs too bawdy to even record. There new characters, new rhythms... and when what Robertson called "a tape of a tape of a tape of a dub of a tape" slipped out, the world soon had it's first bootleg album. This, of course, didn't much please the victims of the theft. Even though the mood of The Basement Tapes, as they were called, was forbidden and exciting, (Neil Young for years kept a mastertape copy and played it during the breaks in his own sessions often) the songs stayed on the shelf until 1975.

"The bootleg records," Dylan commented, "those are outrageous. I mean, they have stuff you do in a phone booth. Like, nobody's around. If you're just sitting and strumming in a motel, you don't think anybody's there, you know... it's like the phone is tapped... and then it appears on a bootleg record. With a cover that's got a picture of you that was taken from underneath your bed and it's got a striptease type title and it cost $30. Amazing. Then you wonder why most artists feel so paranoid."

It would be a while before Dylan officially re-emerged on record with a quietly thoughtful Nashville album called John Wesley Harding. In his recuperation period, he had watched his own influence take rock in an explosive new direction. Rock was more topical and meaningful, the form had been stretched and now studio techniques were changing too. The Beatles released Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band, The Rolling Stones answered with Satanic Majesties and now the pop world was waiting on Dylan. Dylan was waiting on Dylan, too. Did he feel confident about meeting the challenge?

"Not really," he smiled, "I didn't know the studio like those guys did. They had obviously spent a lot of hours in the studio figuring that stuff out and I hadn't. And not only hadn't I, but I didn't really care to and I'd lost my (studio) contacts at that point. I'd been out of commission for a while. All I had were those songs that I'd just sort of scribbled down."

"We recorded that album, and I didn't know what to make of it. Lots of times people will get excited and they say, 'this is great, this is fantastic.' But usually they're full of shit. They're just trying to tell you something to make you feel good. People have a way of telling you what they think you want to hear – anytime I don't know something and I ask somebody, I usually know less about it after I ask than before. You've got to know or you don't know and I really didn't know about that album at all. So I figured the best thing to do would be to put it out as quickly as possible, call it John Wesley Harding because that was one song that I had no idea what it was about, why it was even on the album. I figured I'd call the album that, call attention to it, make it something special... the spelling on that album, I just thought that was the way he spelled his name. I asked Columbia to release it with no publicity and no hype because this was the season of hype. And my feeling was that if they put it out with no hype, there was enough interest in the album anyway, people would go out and get it. And if you hyped it, there was always that possibility that it would piss people off. They didn't spend any money advertising the album and the album just really took off. People have made a lot out of it, as if it was some sort of ink blot test or something. But it never was intended to be anything else but just a bunch of songs, really, maybe it was better 'n I thought."

Nashville Skyline continued Dylan's string of albums recorded at the CBS studio in the country music capital of the world. His voice, sweetened by a brief break from cigarettes, Dylan produced one of his biggest single hits in April of 1969. Written for the movie Midnight Cowboy, Lay Lady Lay missed the deadline for inclusion on the soundtrack. The producers used Fred Neil's Everybody's Talkin' instead. Dylan released Lay Lady Lay himself and it is that love song that became one of his longest lasting hits. "I don't know what made me sound that way. Today I don't think I could sound that way if I wanted to. Clive Davis really wanted to release that song as a single. Actually I was slightly embarrassed by it, wasn't even sure I even liked the song. He said it was a smash hit... I thought he was crazy. I was really astonished, you know, when he turned out to be right."

Dylan's next release was 1970's Self Portrait, a double album of standards and several live tracks from his concert at the Isle of Wight. Criticized as trivial at the time, now revered by critics looking for an argument, the album seemed to make a simple statement – he enjoyed singing other people's material – but it also further signaled that Bob Dylan had no responsibility toward the vocal few who still demanded to know why he stopped writing "protest songs." One man, A. J. Weberman, had even become famous for going through Dylan's garbage for "clues".

"Self Portrait," Dylan explained recently, "was a bunch of tracks that we'd done all the time I'd gone to Nashville. We did that stuff to get a (studio) sound. To open up we'd do two or three songs, just to get things right and then we'd go on and do what we were going to do. And then there was a lot of other stuff that was just on the shelf. But I was being bootlegged at the time and a lot of stuff that was worse was appearing on bootleg records. So I just figured I'd put all this stuff together and put it out, my own bootleg record, so to speak. You know, if it actually had been a bootleg record, people probably would have sneaked around to buy it and played it for each other secretly. Also I wasn't going to be anybody's puppet and I figured this record would put an end to that... I was just so fed up with all that who people thought I was nonsense."

It would be his last work of the sixties, a decade that Dylan had largely spent in a spin-cycle of touring and recording. He had become a part of everybody else's sixties experience but did he feel like he'd had one of his own?

"I never looked at it that way," answered Dylan. "I didn't even consider it being the sixties. People who were in it, it never occurred to anybody that we were living in the sixties. It was too much like a pressure cooker. There wasn't any time to sit around and think about it. Not like what we're living now is the eighties where everybody says, 'These are the eighties and ain't it great.' In the sixties they didn't say that. Nobody wanted to say that. There were a lot of people who jumped on the bandwagon who didn't know it existed before. As far as I know, they're the only ones who made a big deal about it. People like to think of themselves as being important when they write about things that are important. But for people who were active, it didn't matter. It could have been the twenties. Nobody really figured it out until the late sixties that something happened. I remember Joe Strummer said that when he first heard my records, I'd already been there and gone. And in a way that's kind of true. It was like a flying saucer landed... that's what the sixties were like. Everybody heard about it but only a few really saw it."

Dylan soon released New Morning, a confident album of originals. It was another critically heralded return for a man who'd never really left. He'd simply learned to work at his own pace, a pace that tended not to interfere with the raising of his family.

Dylan spent the next few years in New York, popping up only occasionally with performances like Concert for Bangladesh or a single like Watching The River Flow or George Jackson. In 1973, Kris Kristofferson talked Dylan into joining him on the Durango, Mexico set of the late Sam Peckinpah's Pat Garrett And Billy The Kid. Dylan ended up not only scoring the movie, but turning in a clever performance as Alias, sidekick to Billy the Kid. Knockin' On Heaven's Door, one of Dylan's most successful singles was released from the soundtrack album. The film featured Peckinpah's trademark violent and unpolished beauty, and the music fit it perfectly. The project seemed to signal a new period of activity. "I think he's getting ready for something," said co-star Kris Kristofferson at the time. "He sat down at the piano the other night. He had that look in his eyes...". Said Dylan, "actually, I was just one of Peckinpah's pawns. There wasn't a part for me and Sam just liked me around. I moved with my family to Durango for about three months. Rudy Wurlitzer, who was writing this thing, invented a part for me but there wasn't any dimension to it and I was very uncomfortable in this non-role. But then time started to slip away and there I was trapped deep in the heart of Mexico with some madman, ordering people around like a little king. You had to play the dummy all day. I used to think to myself, 'Well now, how would Dustin Hoffman play this?' That's why I wore glasses in that reading part. I saw him do it in Papillon. It was crazy, all these generals making you jump into hot ants, setting up turkey shoots and whatever, and drinking tequila 'til they passed out. Sam was a wonderful guy though. He was an outlaw. A real hombre. Somebody from the old school. Men like they don't make anymore. I could see why actors would do anything for him. At night when it was quiet, I would listen to the bells. It was a strange feeling, watching how this movie was made and I know it was wide and big and breathless, at least what was in Sam's mind, but it didn't come out that way. Sam himself just didn't have final control and that was the problem. I saw it in a movie house one cut away from his and I could tell that it had been chopped to pieces. Someone other than Sam had taken a knife to some valuable scenes that were in it. The music seemed to be scattered and used in every other place but the scenes in which we did it for. Except for Heaven's Door, I can't say as though I recognized anything I'd done for being in the place that I'd done it for. Why did I do it, I guess I had a fondness for Billy the Kid. In no way can I say I did it for the money. Anyway, I was too beat to take it personal. I mean, it didn't hurt but I was sleep walking most of the time and had no real reason to be there. I'd gotten my family out of New York, that was the important thing, there was a lot of pressure back there. But even so my wife got fed up almost immediately. She'd say to me, 'What the hell are we doing here?' It was not an easy question to answer."

Much in music had changed over the previous few years. Bob Dylan could now look around to see a world of rock megatours, chartered 747's, mega-platinum artists, rockers on the cover of world news magazines and more. Dylan, who first left Minnesota at a time when rock and roll was still a forbidden entity, was about to venture back at a time when it had become the biggest business.

In 1974 he reunited with The Band and began recording a batch of new songs in Los Angeles. First titled Ceremonies of the Horseman and later re-titled Planet Waves, the album (and the first single, On A Night Like This) set the tone for a high-spirited return. Dylan's first coast-to-coast US tour was announced. The seats sold out in hours but the event brought on board a number of new questions. What would Dylan be like? Could he match the intensity of his early days in huge arenas? Would he mean as much?

The questions were dispensed with in short order. Dylan appeared at full strength, with an adrenalin charged voice and powerful backing from The Band. The concerts were cheered like victory parties. Remembers Robbie Robertson, "We were hoping to do an extremely different kind of show. But we rehearsed and eventually settled on a show that wasn't dissimilar from our last tours (in '65-'66). But this time when we played, everybody loved us. I don't know if we needed it but it was a kind of a relief."

All the while, Dylan had some problems with myth-making proportions of the tour. "I think I was just playing a role on that tour," he said. "I was playing Bob Dylan and the Band was playing The Band. It was all sort of mindless. The people that came out to see us came mostly to see what they missed the first time around. It was just more of a 'legendary' kind of thing. They've heard about it, they'd bought the records, whatever, but what they saw didn't give any clue to what was. What got it to that level wasn't what they saw. What they saw you could compare to early Elvis and later Elvis, really. Because it wasn't quite the same, when we needed that acceptance it wasn't there. By this time it didn't matter. Time had proven them all wrong. We were cleaning up but it was an emotionless trip."

"Rock-and-roll had become a highly extravagant enterprise. T-shirts, concert booklets, lighting shows, costume changes, glitter and glamour... it was just a big show, a big circus except there weren't any elephants, nothing really exceptional just Sound and Lights, Sound and Lights, and more Sound and Lights. That's what it had become and that's what it still is. It is like those guys who watched the H bomb explode on Bikini Island and then turn to each other and say, 'Beautiful, man, just incredibly beautiful.' That's what this whole scene had become. The only thing people talked about was energy this, energy that. The highest compliments were things like, 'Wow, lotta energy, man.' It had become absurd. The bigger and louder something was, the more energy it was supposed to have. You know, like knock me out, drive me to the wall, kick my brains in, blow me up, whip me 'til it hurts, that's what people were accepting as heavy energy. Actually it was just big industry moving in on the music. Like the armaments manufacturers selling weapons to both sides in a war, inventing bigger and better things to take your head off while behind your back, there's a few people laughing and getting rich off your vanity. Have you ever seen a slaughter-house where they bring in a herd of cattle? They round them all up, put them all in one area, pacify 'm and slaughter them... big business, brings in lots of bucks, heavy energy. It always reminds me of that. The greatest praise we got on that tour was 'incredible energy, man', it would make me want to puke. The scene had changed somewhat when we stepped into that picture. We were expected to produce a show that lived up to everybody's expectations. And we did it. It was utterly profound."

"What they saw wasn't really what they would have seen in '66 or '65. If they had seen that, that was much more demanding. That was a much more demanding show. People didn't know what it was at that point. When people don't know what something is, they don't understand it and they start to get, you know, weird and defensive. Nothing is predictable and you're always out on the edge. Anything can happen. I always had those songs though and so I always figured everything was alright."

When the tour was over-commemorated by a cover in Newsweek, the same magazine that once questioned his authorship of Blowin' In The Wind, Dylan responded in surprising style. Just as he had cultivated his most public performing style yet, he reversed himself, contacted several acoustic musicians and told his label he was going to record some "private songs." He wanted to do them quickly, in a small way.

He began recording what is often recognised as his finest album of the seventies, Blood On The Tracks. Reportedly inspired by the breakup of his marriage, the album derived more of it's style from Dylan's renewed interest in painting. The songs cut deep and their sense of perspective and reality was always changing. This was acoustic soul music and clearly not the work of an artist intent on staying in arenas touring on the strength of his own myth.

"I'm not concerned with the myth," Dylan said in a 1977 interview, "because I can't work under the myth. The myth can't write the songs. It's the blood behind the myth that creates the art. The myth doesn't exist for me like it may for other people. I'd rather go on, above the myth."

After Blood On The Tracks, Dylan stayed in New York. He recorded one of his most successful albums, Desire, with a new group of musicians led by Scarlet Rivera. Dylan had seen her playing on a street comer and invited her to join the band. Her violin helped characterize Hurricane, the unreleased Abandoned Love and many other songs from this period.

Dylan also began popping up, in clubs around Greenwich Village, on some of the same stages where he started out. More than a few visitors in the Village, accustomed to seeing the early photos of a long-gone Dylan still pasted in the windows, did a triple take when they actually saw Dylan back again on stage. Slowly, those club performances grew to include others like Ramblin' Jack Elliott, Joan Baez, T-Bone Burnett, Roger McGuinn, Mick Ronson and others. Those shows built into the Rolling Thunder Revue, a bicentennial tour of small to mid-size halls that was documented in a TV special, a number of books and later in Dylan's own film Renaldo and Clara. In what was now Dylan's third or fourth wave of popularity, even candidate Jimmy Carter was campaigning for president with a speech that quoted Bob Dylan.

By the time of Renaldo and Clara's release, Dylan was already past it. He had relocated to a converted rehearsal hall in Santa Monica, California and was rehearsing musicians for a band he could both tour and record with. The resulting eleven piece group was one of his biggest and most precise. They toured the world in 1978 and also recorded the underrated Street Legal album. The sound of this period was something close to the dense precision of Blonde on Blonde, with a measure of gospel-blues added. Street Legal defined Dylan's work for the next several years. Said Dylan, "The critics treated this record spitefully... I saw one review that accused me of going 'Vegas' and copying Bruce Springsteen because I was using Steve Douglas, a saxophone player... the Vegas comparison was, well you know, I don't think the guy had ever been to Vegas and the saxophone thing was almost slanderous... I mean I don't copy guys that are under fifty years old and though I wasn't that familiar with Bruce's work, his saxophone player couldn't be spoken of in the same breath as Steve Douglas who'd played with Duane Eddy and on literally all of Phil Spector's records... I mean no offense to Clarence or anything but he's not in the same category and the guy who reviewed my stuff should have known it... anyway people need to be encouraged, not stepped on and put in a straight jacket."

After his world tour, reports would soon circulate that Dylan had become a born-again Christian. The next album told the bigger story. Dylan was inspired with religious thought but he'd also struck a smoldering studio groove with celebrated rhythm and blues producers Jerry Wexler and Barry Beckett. This partnership produced one of the most finely recorded albums of Dylan's recording career. Slow Train Coming was both a critically praised and successful work. Dylan received his first Grammy and the album went platinum. It also won the Dove Award for Inspirational Album of 1979. The follow-up album Saved, with it's Biblical inscription on the outer sleeve, fared less well. Religious themes have had a place in his music from the beginning, but for a time the media searched these songs for clues to his commitment. Although the messages might have been too much for pop music mentality, the meaning behind the songs did not fall entirely upon all deaf ears. "Yes mon," said Bob Marley,... "that is a good verse too, a revelation, a link-up with a Rasta, as Haile Selassie is the Conquering Lion of the house of Judah. And me like his song Serve Somebody quite a bit as well... I glad him do it, too, y'know, because there comes a time when an artist just cannot follow the crowd. If you are an artist like Bob Dylan, you got to make the crowd follow you. I can tell you that it doesn't mean anything to him that people might not like what he is doing. Him still do it. And that is the most important thing. Him still do it."

Shot of Love, a somewhat more secular LP recorded in Los Angeles, was produced by Dylan and Chuck Plotkin (with the help of Bumps Blackwell on Shot of Love).

The range of influence was wider, the music was technically improved from earlier days but the feel could have been 1966. This was raw Dylan, live in the studio, scrambling to get to the heart of his new songs. "People didn't listen to that album in a realistic way. First of all, Shot of Love was one of the last songs Bumps Blackwell produced and even though he only produced one song I gotta say that of all the producers I ever used, he was the best, the most knowledgeable and he had the best instincts... I would have liked him to do the whole thing but things got screwed up and he wasn't so called 'contemporary'... what came out was something close to what would have come out if he was really there... also Clydie King and I sound pretty close to what's all the best of every traditional style so how could anybody complain about that... and the record had something that, I don't know, could have been made in the '40's or maybe the '50's... there was a cross element of songs on it... the critics, I hate to keep talking about them, wouldn't allow the people to make up their own minds... all they talked about was Jesus this and Jesus that, like it was some kind of Methodist record. I don't know what was happening, maybe Boy George or something but Shot of Love didn't fit into the current formula. It probably never will. Anyway people were always looking for some excuse to write me off and this was as good as any... I can't say if being 'non commercial' is a put down or a compliment." The next album, Infidels, was a critical and artistic success that also ushered Dylan into the video age with Sweetheart Like You and Jokerman.

"I don't feel like I know what I'm going to do even next week, or not do." Dylan said of the future. "Mostly I just write songs, make records, and do tours, that takes up most of my time, so I just expect it to go on that way. I started a book awhile back called Ho Chi Minh in Harlem. I'd probably like to finish that. Maybe write some stories the way Kerouac did, about some of the people I know and knew, change the names – New developments, new ideas? I guess I'd like to do a concept album like, you know, Red Headed Stranger or something, maybe a children's album, or an album of cover songs but I don't know if the people would let me get away with that ... A Million Miles From Nowhere, I Who Have Nothing, All My Tomorrows, I'm In The Mood For Love, More Than You Know, It's A Sin To Tell A Lie... I guess someday I'd like to do an album of standards, also, maybe instrumentals, guitar melodies with percussion, people don't know I can do that sort of thing. I can get away with a lot more in a show than I can on record... I mean I'm aware of sythesisers and drum machines but they don't affect my stuff to any great degree. There's a great temptation to see how false you can be. I can see where pretty soon the human voice will be synthesised, become totally unreal. You know, like put in Paul Anka and get him sounding like Howlin' Wolf or vice versa. I guess it don't matter but it's irritating, it's a cheap substitution for reality, stimulating little boys and little girls with sex in a bottle, it's all got the soul of a robot, your mind thinks its true but your heart knows it's wrong. Too much chaos on the airways for the senses to take, assault on the all too fragile imagination as it is... fill up everything, put in every color, clog it all up... if you wanna make things clear, you've got to leave other things out... like that's why the old black and white movies look better than color movies, they give your eye and your imagination something to do, well, that's one of the reasons, same thing with the old music and the new music... probably too much progress or something, I don't know."

While Dylan had often deflected artistic inquiries in the past, on this day he was almost earnest in his observations. Bob Dylan's perspective in the mid eighties is a valuable one, one he seemed inspired to have gained.

"No, I really don't have a plan. You know what I mean, if you've heard my records and know what was going on at the time I turned them out. A lot of the styles and lyrical dynamics that I use I feel I have invented myself or stumbled into accidentally. Either back in the sixties or even in the late seventies or eighties using certain combinations that have never come up before, so I work mostly in that area. I can't stop doing it just because a whole lot of other people have taken certain elements of it and used it for their own thing. I mean Muddy Waters didn't stop playing just because the J. Geils Band started making records. I noticed that George Jones didn't roll over just because Merle Haggard appeared. It's actually quite complimentary to witness your own influence in someone else's success. But I don't know, I guess it can be taken the other way too... look at what happened to Lefty Frizzell. Link Wray invented heavy metal music but who knows it? T-Bone Walker is really the essence of city blues, can wipe B. B. Jones off the map but who can tell you that? Isn't Bessie Smith rock n' roll? People forget. You have to know there's always someone else that's gonna come along after you. There's always going to be a faster, bigger and younger gun, right? Pop music on the radio? I don't know. I listen mostly to Preacher stations and the country music stations and maybe the oldies stations... that's about it. At the moment I like Judy Rodman, I've Been Had By Love Before, more than anything happening on the pop stations. I don't think of myself really as a pop singer anyway, so what do I know."

For a man often credited with helping to define rock, Dylan was careful to point out that he was never owned by it.

"The thing about rock n' roll is that for me anyway it wasn't enough, Tutti Frutti and Blue Suede Shoes were great catch phrases and driving pulse rhythms and you could get high on the energy but they weren't serious or didn't reflect life in a realistic way. I knew that when I got into folk music, it was more of a serious type of thing. The songs are filled with more despair, more sadness, more triumph, more faith in the supernatural, much deeper feelings... My Bonnie Love Is Lang A Growing, Go Down Ye Bloody Red Roses even Jesse James or Down By The Willow Garden, definitely not pussy stuff. There is more real life in one line than there was in all the rock n' roll themes. I needed that. Life is full of complexities and rock n' roll didn't reflect that. It was just put on a happy face and ride sally ride, there was nothing even resembling Sixteen Snow White Horses or See That My Grave Is Kept Clean in even the vaguest way. If I did anything, I brought one to the other. There was nothing serious happening in music when I started, not even the Beatles. They were singing Love Me Do and Marvin Gaye... he didn't do What's Going On until the '70s."

What did he think of the new music?

"Nothing is new. Everybody just gets their chance – most of it just sounds recycled and shuffled around, watered down. Even rap records. I love that stuff but it's not new, you used to hear that stuff all the time... there was this one guy, Big Brown, he wore a jail blanket, that's all he ever used to wear, summer and winter. John Hammond would remember him too – he was like Othello, he'd recite epics like some grand Roman orator, really backwater stuff though, Stagger Lee, Cocaine Smitty, Hattiesburg Hattie. Where were the record companies when he was around? Even him though, it's like it was done 30 years before that... and God knows when else. I think of Luke the Drifter as rap records and as far as concept and intelligence and warring with words, Mighty Sparrow was and probably still is king. You go see him and in the audience there's people just standing up and arguing away with him about every kind of thing... politics, sex, outer space, whatever, he answers 'm all back, never breaks stride, all in his poetry, his shows are like prize fights and he always come out on top, all this and a fifteen or twenty piece band just blasting away ... Calypso King... Mighty Sparrow... he's fantastic. Rock n' roll, I don't know, rhythm and blues or whatever, I think it's gone. In its pure form. There are some guys true to it but it's so hard. You have to be so dedicated and committed and everything is against it. I'd like to see Charlie Sexton become a big star, but the whole machine would have to break down right now before that would happen. It was easier before. Now it's just rock, capital R, no roll, the roll's gone, homosexual rock, working man's rock, stock-broker rock, it's now a highly visible enterprise, big establishment thing. You know thing's go better with Coke because Aretha Franklin told you so and Maxwell House coffee must be OK because Ray Charles is singing about it. Everybody's singing about ketchup or headache medicine or something. In the beginning it wasn't anything like that, had nothing to do with pantyhose and perfume and barbecue sauce... you were eligible to get busted for playing it. It's like Lyndon Johnson saying 'We shall overcome' to a nation-wide audience, ridiculous... there's an old saying, 'If you want to defeat your enemy, sing his song' and that's pretty much still true. I think it's happened and nobody knows the difference. In the old days, there's that phrase again, you paid the price to play. You could get run out of town or pushed over a cliff. Of course there was always someone there with a net. I'm not trying to paint just one side of a picture. But, you know, it was tough getting heard, it was radical. You felt like you were part of some circus side-show. Now it's the main event. You can even go to college and study rock and roll, they turn out professors who grade your records. There's enough dribble, magazine articles, proclamations, declarations, whatever, written about it to keep you guessing for a lifetime but it's not in reading and writing about it, it's in doing it... the best stuff was done without the spotlight before the commentaries and what not... when they came to define it I think they killed something very important about it. The corporate world, when they figured out what it was and how to use it they snuffed the breath out of it and killed it. What do they care? Anything that's in the way, they run over like a bulldozer, once they understood it they killed it and made it a thing of the past, put up a monument to it and now that's what you're hearing, the headstone, it's a billion dollar business. I don't know, I guess it's hard to find flaws with this. Used to be they were very much afraid, you know, like hide your daughters, that sort of thing... Elvis, Little Richard, Chuck Berry... they all struck fear into the heart. Now they got a purpose sort of... to sell soap, blue jeans, anything, it's become country club music... White House... Kentucky Fried Chicken... it's all been neutralised... nothing threatening, nothing magical... nothing challenging. For me I hate to see it because it set me free, set the whole world on fire, there's a lot of us who still can remember, who've been there. What I'm telling is no lie but then again who wants to hear it? You just get yourself worked up over nothing."

Dylan considered the thought.

"The truth about anything in this society, as you know, is too threatening. Gossip is King. It's like 'conscience' is a dirty word. Whatever is truthful haunts you and don't let you sleep at night. Especially anybody who's living a lie gets hurt. You get a lot of ugly reactions from people not familiar with it. A lot of times you don't even bother. Not that I'm an expert or anything but I've always tried to stick that into my music in some kind of way or at least not to leave it untouched. The old stuff stayed in your head long after it was over, you know, even something as simple as 'to know, know, know him is to love, love, love him', it became monumental in some kind of way, now it's just blabbering noise and after you shut it off you've forgotten about it and you're glad – Some Like It Hot. Oh mercy! Spare me please! These things are just hooks, fish hooks in the back of your neck... nothing means anything, people just showing off, dancing to a pack of lies – lotta people gotta be dead first before anybody takes notice, the same people who praise you when you're dead, when you were alive they wouldn't give you the time of day. I like to wonder about some of these people who elevated John Lennon to such a mega-god as if when he was alive they were always on his side. I wonder who they think he was singing to when he sang 'just give me some truth. ' Everything is just too commercial, like a sprawling octopus, too much part of the system. Sometimes you feel like you're walking around in that movie Invasion Of The Body Snatchers and you wonder if it's got you yet, if you're still one of the few or are you 'them' now. You never know do you? When people don't get threatened and challenged, I mean in some kind of way, they don't get confronted, never have to make decisions, they never take a stand, they never grow, live their lives in a fishtank, stay in the same old scene forever, die and never get a break or a chance to say goodbye. I have views contrary to all that. I think that this world is just a passing-through place and that the dead have eyes and that even the unborn can see and I don't care who knows it. I don't know, I can go off on tangents... things that got nothing to do with music... The great folk music and the great rock n' roll, you might not hear it again. Like the horse and buggy. Sure, a horse and buggy is more soulful than a car but it takes longer to get where you're going and besides that, you could get killed on the road."

Sitting across from Bob Dylan on this afternoon, one could see his influences very clearly. His speech sometimes flecked with the country-isms of his youth, a leather jacket draped on his shoulders, a sharp hand gesture with a cigarette barely holding its ash... for all the years of who-is-Bob-Dylan analysis, the answer seemed obvious. He still is, as he always has been, a lone figure with a guitar and a point-of-view.

"Basically, I'm self taught. What I mean by that actually is that I picked it all up from other people by watching them, by imitating them. I seldom ever asked them to take me aside and show me how to do it. I started out as a traveling guitar player and singer," Dylan reflected. "It had nothing to do with writing songs, fortune and fame, that sort of thing. You know what I mean. I could always play a song on a concert-hall stage or from the back of a truck, a nightclub or on the street, whatever, and that was the important thing, singing the song, contributing something and paying my way. The most inspiring type of entertainer for me has always been somebody like Jimmie Rodgers, somebody who could do it alone and was totally original. He was combining elements of blues and hillbilly sounds before anyone else had thought of it. He recorded at the same time as Blind Willie McTell but he wasn't just another white boy singing black. That was his great genius and he was there first. All he had to do was appear with his guitar and a straw hat and he played on the same stage with big bands, girly choruses and follies burlesque and he sang in a plaintive voice and style and he's outlasted them all. You don't remember who else was on the bill. I never saw him. I only heard his records. I never saw Woody Guthrie in his prime. I think maybe the greatest of all those I ever saw was Cisco Houston. He was in his last days but you couldn't tell – he looked like Clark Gable and he was absolutely magnificent... I always like to think that there's a real person talking to me, just one voice you know, that's all I can handle – Cliff Carlysle... Robert Johnson, for me this is a deep reality, someone who's telling me where he's been that I haven't and what it's like there – somebody whose life I can feel... Jimmie Rodgers or even Judy Garland, she was a great singer... or Al Jolson... God knows there are so few of them, but who knows? Maybe there are just enough. I always thought that one man, the lone balladeer with the guitar could blow an entire army off the stage if he knew what he was doing... I've seen it happen. It's important to stay away from the celebrity trap. The Andy Warhol fame-for-a-minute type trip. The media is a great meatgrinder, it's never satisfied and it must be fed but there's power in darkness too and in keeping things hidden. Look at Napoleon. Napoleon conquered Europe and nobody even knew what he looked like... people get too famous too fast these days and it destroys them. Some guys got it down – Leonard Cohen, Paul Brady, Lou Reed, secret heroes, – John Prine, David Allen Coe, Tom Waits, I listen more to that kind of stuff than whatever is popular at the moment, they're not. just witchdoctoring up the planet, they don't set up barriers... Gordon Lightfoot, every time I hear a song of his, it's like I wish it would last forever. Pop culture, what is it? IBM, Calvin Klein, General Motors, Mickey Mouse, and that whole kind of thing, conformity to fashion, ideas, conformity to other people's opinions, conformity in the mirror, lots of singers who can't even deliver live on stage, use tapes and things... Van Gogh never sold but a few paintings while he was alive, incredible, as far as he was concerned he was a failure. I don't think for a minute though that he's having the last laugh cause that's not what I think it's about. Artists should remember that – There's a tremendous hypocrisy in this thing."

From the demos, to the songs, to the hits and the never-heards, this is a collection of music that anyone should take the time to listen to in sequence. And when the last notes of Forever Young disappear, consider this: Dylan's influence continues to be heard all around us, from his own work to the music of artists like Springsteen, The Clash, The Pretenders, U2, The Blasters, Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers and many others. Fan sponsored publications like Telegraph and Wanted Man pour over set lists from twenty years ago, as well as Dylan's movements of today. To many, Dylan's life is already the stuff of myth. To Dylan, it's a life only half begun. Just listen to the fire in his impassioned vocal on the USA for Africa single of We Are The World. A hero to many, Bob Dylan has his own definition of the word.

"I think of a hero as someone who understands the degree of responsibility that comes with his freedom, someone who's not afraid to jump in front of a freight train to save a loved one's life, to draw a crowd with my guitar, that's about the most heroic thing that I can do. To play a song to calm the king, well everybody don't get to do that. There's only certain things a King wants to hear. And then if he don't like it, he might send you to the gallows. Sometimes you feel like a club fighter who gets off the bus in the middle of nowhere, no cheers, no admiration, punches his way through ten rounds or whatever, always making someone else look good, vomits up the pain in the backroom, picks up his check and gets back on the bus heading out for another nowhere. Sometimes like a troubadour out of the dark ages, singing for your supper and rambling the land or singing to the girl in the window, you know, the one with the long flowing hair who's combing it in the candlelight, maybe she invites you up. Maybe she says 'Sing me another song, sweetness, sing me that song about the cat and the fiddle, the knave and the long sea voyage' or maybe she don't. You gotta be able to feel your dream before anyone else is aware of it. 'Your parents don't like me they say I'm too poor'... Gotta learn to bite the bullet like Tom Mix, take the blows, like the song says. Or like Charles Aznavour, 'you must learn to leave the table when love is no longer being served' but that's a hard thing to do. You got to be strong and stay connected to what started it all, the inspiration behind the inspiration, to who you were when people didn't mind stepping on you, it's easy to say but the air gets thin at the top, you get light-headed, your environment changes, new people come into your life..."

Bob Dylan stood and walked to a nearby window, he stared out at a small courtyard. A cat shrieked from an over-hanging balcony. Dylan was restless and ready to go. I asked him he viewed his impact upon modern culture. He shrugged.

"In the big picture, on the big stage, I'm not too sure, to take yourself seriously or to take seriously what other people are thinking, you know that could be your downfall. I mean it's a weakness. I know I've done some important things but in what context, I don't know, and also for who. It's hard to relate to fans. I mean I relate to people as people but people as fans, I'm not sure I know what that means and don't forget John Lennon was murdered by a so-called fan – I know it gives them all a bad name but so what? I don't think of myself as a fan of anybody, I am more of an admirer, so why should I think of anyone as a fan of me? If they like you, they do and if they don't, well that's their business – nobody owes anybody anything. And anyway fans are consumers, they buy products and the company tries to please the consumers. That type of thing can rule your life. If the fan don't like you he becomes somebody else's fan, like the Paul Simon song, Got To Keep The Customer Satisfied – I'm not gonna live and die behind that – I'm not selling breakfast cereal, or razor blades or whatever. I'm always hearing people saying how 'Dylan should do this and do that, make an album like he did in the sixties. ' How the hell do they know? I could make Blonde on Blonde tomorrow and the same people would probably say its outdated... that's the way people are. As far as the sixties go, it wasn't any big deal. Time marches on. I mean if I had a choice I would rather have lived at the time of King David, when he was the high King of Israel. I'd love to have been riding with him or hiding in caves with him when he was a hunted outlaw. I wonder what he would have been saying and about who – or maybe at the time of Jesus and Mary Magdalene – that would have been interesting huh, really test your nerve... or maybe even later in the time of the Apostles when they were overturning the world ... what happened in the '60's? Wiretapping? What was so revolutionary about it? You know, there was a time when people thought the world was flat and that women didn't have souls... you can say how ridiculous and how could they have been so stupid but nevertheless people did think it to be truth just like right now a lot of what's thought to be truth will later be proved false... actually I'm amazed that I've been around this long, never thought I would be. I try to learn from both the wise and the unwise, not pay attention to anybody, do what I want to do. I can't say I haven't done my share of playing the fool. There was never any secret. I was in the right place at the right time. People dissect my songs like rabbits but they all miss the point. I mean have you ever seen 'something's happening but you don 't know what it is do you, Mr. Jones' played over the war in Lebanon? Or the Aids epidemic. Or Mengele's bones? Sometimes I think I've been doing this too long. I can understand why Rimbaud quit writing poetry when he was 19... How would I change my life? Yeah, well, sometimes I think that I get by on only 50% of what I got, sometimes even less. I'd like to change that I guess... that's about all I can think of."

September 1985
Scott Cohen Interview, California (For Interview)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 531-535.

These abbreviated out-takes from the Spin interview by Scott Cohen appeared in Interview magazine, an Andy Warhol publication, in February 1986.

A FEW THINGS ABOUT BOB DYLAN AS TOLD TO SCOTT COHEN
You can tell a lot about someone by what they don't tell you.
Sometimes a simple shopping list can be more revealing than a person's life story

A DOZEN INFLUENTIAL RECORDS
"Lady's Man", Hank Snow
"Lucille", Little Richard
"High Lonesome Sound", Roscoe Holcomb
"Tom Joad", Woody Guthrie
"Mystery Train", Elvis Presley
"Not Fade Away", Buddy Holly
"Molly and Tenbrooks", Bill Monroe
"Get Back", Big Bill Broonzy
"Chauffeur Blues", Memphis Minnie
"Riding on Train 45", Delmore Brothers
"Ida Red", Smokey Mountain Boys
"Pictures From Life's Other Side", Hank Williams

FIVE BANDS I WISH I HAD BEEN IN King Oliver Band
The Memphis Jug Band
Muddy Water's Chicago Band (with Little Walter and Otis Spann)
The Country Gentlemen
Crosby, Stills and Nash

SOME MOVIES I WISH I WAS IN
The Devil and Miss Jones
I Was a Zombie for the FBI
Ben Hur
Raintree County

QUESTIONS YOU CAN'T ANSWER
How does it feel to be a legend?
How does it feel to have influenced a bunch of people?
What did you change your name to?
Are you somebody?
Where's your music taking you?
Did you write that song for me?
Did you know Nixon?

FIVE FAVORITE MOVIE ACTRESSES
Hedy Lamarr (I can't remember what she was in, though)
Dorothy Dandridge (I loved her in a movie she really needed, with Trevor Howard)
Marilyn Monroe (The Asphalt Jungle)

Jane Russell (The Outlaw)
Darla (Little Rascals)

THREE AUTHORS I'D READ ANYTHING BY Tacitus
Chekhov
Tolstoy

TWO FAVORITE HOCKEY PLAYERS
Sammy Williamson
Maurice "The Rocket" Richard

THREE PET PEEVES
Preachers who preach the "Wealth and Prosperity" doctrine
Women who sit and eat meat all day
Salesmen who slap you on the back and wink

WHAT'S FOR DINNER
Grilled corn on the cob, black-eyed peas, beetroot salad, spinach and pilaf, deep fried cauliflower, french-fried chicken and gravy, french-fried cabbage, pinto beans and rice cocoa angel cake

EVENTS I WISH I'D WITNESSED
Custer's Last Stand, Hannibal crossing the Alps, Lindbergh landing in Paris, Houdini on the East River

MY LAST SLICE OF PIZZA
Tony's, Broadway and 46th Street, 1981

A THREESOME I'D LIKE TO PLAY GOLF WITH Paul Gauguin
Lee Iacocca
Edward Teller

A COUPLE OF ACTORS I'D LIKE TO PLAY ME IN MY LIFE STORY
Billy Dee Williams
Mickey Roonie

TIPS FOR GIRLS WHO'D LIKE ME TO LIKE THEM
Tell me everything

ONE THING I'D LIKE TO IMPROVE ABOUT MYSELF
My penmanship

SOME GREAT MINOR MASTERPIECES
"Bony Maronie"
"Surfin' Bird"
"Lonesome Town"

MY FAVORITE SHOT IN BASKETBALL
The three throw

A COUPLE OF PEOPLE I WOULDN'T MIND BEING FOR A MINUTE

Roy Acuff
Walter Matthau
Leonard Cohen

THE BEST CURE FOR THE BLUES
Ginger root

SOME PLACES I WOULDN'T WANT TO GO BACK TO Auschwitz
Camp de Paris, Marseille
The Horse and Hounds Tavern, Edinburgh

THINGS I'LL ALWAYS MISS
Sweet kisses from the Black Queen
Trebuki Bay at sunset
White geese in the North Carolina sky
Four angels blowing marble trumpets in Times Square.

SOME THINGS I'D RATHER FORGET
Spaghetti at the airport in Helsinki, Lady Godiva at the cemetery in New Orleans, girl with the horse's head in Mexico

ONE THING I'D LIKE FOR VALENTINE'S DAY
Earmuffs

MY TWO FAVORITE INGREDIENTS IN JOHNNY CAKES
Corn meal and maple syrup

HOW TO LET HER DOWN EASY
Tell her you're down and out

TWO TRUTHS THAT AREN'T TRUE
God helps those who help themselves
Actors get up at 5 am

THE FURTHEST THING FROM MY MIND
Perpetual youth and St. James Infirmary

THE NEAREST FARAWAY PLACES
Cuba
Isle of Patmos

GAMES I PLAY
Crazy 8's
Dominoes
Chess Hearts
Fan-tan
He say, she say

CLUBS I BELONG TO Back-To-The-Wall Club Night Watch

Merle Haggard Fan Club
Franz Kline Fan Club
Rockin' & Rhythm Club
Backup Rider Club

ONE LAST FAVOR I'D LIKE TO ASK
"Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good"

SEVERAL THINGS STILL BLOWIN' IN THE WIND
Three Little Pigs
The wages of sin
Lester Young's horn solo on "When Buddha Smiles"

September 1985
Scott Cohen Interview, California (Spin)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 517-529.

Scott Cohen conducted this "interview" during late September 1985. A strange "interview" indeed. There are no questions, just a series of headings, which we are to presume prompted the given responses from Dylan. Apparently Cohen spent several days with Dylan in California and then kept in "constant touch" with him during the following two weeks as they added to the story.

The article appeared in the December 1985 issue of Spin (Volume 1, Number 8, issued in late October 1985). It has also manifested itself elsewhere under a number of guises including the Johannesburg Star of December 21st 1985 and in the concert program for the May 1990 shows at the O'Keefe Center For The Performing Arts. It has also appeared in an abbreviated "out-take" form in Interview Magazine.

DON'T ASK ME NOTHIN' ABOUT NOTHIN'. I JUST MIGHT TELL YOU THE TRUTH
BOB DYLAN, IN PERHAPS HIS MOST REVEALING INTERVIEW IN YEARS, PROVES THERE'S NOTHING MORE MYSTERIOUS THAN A NORMAL MUSICAL GENIUS.

Bob Dylan, poet laureate, prophet in a motorcycle jacket. Mystery tramp. Napoleon in rags. A Jew. A Christian. A million contradictions. A complete unknown, like a rolling stone.

He's been analyzed, classified, categorized, crucified, defined, dissected, detected, inspected, and rejected, but never figured out.

He blew into mythology in 1961 with a guitar, harmonica, and corduroy cap, a cross between Woody Guthrie and Little Richard. He was like the first punk folksinger. He introduced the protest song to rock. He made words more important than melody, more important than the beat. His smokey, nasal voice and sexy phrasings are unique. He can write surreal songs with a logic all their own – like a James Rosenquist painting or a Rimbaud prose poem – and simple, straight-from-the-heart ballads with equal ease. He can take the dark out of the night time and paint the daytime black.

He probably could have been the biggest sex symbol since Elvis, had he chosen to. Then Mick Jagger came along. The Stones, the Beatles, Jim Morrison, Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, all paid him their due. The radical Weathermen took their name from him. He caused a riot at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival when he went on stage and played electric rock. The folk faction thought he sold out. Later, during the height of "flower power," when everyone was getting into Eastern religion, Dylan went to Jerusalem, to the Wailing Wall, wearing a yarmulke. A decade later he was a born-again Christian, or so it seemed, putting out gospel records. People discovered that he really wasn't where it's at.

It's not like Dylan suddenly got less political or more spiritual. Biblical references have always been in his songs. People have been calling him a visionary for years. Who knows? Suppose a spiritual revolution is going on and rock n' roll's just a prelude to something else. Who would make a better prophet than Dylan?

Sometimes, what looks large from a distance, close up ain't never that big. Dylan's like one of his lines, He lives pretty simply, in a nice house on secluded property on the California coast, with a bunch of chickens, horses, and dogs. The fact that he's more visible now and doing ordinary things, like the Grammys, videos, even this interview, doesn't make him any less mysterious.

It adds to it.

YOU WANT TO TALK TO ME, GO AHEAD AND TALK

A lot of people from the press want to talk to me, but they never do, and for some reason there's this great mystery, if that's what it is. They put it on me. It sells newspapers, I guess. News is a business. It really has nothing to do with me personally, so I really don't keep up with it. When I think of mystery, I don't think about myself. I think of the universe, like why does the moon rise when the sun falls? Caterpillars turn into butterflies?

I really haven't remained a recluse. I just haven't talked to the press over the years because I've had to deal with personal things and usually they take priority over talking about myself. I stay out of sight if I can. Dealing with my own life takes priority over other people dealing with my life. I mean, for instance, if I got to get the landlord to fix the plumbing, or get some guy to put up money for a movie, or if I just feel I'm being treated unfairly, then I need to deal with this by myself and not blab it all over to the newspapers. Other people knowing about things confuses the situation, and I'm not prepared for that I don't like to talk about myself. The things I have to say about such things as ghetto bosses, salvation and sin, lust, murderers going free, and children without hope – messianic kingdom-type stuff, that sort of thing — people don't like to print. Usually I don't have any answers to the questions they would print, anyway.

WHO WOULD YOU WANT TO INTERVIEW?

A lot of people who aren't alive: Hank Williams, Apollinaire, Joseph from the Bible, Marilyn Monroe, John F. Kennedy, Mohammed, Paul the Apostle, maybe John Wilkes Booth, maybe Gogol. I'd like to interview people who died leaving a great unsolved mess behind, who left people for ages to do nothing but speculate. As far as anybody living goes, who's there to interview? Castro? Gorbachev? Reagan? The Hillside Strangler? What are they going to tell you? The destiny of the world's wealthiest man, that don't interest me. I know what his reward is. Anybody who's done work that I admire, I'd rather just leave it at that I'm not that pushy about finding out how people come up with what they come up with, so what does that leave you with? Just the daily life of somebody. You know, like, "How come you don't eat fish?" That really wouldn't give me answers to what I'm wondering about.

Dark Sunglasses

I started out with Batman and Robin-type sunglasses. I always thought the best kind of sunglasses are the motorcycle helmets with the black plastic masks on them. That way, nobody can recognize the back of your head either. With sunglasses, you buy them off the rack, if they fit, and put them on. Shoes are tougher. You go into a store, try this pair on, that pair on. I feel I have to buy something if I put it on. What I'm looking for is a pair of glasses that can see through walls, whether they're sunglasses or not.

ISN'T IT HARD TO WEAR DARK GLASSES AFTER ALL THESE YEARS?

Late at night it is, when I'm driving. I don't wear them all the time. I've gone through periods when I wear them, but I don't know why. I'm nearsighted, so I wear them for that reason.

HIGHWAY 61 REVISITED

People ask me about the '60s all the time. That's the first thing they want to know. I say, if you want to know about the '60s, read Armies of the Night by Norman Mailer, or read Marshall McLuhan or Abraham Maslow. A lot of people have written about the '60s in an exciting way and have told the truth. The singers were just a part of it. I can't tell them that much. Certain things I can remember very clearly. Others are a kinda blur, but where I was and what was happening I can focus in on if I'm forced to. Of course, there are people who can remember in vivid detail. Ginsberg has that talent and Kerouac had that talent to a great degree. Kerouac never forgot anything, so he could write anything because he could just remember.

MY BACK PAGES

Miles Davis is my definition of cool. I loved to see him in the small clubs playing his solo, turn his back on the crowd, put down his horn and walk off the stage, let the band keep playing, and then come back and play a few notes at the end. I did that at a couple of shows. The audience thought I was sick or something. Lily St. Cyr (the stripper), Dorothy Dandridge, Mary Magdalene, that's my definition of hot

My first pop hero was Johnny Ray. I saw him late '78. I think he was playing club lounges. He hasn't had a hit for a while. Maybe he needs a new record company. I hope the guy's still alive. People forget how good he was.

The only person I can think of who didn't return a phone call of mine was Walter Yetnikoff (president of CBS) the summer before last. I placed it personally, direct dial, long distance, at 3 o'clock in the morning.

The last record I bought was Lucille Bogan. She was a blues singer who I had heard of, but not her records. I don't buy too many contemporary records. I didn't go down to the record store and buy the record personally. I know someone who works in a record store in town and I called and asked him to set it aside. No, I didn't actually pick it up, somebody else did.

The first expensive thing I bought with my first big paycheck was a '65 baby-blue Mustang convertible. But a guy who worked for me rolled it down a hill in Woodstock and it smashed into a truck. I got 25 bucks for it.

The name on my driver's license is Bob Dylan. It was legally changed when I went to work for Folk City a few thousand years ago. They had to get my name straight for the union.

I never watch sports on TV, although I did see John McEnroe beat Jimmy Connors at Wimbledon when I was over in England last year. There was a TV set backstage and I had gotten there early and I paid attention to the whole thing. Usually I don't stay with something that long.

I used to play hockey when I was growing up. Everyone sort of learns how to skate and play hockey at an early age (in Minnesota). I usually played forward, sometimes center. My cousin was a goalie at the University of Colorado. I didn't play too much baseball, because my eyes were kind of bad and the ball would hit me when I wasn't looking. I never played much basketball, unless I played with my kids. Football I never played at all, not even touch football. I really don't like to hurt myself.

I have a good understanding with all the women who have been in my life, whether I see them occasionally or not. We're still always best of friends.

TANGLED UP IN BLUE

I once read a book of Nathaniel Hawthorne's letters to some girl, and they were extremely private and personal, and I didn't feel there was any of myself in those letters, but I could identify with what he was saying. A lot of myself crosses over into my songs. I'll write something and say to myself, I can change this, I can make this not so personal, and at other times I'll say, I think I'll leave this on a personal level, and if somebody wants to peek at it and make up their own minds about what kind of character I am, that's up to them. Other times I might say, well, it's too personal, I think I'll turn the corner on it, because why do I want somebody thinking about what I'm thinking about, especially if it's not to their benefit.

TALES OF YANKEE POWER

The best songs are the songs you write that you don't know anything about They're an escape. I don't do too much of that because maybe it's more important to deal with what's happening rather than to put yourself in a place where all you can do is imagine something. If you can imagine something and you haven't experienced it -it's usually true that someone else has actually gone through it and will identify with it

I actually think about Poe's stories, The Tell-Tale Heart, The Pit and the Pendulum. Certainly, if you look at his life, he really didn't experience any of that stuff. But some fantastic stories came out of his imagination. Like, "Here I am stuck in this job I can't get out of. I'm working as a civil servant what am I going to do next? I hate this existence." So what does he do? He sits in his attic and writes a story and all the people take it to mean he's a very weird character. Now, I don't think that's an illegitimate way to go about things, but then you got someone like Herman Melville who writes out of experience – Moby Dick or Confidence Man. I think there's a certain amount of fantasy in what he wrote. Can you see him riding on the back of a whale? I don't know. I've never been to college and taken a literary course. I can only try to answer these questions, because I'm supposed to be somebody who knows something about writing, but the actual fact is, I don't really know that much about it I don't know what there is to know about it, anyway.

I began writing because I was singing. I think that's an important thing. I started writing because things were changing all the time and a certain song needed to be written. I started writing them because I wanted to sing them. If they had been written, I wouldn't have started to write them. Anyway, one thing led to another and I just kept on writing my own songs, but I stumbled into it, really, It was nothing I had prepared myself for, but I did sing a lot of songs before I wrote any of my own. I think that's important too.

DID YOU EVER SEND YOUR POEMS TO ANY POETRY MAGAZINES?

No, I didn't start writing poetry until I was out of high school. I was 18 or so when I discovered Ginsberg, Gary Snyder, Phillip Whalen, Frank O'Hara, and those guys. Then I went back and started reading the French guys, Rimbaud and Francois Villon; I started putting tunes to their poems. There used to be a folk music scene and jazz clubs just about every place. The two scenes were very much connected, where the poets would read to a small combo, so I was close up to that for a while. My songs were influenced not so much by poetry on the page but by poetry being recited by the poets who recited poems with jazz bands.

THE REAL YOU AT LAST

Sometimes the "you" in my songs is me talking to me. Other times I can be talking to somebody else. If I'm talking to me in a song, I'm not going to drop everything and say, alright, now I'm talking to you. It's up to you to figure out who's who. A lot of times it's "you" talking to "you." The "I," like in "I and I," also changes. It could be I, or it could be the "I" who created me. And also, it could be another person who's saying "I." When I say "I" right now, I don't know who I'm talking about.

ALL I REALLY WANT TO DO

As long as I continue to make records and play, which I'm not through doing yet, I have to go along with what the scene is at the time. I'm not a Pete Seeger. I've actually done that every once in a while, where I have led two thousand, three thousand people through songs, but I haven't done it like Pete Seeger. He's a master at that, leading a mass of people in four-part harmony to a song not even in their language. I think he could appeal to people as much as Sting could, because he could make them feel like they matter and make sense to themselves and feel like they're contributing to something. Seeing Tears for Fears is like being a spectator at a football game. Pete is almost like a tribal medicine man, in the true sense of the word. Rock n' roll performers aren't. They're just kind of working out other people's fantasies.

BOB DYLAN'S 115TH DREAM

I signed a record contract with John Hammond, Sr., of Columbia Records in 1961. It was a big moment. I had been rejected by a lot of folk companies – Folkways, Tradition, Prestige, Vanguard. It was meant to be, actually. If those other companies had signed me, I would have recorded folk songs, and I don't think they would have stayed with me. Most of those companies went out of business, anyway.

Dream #116: The Freewheelin' album. The girl on the cover with me is Suze Rotolo, my room mate at the time.

NEWPORT, 1965

The first time I played electric before a large group of people was at the Newport Folk Festival, but I had a hit record out (Bringing It All Back Home), so I don't know how people expected me to do anything different. I was aware that people were fighting in the audience, but I couldn't understand it. I was a little embarrassed by the fuss, because it was for the wrong reasons. I mean, you can do some really disgusting things in life and people will let you get away with it. Then you do something that you don't think is anything more than natural and people react in that type of riotous way, but I don't pay too much attention to it.

MOTORPSYCHO NITEMARE

In 1966 I had a motorcycle accident and ended up with several broken vertebrae and a concussion. That put me down for a while. I couldn't go on doing what I had been. I was pretty wound up before that accident happened. It set me down so I could see things in a better perspective. I wasn't seeing anything in any kind of perspective. I probably would have died if I had kept on going the way I had been.

GOSPEL PLOW

In 1979 I went out on tour and played no song that I had ever played before live. It was a whole different show, and I thought that was a pretty amazing thing to do. I don't know any other artist who has done that, has not played whatever they're known for. The Slow Train record was out and I had the songs to the next record and then I had some songs that never were recorded. I had about 20 songs that never had been sung live before, and nobody seemed to pick up on that. They were seeing me as if they were dropping into some club I was playing in and were to witness something that really wasn't for publicity purposes. Yet it got all kinds of negative publicity. The only thing that bothered me about it was that the negative publicity was so hateful that it turned a lot of people off from making up their own minds, and financially that can hurt if you got a show on the road.

The first time we went out on that tour, we had something like eight weeks booked. Two of the weeks were in San Francisco. In the review in the paper, the man did not understand any of the concepts behind any part of the show, and he wrote an anti-Bob Dylan thing. He probably never liked me anyway, but just said that he did. A lot of them guys say stuff like, "Well, he changed our lives before, how come he can't do it now?" Just an excuse really. Their expectations are so high, nobody can fulfill them. They can't fulfill their own expectations, so they expect other people to do it for them. I don't mind being put down, but intense personal hatred is another thing. It was like an opening-night critic burying a show on Broadway.

This particular review got picked up and printed in all the newspapers of the cities we were going to play to even before tickets went on sale, and people would read this review and decide they didn't want to see the show. So it hurt us at the box office, and it took a while to work back from there. I thought the show was pretty relevant for what was going on at the time.

POSITIVELY 4TH STREET

Outside of a song like Positively 4th Street, which is extremely one-dimensional, which I like, I don't usually purge myself by writing anything about any type of quote, so-called, relationships. I don't have the kinds of relationships that are built on any kind of false pretense, not to say that I haven't. I've had just as many as anybody else, but I haven't had them in a long time. Usually everything with me and anybody is up front. My-life-is-an-open-book sort of thing.

And I choose to be involved with the people I'm involved with. They don't choose me.

HEART OF GOLD

The only time it bothered me that someone sounded like me was when I was living in Phoenix, Arizona, in about '72 and the big song at the time was Heart of Gold. I used to hate it when it came on the radio. I always liked Neil Young, but it bothered me every time I listened to Heart of Gold. I think it was up at number one for a long time, and I'd say, "Shit, that's me. If it sounds like me, it should as well be me." There I was, stuck on the desert someplace, having to cool out for a while. New York was a heavy place. Woodstock was worse, people living in trees outside my house, fans trying to batter down my door, cars following me up dark mountain roads. I needed to lay back for a while, forget about things, myself included, and I'd get so far away and turn on the radio and there I am, but it's not me.

It seemed to me somebody else had taken my thing and had run away with it, you know, and I never got over it. Maybe tomorrow.

HAS ANYBODY SEEN MY LOVE?

Tight Connection to My Heart is a very visual song. I want to make a movie out of it. I don't think it's going to get done. I think it's going to go past on the way, but of all the songs I've ever written, that might be one of the most visual. Of all the songs I've written, that's the one that's got characters that can be identified with. Whatever the fuck that means. I don't know, I may be trying to make it more important than it is, but I can see the people in it. Have you ever heard that song I'm a Rambler, I'm a Gambler,": I once had a sweetheart, age was 16, she was the Flower of Belton and the Rose of Saline? Same girl, maybe older. I don't know, maybe it should stay a song. In most of my songs, I know who it is that I'm singing about and to. Lately, since '78, that's been true and hasn't changed. The stuff before '78, those people have kinda disappeared, '76, '75, '74. If you see me live, you won't hear me sing too many of those songs. There's a certain area of songs, a certain period that I don't feel that close to. Like the songs on the Desire album, that's kind of a fog to me. But since '78 the characters have all been extremely real and are still there. The ones I choose to talk about and relate to are the ones I find some kind of greatness in.

MILLION DOLLAR BASH

I know going on the Grammy's is not my type of thing, but with Stevie (Wonder) it seemed like an interesting idea. I wasn't doing anything that night. I didn't feel I was making any great statement. For me, it was just going down to the place and hanging my clothes.

IDIOT WIND

Videos are out of character for me, too. The latest ones I've done with Dave Stewart are all right. The other ones, I don't know, I was just ordered around. I didn't pay much attention to those videos. You have to make them if you make records. You just have to. But you have to play live. You can't hide behind videos. I think once this video thing peaks out, people will get back to see who performs live and who don't.

X-RATED

I don't think censorship applies to me. It applies more to Top 40 artists. People who have hit records might have to be concerned with that, but I don't have those kinds of records that I'd have to be concerned about what I say. I'm just going to write any old song I feel like writing. The way I feel about it, I don't buy any of those records, anyway. I don't even like most of that music. I couldn't care at all if the records you hear on the radio are X-rated or R-rated. I don't think it's right, however, I'm opposed to it. I think every single song that you hear can be seen in another point of view from what it is. People have been reading stuff into my songs for years. I'd probably be the first one with a letter on their record.

WHICH LETTER?

F and B, Fire and Brimstone. But I don't know about the B, that could stand for Boring. Certainly a lot of stuff today would fall into that category.

RAINY DAY WOMEN

I've always been drawn to a certain kind of woman. It's the voice more than anything else. I listen to the voice first. It's that sound I heard when I was growing up. It was calling out to me. When everything was blank and void, I would listen for hours to the Staple Singers. It's that sort of gospel singing sound. Or that voice on the Crystal's record, Then He Kissed Me, Clydie King, Memphis Minnie, that type of thing. There's something in that voice, that whenever I hear it, I drop everything, whatever it is.

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN THE BODY DOESN'T MATCH THE VOICE?

A body is a body. A woman could be deaf, dumb, crippled, and blind and still have soul and compassion. That's all that matters to me. You can hear it in the voice.

I FORGOT MORE THAN YOU'LL EVER KNOW

I never had that much to do with Edie Sedgwick. I've seen where I have had, and read that I have had, but I don't remember Edie that well. I remember she was around, but I know other people who, as far as I know, might have been involved with Edie. Uh, she was a great girl. An exciting girl, very enthusiastic. She was around the Andy Warhol scene, and I drifted in and out of that scene, but then I moved out of the Chelsea Hotel. We, me and my wife, lived in the Chelsea Hotel on the third floor in 1965 or '66, when our first baby was born. We moved out of that hotel maybe a year before Chelsea Girls, and when Chelsea Girls came out, it was all over for the Chelsea Hotel. You might as well have burned it down. The notoriety it had gotten from that movie pretty much destroyed it.

I think Edie was in Chelsea Girls. I had lost total touch with her by that time, anyway. It may just have been a time when there was just a lot of stuff happening. Ondine, Steve Paul's Scene, Cheetah. That's when I would have known Edie if I would have known her, and I did know her, but I don't recall any type of relationship. If I did have one, I think I'd remember.

I THREW IT ALL AWAY

I once traded an Andy Warhol "Elvis Presley" painting for a sofa, which was a stupid thing to do. I always wanted to tell Andy what a stupid thing I done, and if he had another painting he would give me, I'd never do it again.

ANOTHER SIDE OF BOB DYLAN

I never read Freud. I've never been attracted to anything he has said, and I think he's started a lot of nonsense with psychiatry and that business. I don't think psychiatry can help or has helped anybody. I think it's a big fraud (pun not intended) on the public. Billions of dollars have changed hands that could be used for far better purposes. A lot of people have trouble with their parents up until they're 50, 60, 70 years old. They can't get off their parents. I never had that kind of problem with my parents. Like John Lennon, "Mother": "Mother, I had you but you never had me." I can't imagine that. I know a lot of people have. There are a lot of orphans in the world, for sure. But that's not been my experience. I have a strong identification with orphans, but I've been raised by people who feel that fathers, whether they're married or not, should be responsible for their children, that all sons should be taught a trade, and that parents should be punished for their children's crimes.

Actually, I was raised more by my grandmother. She was a fantastic lady. I love her so much, and I miss her a lot. But, getting back to the other thing, it all needs to be shaken up, and it will be. I never had any barriers to get across that were that clear to me, that I had to bust down to anything I truly loved. If I had any advantage over anybody at all, it's the advantage that I was all alone and could think and do what I wanted to. Looking back on it, it probably has a lot to do with growing up in northern Minnesota. I don't know what I would have been if I was growing up in the Bronx or Ethiopia or South America or even California. I think everybody's environment affects him in that way. Where I grew up... it's been a long time since. I forgot about it once I went east. I couldn't remember very much about it even then. I remember even less about it now. I don't have any long great story to tell about when I was a kid that would let anybody know how it is that I am what I am.

PATTI SMITH SAYS YOU WERE RIMBAUD IN A PREVIOUS INCARNATION

I don't know if she's right or wrong, but Patti Smith, then, of course, knows a lot of deep details that I might not be aware of. She might be clued in to something that's a little beyond me. I know at least a dozen women who tell me they were the Queen of Sheba. And I know a few Napoleons and two Joan of Arcs and one Einstein.

ALL ALONG THE WATCHTOWER

There weren't too many Jews in Hibbing, Minnesota. Most of them I was related to. The town didn't have a rabbi, and it was time for me to be bar mitzvahed. Suddenly a rabbi showed up under strange circumstances for only a year. He and his wife got off the bus in the middle of winter. He showed up just in time for me to learn this stuff. He was an old man from Brooklyn who had a white beard and wore a black hat and black clothes. They put him upstairs of the café, which was the local hangout. It was a rock n' roll café where I used to hang out, too. I used to go up there every day to learn this stuff, either after school or after dinner. After studying with him an hour or so, I'd come down and boogie. The rabbi taught me what I had to learn, and after he conducted this bar mitzvah, he just disappeared. The people didn't want him. He didn't look like anybody's idea of a rabbi. He was an embarrassment All the Jews up there shaved their heads and, I think, worked on Saturday. And I never saw him again. It's like he came and went like a ghost. Later I found out he was Orthodox. Jews separate themselves like that. Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, as if God calls them that. Christians, too. Baptists, Assembly of God, Methodists, Calvinists. God has no respect for a person's title. He don't care what you call yourself.

A PUFF OF SMOKE

I've never been able to understand the seriousness of it all, the seriousness of pride. People talk, act, live as if they're never going to die. And what do they leave behind? Nothing. Nothing but a mask.

KNOCKIN' ON HEAVEN'S DOOR

Whenever anybody does something in a big way, it's always rejected at home and accepted someplace else. For instance, that could apply to Buddha. Who was Buddha? An Indian. Who are Buddhists? Chinese, Japanese, Asian people. They make up the big numbers in Buddhism. It's the same way with Jesus being a Jew. Who did he appeal to? He appeals to people who want to get into heaven in a big way. But some day the true story will reveal itself, and by that time, people will be ready for it, because it's just going in that direction. You can come out and say it all now, but what does it matter? It's going to happen anyway. Vanities of vanities, that's all it is.

THEY'RE NOT SHOWING ANY LIGHTS TONIGHT

I went to Bible school at an extension of this church out in the Valley in Reseda, California. It was affiliated with the church, but I'm not a believer in that born-again type thing. Jesus told Nicodemus, "A man must be born again." And Nicodemus said, "How can I go through my mother's womb?" and Jesus said, "You must be born of the spirit" And that's where that comes from, that born-again thing. People have put a heavy trip on it. People can call you what they want. The media make up a lot of these words for the definition of people. I mean, who's a person anymore? Everything's done for the media. If the media don't know about it, it's not happening. They'll take the littlest thing and make it spectacular. They're in the business of doing that.

Everything's a business. Love, truth, beauty. Conversation is a business. Spirituality is not a business, so it's going to go against the grain of people who are trying to exploit other people. God doesn't look at people and say, "That's a banker, that's a dentist, that's an oil-well driller."

WHAT'S THE MESSIANIC COMPLEX?

All that exists is spirit, before, now and forever more. The messianic thing has to do with this world, the flesh world, and you got to pass through this to get to that The messianic thing has to do with the world of mankind, like it is. This world is scheduled to go for 7,000 years. Six thousand years of this, where man has his way, and 1,000 years when God has His way. Just like a week. Six days work, one day rest The last thousand years is called the Messianic Age. Messiah will rule. He is, was, and will be about God, doing God's business. Drought, famine, war, murder, theft, earthquake, and all other evil things will be no more. No more disease. That's all of this world.

What's gonna happen is this: you know when things change, people usually know, like in a revolution, people know before it happens who's coming in and who's going out All the Somozas and Batistas will be on their way out, grabbing their stuff and whatever, but you can forget about them. They won't be going anywhere. It's the people who live under tyranny and oppression, the plain, simple people, that count, like the multitude of sheep. They'll see that God is coming. Somebody representing Him will be on the scene. Not some crackpot lawyer or politician with the mark of the beast but somebody who makes them feel holy. People don't know how to feel holy. They don't know what it's about or what's right. They don't know what God wants of them. They'll want to know what to do and how to act Just like you want to know how to please any ruler. They don't teach that stuff like they do math, medicine, and carpentry, but now there will be a tremendous calling for it. There will be a run on godliness, just like now there's a run on refrigerators, headphones, and fishing gear. It's going to be a matter of survival. People are going to be running to find out about God, and who are they going to run to? They're gonna run to the Jews, 'cause the Jews wrote the book, and you know what? The Jews ain't gonna know. They're too busy in the fur business and in the pawnshops and in sending their kids to some atheist school. They're too busy doing all that stuff to know. People who believe in the coming of the Messiah live their lives right now as if he was here. That's my idea of it, anyway.

I know people are going to say to themselves, "What the fuck is this guy talking about?" But it's all there in black and white, the written and unwritten word. I don't have to defend this. The scriptures back me up. I didn't ask to know this stuff. It just came to me at different times from experiences throughout my life. Other than that, I'm just a rock n' roller, folk poet, gospel-blues-protest guitar player. Did I say that right?

BLOWIN' IN THE WIND

Politics have changed. The subject matter has changed. In the '60s there was a lot of people coming out of schools who were taught politics by professors who were political thinkers, and those people spilled over into the streets. What politics I ever learned, I learned in the streets, because it was part of the environment. I don't know where somebody would hear that now. Now everybody wants their own thing. There's no unity. There's the Puerto Rican Day parade, Polish Day, German Week, the Mexican parades. You have all these different types of people all waving their own flags, and there's no unity between all these people. In the '60s, there wasn't any separation. That's the difference between then and now that I can see. Everybody now is out for their own people and their own selves, and they should be 'cause they look around and see everything's unbalanced.

THE TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGIN'

The times still are a-changin', every day. I'm trying to slow down every day, because the times may be a-changin', but they're going by awfully fast. "When I was a child, I spoke as a child, I thought as a child. When I became a man, I put away childish things."

September 1985
Mikal Gilmore Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 511-516.

Mikal Gilmore, staff writer for the Los Angeles Herald Examiner, conducted this interview at his own home sometime during late September 1985. It was published on October 13 1985 under the headline of

"BOB DYLAN — AFTER ALL THESE YEARS IN THE SPOTLIGHT THE ELUSIVE STAR IS AT THE CROSSROADS AGAIN."

The man who showed up at my door one afternoon a few weeks back looked exactly like I had hoped and feared he would: with his mazy brown hair and his taut smile and with smoky sunglasses masking his inscrutable stare, he looked just like Bob Dylan. Almost too much so. Dressed in a sleeveless torn T-shirt, weather-worn black jeans and black motorcycle boots and, at 44, looking far more fit than I had seen him in any recent photos or video appearances, he seemed remarkably like the image of the younger Bob Dylan that is burned into our collective memory; the keen fierce man who often tore apart known views of the world with his acerbic gestures and eloquent yowls.

What brought Dylan to my door was simply that we had an interview to do, and since he had come to Hollywood anyway that day, this was the easiest place for him to do it. While this certainly made the meeting a lot more thrilling for me, it also made it a bit scarier. More than 20 years of image preceded him. This was a man who could be tense, capricious and baffling, and who was capable of wielding his image at a whim's notice in a way that could stupefy and intimidate not only interviewers but sometimes friends as well.

What I found instead was a man who didn't seem too concerned with brandishing his image – even for a moment. He offered his hand, flashed a slightly bashful smile, then walked over to my stereo, kneeled down and started to flip through a stack of some unfiled records on the floor – mostly L. P. s by older jazz, pop and country singers. He commented on most of what he came across: "The Delmore Brothers – God, I really love them. I think they've influenced every harmony I've ever tried to sing... This Hank Williams thing with just him and his guitar — man, that's something, isn't it? I used to sing these songs way back, a long time ago, even before I played rock n' roll as a teenager... Sinatra, Peggy Lee, yeah, I love all these people, but I tell you who I've really been listening to a lot lately — in fact, I'm thinking about recording one of his earlier songs — is Bing Crosby, I don't think you can find better phrasing anywhere".

That's pretty much how he was that afternoon: good-humored and gracious, but also thoughtful and often elaborate in his answers. And sometimes – when he talks about his Minnesota youth, or his early days in the folk scene under the enthrallment of Woody Guthrie – his voice grew softer and more deliberate, as if he were striving to pick just the right words to convey the exact detail of his memory. During these moments he sometimes lapsed into silence, but behind his sunglasses his eyes stayed active with thought, flickering back and forth as if reading a distant memory.

For the most part, though, sipping a Corona beer and smoking cigarettes he seemed generous and relaxed, sometimes even surprisingly candid, as he ranged through a wide stretch of topics. He talked about his recent work in videos: "Making these things is like pulling teeth. For one thing, because of that movie *Renaldo And Clara (Dylan's 1978 film of the Rolling Thunder Revue – widely viewed as a disaster), I haven't been in a place where I could ask for my own control over these things – plus, because my records aren't exactly selling like Cyndi Lauper's or Bruce's, I didn't feel I had the credibility to demand that control".

"But the company wanted me to try one more (to help boost Empire Burlesque's sales) and I said I would, as long as I got to name Dave Stewart (of Eurythmics) as director. His stuff had a spontaneous look to it, and somehow I just figured he would understand what I was doing. And he did: He put together a great band for this lip-sync video and set us up with the equipment on this little stage in a church somewhere in West L.A. So between all the time they took setting up camera shots and lights and all that stuff, we could just play live for this little crowd that had gathered there".

"I can't even express how good that felt – in fact, I was trying to remember the last time I'd felt that kind of direct connection, and finally I realised it must have been back in the '50s, when I was 14 or 15 years old playing with four-piece rock n' roll bands back in Minnesota. Back in those days there weren't any sound systems or anything that you had to bother with. You'd set up your amplifiers and turn them up to where you wanted to turn them. That just doesn't happen anymore. Now there are just so many things that get in the way of that kind of feeling, that simple directness. For some reason, making this video just made me realise how far everything has come these last several years – and how far I'd come".

His reaction to pop's new social activism, and such efforts as Live Aid, U.S.A. for Africa and Farm Aid, is somewhat mixed. "While it's great that people are supporting U.S.A. for Africa and Farm Aid, what are they really doing to alleviate poverty? It's almost like guilt money. Some guy halfway round the world is starving so O.K., put 10 bucks in the barrel, then you can feel you don't have to have a guilty conscience about it. Obviously, on some level it does help, but as far as any sweeping movement to destroy hunger and poverty, I don't see that happening".

"Still, Live Aid and Farm Aid are fantastic things, but then musicians have always done things like that. When people want a benefit, you don't see them calling dancers or architects or lawyers or even politicians – the power of music is that it has always drawn people together".

"But at the same time, while they're asking musicians to raise money, they're also trying to blacklist our records, trying to take somebody like Prince and Madonna off the radio – the same people that they ask to help raise funds. And it isn't just them: when they're talking about blacklisting records and giving them ratings, they're talking about everybody".

Dylan is pleased by Bruce Springsteen's growing popularity, but he has a warning too. "Bruce knows where he comes from – he has taken what everybody else has done and made his own thing of it – and that's great. But somebody'll come along after Bruce, say 10 or 20 years from now, and maybe they'll be looking to Bruce as their primary model and somehow miss the fact (that his music comes from Elvis Presley and Woody Guthrie). In other words all they're going to get is Bruce, they're not gonna get what Bruce got".

"If you copy somebody – and there's nothing wrong with that – the top rule should be to go back and copy the guy that was there first It's like all the people who copied me over the years, too many of them just got me, they didn't get what I got".

Dylan was a bit less expansive when it came to discussing his own historical presence in rock n' roll. He seemed more moved or involved when discussing the inspiration he felt during his early immersion in rock n' roll and the folk, beat and poetry scenes than in deliberating over any questions about his own triumphs – such as the seismic impact he had on international pop culture once he fused folk tradition, rock revolt, political insight and poetic ability into a personalised, myth-making style.

"There are certain things you can say you've done along the way that count," he said, "but in the end it's not really how many records you sell (Dylan has sold more than 35 million) or how big a show you play or even how many people end up imitating you. I know I've done a lot of things, but if I'm proud of anything, it's maybe that I helped bring somebody like Woody Guthrie – who was not a household name – to a little more attention, the same way that the Rolling Stones helped to bring Howling Wolf more recognition. It's because of Woody Guthrie and people like him that I originally set out to do what I've done. Stumbling onto Woody Guthrie just blew my mind".

"Then again, I never really dwell on myself too much in terms of what I've done. For one thing, so much of it went by in such a flash, it's hard for me to focus on. I was once offered a great deal of money for an autobiography, and I thought about it for a minute, then I decided I wasn't ready. I have to be sat down and have this stuff drawn out of me, because on my own I wouldn't think about these things. You just go ahead and you live your life and you move onto the next thing, and when it's all said and done, the historians can figure it out That's the way I look at it".

Despite his reluctance, Dylan did look back recently at some length at the behest of Columbia Records, which has been trying for three years to elicit his co-operation and enthusiasm over Biograph, a five-L.P. retrospective of his career from 1962 to 1981. The package (which is due for release in early November) features 53 tracks, including 18 previously unreleased recordings and three scarce singles. Just as importantly, the set also includes a 36-page booklet by author-screenwriter Cameron Crowe (Fast Times at Ridgemont High) that features extensive commentary and reflections by Dylan. His own critiques of his political anthems, love songs, religious declarations, narrative epics, poetic fancies, rock inventions and long-buried gems are fascinating.

Except for Crowe's booklet, Dylan hasn't much use for the Biograph project. "I've never really known what this thing is supposed to be," he said, "There's more stuff that hasn't been heard before, but most of my stuff has already been bootlegged, so to anybody in the know, there's nothing on it they haven't heard before. I probably would've put different things on it that haven't been heard before, but I didn't pick the material. I didn't put it together and I haven't been very excited about this thing. All it is, really, is repackaging, and it'll just cost a lot of money. About the only thing that makes it special is Cameron's book".

Perhaps Dylan's objections to Biograph derive from an aversion to being consigned to any kind of definitive history when so much of his history remains to be written. Perhaps they also stem from an understanding that no single collection could ever bind or explain a career as wide-ranging and restive as his, nor could it ever satisfy the critics, detractors, defenders and partisans who have scrutinised, acclaimed, assailed and debated his work with more fervor and attention than any other American post-war musician has received. Beginning with his ninth album, John Wesley Harding (1968), virtually every subsequent release has been greeted as either a comeback, a stinging disappointment or an out-and-out betrayal of his early promise and beliefs.

While this later work hasn't affected pop culture as much as his early songs did (but then, what could?), it's also true that much of it amounts to a resourceful body of music – often beautiful and daring, sometimes perturbing or confused, but always informed by an aspiring and uncompromising conscience.

Still, while Empire Burlesque sold respectably (around the half-million mark), it didn't attain the commercial prominence that was expected. Does that bother or disappoint Dylan?

"Yeah," he said without hesitation. "In fact, it concerns me to a point where I was thinking about regrouping my whole thought on making records. If the records I make are only going to sell a certain amount, then why do I have to spend a lot of time putting them together? You see, I haven't always been into recording all that much. It used to be that I would go in and try to get some kind of track which was magical, with a vocal on it, and just wait for those moments. I mean, talk about (Bruce Springsteen's) Nebraska. People say to me, "When you gonna make a Nebraska album?" Well, I love that record, but I think I've made five or six Nebraska albums, you know".

Dylan stopped, shrugged and poured a little more beer into his glass. "You know," he said, "I can't release all the stuff that I want to release. I've got a lot of just melodic instrumentals laying around. I was thinking the other day that maybe I should put them out, but I can't. I've also got a record of just me and Clydie King singing together and it's great, but it doesn't fall into any category that the record company knows how to deal with. It's like... well, something like the Delmore Brothers: It's very simple and the harmonies are great. If it was up to me I'd put that kind of stuff out, or I would've put some of it on Biograph but it's not up to me. Anyway, who's to know what people would make of it?"

I'd heard similar stories from various sources over the last few years – about whole projects that had been discouraged, if not altogether nixed by CBS. I'd even heard tapes of some of the unreleased works, and many of them are stunning. Such still-unreleased tracks as Blind Willie McTell, Death Is Not The End and Lord Protect My Child are among the most stirring work he has done, providing sharp commentaries on physical and spiritual despair and hard-earned moral hope. Hearing these, as well as the better material on Infidels and Empire Burlesque, one realises that Dylan still has a great deal to say – that he is once again at a creative crossroads. At the same time, one fears that he may withhold such uncompromising work out of deference to the expectations of the marketplace.

That was a matter I didn't get to explore because, as quickly as Dylan can enter a room, he can also leave one. "It's late. I should go," he said, standing up, offering his hand and heading for the door. Looking out and realising that night had fallen, he finally took off his sunglasses. It was nice to look, even if just for a moment, into those clear blue eyes.

In a way, I was glad that the question had gone unasked. How was I going to put it: Are you going to redeem every promise we've ever inferred from your work and legend? It was fitting to remember something Sam Shepard once said of Dylan; "The repercussions of his art don't have to be answered by him at all. They fall on us as questions and that's where they belong". That his art still inspires such questions tells me everything I need to know about his remaining promise.

September 1985
Charles Young interview for MTV, California

Source: Talkin' Bob Dylan 1984 & 1985 (Some Educated Rap) by Stewart P. Bicker, pp. 47-49.

CY: I was wondering what your feelings were about this kind of public expectation that is put on you.

BD: Well you know I'm not running for any office, it's not like I have to try and please all the people. Singers and musicians seem to have more of an authority with the people than say a movie star would. I don't know why that is, but they seem to hang onto to every single thing that a singer might say, whereas a movie star who's subject to just as much idolatry – they don't care what he does. You know, they'll see him in any movie. I don't know if that makes any sense, but I don't think it's fair to hang onto a singer such a great burden... to be a leader. Especially as nobody follows them anyway.

CY: What was it about the state of American farms that made you want to participate in Farm Aid?

BD: Well the idea came to me when all that money was being raised for the famine in Africa. I'd gotten a lot of letters from people who were having their farms repossessed.

BD: I think musicians have always responded to people in need. You see musicians usually start out with nothing, don't forget that. Anybody who has reached any kind of success has started out with nothing, because musicians... it's like all you know how to do to escape from the hum-drum of daily existence it's something only you can do that nobody else can take away. So musicians always keep a tie to wherever they came from.

CY: The mood on this new record seemed to be quite friendly, there's a lot of stuff about love. Whereas during your Christian period there seemed to be an element of self-righteousness. Is that a fair perception?

BD: Yeah, that's a fair perception. But you know there are many sides to the coin, and the longer you go on the more sides you show. Sides that are there to be unravelled. And at this time that was just the record. But I believe in the other things too... self-righteousness would be just to repeat what you know has been written down in scripture some place else. It's not like you're trying to convince anybody of anything, you're just saying what the original rule is, and it's just coming through you. But if someone else can get past you saying it and just hear what the message is, well then it's not coming from you but through you. And I don't see anything wrong in that.

CY: I've been told that you're somewhat dissatisfied with some of your past videos, is that true?

BD: (Laughing) I don't know, I never even saw my past videos, except in passing you know. I've never been that excited about 'em you know.

CY: But you were more excited with what Dave Stewart came up with?

BD: Yeah, I was more excited to work with him because I've always liked his work a lot.
I'd heard that Dave was a good director, so I called him you know, er... and asked him if he wanted to do the video – and he said he would – so we just did it.
I would be going (to Dave Stewart's studio in London) just to make a record in that type of atmosphere. You know, the way Dave explained it, it sounds as if it's not so controlled. When you're working in the studios here the clocks are always running, people are always looking at their watches, and there's lunch-breaks and phone calls. So I figured it might be easier to make a lot of records...

CY: Bob, you look pretty healthy these days, are you jogging, taking care of yourself?

BD: Well I feel healthy, (laughter) I don't know what I've been doing. I'm not doing anything differently, I'm just... maybe the longer you do it – maybe the healthier you get.

So, for a person who might not know who I am you know... it covers a lot of different periods, it's just a re-package kind of thing. There are a bunch of old songs and some new things that haven't been heard before, they aren't new but they just have never been released.
I'll be touring next year, a certain amount of shows... you know like sixty to one hundred, I'm not really sure how many shows I'd want to do... but I'll have a touring group…

19 September 1985
Bob Brown (20/20 ABC TV) Interview, Malibu California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1051-1052.

An interview with Bob Brown for a profile on the 20/20 television program which takes place on Bob's estate at Malibu. Interestingly, he reveals that he was not at all convinced about the message behind We Are The World – "I don't think people can save themselves."

BB: Do your children have some kind of an idea of what you meant?

BD: I think so, on some kind of level, but when I was growing up in the fifties, the thirties to me didn't even exist. I just couldn't imagine them in any kind of way. So I don't suspect anybody growing up now will really understand what the sixties were all about.

BD: I used to think it was better if you just live and die and no-one knows who you are.

From the beginning Dylan, now 44 years old has shied away from publicity, granting few print interviews, never agreeing to a television network news interview until now. We spoke with him on a hillside on his estate in Malibu, California, where the wind blew in from the Pacific just below his house. Because the mythology surrounding Dylan has been so embroiled in change and controversy it was interesting to find him low key, cordial, soft spoken.

BB: Depending on how your music has evolved there have been people who have actually got angry because they felt it had changed. Did that ever bother you?

BD: Well, it's always disappointing, you know, if when people, er, decide for one reason or another they don't like your work any more. But, er... you know, it's just one of those things. You can't try to please people in that kind of a way because then you'd just, er, gonna be doing... er... you'll never live it down, you know... it'll just be... you know... always be dogging you around that you might be being a fake about the whole thing.

BB: So it's sort of a no-win situation, I guess.

BD: It's not important what other people call you, if you yourself know you're a fake, that's tougher to live with.

BB: Is protest song an accurate description of some of the things you were doing?

BD: Yeah, I guess so. But the real protest songs were written really in the thirties and forties, Which Side Are You On, mining type songs, union kind of songs. Er... that's where the protest movement developed from. There's still a strain of that type of thing in what I do, it's just more broad now.

BB: Do you view the lyrics that you write as poetry?

BD: I always felt the need for that type of rhyme to say any type of thing that you wanted to say. But then again I don't know if I call myself a poet or not. I would like to but I'm not really qualified, I don't think, to make that decision. Because I come in on such a back door that... I don't know what a, you know, Robert Frost or Keats or T.S. Eliot would really think of my stuff. It's more of a visual type thing for me: I could picture the color of the song or the shape of it or who it is that I'm trying to appeal to in this song and what I'm trying to almost reinforce my feelings for. And I know that sounds sort of vague and abstract, but I've got a handle on it when I'm doing it.

BD: The phrasing I stumbled into. Some of the old folksingers used to phrase things in an interesting way... and then I got my style from seeing a lot of outdoor type poets who would recite their poetry. When you don't have a guitar you recite things differently, and there used to be quite a few poets in the jazz clubs who would recite with a different type of attitude.

BD: Well, people can change things and make a difference... but there is a lot of false prophets around though. And... that's the trouble, people say they think they know what's right and other people they get people to follow them because they have a certain type of charisma. And there's always people willing to take over you know, people want a leader you know – and there'll be more and more of them.

BB: There have been times when Born Again Christianity, orthodox Judaism... both of those were important to you?

BD: Yeah.

BB: Or is it a broader thing for you?

BD: No... I wanna figure out what's happening, you know. And... so I did look into it all.

BB: Did it make life easier?

BD: Not necessarily. No!

BB: Did it make it clearer?

BD: It definitely made it clearer. There's a place you have to work certain things out.

BB: What is it that you do have to work out?

BD: Well, you have to work out where your place is... And who you are. Er... but we are all spirit, it's all we are; we're just walking, you know, dressed up in a suit of skin... and we're gonna leave that behind.

BD: It's like people buying a song and the money going to the starving people in Africa... well you know, it's a worthwhile idea but I wasn't so convinced about the message of the song (We Are The World). To tell you the truth I don't think people can save themselves... I just don't agree with that type of thing.

BD: I like the fans, but I don't feel I have an obligation to be an example to them... like maybe a baseball player or a football player would. I don't think I really have to set an example that somebody else has to live up to.

BB: What kind of beliefs do you have in yourself to write the kind of songs you write?

BD: Oh... there's not really a belief. I really have very little belief in myself to do anything. I just pull it off, you know, it's amazing to me that I even do it.

October 1985
David Fricke Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke pp. 273-276.

An interview in a Los Angeles hotel, published in Rolling Stone on December 5th 1985.

"I've made all the difference I'm going to," Bob Dylan declares. "My place is secure, whatever it is. I'm not worried about having to do the next thing or keeping in step with the times. I've sold millions of records. I've done all the big shows. I've had all the acclaim at one time or another. I'm not driven anymore to prove that I'm the top dog."

Dylan makes this startling announcement, the closest he's ever come to a formal retirement speech, with minimal flourish – a slow drag on his Kool, a quick swig of Heineken. It is strange talk from a man in the midst of a rare interview blitz, ostensibly to aid his latest album, Empire Burlesque.

But while Dylan is cordial, even frank, in his answers ("I'm always accused of not being helpful", he says, chuckling), there is a hint of weary indignation in his voice, as if he's grown tired of his own weighty legend. At forty-four, Dylan no longer worries about making hits – or history.

"I don't feel I've got anything to prove", he insists, sitting poolside at a Los Angeles hotel, a black leather jacket draped over his scarecrow shoulders against the early evening chill. "I've got every legitimate right to do what I want to. Whether it sells records or not, I don't know."

Dylan's new statement of purpose comes after years of apparent insecurity, of coping with radical shifts in mainstream rock and young audiences with new expectations and heroes. Since easing away from the combative fundamentalism of his Christian albums, he has zigzagged from the rootsy sizzle and modest AOR polish of 1983's Infidels to Arthur Baker's animated, high-tech mixing job on Empire Burlesque. Nervy experiments in the tradition of his electric and later country transformations in the Sixties, both LPs suggest an uncertainty about his relevance in the MTV decade.

Yet his continued influence is unquestionable, evident in the new acoustic pop of Suzanne Vega and the hardcore protest-punk of Husker Du and the Minutemen. When Dylan traveled to Moscow earlier this year to appear at a poetry festival (he was permitted to sing his "poetry"), he was amazed to see young Russian fans thrusting dog-eared copies of his earliest albums at him for autographs.

"The young people who normally would have come out to see me didn't know I was there," he says almost apologetically. "But one day I went to this banquet, and the streets were packed with people who somehow found out. There wasn't any music atmosphere; it was very controlled. They didn't ask anything. They just wanted me to sign their records. I don't know where they got them."

Dylan has also been unusually visible at home this year. He made three videos to promote Empire Burlesque, including two with Dave Stewart of Eurythmics. He closed the July 13th Live Aid concert in Philadelphia and plugged in with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers for a vibrant electric set at Farm Aid. A suggestion he made from the Live Aid stage about using some of the incoming millions to pay off a few U. S. farm mortgages inspired Willie Nelson and Neil Young to set Farm Aid in motion – proof positive that when Bob Dylan mutters, the world still listens.

"I didn't think anybody heard me, because I couldn't even hear myself say it," Dylan says with a wry smile. He blames the ragged quality of his Live Aid contribution on sound problems. The mix onstage was so muddy, he complains, that he didn't think anybody in John F. Kennedy Stadium or in the global TV and radio audience noticed his remark.

"But it occurred to me at that moment that a lot of money was being raised for people to be self-sufficient. And it came to me that people in this country need to be self-sufficient. I thought it was relevant."

However, he questions the comparisons drawn between recent charity rock-events like Live Aid and USA for Africa (he also sang on We Are The World) and the student activism of yesteryear. "The big difference between now and the sixties is that then it was much more dangerous to do that sort of thing. There were people trying to stop the show in any kind of way they could. There was a lot more violence. Then, you didn't know which end the trouble was coming from. And it could come at any time."

"Now people seem to be a lot more passive about the whole thing. 'If you can do something great'. Nobody's going to take any offense to it."

"The same limp sentiment also dominates the record charts," he grumbles. "The kids are getting a raw deal. Nobody's telling them anything through music anymore." He casts a disdainful look over his shoulder at the hotel PA system, which is piping Duran Duran's Hungry Like The Wolf into the crisp evening air. "They're just getting a lot of consumer products that aren't doing them any good. Sooner or later, they're going to rebel against it all."

It is unlikely that the young upstarts will be claiming Empire Burlesque for their anthem as they battle Tears for Fears to the death. Dylan acknowledges, without bitterness, that he's not part of the daily soundtrack for a lot of the eighties teens. "They don't need to follow me," he concedes. "They have their own people to follow." Indeed, Dylan's recent albums have sold modestly compared to the platinum achievements of spiritual heirs like Bruce Springsteen and Dire Straits' Mark Knopfler. When asked if he heard any of himself in Springsteen's Nebraska, he barks, "Yeah, but so what? I'm too old to start over and too young to blow my horn about all the people that ripped me off."

Yet Empire Burlesque – highlighted by the Hurricane -like disco gallop of When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky – represents a significant gamble on Dylan's part.. Unwilling to bow to the pressures of mainstream success, he is nevertheless keen to use the new pop science to his own ends.

"I don't know how do the thing with the studio where you use it as another instrument." he admits helplessly. "A lot of kids can, but it's too late for me."

Instead, he recruited Arthur Baker, best known for remixing other peoples records beyond recognition, not to commercialize Empire Burlesque but to retain the "live" integrity of the original sessions. Dylan cut the album in isolated spurts of creativity over some eighteen months, mostly in Los Angeles with an electric supporting cast that included Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare, some of Petty's Heartbreakers and ex-Rolling Stone Mick Taylor. Clean Cut Kid dates back to the earliest sessions. Tight Connections To My Heart (Has Anybody Seen My Love) is a reworked version of a song originally cut for Infidels.

"My difficulty in making a record," Dylan continues, "is that when I record something in a studio, it never sounds anything like it when I get the tapes back. Whatever kind of live sound I'm working for, it always gets lost in the machines. Years ago, I could go in, do it and it would translate onto tape. It gets so cleaned up today that anything wrong you do doesn't get onto the tape. And my stuff is based on wrong things."

He expects Dave Stewart to make the most of his wrongs when the two go into the studio by year's end to cut some tracks for a possible spring release. (Dylan apparently does not plan to issue any of the material he recently cut with Keith Richards and Ron Wood in several impromptu hotel-room sessions) Stewart has already done wonders for Dylan's ailing video image with his sympathetic executive production of the clips for When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky and Emotionally Yours. For the former, a lively black and white mock-concert sequence, Stewart assembled a punk who's who (including former Blondie drummer Clem Burke and Feargal Sharkey of the disbanded Undertones) to mime vigorously behind Dylan. Emotionally Yours, which segues into romantic flashbacks after the gig, was done at his record company's request, Dylan mentions coolly.

"If you want to sell records, I'm told you gotta make videos," he says with a chuckle. "I know they're thought of as an art form, but I don't think they are. They're on and they're over too fast." – this coming, of course, from the director of the four-hour surrealist treatment of the '75 Rolling Thunder tour, Renaldo and Clara. Dylan's main complaint with his past videos, though, is that he rarely got his money's worth. Surprisingly, he cites George Lois' unique concept for Infidels Jokerman, a daring illustration of Dylan's lyrics with paintings by Michelangelo and Hieronymus Bosch spliced with deadpan close-ups of Dylan. He admits the paintings were spectacular, but he hated those close-ups.

"I never know what anybody's doing with me. They filmed me from thirty yards away. What are they looking at? When I saw the videos, all I saw was a shot of me from my mouth to my forehead on the screen. I figure, "Isn't that somethin'? I'm paying for that?"

Dylan's Farm Aid rock-out with the Heartbreakers reaffirmed his stage powers. He's looking forward to a major concert tour next year, his first full-scale US trek since the half-sacred, half-secular Shot Of Love shows in 1981. If the Heartbreakers weren't available for a lengthy jaunt across the States in '86, Dylan's not worried about forming another road unit.

"Actually, anybody can play with me and I can play with anybody," he jokes. "I'm sure I could go to a hall sometime and pick people out of the audience to play with me. I'm not looking for anything special in a band. I'm looking for guys who are enthusiastic and know the kind of music I know, who can play strongly on the structure of the song and have a knowledge of folk music and rock 'n roll."

Dylan's roots in the former and cataclysmic impact on the latter over two decades are neatly summarized in the new Columbia Records five-album retrospective set, Biograph, an exhaustive accounting of Dylan's best work from 1962 to 1981 that includes eighteen previously unreleased recordings. "It's not a record that people are going to make a big fuss over," Dylan ho hums, noting that a few of the rarities are actually alternate takes (Heart Of Mine and Forever Young among them and that most have been bootlegged extensively over the years). But Biograph is significant both as a collection of essential Dylan recordings, fifty three in all, and for it's round-up of elusive gems like Percy's Song, a live Visions of Johanna and a seething electric I Don't Believe You from his 1966 Belfast concert with the future members of the Band. Dylan also cared enough to write his own liner notes in which he explains for the first time, track by track, the people, places and motives behind his best-known songs.

"I'm not reluctant to talk about my songwriting, not no one has ever really asked me the right things," Dylan says, grinning. "I just tried to be brief, remember kind of how things happened. I'm not really a nostalgia freak. Every time you see my name, it's 'the sixties this, the sixties that'. It's just another way of categorizing me." In the Biograph booklet, he says, "I had the chance to clarify a lot of wrong things said about me. It was a chance to set a few things straight."

The one songwriting secret Dylan does not divulge is how he does it. "It's still hard for me to talk about playing, about songwriting. It's like a guy digging a ditch. It's hard to talk about how the dirt feels on the shovel."

October 1985
Robert Hilburn Interview, Malibu, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 537-540.

Hilburn was asked by Columbia Records to conduct a promotional interview for the Biograph collection. The interview was conducted in early October in the backyard of Dylan's Malibu home just before he left for London. It was published in the L.A. Times on 17th November 1985 and was syndicated to various newspapers in the U.S. such as the Chicago Sun Times who printed it also on the 17th under the banner –

AT 44: BOB DYLAN LOOKS BACK

Maybe it's because he did not give interviews at all for years, or maybe it is just that he is the most important songwriter of the modern pop era, but I cannot imagine passing up the chance to talk to Bob Dylan – even if strings are attached.

The interview invitation from Columbia Records suggested that Dylan only wanted to discuss his latest album: Empire Burlesque, the studio collection from last summer and Biograph, the ambitious retrospective set that just hit the stores.

Dylan himself quickly cut the strings. He showed little interest in those subjects as he sat on a chair in the backyard of his Malibu home.

"The new releases?," Dylan asked almost sheepishly, "I hope you don't make this look like some carny trying to hawk his own records. I don't know if you even want to hit on the records. When people think of me, they are not necessarily going to buy the latest record, anyway. They may buy a record from years ago. Besides I don't think interviews sell records."

So why did Dylan agree to a series of interviews, including his first formal network TV interview (for "20/20")?

"I really haven't had that much connection or conversation (over the years) with the people at Columbia" he said, referring to his record label for most of two decades. "Usually I turn in my records, and they release them. But they really like this record (Empire Burlesque), so they asked me to do some videos and a few interviews to draw attention to it."

"But that doesn't mean I want to sit around and talk about the record. I haven't even listened to it since it came out I'd rather spend my time working on new songs or listen to other people's records. Have you heard the new Hank Williams album, the collection of old demo tapes? it's great."

About the project, Dylan said: "Columbia wanted to put out (a retrospective) album on me a few years ago. They had pulled out everything (from earlier albums) that could be classified as love songs and had it on one collection. I didn't care one way or another, but I had a new record coming out, so I asked them not to do it then."

"I guess it's OK for someone who has never heard of me and is looking for a crash course or something. But I've got a lot of stuff that is lying around all over the place in cassette recorders that I'd put out if I was putting the set together."

One thing about Biograph that does please Dylan is a 36-page booklet written by Cameron Crowe, who wrote numerous Rolling Stone magazine profiles and the book and then the screenplay Fast Times at Ridgemont High. The Biograph text is a brief, affectionate look at Dylan's life with generous quotes from the songwriter.

Dylan, 44, is not being open just to the press these days. For years he has tended to be isolated even when doing a benefit concert – avoiding photographers and, often, other artists backstage by arriving just before showtime and leaving quickly after the last number.

At September's Farm Aid benefit at the University of Illinois however, he was almost leisurely hanging out with Tom Petty, whose band backed him on the show, and chatting with other performers including Randy Newman, Lou Reed and Emmylou Harris. Normally camera-shy, Dylan did not even turn away when a TV crew and a few photographers pointed their lenses at him as he sat on steps outside his dressing room trailer.

One reason for the naturalness, a backstage observer joked at Farm Aid, was that Dylan wanted to prove – after his disastrously spacey performance with the Stones' Keith Richard and Ron Wood at Live Aid – that he still had his faculties.

"Yeah," Dylan grumped about July's Live Aid concert in Philadelphia, "They screwed around with us. We didn't even have any (sound) monitors out there. When they threw in the grand finale at the last moment, they took all the settings off and set the stage up for the 30 people who were standing behind the curtain. We couldn't even hear our own voices (out front), and when you can't hear, you can't play; you don't have any timing. It's like proceeding on radar."

Dylan's Malibu home, on a bluff overlooking the ocean, is quite secluded and a guard shack at the only entrance to the property keeps the curious away. The atmosphere is rural. A dirt driveway runs through the property, and lots of small animals, including chickens and a few large dogs roam around.

On this cool afternoon, Dylan was wearing the same outfit that he has always seemed to be wearing in recent years, jeans looking as if they were ready for the hamper, a wrinkled T-shirt and motorcycle boots. Except for Europe last year, he has not toured much in the 80's. Still he is on the road so much – Minnesota, New York, London or some more isolated exotic places – that he does not really call any place home.

"I'm just not the kind of person who seems to be able to settle down," he said as two dogs edged against his chair. "If I'm in L.A. for say, two months, I'll be in the studio for maybe a month out of that time, putting down ideas for songs."

"On the other days I'm usually recuperating from being in the studio. I usually stay in a long time, all night, part of the day. Then I'll go off to New York or London and do the same thing. I'm going to London soon to work on some stuff with Dave Stewart."

Stewart, one half of the Eurythmics, joined Dylan on guitar on the Emotionally Yours video.

Dylan expects to concentrate on performance videos because he has not been pleased with concert clips based upon his songs – either the arty Jokerman video or more conventional narrative of Tight Connection.

He would probably just as soon not do videos at all, but realizes their importance in the market place.

"It used to be that people would buy a record if they liked what they heard on the radio, but video has changed a lot of that," he said. "If someone comes along now with a new song, people talk about 'Well, what does it look like?' It is like 'I saw this new song'."

One continuing question for Dylan is his much-publicized 'born-again' Christian phase. He has said he does not like the term "born-again", and his music has moved away from the aggressive dogma of the Slow Train Coming album. But Dylan still refuses to define his exact religion.

"I fell like pretty soon I am going to write about that," he said. "I feel like I got something to say but more than you can say in a few paragraphs in a newspaper."

He did smile at the mention of the hostile reactions generated during his 'born-again' Christian tours of 1979 and 1980. "If you make people jump on any level, I think it is worth while, because people are so asleep."

Beyond music, Dylan's special interest these days is art. He maintains an artist's studio behind his Malibu house and showed off his character sketches, with the nervous excitement of a proud parent. He hopes to put them in a book and write something to go with each drawing. Dylan is also thinking about a book of short stories.

On his continued energy he said: "It's kinda funny. When I see my name anywhere, it's (often) the '60s this or the '60s that. I can't figure out sometimes if people think I'm dead or alive."

This man who has been hounded, dissected, idolized and ridiculed over the years, stepped outside the studio. The sun had set and the dogs raced over to him. He paused – as if searching for a summary statement. "I've had some personal ups and downs, but usually things have been pretty good for me," he finally said. "I don't feel old, but I remember in my 20's (when) I'd think about people in their 30's as old. The thing I really notice now is time."

"Things used to go a lot slower. The days now go by so very fast. But I've never felt numb (about life). There is something about the chords, the sound of them that makes you feel alive. As long as you can play music, I believe you'll feel alive."

November 1985
Denise Worrell Interview, Malibu, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 907-915.

A major interview conducted by Time correspondent Denise Worrell in a small cabin at Dylan's Malibu estate during November 1985. It was published in her book Icons: Intimate Portraits which also contains interviews with numerous other stars including Madonna, Nastasia Kinski and Bette Middler. Extracts from the interview appeared in Time magazine on November 25th 1985 under the heading It's All Right In Front – Dylan on life and rock.

BOB DYLAN DOWN EXECUTIONER'S ROW

The sun is slipping fast under the edge of the silver ocean when I reach Malibu. Halfway down Blue Water Street there is a high hedge growing along a chain-link fence. I follow it and turn left into a dirt drive. On the right in the middle of an open field are a guardhouse and a dog. Lined up along the fence on the left are ancient, disabled cars: one a green-and-white ambulance with pointed fins, another a battered white trailer with no wheels. A gate hidden in the fence opens, and Bob Dylan's assistant, Carol, asks me to follow her. We walk past a vegetable garden. Dozens of chickens are scratching and pecking in the yard. A Mexican man feeding the chickens smiles at us. Dogs run around and bark. We take a path to a cabin some distance from the main house which fades into twilight.

The walls, floors, and ceilings of the cabin are made of dark wood. There is a blaze a foot high in the corner fireplace. A stereo is sitting on a cardboard box by the door. There are a couple of couches and a coffee table with a bouquet of pink peonies on it. A room on the right is completely bare. There is a kitchen on the left. A wooden stairway leads to what must be a sleeping loft upstairs. I look out a window and see a brick patio with a Jacuzzi. Feeble light comes from a lantern near the fire. I sit down, and Carol brings in coffee and a plate of chocolate finger wafers. She says "I'll go get Bob."

Dylan stands in the shadows of the doorway for half a second. It is chilly, but he is wearing light blue cotton shorts, almost like men's boxer shorts, and a Hawaiian-style blue short-sleeved shirt that is open to the waist. He has a pair of blue thongs on his feet. He gets a cup of coffee and sits next to me on the couch. He has a pack of Kool cigarettes in his chest pocket and smokes maybe five or six while we talk. His fingernails are all very long and pointed. It looks as if he files them to keep the points. His hair is curly and brown and reaches almost to his shoulders. He has stubble on his face. There are bags under his eyes, a diamond stud in his left ear. He doesn't smile, but he laughs a few times. He seems slightly harassed or tired and he keeps rubbing his eyes and running his fingers through his hair and pulling it. Once or twice he leans his head on his arm against the couch. While he sits he sometimes pulls his bare legs underneath him.

He seems oblivious to his surroundings. It is cold and dark, and grows darker as the fire dies out. Once Dylan gets up to put on another log. It burns quickly, and finally we are sitting in near total darkness. I can't see my notes except where I have highlighted them in pink, yellow, orange, and green fluorescent marker. Outside the door, dogs bay without stop. We talk about Biograph, the unprecedented five-record retrospective of his career just released by Columbia Records; we talk about a few other things. Dylan, forty-four, is intense but vague about all details. There are long, aching pauses in the conversation when he considers his thoughts. He cannot be hurried. He is rambling and repetitive but then speaks a word or phrase that stuns, that conjures truth. As he talks I get the sense of waves slapping the side of a boat, or of many rings circling a planet.

BIOGRAPH

"It wasn't my idea to put the record out. This record had been suggested in the past, but I guess it just didn't come together until recently. I think it's been in the works for like three years. I had very little to do with it. I didn't choose the songs. A lot of people probably had a hand in it. The record company has the right to do whatever they please with the songs. I didn't care about what was on the record. I haven't sat down and listened to it. I don't know why. I guess I just never did. Even when I make a record, I listen to it once or twice before it's out, and then once it's out, I don't really listen to it anymore. I'm always doing my current record. Last year's record is sort of in the past. I didn't really take a hand in this because my enthusiasm for making records might not be what it was twenty years ago. I don't know."

THIS SILENCE OF TONGUES IT WAS BUILDING

"This five-record set could have been all unreleased songs. If it was worth my while, I could put together a ten-record set of unreleased songs of mine, songs that have never gotten out and songs that have been bootlegged. Some of those unreleased songs I have, some I have in arrangements. I have a lot of the stuff in different places, just cassettes we made here and there. I would have to call some people, I guess, and say, 'What have you got that I can't remember?' Yeah, I've got songs I can't remember. Everybody's got songs they can't remember. I'm the final judge of what goes on and off my records. This last record I just did, Empire Burlesque, there were nine songs I knew belonged on it, and I needed a tenth. I had about four songs, and one of those was going to be the tenth song. I finally figured out that the tenth song needed to be acoustic, so I just wrote it. I wrote it because none of the other songs fit that slot, that certain place. So now what would happen to those four songs? One of them really didn't get finished, the others just got left. When I go back in the studio next time, I'll look at all that stuff. I'll sort through it. It's on twenty-four-track tape somewhere."

ROBBED MY BOOTS AND I WAS ON THE STREET AGAIN

"Yeah, a lot of my stuff has been bootlegged. What can you do, you know? If you don't want some stuff to be bootlegged or if you want to save it or if it's something that you're working on, you just won't show it to anybody. It bugs me when the stuff I've never finished is bootlegged. I don't know. There was one kid who showed me a record that he got on me of stuff that I was working on. I don't know why anybody would really go out of their way to want something like that. It interrupts your natural working habits. I mean, if there is something you would like to do with some tune and you see that it's already out there, it can get discouraging. Some of the stuff hasn't gotten out, but most of it does. I'm always real surprised that it does. I think it happens to most everybody. The Basement Tapes, they were bootlegged. I didn't pay much attention to the Basement Tapes. I thought they were what they were – a bunch of guys hanging out down in the basement making up songs. I never really cared much for bootlegged tapes of concert shows because usually the sound quality is so bad that a lot of what really goes on, the excitement of it all, really gets lost. I don't listen to the bootlegged stuff. I really don't have any feeling about it one way or another. There's nothing you can do about it. Bootlegging is a big business. It's like the dope business – it's supposed to be illegal, but a lot of people make their livelihood off it."

GOT TO PLAY YOUR HARP UNTIL YOUR LIPS BLEED

"Years ago I didn't spend much time recording. I was putting a lot of pressure on myself to do it right and fast then, because of the confinement of the studio. But nobody else works that way. Now technology has made it kind of difficult to work that way. You have to fill up the space on a record now because the space has a noise of its own, whereas before, when you were working on a four-track or an eight-track, the space was something that had a spontaneity and a life of its own. Now it doesn't. It's just dead space. So therefore you have to fill up the space. People's ears have become accustomed to hearing every space filled up, and they're throwing everything in. More is there to make you think less. If you hear a song now with space in it, it doesn't sound right, it doesn't sound quite as together as something that's got multilayers of sound and multirhythms. To me, the machinery is making sound the thing, not the song. I'm trying to find a balance. You know the old Sun Records, the way they would sound with just the upright bass and a guitar and a snare drum? That's the sound I love the best, just that simple sound. My sound is basically backbeat and Stratocaster guitar or an old Martin guitar. But you can't record that way anymore. It won't sound the same. It will sound sterilized. You have to work within the sterilization of the industry. Anything raw you put in, it's going to come out sterilized. My thing is playing live, but that's even been affected because a lot of groups, they don't play live. They use a lot of preprogrammed stuff to make things sound like they do on records. It's not really too uncommon to be thinking that in a few years when you go hear a live band, that won't sound right either because people's ears will be so programmed to be hearing what they're hearing on records. I don't use synthesizers. I know I could if I was taught how, and put some time into just working the machines. But playing with a synthesizer is not really as much fun as playing with an instrument. I guess those machines are for people who are more inclined to be visionaries, who imagine something and work it out. As opposed to people who carry it around with them. That's what I do."

COME AROUND YOU ROVIN' GAMBLERS AND A STORY I WILL TELL

"I go through different periods when I'll write a bunch of things, then go through long spells where I don't really write anything. I just jot down little phrases and things I overhear, people talking to me, stuff like that. I write them on paper, write them out with my hand. Usually when I have some kind of deadline pressure I'll get prolific. When I do work, I work for long periods of time, then I lay back for a minute. I'll work for, like, twenty-four or thirty hours, fourteen hours at a time, and then readjust after that. Then I do it again four or five days later. I write a bunch of different ways. Sometimes I'll be able to hear the melody and everything right in my head, sometimes I'll play on the guitar or piano or something, and some kind of thing will come. Other times I'll just go into the studio and play riffs with other people and then later on listen to the tapes and see what that wants to be. Sometimes the words and music come together. Other times the melody will come first, or the words. You might write a song because you feel a certain way about a certain thing, like the Sun City record – Steve Van Zandt felt a certain way, so he wrote a song. I've done that, and then I've done the other way where the song is not really about any certain thing but it all seems to be focused in on a feeling. As I go on, I find it harder to hold on and develop a certain idea. You have to be almost a monk to hold on to something and explore all the possibilities of it. I haven't really done that as much as maybe I should or I could. When I play live, I always find stuff in my songs that I could have done a little better, could have written a little better. I don't know. It's not for me to understand my songs. I don't need to understand them. I don't make that a part of it. They make sense to me, but it's not like I can explain them. I mean, while I am doing them I have an understanding of them, but that's all, you know."

AND IN COMES ROMEO, HE'S MOANING

"What voice I have, what little voice I have – I don't really have a good voice. I do most of my stuff with phrasing. I think of myself as just having an edge when it comes to phrasing. I guess my voice sounds pretty close to a coyote or something."

IDIOT WIND

"What is that, rock? I don't like rock, just plain rock. I don't know what rock is. Is that Twisted Sister? I don't know what that is. I hear people talking about it all the time. I like rock and roll; now that's a different thing. Rock is hard; that don't mean nothing to me. But rolling is smooth and easy. A lot of the roll is gone from the music I hear, sure it is. Look at the buildings you see every day. They're huge, towering skyscrapers. Concrete and steel. Massive coliseums is where they play rock. It's the environment, right? Hard rock. Things got to have roots. There are still roots, but they're only there on record. It's like people studying literature. Who do they read? They read Shakespeare. Literature must have been at a high level when Shakespeare was writing his plays. You can't say that today if you go and see a play. It's going to be very far down the line from Shakespeare. The same way with rock n' roll, rhythm and blues, and all that. We're living in a time where you can still feel it. It might be remote, but you can still feel it, whereas fifty or sixty years from now, it's only going to be a dream. How many radio stations play Howlin' Wolf or Jimmy Reed or Muddy Waters? Most young black guys don't even know who those people are."

TOO MUCH OF NOTHING

"There's no way you can listen to the radio now and think that all those songs are on because of the music. Something else is putting them on the radio. It's not because the songs or the music is so good. It's something else entirely. I don't much listen to radio. Every time I hear it, it's depressing. Most of the stuff isn't meant to be heard by someone who is in anything but an up mood. I'm not in an up mood most of the time, or half the time. My moods vary. The stuff you hear on the radio would make it seem like everything's all right everywhere. You really have to seek your salvation in some other place than the popular radio. It used to be you could hear in the different parts of the country different types of music. I don't remember when this was, maybe in the sixties. Wherever you went, you would hear different music that was popular in different regions. What was popular in Los Angeles was different than what was popular in New York. There would be different music playing in Nashville than in Austin or Seattle or Chicago. Now, wherever you go, it's the same. If it's the Top 10 in New York, it's the Top 10 in Miami. Why do you suppose that is?"

SOMETHING IS HAPPENING HERE BUT YOU DON'T KNOW WHAT IT IS, DO YOU MISTER JONES?

"I have never cared whether critics liked or disliked my albums, but I have cared that they didn't understand where they were coming from or what I was up to. I can truly say that there have been a lot of critics who have listened to my stuff, and they have been just deaf. They haven't really heard what the heart of the matter is. They haven't heard what was there to be heard. All they heard were preconceived ideas of their own, which they brought to whatever record of mine they were listening to. I haven't understood the critics' evaluation of my stuff. It's deeper than 'He's trying to do this' or 'He's trying to do that' or 'He's not succeeding at this' or 'there's none of this.' Critics reviewed the movie Renaldo and Clara saying that was an ego trip, whereas, what is an ego trip? Bob Dylan up on the screen is an ego trip? Who made Bob Dylan a myth, anyway? Isn't Scarface an ego trip? What's not an ego trip if you make a movie? I don't know. The criticism of the movie was not about the movie. It was about what the movie could have been or should have been or something like that. That carries over to my records. Some intellectual critics who want to see things keep evolving, who want to feel the same kick at forty-five or fifty that they felt when they were fifteen and sixteen, a lot of those intellectual people, they stand in my way."

'TWAS IN ANOTHER LIFETIME

"My first five albums? I don't even know what the first five were. I don't know if I could name all twenty-nine of my records, but I could name some of them. I liked a bunch of albums I did in the eighties. I liked Street Legal a whole lot. I did that in the seventies. I liked all the albums, sort of, I guess. There's always something on all the records I liked. When you make them, you like them. My favorite songs of all time aren't anything I've written. I like stuff like Pastures of Plenty and Mississippi Mama and Me and That's All and I Get a Kick Out of You. My favorites are old forties songs, I think."

EZRA POUND AND T.S. ELIOT FIGHTING IN THE CAPTAIN'S TOWER

"At certain times I read a lot of poetry. My favorite poets are Shelley and Keats. Rimbaud is so identifiable. Lord Byron. I don't know. Lately if I read poems, it's like I can always hear the guitar. Even with Shakespeare's sonnets I can hear a melody because it's all broken up into timed phrases so I hear it. I always keep thinking, 'What kind of song would this be?'"

JOKERMAN

"There's some humor in my songs. I don't know, I think so. Some other people might not get it. I think there are funny things inside a lot of them. Some there aren't. It's kind of mixed up so much that I wouldn't be one to just point and say, 'This is funny.' Some of these things are just foggy, some of these things I just don't have a fix on. I'm not really a good authority on my stuff. I'm a better authority maybe on Woody Guthrie's stuff than I am on my own stuff."

TOMORROW IS A LONG TIME

"For me the sixties seem just like yesterday. Time has a strange way of eluding you, you know. I mean, spiritually there is no time. There's no sixties, no eighties. When we say the sixties or the seventies or the forties, I don't know, we can't touch that. What are the sixties? We can't reach out and touch it any more than we can touch the nineties or the 1800s. I'm not so overwhelmed by sixties, seventies, fifties. It seems, though, that at a certain time there was more to discover all the time. It doesn't seem that way now. Kids grow up real fast. I've got kids. They grew up fast, faster than I grew up. A hundred years ago they grew up even slower. You ate by candlelight then, you know what I mean? All the comforts are real deceiving as to what life's all about. All the crutches. Society, you know. Western civilization."

THE TRUTH WAS OBSCURE, TOO PROFOUND AND TOO PURE, TO LIVE IT YOU HAVE TO EXPLODE

"I don't think each person has his own individual truth. How could you have your own personal truth? Who would give it to you? If you had it, why would you have to go to school? Why would you have to get a job? If you had your own personal truth, even truth you think you might know, whose truth is it? Is it your truth? Did you make it up? What's inside is just confusion. But what's inside has been put inside, you know. Whatever culture you're in, that puts it inside. So when you're searching inside for something and you say, 'Well, I have my own thing inside,' well, that's been put inside by cultural forces. They just bombard you. It's an all-out attack to stick stuff into your brain."

YOU WERE BORN WITH A SNAKE IN BOTH OF YOUR FISTS WHILE A HURRICANE WAS BLOWING

"Well, people tell me about the myth, You know. Some people are in awe. It doesn't penetrate me for some reason. I wish it did because then I might be able to use it to some advantage. I mean, there must be some advantage to it. I haven't been able to figure out what it is as yet. [He laughs] I don't really think too much on myself, you know. It's a waste of time for me to think like that. Oh, I don't know where I fit in now. God, life is short enough without having to dwell on how you fit in. The best you can do is just survive through it."

AND MUTTERED UNDERNEATH HIS BREATH, 'NOTHING IS REVEALED'

"Prophet. I might be that. [He laughs] I still might be. You never know anything for certain, especially something like that. But when you think back to certain events, there's a possibility they may be true. Or you may just think they're true. Who really knows?"

OH, MAMA, CAN THIS REALLY BE THE END

"I've never felt that it was over for me in music today. I still feel like I've got more to do. As long as I can do it live on stage, I'll still be doing it, and as long as I'm performing live, making records just goes with that. A while back I started writing a novel called Ho Chi Minh in Harlem. He was a short-order cook there in the twenties before he went back to Vietnam – it's a documented fact. It excited me there for a minute. It's possible I'll finish it if I get dedicated to it and decide that this is something that really needs to be done, or I need to do this. I did this song with Sam Shepard last year. It was called Danville Girl. A long ballad, about fifteen minutes. I heard some people talking about making a movie out of that. I'd like to write some short stories, but I'd have to go to a log cabin in the mountains somewhere and say, 'This is what I'm going to do.' I will do an album of standards. I think I'm going to try to do that with Richard Perry. We were talking about that. I don't know what's going to be on it, but I will do one. I've always wanted to do a children's album too. But how would they release it?"

HE NOT BUSY BEING BORN IS BUSY DYING

"I don't want to talk about what I've become or became because that sets people off into role playing. You can't lead people by role playing, and you can only muddle things up. So, whatever it is that I am manifests itself through what I do, what I say, not by what title I want to put on myself, or other people may want to put on me. That's why I've stayed away from all that stuff all the time. I mean, I know you can call somebody something like 'born again' and then you can dismiss that. As long as you can deal with it on a level of, like, a cartoon, you can dismiss it."

PREACHERMAN SEEKS THE SAME, WHO'LL GET THERE FIRST IS UNCERTAIN

"I've always played the guitar and sung and wrote songs. That's all I'll ever do unless there comes a time when I decided not to do it anymore and started to preach or something. But even preaching would be an extension of what I am and what I do and the music I play. People who don't play the music, who don't know what it feels like, they tend to overintellectualize what I do. They overestimate the lyrics in my songs. My stuff has always been lyrics and guitar, strumming, always. I mean, I would not make a good street poet. You put me on the stage without a guitar and I probably would hide. I feel uncomfortable in front of people without my guitar. What people have never understood is that the words were important because no one else was doing it and I broke through and I did it, but there wouldn't be the songs or the words without the guitar. To me, the guitar has always been just as important, if not more important, than the words. You see my lyrics printed in books, and to me they look silly. They don't really have the same effect because they're meant to be sung or recited in an odd kind of way. People put on a record and take out the lyrics and say, 'What's he saying?' and they kind of listen to what is being said, as if it's being spoken to them. They're waiting to hear some voice to put everything in perspective for them. Everything's not going to be put in perspective for them."

"People who have lived through the fifties and the sixties and the seventies and who are now living in the eighties are downright insane if they were to take all those periods seriously. There's none of them you can hang on to. People who are living in the eighties are living a different life – than they were living in the forties and the fifties and the sixties. But there are some people who don't get changed by the times. They can be living in any kind of time period, and I'm one of those people because everything gets filtered through me, and it gets filtered into the music I play. I was the same twenty, thirty years ago that I am now. My values haven't changed. Sure I've gone through lots of different things and I've learned a lot and my life isn't what it was. My life is different all the time, but my values haven't changed. There comes a time and a place for me to tell people what I've experienced or what I've learned. If I clarify it for me, and that's what I do in the songs in some kind of way, that's all I can do. I don't judge myself and I don't really judge others. I don't watch or look at what's happening, I just take it or leave it."

"When you get high and then your bubble busts and you get down low again, lower than you were when you started, you have to have values. You have to know what the great big picture is, how it operates, and it has to be busted down in simple terms because sooner or later everybody gets to that point, and that's what makes people confused. There's too much everything, too much traffic, too much food in the supermarket, too many clothes, too many this, too much that. And there's going to be more and more of it. But I've never been caught up in that, it doesn't do anything for me. I have to make things, I have to do things. The only thing I get a kick out of is playing or performing or some kind of artistic thing. That's just the way I always have been. I don't get a kick out of nothing else. But that's okay because throughout history it's been one big mass spectator sport. I don't know. Am I making any sense? When you write a song, you always work with common things, clichés, that everybody can identify with. If you're working with something like that, then most people can understand. You always have to be in that area where everyone knows what you're talking about. But from that point you can use it how you see fit and go as deep or as shallow as you either choose to or have the talent to. The deeper you go, the fewer people who are going to go with you. There's nothing you can do about that, because in the end it's not up to you to know who you're supposed to reach. It might be one person. You know, it's true, that old saying, 'Leave all and follow me.' And it's a point not too many people can ever allow themselves to get to because they're too busy hanging out. Unless somebody has experienced that, even for a minute, you're stuck in the flesh. So everything revolves around that, what feels good, what tastes good, what looks good, what smells good. I mean, it's all like the last meal down on executioner's row. Striped candy or something."

BLOWIN' IN THE WIND

"In life, well, I mean, I feel like I fall short in just about everything. In music I can do just about what I need to do. I feel pretty calm most of the time, but then if I review my situation at all, it always seems like I'm up there walking the plank. I'm probably a driven person. I always feel like somebody's cracking the whip. Somebody or something. It's just mostly because so many things happen in my life and they're all going at the same time, but I don't know how else to live my life. I never felt like I was searching for anything. I always felt that I've stumbled into things or drifted into them. But I've never felt like I was out on some kind of prospector hunt looking for the answers or the truth. You won't find that in any of my songs. I never went to the holy mountain to find the lost soul that is supposed to be a part of me or whatever I am. I don't believe in that stuff, and I don't feel like a person has to search for anything. I feel like it's all right in front."

It is utterly dark now. Carol knocks on the door to retrieve Bob. But first he picks up a flashlight and, as he walks me to my car, says, "I wish I could say something exciting or preposterous." I ask him about the property, and he says something vague like, "There are a bunch of houses here." He tells me, "You can call me a couple of months from now or next year or if you ever need to reach me for anything. If you ever need a quote or anything. If something's happening." Then he says good-bye. Before I can turn on my headlights, the gate in the hedge is closed.

22 November 1985
Andy Kershaw Interview, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1053-1054.

This interview was conducted by Andy Kershaw of the BBC for showing on the UK TV program The Old Grey Whistle Test. It took place at a recording studio in North London where Dylan and Dave Stewart were working at the time. Due principally to the tactlessness of Kershaw, the interview was short and not particularly productive.

DS: It's just experimental really. Bob and I are just working in this empty sort of church, that's busy being changed around at the moment. The studio's being knocked down, so it's a bit derelict, but we're just messing around.

AK: What's made you come to London to work with Dave Stewart?

BD: Well, I just wanted to work with Dave.

AK: For what particular reason; what attracted you to Dave?

BD: I think he's great.

DS: (Laughing) This sounds like a marriage guidance program...

AK: Did you decide to work with Dave because you felt you'd been going wrong in the past decade?

BD: No, I think Dave understands my music, you know.

AK: Did you think you were going wrong in the past few years?

BD: Well, it's hard to get people to, you know, work in the studio that understand your music. I've had a problem with that.

AK: Have you any plans to work with Keith Richards and Ron Wood again after Live Aid?

BD: Er, well! We see each other, you know, from time to time.

AK: Were you satisfied with that performance?

BD: That particular one? No, not really. The sound was very bad. We couldn't really hear...

DS: Well, what happened there was that they didn't tell Bob that they were going to pull that curtain down in front of him, so all the monitors were behind the curtain...

BD: They set the stage up for twenty people in the back of us...

DS: Yeah, there were all these people coming on the stage and talking about singing the song We Are The World while he was trying to play. So it was all jumbled up. A lot of people didn't understand that.

AK: I understand that you've recorded about twenty tunes whilst you've been here in London. Are they all Dylan tunes or are some of them Dave Stewart tunes?

BD: Oh, I think they're all my tunes. No, I think we recorded one of Dave's today, didn't we?

DS: I can't remember. Well, we did it all in three days so... Well, they're all Bob's tunes. He makes them up on the spot and then we just record them as soon as he makes them up.

AK: What are you going to do with them? Are they going to come out on a record or are they just kind of demos? Are you just feeling around?

BD: Oh, I don't know. They'll probably come out on record.

That's all I have on the audio and video tapes available to me as well as in another transcript. However, Ian Woodward, writing at the time in one of his Wicked Messenger articles (number 946) has this to say:

I cannot guarantee the accuracy of these excerpts from the OLD GREY WHISTLE TEST interview but felt them very worthy of passing on:

AK: Has Dave had any time in your busy schedule to give you any hairdressing tips?
(No answer)
AK: How do you like London? Does Dave cook a good breakfast?
BD: I'm not staying with him.
AK: Have you been out much? Been to any gigs?
BD: No, no, I don't think so.
AK: I heard you'd been to see Feargal Sharkey.
BD: Oh yeah. I forgot that.
AK: Has Annie Lennox been here?
BD: Yeah. She was in yesterday.
AK: Did she sing?
BD: No, she just played piano.
AK: Do you get to listen to much music? Is it difficult?
BD: What, to listen to music? (laughter) I listen to radio a bit, but few records.
AK: Whose records do you like to listen to on a regular basis?
BD: Nobody really.

January 1986
George Negus interview for "60 Minutes", Malibu, California

Source: Circulating tape

Some Dylan replies are voiced over and are impossible to transcribe.

GN: The song and the phrase that people have attached to you most regularly is probably "The Times They Are A-Changin'". Do you think that they have?
BD: I don't know. I've no idea.
GN: Did you think it were at that time?
BD: I… I would have no idea of knowing.

When you do actually get to sit down and interview the man, it's a rare event indeed. In more ways than one.

BD: I don't really attach any other great importance to it, other than the fact that I do it and people show up to see me, you know.

GN: Do you think that there is a limit to the creative depths of someone like yourself? Do you think that it's possible that you could go on writing songs for as long as you're on this earth?
BD: Oh, yeah.
GN: And what about performing – is it also something that you can do?
BD: Mm-hmm. Yeah, as long as you're healthy you can perform.
GN: And how are you, healthy?
BD: Yeah, I'm feelin' alright.

GN: When I talk about Bob Dylan as a legend and a folk hero, do you really think that anybody other than yourself deserves that sort of description?
BD: I don't know anyone who calls themselves like that, you know. I know I don't.
GN: So would you say that anybody deserves that sort of label?
BD: Well, somebody maybe… um, Robin Hood. Jesse James maybe. People who are back in the history somewhere.

BD: For me, the 60's, you know, they existed, that's just a number, really.
GN: Why did they grab hold of Bob Dylan?
BD: Because the songs were different than what was being played on the radio at that time.
GN: What do you think it would be like if Bob Dylan had emerged, or tried to emerge not in the 60's, but the 80's? Do you think you would have had anything like the same impact that you had in the last twenty years?
BD: I don't think so.

GN: Why is it, do you think, that when I told people I was gonna interview you that a lot of our generation say, 'Well, maybe Dylan is a thing of the past. Maybe what he says and sings these days is nowhere near as relevant as it was then'?
BD: No, but because a lot of the stuff that I've done has been in the past, you know, but… so what?
GN: It was pretty clear what you wanted to say in the 60's. What does Bob Dylan, poet and preacher, write poetry and preach about now?
BD: It's the same message, really. It's just the people… It's not so much me that's changed. It's the crowd, you know. It's the audience. Because I'm still doing what I'm doing. You ask any of them if they still are.

GN: And 9 out of 10 they wouldn't be.

BD: I don't… I bet you'll find out that to be true, don't you think?

GN: If we talked about the 60's as a protest period, a protest decade, and the 70s, I think you said yourself once, was a period of healing after all that had gone wrong in the 60's. How would you describe the 80's?

BD: No, I've no idea. I don't really think of it. It's been hazy whatever it is…

GN: Because time is pretty irrelevant…

BD: Yeah, you know last year was '84 or '85… years go by fast, don't they?

GN: They surely do, yeah.

GN: I get the feeling that you see yourself quite differently from the way other people do. Did other people possibly have given Bob Dylan an importance that you don't necessarily like?

BD: Well, I mean I've spent more time with myself than other people do, so I would know myself better. So what I do doesn't really throw me all that much, you know.

GN: Is it possible to pinpoint exactly the way you're at at the moment, so we can get some idea of what your music…

BD: Oh no, no, I can't do that, because my songs speak for that. I usually say everything I have to say through the songs. I mean it would be pointless for me to go out and say how I feel about this and how I feel about that. I could never articulate this well.

GN: Do you think you articulate your feelings and your views about things…

BD: Mm-hmm.

GN: …much better musically than you would in any other way?

BD: Oh, not only much better, but only… the only way.

GN: Why was there a confusion for a couple of years almost and probably still going on in some part of the world and in this country particularly about whether or not you're a born-again Christian or a practicing Jew or what the hell you are?

BD: Mm-hmm. Well, people are confused about everything these days. You know. They're confused about what kind of car they drive. They just don't know what they want to do.

GN: Why do you think people have become so confused about you and religion…

BD: Well, because I'm probably on people's minds and religion's on people's minds, so they put 2 and 2 together, I don't know.

GN: Where do you think that burst of spiritual enthusiasm came from when you were actually recording albums that were genuinely gospel?

BD: Oh, I had to do those albums. They were very important and necessary for me to do.

GN: Why was that?

BD: Oh, because people needed to hear that.

GN: At that time?

BD: Oh yeah.

GN: So you think you were reflecting a feeling that was abroad in this country by picking up religion as a subject matter?

BD: Oh we have to be very careful when talk about religion, you know, because religion is more than just church.

GN: And what's yours?

BD: Mine has more to do with playing the guitar.

BD: I remember growing up with radio. It was always more exciting in some kind of way that I'd listen to the radio and be able to see it the way you saw it in your head rather than watch it on TV screen. (the rest drown in background music)

GN: So why have you – in a way – contributed to that by allowing video…

BD: No, I'm not happy about that, you know.

GN: But aren't you in a position? Surely, everyone would imagine Bob Dylan or anybody in a position to say, well, I don't want to have a video and that's it.

BD: well, yeah, it is viewing 'em. You don't have to watch 'em, but… sometimes I guess I try to get by with the few things I possibly can…

GN: It's the sound of what you're playing and the sound of the words that you're singing that's important not the way you look or what the…

BD: Mm-hmm. Yeah, that and… you know… the possibility that you're really going to fry somebody's brain.

BD: Well, I write for me, you know. And if someone else can relate to it that's their business, and if they can't that's their business, too.

GN: What, say, would be the worst of al things that can happen to Bob Dylan – he'd lost his voice and the guitar was not available to him… What would be there left of you?

BD: What would be left of me? Oh, I don't know, I guess I'd still have some people around who would understand…

January 1986
Toby Creswell Interview, US/Australia Telephone Link (Published)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 541-546.

Whilst rehearsing at the Soundstage 41, Universal Studios, for the upcoming tour, Dylan was interviewed over the telephone by Toby Creswell. This interview, which took place early in January 1986, concentrated on the recent album and Bob's collaboration with Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers. It appeared in the Australian Rolling Stone on January 16th 1986. David Frickes interview which appeared in the American Rolling Stone the previous December was reprinted in Australia along with Creswell's interview.

There is a tape-recording of this interview which is more extensive than the Rolling Stone article -see next item in this volume.

The article ran as follows:

It doesn't really matter now whether Bob Dylan is a fundamentalist Christian, anymore than it mattered whether he was going to the Synagogue when he recorded Blood On The Tracks ten years ago. Amongst all the crucial lines that Dylan has sung one sticks out – "He not busy being born is busy dying". Dylan, of all the great creators of his generation, has been busy being born over a series of almost thirty albums, each of which has added to all that has come before.

However, there have been some constants. There has always been a sense of engagement with the external world. When Dylan gave up writing specific protest songs in 1964, he began writing songs about hypocrisy, prejudice, injustice, malice, exploitation and cruelty. Those concerns are still the subject of his songs. At the same time he was writing love songs like Love Minus Zero / No Limit which is a tender and complete statement of affection that is also a religious statement. Dylan has sung of both sacred and profane love throughout his career, sometimes concentrating on one, sometimes on the other. Then there was the electric bite of pure rock & roll as portrayed on Subterranean Homesick Blues a song that Dylan notes on the five album Biograph retrospective, was recorded in one take.

All these are still elements of Dylan's current work. His choice of Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers as a backing band suggests that he is still after that fire in his rock & roll. Moreover, the news that he is working with Dave Stewart of the Eurythmics suggests that he still sees himself as contemporary.

Given all of that and the quality of the last album, Empire Burlesque, the presence of the Heartbreakers on Dylan's Australian tour promises us an extraordinary series of concerts.

CBS has just issued the Biograph box set: ten sides of Dylan from Bob Dylan to Shot Of Love. It's an awesome body of work, unequalled in rock and roll, even the outtakes and the unfinished songs like Jet Pilot, which later became Tombstone Blues.

As somebody who has listened to Bob Dylan for twenty years, I jumped at the chance of an interview. But what do you say over the telephone to someone whom you have grown up with? My friend Danny said you usually talk about how the family is doing. What do you ask Bob Dylan, though?

TC: This tour you'll be playing with The Heartbreakers, the first time you've played with a band since The Band tour a decade ago. It must be good to get back to that format.

BD: We don't really know what the format is going to be yet. It's a lot easier, though, because as band members they sort of think as one person. When you put people together who've never played together before, there's so many different people; it takes years for people to play together like the Tom Petty band. We are all raised on the same sort of music.

TC: You played with The Heartbreakers for Farm Aid. You seem to have been doing rather a lot of those shows lately.

BD: These things pop up every once in a while. I don't think it'll become a regular thing. This year there seem to have been a couple of those kind of shows.

TC: It seems that these shows have become such huge events that they tend to overshadow the issues.

BD: I know what you mean. That can happen. The atmosphere is like a carnival. But by raising that kind of money, they must be getting these problems into the minds of a lot of people who wouldn't have had it on their minds before, and that's a good thing.

TC: You have said in the past that the function of art is to lead you to God. There were the three gospel albums: Slow Train Coming, Saved and Shot Of Love, but your last two records have taken a different slant.

BD: Well it all depends where you come at it from. I come at things from different sides to get a different perspective on what it is I'm trying to focus in on. Maybe all my songs are focusing on the same thing. I don't know; maybe I'm just coming in from all sides.

TC: The difference between the gospel records and the recent stuff seems to be that earlier you were laying down the law.

BD: Every so often you have to have the law laid down so that you know what the law is. Then you can do whatever you please with it. I haven't heard those albums in quite a while; you're probably right.

TC: You have said recently that you didn't think rock & roll still existed in it's pure form, that it was no longer viable. Would you put yourself in with that?

BD: I don't think I put myself in with that category. I'm not coming up anymore, you know what I mean. I probably was speaking about the industry itself. I listen to it but mostly I don't pay much attention to modern music. It's everywhere, in places that maybe it shouldn't be. There comes a time to shut off the radio, there's a time to turn off the tube, but the way it's projected into society there's not much of a chance that you can get to do that.

There are very few people I know who play the real old-style music. When it first appeared, as I remember it, it was an escape from everything that was going on, which was mainly life, so when music came it was a direction to pull you in that was out of this myth. But now nobody wants to get pulled out of the myth because they don't recognise it as being a myth. That's what it's like here anyway. They like where they're at, they like what's going on, and music is just an extension of that, so they like it too. It's nothing different, it doesn't pull you anymore.

TC: So what's the solution?

BD: Turn it off. It's a decision people have to make. That's what the sixties and the fifties were all about. There are other ways to operate, to survive. There's got to be some type of light, some type of brightness outside of everything that you're given on a mass consumer level.

What I can see is the mass monster. I don't know what it's like in Australia, but in America it's everywhere. It's invaded your home, your bed, it's in your closet It's come real close to kicking over life itself. Unless you're able to go into the woods, the back country, and even there it reaches you. It seems to want to make everybody the same. People who are different are looked at as being a little bit crazy or a little bit odd. It's hard to stand outside of all of that and remain sane. Even outrageousness gets to be in fashion. Anything you can think of to do, someone is going to come along and market it I think it's going to change. I don't think it can stay like this forever, that's for sure. I think it's going to change but for the moment it's hard to find anything that's really hot.

TC: Empire Burlesque seems a very straightforward record by comparison with some of your earlier work. Is simplicity something you are striving for?

BD: I strive for something that feels right to me. It could be a lot of different kinds of moods and phrasings, or lines that might not seem to be too connected at the time with the music They're all connected. A lot of times people will take the music out of my lyrics and just read them as lyrics. It's not really fair because the music and the lyrics I've always felt are pretty closely wrapped up. You can't separate one from the other that simply. A lot of the time the meaning is more in the way a line is sung, and not just in the line.

TC: These last few years have been very prolific for you.

BD: Yeah, I've been trying to find different things I would normally do. I feel like something might open up in the next couple of months in different areas. There's a bunch of songs I want to write that I haven't been able to get close to.. I almost know what they are but the information that I need is not really available to me so I have to go out and get it and I haven't done that I expected to have a little more of that on Empire Burlesque but I just didn't do it. They are the true story type things, real things that have happened that I would like to comment on. I need to talk to the people involved but I haven't followed through yet. I hope to have some of that stuff on the next album I do.

TC: Were you pleased with the way Empire Burlesque turned out?

BD: Yes, for what it was I thought it was really good. I think the next record is going to sound even better. I'm not too experienced at having records sound good. I don't know how to go about doing that, though I thought I got pretty close last time with Arthur Baker. I think next time, working with Dave Stewart here, the stuff we're doing has been happening a lot easier, quicker, so I think it's going to sound a lot more together than the last record.

TC: You recorded that album yourself and gave it Arthur Baker to mix?

BD: Pretty much so. I just went out and recorded a bunch of stuff all over the place and then when it was time to put this record together I brought it all to him and he made it sound like a record. Usually I stay out of that side of the finished record.

TC: Why?

BD: I'm not good at it. There are guys that don't mind sitting in the control booth for days and days. I'm just not like that; I'm a one-mix man. I can't tell the difference after that.

TC: Your music often seems to get ignored as compared with the emphasis that's placed on the lyrics, but there have been some really nice instrumental passages like Pat Garrett and Billy The Kid, for example.

BD: Yes, I just did a bunch of tracks with Dave Stewart that have no lyrics, and you don't even miss the lyrics, really. They're just different chord patterns that make up a melody. My records usually don't have a lot of guitar solos or anything like that on them. The vocals mean a lot, and the rhythm means a lot, that's about it.

TC: Your voice seems to have changed a lot over the years.

BD: Maybe it has, I don't know.

TC: It sounded different to me, particularly after Street Legal when you started using girl singers.

BD: I'm not aware of any significant difference really. I've always heard that sound (female backing) with my music. I just hear it in there, it's just like another way of putting horns in. That sound has always been one of my favorites, just that vocal part, because I don't do anything with solo type work – it's all part of the overall effect, it's more just playing the song and getting the structure of it right. The vocal parts are like another instrument, but not a solo instrument. Apart from that, I just like the gospel sound.

TC: Seeing the latest video and the We Are The World video, you seem to have less of the legend around your neck, you seem freed of the burden of being Bob Dylan.

BD: I don't think I ever carried that around except for 1974, when I did that tour with the Band. That was pretty much of a heavy tour because of the notoriety and legendary quality of the people involved. I had to step into Bob Dylan's shoes for that tour. Since that time I never thought about it. I wouldn't do half the things I do if I was thinking about having to live up to a Bob Dylan myth.

TC: Do you feel that you have been guided to where you are?

BD: You're always guided to where you are, but you have the choice to mess it up. Sooner or later, everything that goes around comes around. So, yeah, I feel like I've been guided to wherever it is I'm at right now, but I don't know whatever it is I'm supposed to be doing. I might have something else to do. I can't figure out what it would be, though, because I like doing what I do. Who's to say? There's a lot of luck involved, a lot of circumstance.

You can't do anything alone, though. You've always got to have somebody supporting you or nobody would get anywhere.

TC: Do you think that with time comes wisdom?

BD: With experience. Things don't really change, just attitudes.

TC: You've been doing videos with Dave Stewart. What do you think of the video age?

BD: I don't think much about it at all. It's not going to go away. Every place you look you're drowning in it. You can't turn on your TV without seeing music videos. It's like the unions. Unions in the early thirties were all communist organisations and now they're big business.

TC: It's got to the point where everybody seems to be using rock & roll for their own ends. In America you have politicians associating themselves with rock & roll songs.

BD: Absurd, isn't it. The rock & roll songs they're quoting from don't deserve to be quoted from like that. You couldn't do that with the early stuff, Little Richard and Chuck Berry – what politician is going to quote Chuck Berry? Who's going to quote Carl Perkins or Gene Vincent or any of those guys? It was outside then.

TC: Today it's image rather than content. People hold up an image of a star and hope to attach themselves to that image.

BD: That's absolutely correct It's destroying the fabric of our minds and all we can do is complain about it, so we just have to shut it out. You just have to cut it off and not let it get into your framework because that's the only way you're going to escape it. You can't meet it head on. You've probably got a little more space to breath over there, but here it's heavy. There's not many places you can go where you're not reminded of the current cultural ambitions of people who are on their way to be stars.

TC: When you started out you must have wanted to be a star in some way.

BD: I wanted to be a star in my own mind, I wanted to be my own star. I didn't want to be a star for people I didn't really identify with. For me what I did was a way of life, it wasn't an occupation.

TC: Has it been all it was cracked up to be?

BD: Yes and no. I'm still doing it, you know. It seems to be what I've done more years than I haven't done it, but I'm just going to keep on doing it until it runs out. Yes it was all it was cracked up to be because I never strayed from it. Maybe I would've gone down if I'd gone into being a movie star or if I'd started believing what other people said of me or if I'd started to think I was this person that everybody was talking about. I know there are a lot of people who did go down. They started believing what the newspapers said about them. I never believed it one way or another, so for me, I don't really feel much of a change. I feel very little change between now and ten years ago. I don't feel like I've traveled that far or done that much.

TC: You mentioned the unions earlier and I was thinking of the song, Union Sundown, on Infidels which is a very specific commentary. Do you still feel a need to make that type of comment?

BD: Oh yes, that comes with the territory.

TC: There seem to be two types of songs you've written, those which are here and now, and a lot that seem to focus on the eternals.

BD: Well, that's the important thing, if you lose that, you start getting into stuff that is mindless and meaningless. Usually there's a voice that goes on, there's some kind of warning point if that ever happens, but mostly what this kind of music is about is your ability to feel things. That's a lot of stuff going on that you hear that you know nobody felt nothing about; you can hear it in the spirit. So much stuff gets thrown at you with no feeling behind it because nobody feels anything anymore.

But there's a lot of good things going on that I don't understand. A lot of music that's coming out is way beyond me. There are some people who are really gifted musicians, I mean in a classical sense, and they're coming out with a lot of different stuff that is being thought out and pre-planned.

TC: There does seem to be an attempt by people, like Miami Steve on the Sun City record to say things about apartheid and about what is happening in America today.

BD: Yes, he's highly committed to that.

TC: It seems like a very difficult struggle.

BD: Well, it is a very difficult struggle, because most people don't want to hear that.

TC: There's a lot of red-baiting going on again.

BD: That's been going on since the fifties.

TC: The cold war seems to be coming back.

BD: I don't think it ever went away, you know. It just lays low for a while. People need something to hate, you've got to hate something. As soon as you're old enough, people try to make you hate something or somebody. Blacks are a little easier, Communists you can't really see. The early Christians were like Communists. The Roman Empire treated the early Christians the same way as the Western World treats communists.

TC: So it doesn't really change.

BD: No, things don't, it's just got a different name on it.

TC: Your kids are grown up, now. What's the perspective like as a father?

BD: It gives you a perspective on what kids are doing. I don't think kids are any different from what they ever were, really. It's like my daddy once said, when he was twelve years old he asked his dad something and he didn't think his dad knew too much about what he was talking about. When he got to twenty five, he asked him the same question and he got the same answer and he was amazed how his father got to be so smart.

January 1986
Toby Creswell Interview, Us/Australia Telephone Link (Tape)

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 547-558.

The taped version.

TC: How does it work out, do you think?
BD: How will the show run?
TC: Yeah, I mean...
BD: We don't really know that yet. I don't really know what the format of it's going to be.
TC: Is it sort of good to get back to playing with a band as a band rather than, sort of, musicians you put together?
BD: Oh yeah, yeah, it's a lot easier, you know, because they sort of think as one person. When you're putting people together, you have so many different people, er, that... it takes years for people to, to be able to play together like Tom Petty's band does.
TC: That kind of empathy that you get.
BD: 'Scuse me!
TC: The kind of empathy that you get from er, just, from working together and intuition between each other.
BD: Yeah, right. We were both sort of really raised on the same music.
TC: Yeah, erm; have you... what about recording? I mean, have you been planning to record with them?
BD: Er, we don't have any plans to record.
TC: I heard that you were writing with that guy from the Eurythmics, what's his name?
BD: Dave Stewart.
TC: Yeah.
BD: We've begun writing on a bunch of stuff.
TC: Nothing, nothing definite at the moment?
BD: Er, no. We're just still... we're still working on it.
TC: Right. It's kind of interesting with the Eurythmics as well 'cause they've got... their last record had that rude kind of band sound which seems to be coming back in a way.
BD: Yeah.
TC: Yeah, 'cause I mean, like, the thing that really struck me about your earlier records was that, that you couldn't really tell, you know, like who was playing what and it didn't really matter; it was just kind of the whole feeling of the song and the session.
BD: Uh, huh.
TC: Right.
BD: Yeah.
TC: You've also been doing all those kind of Farm Aid and the Live Aid shows and everything like that. I mean, how do you sort of feel about this sort of mega rock, sort of working for ... working for... er, to raise money. I mean...
BD: Well, these things kinda pop up every once in a while, you know. I don't think it's a regular thing. Er, This year there seems to be maybe a couple of those kind of shows, but there's usually, usually something like that every so often, you know.
TC: But, er, it's sort of because this thing whereby people sort of feel that maybe, maybe it's mm... may be the event is more important than the issue. I mean...
BD: Oh yeah, yeah. I know what you mean. That can happen and the atmosphere gets sort of carnival like at times, you know. But, I don't really know, they must raise... by raising that kind of money they probably get these problems on a lot of peoples minds who wouldn't have it on their minds before, so that's a good thing.

TC: It doesn't, I mean, it also doesn't seem to be actually going to effect a hell of a lot of change really.

BD: Oh, I don't think so.

TC: No.

BD: No.

TC: Right. You once said that all art should lead to God, right? And your... you did those gospel albums and your later records have sort of gone away from that... I mean, do you still think that that is the cause?

BD: Well, you know, it depends where you're coming at it from. I just... I just come at things from so many different sides that, er... whatever... whatever side I'm coming out of, I'm coming at it and... er... it's just a different perspective on, on what it is I'm trying to focus in on, you know? Maybe all my focusing in is on the same thing. I don't know. Maybe I'm just coming in from different sides all the time.

TC: It seems to me that the difference between, erm, Slow Train and Saved and the records that came after that was that, er, not that the message was particularly dramatically different but rather that instead of kind of laying down the law, it was... the later records kind of gave pointers, sort of. It was like, umm...

BD: Well, you know, every so often you have to have a law laid down so that you know what the law is. You know what I mean? Then you can do whatever you please with it, but, um... er... I don't know. I haven't listened to those albums in quite a while but, er... you're probably right on that.

TC: I was also thinking about the film Renaldo & Clara that you did a long time ago and, mm, I mean, the sheer sort of the length and the structure of the film was, I think, put a lot of people off. But I remember reading somebody saying at the time that the thing they liked best about it was... it was what it was, it was, you know, three and a half hours or whatever, um, and that it wasn't kind of reduced simply to fit into the kind of, the modern format to kind of provide some easy answers and happy endings and stuff like that.

BD: No. It wasn't that type of film. It was... I don't know what kind of film it was. I don't know if there's a category for it. You know, that might have been one of the problems with it.

TC: Right..

BD: You know, things usually have to follow some kind of category and it wasn't... it just didn't seem to fit anybody's idea of what a movie should be.

TC: But looking at the kind of... I mean... we get sort of a selection of stuff that comes out of America from films and music and television out here and the thing that seems to come through is that everything these days seems to be really kind of formulaised and also there seems to be this real desire to have happy endings. I mean, in the sixties, films didn't have happy endings. They were sort of meant to, meant to make you kind of, er, leave, leave the theatre feeling, feeling a bit... maybe not confused but having to think about things.

BD: Yeah. Oh... I don't know with movies they made... I can't remember any from the sixties, er... that were, you know, that kind of moved me one way or other. There probably have been some but I don't remember any. I remember some from the fifties, but, er... Yeah, you know, I guess everybody likes to have a happy ending, you know? I don't blame anybody for that. I like to see happy endings myself. You know? It's... but... sometimes it doesn't work out that way.

TC: Mm. Do you, do you sort of see your band... I mean, I've seen a couple of things that you've said lately, where you've said that you didn't think that rock n' roll was really still, urn, viable or that rock n' roll still existed. I mean, would you sort of put yourself in that kind of category?

BD: No, er... I don't think I put myself in that kind of category, but I'm not coming up any more, you know, I mean, er, I don't know... I probably was speaking about the industry itself, you know what I mean?

TC: Yeah.
BD: Uh, it's, like, er... Could you hang on for a second?
TC: Do I wanna hang up for a second? Sure.

Short pause

BD: What were we talking about, now?
TC: You were talking about modern music.
BD: Oh yeah. I listen to it but mostly I don't I mean, modern music... it's everywhere, you know, like it's everywhere in places where maybe it shouldn't be. I mean, there comes a time to shut off the radio, you know.
TC: Yeah.
BD: There's a time to turn off the tube and there's a time to, you know, to stop listening to it, to all of it, and, er, with the way it's projected into society now there's not much of a chance that you could get to do that so you can't really get to think about it much.
TC: Right.
BD: And then everything is formulised, you know... There are some people I know who play like real old, you know, style of music but they're an exception, you know.
TC: Yeah.
BD: Now there just doesn't seem to be... it's not maybe fashionable or marketable, or... I don't know. You know... it's... when it first appeared as I remember, it was more of an escape, you know, from everything that was going on. You know, everything that was been going on was just lies everywhere. So when the music came on it was, it was er, a direction to pull you in that was out of this mess, you know?
TC: Yeah.
BD: But now, nobody wants to get pulled out of the mess because they don't recognise it as being a mess. I mean that's the way it's like here anyway.
TC: Right.
BD: Right, they like where it's at. They like what's going on. So music is just an extension of that They like that too. It doesn't, it's not, it's nothing different, its... it doesn't pull you anywhere, it's just into your, into your, er... daily walk through life. Do you follow me?
TC: Yeah. I can see what you mean. Um, do you, you've also always, like, I mean your music has always gone through changes. When you've gone out on tour you've played all material completely differently, like the last time you came to Australia. I mean, do you sort of think, do you sort of see the songs as becoming better or just changing, or... or what?
BD: Oh, they sort of... the song remains the same, you know.
TC: But, despite the arrangement and despite the instrumentation and stuff...
BD: Yeah, I think so.
TC: Yeah, I mean, looking at your 29 albums or something, they seem to me to sort of run together like a whole series of movies almost, rather than, rather than being bits of an autobiography, they kind of seem to reflect a particular time... each one reflects a particular time and a particular place.
BD: Yeah... they probably do.
TC: I got the impression that you don't usually just hang on to a big back catalogue and just re-record it and stuff like that.
BD: Erm, what was that?
TC: I got the impression, I get the impression, that you don't sort of hang on to a big back catalogue. I mean, when you go to make a record, you have a few songs of that period rather than sort of...
BD: Yeah, right I seldom listen to my own stuff though, er... I usually try to do something new all the time, you know, when I'm making a record.

TC: Right, erm... I mean, do you think that your... that your talkin' about how people didn't wanna be pulled out of the mess and stuff? I mean, do you think it's possible that anybody can do that?

BD: Oh yeah, if you cut yourself off. If you just, you know, turn it off, you know, you've gotta just turn it off. It's a decision that people have to make. You have to turn it off, you know? Like that, that's what, er, that's what the sixties or the fifties were all about... I don't know, you know... erm... there are other ways to, to operate, you know and to be... and to survive, and, erm... that's gotta be some type of light, you know, some type of... some type of brightness outside everything that's... that you're given on a mass consumer type level, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: And, and it's like... from where I can see, what's happened is that this mass monster, whatever it is... I don't know what it's like in Australia, but, in America, it's everywhere. I mean, it's invaded your home, you know, it's in your bed, it's in your closet, it's come real close. It's just taking over life itself, you know. Like, if you go out into the woods and into the back country, erm... and even there it reaches, you know? So, it seems to wanna make itself all of one thing. It wants everybody to be the same, you know. People who are different, they are looked at as being kind of crazy or a little bit odd; do you know what I mean?

TC: Yeah, sure.

BD: And, er, it's hard to, it's hard to stand outside of all that and remain sane.

TC: It seems a bit like the music of the fifties, a kind of everything being homogeneous and everybody kind of feeling that they have to toe the line and um, not be too outrageous, or if...

BD: Well, I mean, even outrageousness, you know, gets to be in fashion.

TC: Yeah.

BD: Anything you can think of to do, someone's gonna come along and market it.

TC: Right.

BD: Whatever it is, I don't know. I think it's gonna change. I don't think it's gonna stay the way it is forever. That's for sure. I think it's going to change into something else, you know, but, as for the moment, it's hard to find anything that's hot, you know?

TC: But there' just a huge amount of money tied up in it.

BD: Yeah, there's... probably more than anybody knows even.

TC: Mm... urn... what was I gonna say? Some of your songs have seen more... some of your songs seem incredibly direct and sort of really obvious and some of them seem sort of kinda quite the opposite. I mean, some of them are very impenetrable. Do you sort of strike for directness, or, I mean, is it something that doesn't matter to you much?

BD: Well, I strike for something that feels right to me. Er, like I said, it could be, er... a different... a lotta different kinds of er, mood or phrasings, or... lines that might not seem to be too connected at the time but with the music they're all connected, you know, like, a lot of times people will take out my lyrics and they'll take the music out of them and they'll just read 'em as lyrics, you know. And that's not really fair, because... er, the music and the lyrics, I've always felt, are pretty closely wrapped up and I don't think one... you can't separate one from another that simply. So... a lot of times it's not in the line, maybe, the line is sung. You know what I mean?

TC: Yeah.

BD: I mean, there might be more meaning in the way the line is sung. You could take a line and it might be a line which is... seems to be very positive, and you can sing it in a way which seems to be very negative, or vice-versa, you know?

TC: Right.

BD: I don't... I'm not really conscious of that when I'm doing it. It just comes out the way it comes out.

TC: Yeah. I was just wondering, I mean, you have, you've been in this game for, like, a long time, right, like thirty years almost, maybe, and, erm, I suppose, I mean, how much do you approach the possibility... the task of improving your craft, or do you see it in that way. I mean do...

BD: Oh yeah, all the time. Yeah, I'm always studying on it, you know. Um, there's just a lot... there's... it's bottomless, it's bottomless, you know, it's... there's no end to it, er... I'll probably never get to do all the stuff that I wanna do that I feel I'm capable of doing... lyrically. There's just all kinds of different ways to go about things. I've just got, you know, I've just er... I'm really at the surface really.

TC: Yeah. Do you still get the satisfaction out of live performance that you did... that you did when you first started out, like performing, particularly performing with an electric band?

BD: Well. When it's right, you do, yeah. And when it's not right, you don't, um. I don't like bad nights any more than anybody else, you know?

TC: Right.

BD: But... the good nights make up for all the bad nights.

TC: Do you, um, do you... you've been working very hard for the last couple of years as well. I mean, it seems to have been a very creative period or a very...

BD: Yeah. I have been. I've been doing... I've been just doing... I've been trying to find different things though that are kind of like offshoots of what I normally would do, you know, um, and I feel something might open up in the next couple of months, I don't know, in different areas, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: But...

TC: How does it, um... I mean, your kids are pretty well grown up now.

BD: Yeah, they are.

TC: Do... well, how much of a perspective does that give you, I mean, being a father as well as being a...

BD: Well, er, it gives you perspective on what, you know, kids are doing, but the kids don't seem... I don't think they're any different than they were... than they ever are really.

TC: No. But I just wonder, I just wonder how, I mean surely it must affect the way you approach your art. I mean, seeing... seeing a family.

BD: Well, you know, it's like... it's like my daddy once said, you know. It's like when he was, er... when he was, er... twelve years old or something he... he asked his dad something and, er, he didn't think his dad knew... knew too much about what he was talking about. And, then when he got to be 25, he asked him the same thing and he said, you know, he gave him the same answer and, er, you know, he was amazed that his father got to be so smart, you know.

TC: Right. You also, in the last few years, or quite a few years ago now, I suppose, before Infidels. I mean, your... up through the 70's you had seemed to be something more than just another pop singer and you get a lot of flak for those albums that you did in that period. I mean, has that... was that, um... it seemed also to clear the air a bit, when one sees you on TV or one hears your records. You don't seem to be carrying around that burden of having to be Bob Dylan. So if you have...

BD: Yeah, well, I don't think I ever carried that burden around except maybe one tour in '74.

TC: Yeah.

BD: And when I did that tour with the Band I think I was pretty much of a heavy burden from tour, you know, because... because of the notoriety and the legendary quality to it... there wasn't any. I had to be, I had to step into Bob Dylan's shoes, you know?

TC: Right.

BD: But since that time I never thought about it, er... I wouldn't do half the things I do if I was thinking about, er... having to live up to a Bob Dylan tour or Bob Dylanness, you know.

TC: Perhaps it's just our, my perception of it... as being, well, my perception of your persona. Do you think also that, um... I mean, do you think that basically that your life has been pretty much, um, a process of, of, of positive learning? I mean, do you think that, that, that you have been guided to where you are now or is it just, um, a mixture of good luck and misfortune?

BD: Well, yeah. You know? I, er, you're always guided to where you are but you can, you have, you have the choice to mess it up, you know.

TC: Yeah.

BD: And, um, sooner or later everything that goes wrong comes round, so... yeah, I feel that I've been guided to wherever it is I'm at right now, and I don't know what it is I'm really supposed to do. I might have something else that I'm supposed to do. I... I can't figure out what it would be though, um, 'cause I like doing what I do and, er... you know, who's to say... there's a lot of luck involved, there's a lot of... you know, just a circumstance involved too.

TC: Being in the right place?

BD: Yeah, at the right place. Being there at the right time and knowing the right people and having the... you know? I mean, you can't do anything alone, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: You always have to have somebody that's supporting you. Nobody'd get anywhere if they didn't.

TC: Um, I think I've sort of run out of questions... Are you planning to tour after Australia?

BD: Oh, I've got to have another record out by June, so I'm gonna be working hard on that, er, after this particular tour. And then I don't know. Maybe in the summertime. Maybe in the early Summer I'll tour... I'll do some tour, yeah.

TC: There are a lot of... um... a lot of songs on Empire Burlesque... why is that... is that just the one... the way there was a...

BD: Yeah, they're just... I don't know, it turned out that way. There's a bunch of songs that I want to write that I haven't been able to get close to at the moment There's songs I almost have to go out and... I know, I know what they are and... but the information that I need is not really available to me so I have to go out and get it and I haven't done that. Um, I expected to have a little bit more than that on Empire Burlesque but I just, I just didn't do it Er, there's a type of songs and situations like true story type things that, that... real things that have happened where I would like to comment on these things and I need to talk to the people involved and I haven't followed through on some of that stuff. I hope to have some of that something like that on the next album I do.

TC: Were you sort of pretty happy with the way Empire Burlesque turned out?

BD: Yeah, for what it was. I thought it was, I thought it was, er, I thought it was really good, you know? Um, I think the next record's gonna sound even better though because I've been, I've been not too experienced at having records sell good and I don't know who... how to go about doing that and I thought, I thought I got pretty close last time with Arthur Baker. I think the next time, though, working with Dave Stewart here, the stuff we're doing has been happening a lot easier, quicker. So I think it's going to sound even more, more together than the last record.

TC: With Arthur Baker, did you sort of put down the tracks and give them to him to mix?

BD: Yeah. Yeah.

TC: Right. What you, you put them down pretty much live?

BD: Ah, yeah, pretty much so... I just went in and recorded a bunch of stuff all over the place and then when it was time to put this record together I just brought it all to him, you know?

TC: Yeah

BD: And we sat down and he made it sound like a record.

TC: Yeah, it's very difficult...

BD: Usually, er, usually, er, I stay out of that side of the record, of the finished record whatever it is, you know?

TC: Why?

BD: Well, it gets... I'm not good at it, erm. There are guys who don't mind sitting in the control booth for days and days, you know, we're in the studio and I'm just not like that. I can't... I'm one mix... I can't tell the difference between 'em, you know?

TC: Do you think it makes better records working that way?

BD: Yeah, oh yeah, the way records are mixed. You could take a record and mix it a hundred different ways, you know?

TC: No, but I mean, do you think like doing thousands and thousands of takes of different solos – do you think that makes a record better or... I mean, I personally...

BD: Well my records, solos don't mean that much.

TC: No.

BD: Oh the vocals, the vocals mean a lot and the rhythm means a lot and, er, that's about it, you know?

TC: Yeah. Your voice has changed really dramatically as well like over the years. I mean...

BD: Has it really?

TC: Yeah. It sounds to me completely different.

BD: Well, you mean from the early days.

TC: Well just over the, over the, yeah. All the time it changes.

BD: Oh yeah, yeah. Maybe it does. I don't know.

TC: I know... I don't know whether that's the way it's recorded now or whether it's, it's erm, it's just the way you are, I mean, you get old I suppose.

BD: Yeah.

TC: I guess one of the weird things for people of... for musicians of your generation is that you're the first generation to really have to grow old, old, with pop music. If you know what I mean?

BD: Well, there's some people from the fifties still around.

TC: But not many people from the fifties are still kind of writing new material and sort of pushing...

BD: I don't think Chuck Berry has written a song in years, or Carl Perkins either. Carl Perkins, he's still around but I don't think he's written anything either.

TC: I mean, when you started out... it was teenage music and you were teenagers or just after and to, to go through that process of trying to find something that makes sense to you, when you have to put all the teenage things aside.

BD: Yeah... Oh boy... I don't know... like I...

TC: It's not a question.

BD: Yeah. I know what you mean. To me it seems like such a long time ago and then on the other hand it just seems like the other day, you know.

TC: Yeah, sure.

BD: I mean, it's just a... time's got a way of just rolling on, you know... affects you and don't affect you.

TC: Do you think that with time comes wisdom?

BD: Well, with experience, you know.

TC: Yeah.

BD: Er, because, it's er, things don't really change, it's just attitudes that change, you know?

TC: Yeah, sure. Do you also think that maybe it's necessary to erm, to experience everything?

BD: Ummm. No, I don't think so. I don't see, I don't know what the point of it all would be, you know, I mean, there's... don't know.

TC: If not everything, I mean, do you think... I mean, going through the kind of temptations and the craziness and stuff, like, that surround, that surround being in a band.

BD: In a band?

TC: Well being a successful pop star... being in the public eye and, I guess, I guess, just going ... going through the kind of temptations that are offered to you.

BD: Yeah, well those are like... those are like... when you're young you know and you've never seen it before, it's exciting, but you can't keep going that way, because er, um, you're just not strong enough to... to make the stage, you know, or to go out, to go out on the road as if you're in a play pen or something, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: Because you do have to work (laughter). If you didn't have to work, I guess it'd be alright, I guess, but, but it takes a lot out of you to... succumb to all of those temptations.

TC: Yeah. When I was talking about your voice changing... I think also one of the things that seemed to make a little difference was all those years of singing with girls.

BD: Oh yeah.

TC: From 78 on, or whatever it was.

BD: Yeah, I don't know. I mean.. Do you think it's changed that much? I can't really tell. I'm not really aware of it, if it is. I'm not sure if there's any significant difference really. But, I have always heard, you know, that sound with my music.

TC: Yeah.

BD: I just hear it in there. It's like... it's like it's just another exten... it's just another way of putting horns in, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: That sound has always been one of my favorite sounds. It's just that... that vocal part and, I mean... because I don't do anything with soloistic type work. You know what I mean?

TC: Yeah.

BD: Like... in the band, there's never any guitar player that... that's, that's solo is going to be, you know... part of the overall effect. You know what I mean?

TC: Yeah.

BD: Oh. It's more than just playing the song, you know? It's getting... getting the structure of it down right and the vocal parts are like another instrument, but they're not a soloistic instrument.

TC: Yeah, yeah...

BD: Oh, and just besides that, I mean, I just like the sound. I just like to hear, you know, gospel-type girl sounds.

TC: Right. It's something that um... it's something er... that seems to get really quite lost when people talk about your work, is the music, actually. I mean, they, even stuff like the Pat Garrett sound track. I mean there's some great, there's some great pieces of music on that without any words at all.

BD: Oh, well, you know, I just.. we just did a bunch of tracks... I just did a bunch of tracks with Dave Stewart and, er, you know, there's no lyrics on 'em. Like, you know, you don't even miss the lyrics, really. Just musically like they're... they're like just different chord patterns that seem to make up a melody, you know what I mean?

TC: Yeah. The stuff that you did with Dave Stewart, was that just the two of you or was that...

BD: Err, it was in his... he's got a studio in London. No, it wasn't just two of us, there was a er... we also had a drummer and a bass guitar player and a keyboard player.

TC: Right. Um... yeah. How do you still feel about videos, these days?

BD: Well, I don't really have any, much of a feeling on them um... they're... I'm, not really an expert in that area on videos... they're... they're probably here to stay for sure, you know and, er... it's just another way to sell records really.

TC: Yeah. Do you think...

BD: But that's more about what I was saying about, every place you look, you know, it's just... you're just... you're drowning in it, you know? I mean, you can't turn on your TV without seeing videos, I mean, here, you know what I mean, it's just everywhere.

TC: It's sort of... I mean pop music now or rock 'n' roll music is now the main culture in our society. Where once it was sort of an outlaw thing in ours, it's just everywhere.

BD: Yeah, well, it's become that, you know?

TC: I think the... well, I think...

BD: It's just like the unions, you know. Unions are the same way. In the early thirties they were all communist organisations. And now they're, you know, now they're big business in themselves, do you know what I mean?

TC: Yeah, exactly. I mean... you have politicians in the United States quoting from rock n' roll songs.

BD: Yeah. Absurd, isn't it?

TC: Yeah. It's pretty horrifying...

BD: Rock n' roll songs they're quoting from deserve, you know, to be quoted like that.

TC: Mm, sure. The um...

BD: You see, you couldn't do that with er, with all that early stuff – Little Richard, Chuck Berry – I mean, what politician's gonna quote Chuck Berry? You know?

TC: Right.

BD: Well whose gonna quote Little Richard or Elvis Presley or Carl Perkins or Gene Vincent, any of those guys? Who's gonna quote any of that? You know, it was outside then and it's outside now.

TC: Yeah, but then again there's a lot of pop... a lot of rock n' roll music that they're not gonna quote either.

BD: Oh yeah, Oh, for sure. Huh. They're only gonna quote... anybody's just gonna quote what helps their own, what serves their own self, you know?

TC: It seems to be more... it seems though to be, sort of, everything's sort of tied up with image and, I mean, then, sort of quoting from Bruce Springsteen or quoting from Bob Dylan is more, rather than actually using the words for what they mean, it's more sort of attaching themselves to an image. You know, it's like everything, particularly video sensitive, that it seems to make... make an image or an icon of people or of works and you just sort of grab hold of it and stick it in front of you and "this means something to me".

BD: That's absolutely correct and that's why I say you've just gotta turn it off because if, because if all we can do... if all we can do is just complain about it and that it's, you know, destroying the fabric of our minds, then we just have to shut it off, you know? We just have to, we just have to, just er... cut it off where it is and, and er, not get it into, into your framework, you know, because that's the only other way you're gonna escape it. You, you, you can't meet it head-on, because it's there, you know?

TC: Yeah. You can just learn how to deal with it.

BD: Right, right.

TC: How to see things properly.

BD: I imagine that you've probably got a little more space to breathe there where you are, but it's, you know, but over here it's... it's heavy. But, you're gonna hear... there's only places you can go without being reminded of... you know, of current cultural musical ambitions of people who are on their way to be stars.

TC: Yeah. When you started out and you wanted to be a star... did you want to be a star?

BD: I wanted to be a star in my own mind, you know? I wanted to be my own star.

TC: Right.

BD: I didn't wanna care to be a star for people that I really didn't identify with anyway.

TC: Yeah.

BD: For me, it was just, er... it was a way of life, it wasn't er, er...

break in tape

er... at the moment will do, er... but, the most... that's the important thing. If you lose that then you just start giving in to er... just sort of stuff which is kind of mindless and meaningless, you know and er, usually there's a little something, there's a little, you know... there's a voice that goes on, you know – there's a, some kind of warning point if that ever happens. Um, but mostly what, what this kind of music is all about is just a pull for you to feel things.

TC: Yeah.

BD: There's a lot of stuff going on which you hear that you know nobody's felt nothing about and you can hear it in the spirit, you know? Like when you, when you... watch so much stuff which is thrown at you. There's no feeling behind it because there's nobody that feels anything any more. The danger and all that stuff has just wiped out everybody's feelings about everything.

TC: Yeah. Do you think, do you think it's a conscious attempt to do that or it's just a... it's just a by-product?

BD: I think it's a spiritual attempt, you know. If you put, if you put erm, headlines in the paper, you know, that there were forty John Does found in the morgue, you know, and there was no identification, no next of kin – if you put that in the paper enough times it'll blow your... it won't register with people any more.

TC: Yeah. Do you, urn, do you think it's worse now than it was. I mean, when the Beatles were around, there were the Beatles and the Animals and there were the great people but there were also like, you know, I mean, plenty of schlock around as well.

BD: Yeah. Yeah, there was just always a lot of that around, er...

TC: It's just the percentage is more now.

BD: Er.. yeah, because maybe the present... I don't know what... but there is a lot of good things going on which I don't understand. I mean, I know, like, a lot of this stuff which is coming out musically is way beyond, erm.. way beyond me. Some of these people, you know, who are, are really gifted musicians, I mean in a classical sense, you know. You're hearing a lot of different stuff, you know that, that, that's been thought out and pre-planned, er... it's just a different picture now, you know, it's like, there's like everything is just kinda... it's just kinda existing on it's own level... there's nobody really got a handle on it, you know?

TC: Yeah.

BD: I mean, there's new... I guess there's new categories and stuff coming out every day because people still need categories. But, what meaning they have is highly debatable, you know?

TC: Yeah. You have those records... I just got that Sun City record the other day which is kind of... erm... I mean it's a sort of an attempt, I suppose, to cut through the kind of, the crap. It seems to me to be a remarkably sort of non, non-image kind of record.

BD: Oh yeah.

TC: And there does, there does seem to be an attempt by people like Miami Steve to kind of say things about what's happening in America today.

BD: Yeah. He's highly committed to that.

TC: But it seems like it's an incredible struggle.

BD: Well it is an incredible struggle because, you know, erm... most people, I guess, just don't wanna hear that.

TC: There seems to be a lot of like, red-baiting going on as well. Like people being accused of being communists and sympathising with communists and stuff.

BD: Oh, that's been going on since the fifties.

TC: But the cold war seems to be coming...

BD: Uh?

TC: The cold war seems to be coming back.

BD: The what?

TC: The cold war seems to be coming back.

BD: Yeah. I don't think it ever went away, you know? Erm... it's just... laid low for a while.

TC: Yeah.

BD: But people, people need something to hate, you know? You gotta hate something. I mean, that's... it's like er... as soon as you're old enough they try to make you hate something or somebody.

TC: Yeah. Whether they be communists or blacks... or anything else.

BD: Blacks are a little bit easier than communists. Communists you can't really see. Communist is what... I mean... is a person, like... well, you know, the early Christians were like communists.

TC: Right.

BD: But they did the same things in the Roman Empire – treated the Roman Christians the same way as the Western world treats the communists.

TC: Yup. So it doesn't really change, does it?

BD: No, I don't think so. It's just got a different name on it.

TC: Yeah.

BD: I'm not saying that communists are today's Christians by any means, but, you know, I mean, there's always, there's always some... there's always, there's always someone that, that you're told you've gotta step on so you can rise up a little higher.

TC: Yeah. OK.

BD: OK?

TC: OK.

BD: Well, maybe I'll get to see you when we get over there.

TC: Yeah. OK.

BD: OK.

TC: See you around. Bye-bye.

BD: Bye.

January 1986
Congratulations To Willie Nelson, Los Angeles, California

Source: Circulating tape

Bob Dylan's congratulation speech to Willie Nelson, when he got the First Annual Award Of Appreciation for his work for humanitarianism, e.g. Farm Aid. The award was presented 27 January 1986. Broadcast by ABC-TV network the same day.

It's not a bad thing to have a good idea. It is a better thing to take a good idea and do something about it. That's just what you did, Willie. You took time off of a busy career , you put a lot of energy and money. You asked a lot of friends to help out and they did. You made "Farm Aid" a reality. For this the music business thanks you, I thank you, the American farmers thanks (sic!) you. You deserve this award, Willie, congratulations!

26 January 1986
Don McLeese interview for Chicago Sun-Times

Source: Chicago Sun-Times, "Show" section, 26 Jan 1986, p. 8

ASK HIM SOMETHING, AND A SINCERE DYLAN WILL TELL YOU THE TRUTH
by Don McLeese

LOS ANGELES "You got any questions for me? I love to talk," said Bob Dylan, as he motioned me toward the piano for a chat after rehearsal. He seemed sincere, even friendly, if a little guarded.

There was a time when hearing Dylan say he loved to talk would have been as surprising as hearing Mike Ditka say he loved to lose, or Elvis Presley confiding that he loved to diet. An interview with Bob Dylan offered the same prospects for congeniality as a Sean Penn photo session. Twenty years ago, Dylan's dealings with the press ranged from cryptic to combative. As the "Don't Look Back" documentary made plain, he didn't suffer fools gladly, and he seemed to find signs of foolishness everywhere. From behind his dark glasses, he preferred to let his lyrics – his parables and paradoxes, his amphetamine-fueled flights of surrealism – speak for themselves. He seemed like a hard man.

The Dylan that I encountered was far softer – a softer handshake, a softer demeanor – than I had expected. Maybe now that people aren't prying so much into his personal life – remember the self-proclaimed "Dylanologist" who dedicated himself to sifting through Dylan's garbage for revelations? – so maybe he can allow himself to be a little more open. Maybe religion or age or both have mellowed him a little. Maybe he tired of inventing and shedding new skins, new shields, new identities. Maybe he is simply more willing these days, in light of his declining commercial impact, to meet his audience halfway.

Whatever the case, Dylan's lyrical approach has become more straightforward in recent years, and his personal manner seems more open as well. The man who once sang "Don't ask me nothin' about nothin', I just might tell you the truth," had asked me if I had any questions. And he seemed to mean it. And, yeah, I had some.

Why New Zealand, Australia and Japan, rather than the long-awaited return to Stateside touring?

"I've never been offered that much here in the States," he said with a laugh. "There's really very little reason for most of the stuff I do. There's not very much logic behind it. I haven't been in Australia since '78 or so."

Why the Heartbreakers?

"This just kinda fell into place for me," he said. "Mutual friends I know. It just happened. It wasn't like I woke up one morning and decided that I wanted to work with a particular band."

The band's guitar-and-keyboard sound reflects the enduring influence of Dylan's "Highway 61 Revisited"/"Blonde on Blonde" period, and the fact that the Heartbreakers would interrupt their own projects for a chance to tour with Dylan suggests that his stature in musical circles hasn't diminished with the passage of time. With the exception of Elvis Presley, it is hard to imagine another artist who has so completely reshaped the face of popular music in his own image.

When he turned to rock, his impact was so profound that it was impossible to ignore. Not only did he radically transform what was being sung, but he also revolutionized how it would be sung. Just listen to John Lennon singing "Norwegian Wood" or Mick Jagger singing "She Smiled Sweetly," and you'll hear imitation Dylan. Just listen to the Four Tops' "Reach Out (I'll Be There)," and you'll hear Dylan in the way Levi Stubbs phrases the lyric.

A few years later, when glitter was the vogue in England, both David Bowie and Marc Bolan penned odes to the master. Bruce Springsteen reportedly drew the blueprint for his early career from a biography of Dylan, and took his music to the same man who had signed Dylan to Columbia Records.

Among the best of today's new bands, Dylan's influence stretches from Jason and the Scorchers to Mike Scott and the Waterboys. Few producers these days are hotter than the Eurythmics' Dave Stewart, who felt privileged to collaborate with Dylan on a recent video and tracks for his next album. And what are such socially conscious efforts as Live Aid, Farm Aid and "Sun City," but the reflowering of the seeds sown by Dylan in the early '60s? Although the five-record "Biograph" set should reinforce the breadth and depth of Dylan's accomplishments for a new generation of listeners, there's no question that his commercial impact has diminished as the quality of his recorded work has become more erratic. Does it bother him to be away from t he forefront of popular consciousness?

"Not really," Dylan said. "I mean, I've done what I wanted to do, and I really can't complain. Everybody gets their time to do whatever it is they're doing. You know what I mean: You gotta start out when you're young. Sometimes I forget I'm not that young."

How important are record sales to the 44-year-old Dylan?

"At this point really not that important, because of my contract. But in the future, it might be," he said. "There's more great records that don't sell, in a real crushing sort of way: Leonard Cohen's last record was a brilliant record. John Prine's last record I thought was incredible. Lou Reed always makes a great record.

"I've found, and I think it's true, that most people get their inspiration from records that they have to seek out, and really aren't that popular. I know that's the way it was with me. Whether it was folk music or rhythm and blues or rock 'n' roll, it wasn't that popular when we were growing up. You really had to be dedicated to seek that out, and make that a part of your life." Of course, where the music that initially attracted Dylan represented an outsider's voice of expression – raw, vital, unpolished – much of what has passed for rock in recent years has been a triumph of mainstream merchandising. Little wonder that a man who never sang a song the same way twice has seemed increasingly uncomfortable in an era of rhythm-machine rigidity and frozen video images.

"I definitely think and believe that the popular music of today, it's not gonna work," Dylan said. "Because there's not really substance behind it. There's a lot of machines and a lot of riffs, and people are going to get tired of it, if they're not tired already."

When he's playing with people who once idolized him – or still do – is there any sense of intimidation that he has to dissolve?

"When they see what I'm about, you know it's all about being able to follow what I'm doing and stick with that," he said. "It really doesn't amount to any kind of intimidation. Maybe I might play with somebody who's really young, and they're kinda shaky, but then you have to encourage those people to play.

"When I play, people can play around what I play. I give people a lot of space."

Although Heartbreaker keyboardist Benmont Tench says that Dylan is an easy artist to work with, he remembered his initial experiences for the "Shot of Love" sessions.

"The first day that I worked with him, he didn't say a word the whole session, and I didn't know anybody at the session," he said. "At the end of the day, when I was leaving, he said, 'Can you come tomorrow?' "

At that point, Tench figured that he probably had done all right.

3 February 1986
Auckland airport, Brief comments to press

Source: Circulating tape.

Two unwillingly given comments to the press:

BD: I just love to fly.
and
BD: We'll see you later, you know.

7 February 1986
Stuart Coupe interview, Regent Hotel, Auckland, New Zealand

Source: Internet

Not a complete interview, just one snippet –

A surprise inclusion in the live set-list has been Dylan's song about Lenny Bruce. As the song suggests, Dylan confirmed that they did catch a cab together once.

"Yeah, I saw him perform in the early sixties, around 1963, before he got caught up in all that legal stuff," Dylan said. "He's someone who's never really been attributed the respect he deserves for what he did and the influence he had on so many people. Guys like Richard Pryor and Eddie Murphy, they owe such a huge debt to him but no one makes the same fuss about him as they do about all those other guys that died before they should have."

10 February 1986
Press Conference in Brett Whitley's Studio, Sydney, Australia

Source: The Rolling Telegraph Supplement #1, p.23; #2, p. 17

Dylan in conference
Juke's Murray Engelheart (tape-recorder) and Bob King (cameras) joined the jostling throng as The Zim gave his only Australian press conference

The narrow, roughly paved back streets of Surry Hills in Sydney was a strangely apt, though unusual, environment in which to cross paths with a living legend.

There was a distinct air of tension and anticipation is the expansive studio of artist Brett Whitley. Hardened industry persons shifted uncomfortably, nature which position to take.

Approximately 15 minutes late. It was announced that "Mr Dylan" would be arriving soon, and photographers had 30 seconds to take their shots. Then, in he strolled, to the deafening overture of a multitude of clicking cameras and the awe-filled murmurs of those present. Dylan positioned himself on the leather lounge, hands together, eyes raised, tolerating the adulation. The photographers' curfew was firmly enforced.

Dylan seemed relatively at ease, his customary leather jacket and bike boots complemented by a shirt undone to his waist. He looked tired but, after all, this is Bob Dylan.

Contrary to the Sixty Minutes fiasco, Dylan displayed a kaleidoscope of moods: warm, humble and humorous. The razor tongue that was the terror of interviewers year ago has been replaced with the patience of a world-weary man who has humbly seen it all and inspired most of it.

The man had a spiritual calm about him, almost an aura. Despite the fact his Christianity concerns are now back between the lines as they were prior to his seventies' public spirituality, this is still, without a doubt, the man whose heart poured out the majestic prayer, "I Believe In You" from Slow Train A'Coming, although the fire-breathing rock'n'roller is making a resurgence.

The questions came thick and fast from dozens of media reps and hangers on. Some just stood and listened in awe. Although reluctant to give opinions on some subjects, which he countered with a three or four word response, Dylan fielded most questions in a slow, thoughtful manner, though at times translation was difficult.

On his high profile recently and the Live Aid and Farm Aid experiences.

"Live Aid and Farm Aid were pretty good causes I guess."

His involvement in those projects.

"As much as anyone else that was there."

Did imitators flatter him?

"It's… it's… it's flattering."

On his visit to Moscow last year.

"I was invited by a poet, Yevgeny Yevtushenko. He invited me to a poetry convention."

Was he surprised at how much that country knew about him?

"The particular show I did was only for a certain type of people."

Did he see himself as a poet?

"I don't know, compared to whom? I don't really put my stuff next to Byron or Keats. I don't think my stuff stands up too well on paper next to that."

Why Australia with Tom Petty?

"Why? Because of the money."

In the video of "Tight Connection To My Heart" he looked uncomfortable at times.

"All the time." Laughs.

Did he hate every minute of it?

"Yeah." (Grins)

Are videos a necessary evil?

"Not any more than anything else."

Such as?

"Like anything."

Also looking uncomfortable in "We Are The World".

"To tell you the truth, I don't remember that I did as best as I could."

The reason for the popularity of monstrous music?

"There is so much mediocrity going on, every time someone really good comes along it's like you can't be too good 'cause you're looked at. you stand out. People that stand out in an individual kind of way, they don't fit into the system because they don't sell, they don't keep system commodities going. I thought Peter Townshend's record was real good."

On Shyness:

"Yeah, most of the time."

On himself:

"Who's Bob Dylan? I'm only Bob Dylan when I have to be Bob Dylan. Most of the time I just be myself."

On Christianity:

"I was doing what I believed I should be doing. Most artists should do some gospel kind of music. If they don't do something with gospel, I don't really trust that artist I don't care who he is. I never considered myself to have Christian fans and non-Christian fans. I don't deal with people in that kinda way."

Impact over the years:

"I know I've had a lot of influence on people, but a lot of people have been an influence on me, too. When I started, when I was coming up. I was influenced by everybody that had formed the style I'd come up with. It's not a bad thing to be influenced by other people."

Responsibility and the Protest movement:

"That was never my intention. To be responsible, to set an example for anybody, that's not my fault."

What is believed to be the sexist overtones on Empire Burlesque. (Uproar from the group)

"What's a sexist album? What does that mean. Sexist, I don't know what you mean, I have never met a man who is stereotyped."

Women:

"I couldn't live without them."

The world:

"I am just as much anti-nuclear as anybody. Things have changed, you know. They might still be the same, they might just look different."

Change for the better:

"In the States they have. In a lot of different parts of the States, they have, sure."

Changed for the better?

"For the better? In the United States? See, I can only speak for things in the United States. Well, it's like we've been talking, it's true there's a lot of oppression in the United States. but it's also true there's more freedom there."

How much of the music comes from the subconscious and how much are you a medium for God?

"I don't know. It gets less and less that's pulled up from my subconscious. I used to pull a lot of it up. I pull some of it up once in a while now, but not too often."

Medium for God?

"I feel that way about most of the stuff I do. I may not know at the time that that's what happening, or that might be the process, but when I see it later it seems to me that that's the way it happens."

Surprised his influence wasn't stronger in '60s as the ministerial poet?

"Yeah, but see, poetry, it takes a long time to get your thing together. Everybody expects (pause)... there's this commercialism of stuff where if you're a good looking kid or got a good voice they expect you to be able to do it all. You may be good looking and you may have a great voice, but if you've never had experience to go with it, you're just gonna be disposed of.

"There are quite a few people that did that (follow his lead). I think it does a lot whether. you know it or not, because a lot of stuff that is really good, nobody is really turned up to, you know. Most of the things you're exposed to you just hear on the radio or television and it's like if it's not on the radio or on the television it's not happening, and that's not true at all. There's a lot of stuff happening, but it's not Just happening on that level."

Music affecting society and politics.

"No, I don't think so. I think they (music) can get into people's subconscious minds, maybe in a roundabout way, and they make people feel better. They feel that maybe sometimes what they are thinking or feeling they can hear it articulated in a song and they may think, yeah, I'm not so crazy to feel that way."

If the credit for recent work lies with God, where does the credit for year early work lie?

"It's all for God, you know."

On patriotism and the scoundrel reference in "Sweetheart Like You" and is Patriot a scoundrel?

"Groups of people who use America for a stepping stone for a more powerful position In the rest of the world. I mean, face it, there are people who are trying to gain control of the entire world now, not just in America, but everywhere. There would seem like in future there's gonna be some man that wants to be powerful enough to rule the world, and why not?"

The press — could he have made it without them?

"No. I could not have made it without their help. The press wasn't that powerful when I got started. I only got turned off the press in the mid-60s when record companies would send me over to do an interview with someone and you'd be honest with that person and he'd ask you questions and you answer them in an honest way and then you'd see the article would come out and, not dishonest, but he'd take quotations and turn things around and make you seem like a different kind of person by using everything that you gave him. So you felt like you'd been suckered into something.

"Someone else has an idea about doing something to you and you were innocent and didn't know about it, so, after that I started to get turned off by the manner of the people who were coming to interview you for a magazine.

"When I was talking about the press I wasn't talking about war reporters or people covering fires or investigating murders. I never meant that side of the press, just the side that was pertaining to the entertainment section."

Career:

"What career? I've never had a career. I am somebody that doesn't work for a living."

What does Bob Dylan think of Bob Dylan?

"Bob Dylan doesn't ever think about Bob Dylan."

Whey does he continue? Does he enjoy it?

"Well, this is about all I can really do. I don't really remember doing anything else."

But, you don't have to?

"I don't have to? ... I don't know."

21 February 1986
EON-FM Radio Interview, Melbourne, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1055-1056.

This interview by an (as yet) unknown individual (XX) was recorded at the poolside of the Rockmans' Regency Hotel in Melbourne during Bob's 1986 tour. It took place either on the 20th or 21st of February 1986 and was broadcast on EON – FM Radio on the 21st.

BD: Okay, this is Bob Dylan... they're gonna play a record of mine next and your listening to EON.

DJ: You've done 30 albums or 30-some albums by now and that's a lot of material... a lot of songs. How do you go about actually selecting songs you're going to do in a performance of 3 hours or 2½ hours or whatever?

BD: Well, I usually... I usually try to put in songs which are different in their own context, either structurally or melodically or uh lyrically, that uh, don't... so it's not all the same type of material, I try to fill in a larger picture. I don't know what the total effect of it is. Umm... How do I go about selecting the material? Well, there's material that I WANT to play, there's material that I feel I HAVE to play, and, uh, I try to get the material that I feel I have to play into the frame of mind where I want to play the material that I have to play. The rest of it is just stuff I want to play.

XX: Who do you figure... is there somebody that you're aware of in the world that may be a logical successor to the contribution that you've made to music and thought over the years?

BD: Well, strangely enough you know I've thought about that. People ask you at the time when you think you're gonna quit, when you've had enough, you know, when you're gonna get out, and uh, we were just talking this morning, I was telling somebody that your health will knock you out, first of all. If you're physically not able to do it, that's it, it's over you know. You can't just be some... like an ageing, uh, rock and roll performer, or sort of like... an ageing baseball player, actually, you know. I mean, you get your high points and that's it. Well, if you're physically together you can stay together. I'm also not an oldies type performer, oldies circuit thing. So that's one of the reasons you'd probably drop out and then another reason would be if you saw somebody coming along who you could help, and... Pete Townsend was talking about that one time, but, umm... and he got some criticism for saying it. But I understood exactly what he was talking about and it was, like, time to hand, uh, you know, the torch or something to somebody else. Well, you know, like it doesn't happen that way in rock and roll, you don't just hand it to somebody. The idea is right, but...

XX: Somebody comes and takes it?

BD: Yeah.

XX: You've been through the 50's, the 60's, the 70's, the 80's and we're heading into the year 2000. What do you feel generally about the next 20 years in the world?

BD: Well, I don't know, I've stopped counting, you know, I stopped counting. The 50's were rough. Everybody romanticises the 50's but that was a very rough time. Uh it's not as, it was not as spectacular... The only thing I remember that kept everybody going that I know in the 50's was maybe a few films that Marlon Brando made, or James Dean or... and the rockabilly music, you know, and rhythm and blues and that was it. But that music, you had to really... that's like... it called out to you, and very few people were onto it. And it was like a... almost like a life-raft thrown to people who were different back then. I don't know, there are people, the same type of people today, I don't know what's calling to them, what life-raft they have, because everything is kinda closing in... It's all like, this town here, this looks like the same as San Antonio, Texas, you know? It wasn't so in the 50's, or the 60's. Umm, everything, you know it's the same food, it's the same clothes, it's the same look, it's the same cars, it's the same materials, it's, you know, the same language, just about. Uh, that of course is on this side of the world. In the other parts of the world, it's, you know they have a real... Umm.. There's two sides to the world, there's the good side and the bad side, you know, and it's relatively civilised, I play in relatively civilised places, but I have been in places that are not civilised.

22 February 1986
Maurice Parker interview, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia

Source: Circulating tape

BD: I don't write songs if they're not easy to write. If it's hard for me to write something I usually drop it. I don't usually struggle with it. I have done that, but I don't usually like the results.

[clip from Like a Rolling Stone is shown. Probably from one of the Melbourne shows]

BD: You can tell during a show they respond to certain things that you think are... when you think you're doing something, you know. And when the crowd responds to that, you know, it gives you more confidence.
MP: Do you need to worry about confidence?
BD: No, not on the stage (laughs).
MP: What about before you go on stage?
BD: Well, yeah, in that area. You know, there is in the life of mine.
MP: Such as?
BD: Oh, like in a room full of crowded people, you know, a party of something. I usually don't like to mingle with too many people.
MP: Why is that?
BD: I don't know...
MP: Obviously, when you walk into a room...
BD: Like everybody either purposely avoids you or purposely confronts you. So sometimes it can be uncomfortable.
MP: How do you sort of react to that confrontation then?
BD: Usually I try to leave.
MP: Quickly?
BD: As quick as I can. Usually through the back door or some place.
MP: Where do you feel most comfortable then?
BD: Just about anywhere really. I'm not really discomfortable anywhere.
MP: Being on the stage is the place where it really all happens for you?
BD: Yeah. I have a better understanding of who I am up there.

[Like a Rolling Stone clip again]

BD: I wouldn't describe myself as confident or unconfident. I'm just... (laughs)... how'd I describe myself? I can't describe myself in one or two words considering the fact that I have written over 300 or 400 songs that do describe me.
I have a lot of other people speak for me. If you wanna find out what I'm like you usually have to ask other people. Usually you can find out better from someone who don't know me.
MP: What can you tell me?
BD: I can't tell you more that you can tell me about yourself, you know. I think it's wrong for a person to talk about themselves.
MP: Why is that?
BD: While a person's life speaks for itself. If you've done good things people will spread the news and if you've done bad things people will spread the news, too.
MP: So how then would you like to be remembered?
BD: Oh, as someone who tried to love somebody.
MP: So...

BD: Have you ever heard that expression before?
MP: I've heard that, yeah, yeah. What's love to you then?
BD: Love to me is a active thing. Love to me is an action type thing. It's not a word it's not a passive thing. If you love somebody you prove it.

[Clip of Emotionally Yours is played]

MP: What about romance?
BD: Romance is kind of in the fantasy area. It's sort of... It's got a dead end.
MP: Do you like humor?
BD: Humor? Of course I do. I love humor. I love to laugh. It's one of my favorite things.
MP: There goes your answer! People read articles about you, etc. and they say you're solemn and quiet, this sort of thing…
BD: Once in a while.
MP: What makes you laugh then.
BD: Well, something funny.
MP: Ha, ha. You got me there!

10 March 1986
MTV Interview, Backstage, Budokan Hall, Tokyo

Source: Circulated raw tape

This is a transcription of a 6+ -minute tape which seems to be a fraction of the whole interview. To the best of my knowledge there's nothing more in general circulation. There are two reporters asking questions – male (MR) and female (FR).

BD: The people my age I know are mostly musicians anyway. I really don't know people whose so called "age group" can be defined by an age group. The only people my age that I do consistently know are only other musicians. Outside of that, I don't know anybody at my own age at any type of social level, so unless of course they're a writer or a musician or an artist and at this area of life age isn't really important. You know, you just go out and play and see who comes. If younger people are coming, well, they seem… They see something new that they've not seen in their own younger group. They same way that I would go see older people when I was starting out playing when I was 18, 19, 20, 21. I mean I knew who the people were that I played with and people who were around doing the same things that I was. But if I wanted to see somebody play and learn about something, I would always go find much older type of person like Muddy Waters or Sleepy John Estes or somebody, you know, John Lee Hooker, something that I… Bill Monroe, you know, somebody like that. I never thought I'd be one of those people that younger people would ever come and see. I know it's all about younger people now, so…

MR: In some way you should be rediscovered by the young people. How do you feel about that?

BD: I don't know. I've always been doing what I've been doing, so I just don't have any idea… and no feeling or whatsoever… Rediscovered or discovered I mean, you know… it doesn't mean anything.

MR: A lot of artists did have a career, you know, anywhere approachable in length and depth to yours who had come to the stage maybe earlier than you, want to drop the past behind and leave the old songs and you continue to play yours…

BD: Mm-hmm, well, I continue to play them, because they actually hold up. They actually hold up in a lot of funny ways. They just do. They hold up. The words ring true. There are some songs that I can't play that I just don't feel like wanna play during a certain period, but the real old songs, they seem to really hold up, you know. There are certain ones, certain periods that I couldn't make hold up, I could stand them up in a certain way… That takes a lot of concentration and effort and anyway I'm not sure if they're that important anyway, because some of people come to see you for ah hour, hour and a half, two hours, what ever it is. I mean, they come to see you, and you could be doing anything upon that stage, you know, you can talk or fry an egg up there, hammer a nail into a piece of wood… they come to see you do something. And if you do nothing, that's alright, too, because at least they came and they saw you. It's not really about what you're doing or trying to impress anybody… Me, I just do what it is that I've always done, I was always in it, all the way to the end when I started. I means I had no other place to go and I had nothing to do. Except make music and write lyrics to that stuff. I was always in it for keeps when I was a little boy. I knew I was gonna be doing this rest of my life… as long as I was gonna be alive. So to point that anybody'd be disappointed in this or that on me, I mean, it's ridiculous. I don't pay much attention to that, because I'll be doing this for as long as I'm around, you know. And all the people I admired, they've all done it all the way to the end, too. It's all I do and I just keep doing that thing.

MR: Can you give us an example of some songs of yours that you think are no longer relevant?

BD: I don't say they're no longer relevant. It's that there are certain… maybe something… probably I'd do ANY song that I'd ever written, but to put them in a show is a different thing, because it takes time, and there's not a lotta time when you play for a few hours. First, I don't think I need to perform it or play for an hour… we play like a two-hour show, but the more records you put out, the more songs you write, the more you feel compelled that you have to put it in your program and another ones you have to drop out. Well, in the old days a show you didn't play for any longer than an hour and that was it. 14, 15 songs. 20 minutes – most of packet shows, most of those people played 20 minutes. And it some kind of way get out to where we perform… the more songs you write the more you do, the more you just have to stick to do onstage, so you have to drop things along the way, 'cause you can't do them all. I mean if I was going out there to do thirty-albums worth of stuff, you know, I'd be I'd be up there for days. There'd be no point to that.

FR: Your 'Biograph' actually sold better than any other five-record set ever released in the United States. How do you feel about it?

BD: I am surprised by that, actually. I really don't know, you know. I really don't know, I haven't really thought about it. It's great that it is… Selling records, but it's nothing that you can plan for. Those kind of things just happen, so… I don't know.

31 March 1986
Acceptance speech for the ASCAP Award, Chasen's Restaurant, Los Angeles, California

Source: Belfast Telegraph, p.6, Tuesday, April 1, 1986 reproduced in Rolling Telegraph Supplement #2, p.15
Circulating raw footage

Belfast Telegraph, Tuesday, April 1, 1986
Stars come out to honour Bob Dylan

THE music and movie establishment has paid tribute to Bob Dylan, honouring the poet-songwriter for a quarter century of achievement as an outspoken trendsetter in American popular music.

Songwriter Hal David, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, presented the group's second Founder's Award to Dylan at a party last night at Chasen's Restaurant that attracted a crowd including Elizabeth Taylor, Whoopi Goldberg, Neil Young and Burt Bacharach.

"I'd like to feel like I'm accepting this award for a lot of people who started out in rock n' roll and folk music, and never claimed to be as good as Johnny Mercer or Hal David or Jerome Kern or any of those people," Dylan said.

Pioneer

"We just used that medium to write what we were feeling, you know. And I feel like I'm accepting this for a lot of other people who are in the same category I'm in."

David referred to Dylan as a "pioneer, innovator, trendsetter and poet of his generation," saying ASCAP officials decided to give him the award — first given two years ago to Stevie Wonder — because of their esteem for the man "whose legendary contributions have been a sustaining influence on the music of an entire generation."

He also said the board "thought it was time we let him know how much we care for him and what he stands for." Dylan appreciated the thought, David added, describing the legendary but reclusive singer as "tickled pink to be here... and to have so many friends here."

Dylan apparently shared those sentiments, ending his comments by reciting lyrics from a song that Elvis Presley quoted in accepting another award — "Without a song, the day would never end. Without a song, the road would never bend. When things go wrong, a man ain't got a song, without a friend."

Speaking later to reporters, Dylan said he thought it "ironic that I'm honoured for anything." He also said of his work, "I guess it's been inspiring. I know it's been inspiring to me to write it."

Asked if he thought modern music was as significant as the songs of the '60s, he replied: "Not really. But I think it's going to change. People are going to get sick of it."

Dylan, dressed in black leather pants and a white scoop-necked T-shirt, spent most of the night sitting next to Taylor, talking with party guests.

Admired

The actress told reporters she admired Dylan most as a lyricist.

"He's a great poet and a marvellous musician," she said. "I love to read his lyrics. They're wonderful poetry."

Several other musicians also shared their thoughts about Dylan — whose songs include such classics as "Blowing in the Wind," "It Ain't Me, Babe," "The Times They Are A-Changing" and "Like A Rolling Stone."

Leonard Cohen, another singer-songwriter who emerged in the 1960s, called him "one of the greatest hearts that has spoken of the heart in a long, long time."

"Bob Dylan is a figure that arises every three or four hundred years," he added. "He represents and embodies all the finest aspirations of the human heart. He is unparalleled in the world of music and will remain a torch for all singers and all hearts for many generations to come."

Actual transcription follows:

HD: Good evening, I'm Hal David, and on behalf of Board of Directors of ASCAP without who we wouldn't be here today, I'm calling one of the great voices of the American music, Bob Dylan! (round of applause) And if there's any question about the esteem all of us hold for Mr Dylan, just have a look at this crowd, that says a great deal. He's been called a pioneer, an innovator, a trendsetter, and a poet of his generation. All those phrases fit. Beginning in the early 60's, Bob Dylan made everyone sit up and take notice. Writing songs that make up a part of our national heritage. He is the singer/songwriter personified. And for over 25 years, he has written and sung the songs he has created. The times they kept a-changin', but Dylan always stayed true to himself. Someone once called him a lone figure with a guitar and a point of view. And the remarkable thing is that the guitar and the point of view are still here 25 years later. Not only in his own music, but in the music of many of other contemporary artists, notably Bruce Springsteen. The far-reaching impact of Bob Dylan songs like Blowin' in the Wind, It Ain't Me, Babe, Like a Rolling Stone, Mr Tambourine Man and many others has made Dylan one of the most influential forces in pop music. And so, Bob, in recognition of all your accomplishments, I'd like to present you with a very special award on behalf of the ASCAP Board of Directors, all the ASCAP members, and if I may, would you come up here, I'll read it to you and I'll give it to you. (round of applause) This says, "The American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers presents the ASCAP Founders' Award to Bob Dylan whose legendary contributions to music have been a sustaining influence on the music of the entire generation, and whose accomplishments reflect the goal set forth by ASCAP Founding Fathers. March 31, 1986." Bob…

BD: All right… Okay…

Q: Bob, I wonder if at this point you find it ironic that you're getting this award from the Hollywood establishment after all those years of writing your songs — I'm from New York — … what are your feeling about that?

BD: Well, I'd like to feel like I'm accepting this award for a lot of people who started out in rock n' roll and folk music, and never claimed to be as good as Johnny Mercer or Hal David or Jerome Kern or any of those people, but we just used that medium to write what we were feeling, you know. And I feel like I'm accepting this for a lot of other people who are in the same category I'm in. I hope they all get awards.

HD: We'd like to thank everybody for coming and now, have a terrific time.

BD: I'd like to quote like Elvis Presley did when he accepted some award. When he accepted it he said, "Without a song, the day would never end. Without a song, the road would never bend. When things go wrong, a man ain't got a friend, without a song."

Q: You were writing in the 1960's. Do you think the music of the '80's is as important as the music of the 1960's?

BD: Nah, not really. But I think it's going to change.

BD: This man here is a great songwriter. He should be honored, too.

Q: Why did you say it is going to change?

BD: Ah, people are going to get sick of it.
Q: What's your reaction to this (function?)
BD: Oh, it's beautiful. I'm just happy to be here.
Q: Bob, what about the future, where are you gonna go from here?
BD: I'm going home.

31 March 1986
Dick Shoemaker interview, Chasen's Restaurant, Los Angeles

Source: Circulating tape

DS = Dick Shoemaker
NY = Neil Young

DS: Bob Dylan was honored by ASCAP, the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. Afterwards the elusive entertainer talked exclusively to Entertainment Tonight about returning to the spotlight.

BD: Well, I'm back in and I'm outside and I'm all over the place. I love to be just all over the place.

DS: What about being a role model for so many of the people who are doing music today?

BD: No, no, no. Not a role model.

DS: What are you?

BD: I'm just me.

DS: What can we look for in the future in terms of Bob Dylan.

BD: I'm letting Neil answer that.

NY: Just more of the same, man. More of the same, you know.

DS: Why is it, do you feel, that your music down to the earth has meant so much to so many people?

BD: Well, I guess it's been inspiring. I know it's been inspiring to me to write it. Outside of that, I wouldn't know.

DS: What do you think that there is about your music that seems to make sense to people. I mean, why has it captured so many people?

BD: I don't know, I really just don't. I'm still trying to make sense of it to me, you know?

DS: Did you think back in the 60's that you would be here today enjoying the adoration of the people who believe in music and getting this material reward as well?

BD: I never thought about it.

DS: Never thought about it?

BD: M-hm. (shaking his head). I didn't know I was gonna be here twenty years ago.

DS: Why?

BD: Well, you know, nobody ever knows. You live only one day at a time.

April 1986
Charles Kaiser interview for Boston Review

Source: The Rolling Telegraph Supplement #2, p. 22

The Boston Review of April 1986 includes several quotations from an interview with Charles Kaiser in an article called Encountering Dylan:

About The Times They Are A-Changin':

"I wanted to write a big song in a simple way."

About TV:

"TV is so super powerful. It forms people's opinions. When I was growing up, and even in the sixties, that never was the case. You had to go out and experience things to form opinions. Now you don't have to move. You get knowledge brought in to you, you know, without the experience of it. So I think there's something really dangerous in that."

About God:

"People talk about Sylvester Stallone , you know , and they talk about Pacino and they talk about last year's flood, and they talk about 'Miami Vice' and they talk about the new Dustin Hoffman movie – and all that is exciting for people. But God doesn't interest people for some reason."

About his second marriage:

When I asked him if he had been married again after his brutal divorce from his first wife, Sarah (sic), he said "Yes, in a manner of speaking."

A few minutes later he reconsidered and made that "Yes, as a matter of fact." Asked if he was still married to the woman who became his second wife in "about 80", he said, "I'm not sure"

7 April 1986
MTV interview re: Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man) video

Source: circulating tape

Dylan:
(Strange?) boys who kinda grow up in a kinda harsh way and kinda make their way through that learning how to deal with certain elements in society they know that usually in the passive would take an advantage of them, and they have to overcome that and go from bad to good.

10 April 1986
Press Conference, Westwood One Radio Offices, Los Angeles, Ca

Source: Circulating tape

Q: We'd like to ask Bob first of all, this tour came together because of a purpose and a reason, so as the man behind it all you asked Tom Petty to back you up onstage. Why did you guys put this together?

BD: What did we what?

Q: Why did you guys put this together? Why did you decide to put this collaboration together?

BD: We just felt like it.

Q: Oh, it's a good answer, but it's probably a journey of two of the best known names in rock n' roll and a chance to bring the public… a change to see these two groups together. Why did you, of all the groups out there, decide upon Tom Petty as your group to back you up?

BD: Well, you know, it just sort of happened by itself, really.

Q: But you guys had done a lot of talking beforehand, playing in some studios and such, and the chemistry was right…

BD: Well, you know, you're always looking for people to play with.

Q: Tom, I saw you in Japan when I was there. Are you gonna be different from the Japanese and the New Zealand and Australian shows?

TP: Well, they were different every night, they could be different… Basically, the same kind of thing, probably… same kind of format. It'll be a little different day to day.

Q: Bob, what's the most important song you ever wrote?

BD: Yeah. Probably 'Song to Woody.' Song called 'Song to Woody,' 'cause it was my first song.

Q: Bob, what was your reaction when you met with Woody Guthrie as he was dying in a hospital? What were your emotions?

BD: Oh, I felt sick.

Q: With regards to the line-up of the songs that you chose for this tour, what were some thoughts behind it? In other words, is there some of Tom's stuff and some of your stuff, I mean, how did you put that together?

TP: We just, well, pretty much played what sounded good, you know, most of the time. There is a little of everything, and there is a lot of other people's songs, too.

Q: Bob, it's been five years apparently since you've been on tour in the United States. Are you anxious to get that tour started in summer?

BD: Yeah, I have.

Q: How much?

BD: That much.

Q: You are ready to go on road again in the United States this summer…

BD: Yeah. I'm excited about it.

Q: What was that actually drew you to… together?

TP: Money. (laughter) No, we just… enjoy the music.

Q: Stadium/Arena tour is (inaudible). What's making this one different for you?

TP: (to Dylan) Is he talking to you?

BD: (to Petty) I don't know.

Q: Some of (inaudible) the 'Biograph' album being emotionless trip or a slaughterhouse, something that you felt detached from. What's making this tour different for you?

BD: I said all that?

Q: You did on the 'Biograph' album…

BD: Really? Oh, this one, this is bound to be better.

Q: Why?
BD: Just is.
Q: Tom, do you think that your music and Bob's music can work together?
TP: I don't know, I haven't even thought about it that deeply, it's just… you know… works. It is rock n' roll music. Is it… figuring out how the two things work together – I don't know. Some sounds good, or it don't.
Q: Are you writing songs together?
BD: Yeah.
TP: Mm-hmm.
Q: Is any of them gonna be on the tour?
BD: Could be.
Q: Bob?
BD: Yeah.
Q: What was your reaction to Richard Manuel's suicide?
BD: It depressed me.
Q: Bob, are you Jewish again on this tour?
BD: Oh, I'm Jewish only when I have to be.
Q: When so you have to be?
BD: Every so often, you know.
Q: Are you a Christian on this tour?
BD: Part of the time, yeah.
Q: Do you think you will find any difference in the audience in the United States that changed in the last five years or so…
BD: I don't think so. No, I don't think the audiences have changed at all. Not since I've been playing.
Q: Forty-five years?
BD: Really?
Q: Bob, you said at your last press conference that people would be starting to feel sick of the current music…
BD: I said that?
Q: Yes, you said, "People are going to get sick of today's music." Is it an attempt at maybe changing music on your part?
BD: Nah, what I think I said that the people are going to change it, not the musicians. People just are gonna want to get that simple music again. They're gonna demand that musicians play it.
Q: Are you gonna bring up the new stuff along with the old songs?
BD: Oh yeah, that's all the kind of stuff mine is. I can't play complicated stuff anyway.
Q: Bob and Tom both, how did the audiences differ from where have you been to where you are going; where you just finished playing to where you'll be playing this summer in the United States? Did the audiences differ at all?
TP: Not basically. I think they are basically the same. There's not a lot of difference even in a place like Japan. No, I don't think there's a great deal difference.
Q: On some of your tours you come up with some original arrangements to some of your songs. Have you and Tom done so for this tour…
BD: Yeah. Most of it sounds like it used to sound, you know.
Q: Are you still working on your autobiography?
BD: No, I gave that up.
Q: Do you think you are ever going to resume it?
BD: I don't know.
Q: Do you think that your life would be an interesting story to read?
BD: Not really.
Q: What are your associations with the Band of the Hand (inaudible)?
BD: Well, I don't know, I can't remember.

Q: How many tunes did you contribute to the soundtrack?

BD: Can't even say, I don't know. One probably.

TP: One.

Q: Bob, why did you (inaudible)?

BD: Oh, I don't know, it was just too… You know, I don't really like to think about it by myself.

Q: Stevie Nicks joined you on a couple of dates in Australia. Will we have any surprise guests on your American tour?

BD: Joan Baez might come… show up somewhere.

21 May 1986
Bob Fass Interview/Phone-In, New York City, New York

Source: Hungry As a Raccoon by John B. Way, pp. 91-114.
The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 917-930.

This interview / phone-in session has been transcribed from the circulating tape and then compared with the transcript by John Way in his excellent book Hungry As A Raccoon, with differences in opinion being resolved by a third party. As background, I've taken the liberty of using the introduction in John Way's book – I could not do better, so why try.

Twenty years after Dylan's appearance on Radio Unnameable WBAI-FM decided, probably largely at Bob Fass's (BF) suggestion, to honor his 45th birthday in quite spectacular fashion with what amounted to a forty-five hour Special. (One hour for every year of course, and the records played throughout included all of Dylan's 45's). This was broadcast over a three-day period, May 22-24.

Dylan had agreed to take part in a telephone interview/phone-in during the first day's broadcast; only as he was in California this time there were already potential difficulties in communication. His contact with Bob Fass since 1966 would have been minimal at best, and with his status having grown to legendary proportions in the meantime, perhaps it's not surprising to find Fass so deferential – not to say fawning – compared with his 1966 attitude. The listeners were able to make a direct comparison too, since the 1966 phone-in was broadcast again courtesy of a tape provided by Mitch Blank: Bob Fass didn't have a copy himself.

This time Fass didn't run the show on his own but with Robert Knight (RK) who is efficient, if not inspired or inspiring. There is additional input from time to time from Steve Ben Israel (SB) (who knew Dylan during the early '60s), most of whose comments had been edited out when the interview/phone-in was broadcast again a couple of days later (some more of the broadcast was also edited out, principally the repetition where Bob was unable to hear the caller's questions – JAB).

Dylan is friendly enough throughout the ordeal, and generally accommodating, if not too forthcoming, but like he says: "I can't remember what I was doin' lately. I've been locked up in the studio for, uh, what seems a long time". In fact he had been working on putting an album together for about four weeks and Mikal Gilmore, who interviewed him for Rolling Stone during this period, reported: "His weary air reminds me of something he'd said earlier: "Man, sometimes it seems I've spent half my life in a recording studio – it's like living in a coal mine"..." there's also a note of tension about the evening. The pressure of completing the album has reportedly been wearing on Dylan, and his mood is said to have been rather dour and unpredictable these last several days... Dylan tries to warm up to the task of the evening's interview. But... he seems somewhat distracted, almost edgy, and many questions don't seem to engender much response. Add to that the problems of active communication over a transcontinental phone-line, and I suppose that the listeners and callers were lucky to get what they did.

Since 1986 there have been further Dylan Specials on WBAI, but with no further direct input from the man himself.

— John B. Way

RK: This is WBAI in New York. I'm Robert Knight – that's Bob Fass...
BF: Hi.
RK: And that's Bob Dylan. Good morning, Bob.
BD: Hi.
BF: Hi Bob! How are you?
BD: I'm OK.
BF: Been quite a while since I talked to you, or you to the world over WBAI...
BD: Yeah.
BF: What's that?
BD: I said yeah, it has been quite a while, right.
BF: So far. But at the moment it's right now.
BD: Mm.
BF: Have you any messages for the...?
BD: Nothing. Now, what you doing?
BF: Well, Bob. It's your birthday in a couple of days – it probably slipped your mind.
BD: ...my birthday back, I forgot to tell you.
BF: What's that?
BD: I pushed my birthday back this year.
BF: Oh, you did?
BD: Yeah.
BF: Did you go to court and have it legally changed?
BD: Oh no. I just did it.
BF: You went to an astrologer?
BD: No, I just... you know?
RK: Is that Dylan-saving time?
BF: Is that a way to save time?
BD: Sure is, yeah.
BF: Uh-huh. I think that will catch on. When did you push it back to?
BD: I pushed it back just a few weeks.
BF: Uh huh. When will it be now?
BD: I don't know. I'd like it to be in New York, you know. I think I'll push it back, actually, until I get there.
BF: Well, today is the third day of the rest of your life, you know?
BD: (laughs).
SB: Hi Bob! This is Steve Ben Israel, man. How are you doing? Love you, man.
BD: OK.
BF: Yeah, I...
RK: Basically, what we're doing here in New York is thanking you for having this next birthday, whenever it may be.
BF: And for all the others, and for the very first one, uh, we're all very grateful. I was just talking about how I had been led to you, at the very first, looking for other people. First time I went to hear you I heard Lightin' Hopkins, or at least that's who I thought I would remember from that moment, but, uh, uh, I... yeah, I guess it might just as well have been John Lee Hooker. And there you were, playing with him. And, uh, I thought... I sort of thought what you did was, uh, wonderful, but not humble enough. That's who I was, then.
BD: Yeah.
BF: I, I... second time I heard you I thought "God, this guy has a lotta talent. Now why is he doing things this way instead of that way?" Cause that's where I was at at the time. And all through my life, without ever having talked to you about it, I've heard you singing the story of my life. And you weren't even there! And I talked to other people and, uh, you've been telling them the news about their lives all these years too. And we just wanna say thank you for it, Bob. Thank you Bobby.

BD: I appreciate that.

BF: Well, we appreciate you, man.

BD: I hope somebody'll sing about my life.

BF: (laughs) Well... people don't sing about your life, you know? People don't tell stories on you. You wanna tell a few on yourself?

BD: Ha, no. Stories – I don't have many.

BF: You have millions of stories, it seems.

RK: Do you ever find it inhibiting in the...?

BD: No. Who's this, still Bob?

RK: This is Robert Knight.

BD: Oh, OK.

RK: And I was wondering if, uh, if you ever find it limiting to know that what you do means so much to so many?

BD: What?

BF: How does it feel to sing, uh, the same song – Blowin' In The Wind – for thirty years?

BD: Oh. It still feels, uh, the same, you know? Still feels like it was just written yesterday.

BF: It sounds like you... you still... mean it. Really mean it. And, uh, uh, one time... you told me you didn't think people would get it, about one particular song, and I really think people are getting it. Maybe a little too late.

BD: Well...

BF: But, uh, uh...

BD: Well, you know – it's nice to be appreciated, though, on any level, at any time.

BF: Well, we don't mean to embarrass you, Bobby. We just wanna say thank you. And ask you maybe to tell us a few details about, uh... you're goin' around the world: you gonna make any unusual stops on your world tour?

BD: Unusual?

BF: Yeah – I mean, you're not gonna visit the Middle East?

BD: Oh, you know. They're all unusual!

BF: (laughs).

SB: Are you gonna come down... hang down MacDougal Street on this next tour – in this next New York – gig, Bob?

BD: (laughs).

SB: This is Steve, man.

BD: Yeah!

SB: Come down the Café Borgia for an espresso, huh?

BD: All right.

SB: OK, we'll see you there.

BD: OK. Who's this, now?

SB: Steve Ben Israel, man.

BD: Yeah... Well, what more can I say?

RK: Have you been listening to anything interesting, musically, lately?

BD: Well, let me see. Uh... ohh... can't remember.

BF: Have you heard Falco?

BD: Falco?

BF: Yeah.

BD: What's that?

BF: Well, he's got the number one song, and he's got one of your songs on his album: he's German.

BD: Who does?... Oh... Which one?

BF: Baby Blue.

BD: Oh, all right. Mm. I re... I remember that. I still do that once in a while.

BF: (laughs) We'd love to hear you doing it soon. That birthday that you're pushing back – h, have you picked a date yet?

BD: No, not really. I'm gonna push it back some time in, uh, June.

BF: June?

BD: Yeah!

BF: All right.

SB: June 17th.

BF: OK... why June 17th?

SB: That's the extra, uh, concert that's been added to Madison Square Garden, because the first two have been sold out, so they've added one on June 17th.

BD: Madison Square Gardens?

SB: Yeah. They've added a concert on June 17th, 'cause the first two were sold out.

BD: Hmm!

SB: So try June 17th – sounds like a good night for a birthday.

BD: Yeah.

RK: Anything interesting in the music you've been doing lately?

BD: Well. I'm just making another record, you know.

BF: Uh huh. Have you been, uh, writing alone or with other people this time?

BD: Let's see. It's about, uh... yeah, I did a song with Sam Shepard. You know Sam?

BF: Yeah. I remem...

BD: We wrote a song a while back. I think it's comin' out now. And, uh,... I don't know... Yeah, there are all different people comin' in and out, you know.

BF: Oh, Sam Shepard was in Renaldo and Clara. You discovered him as an actor.

BD: Is that right? (laughing)

BF: Yeah, well, I... I don't know, maybe not, but that could, uh... I don't know if that even could be said but... I discovered him through you – is what I really mean.

BD: Yeah. He's good you know.

BF: Yeah. So are you, man, so are you. Uh, Sam Shepard... why don't you tell the story of what part he played in that?

BD: Who, Sam?

BF: Yeah.

BD: What did he play? I don't know, I can't remember. He played a cowboy, didn't he? He played a... cowboy involved in a three way conversation or something, didn't he?

BF: Mm. Well... what was that three way conversation like?

BD: I don't remember.

BF: Well, I do. I sat through Renaldo and Clara four times.

BD: Wasn't he sittin' on a couch, er, with a woman...?

BF: It's a seven and a half hour movie!

BD: It was what?

BF: A seven and a half hour movie when I saw it. Probably should have been fifteen.

BD: Yeah, it could have been fifteen. You know, in India they have those movies that are twenty two hours long, you know. I mean... I like 'em long myself.

BF: What' s the album called?

BD: I think it's called Knocked Out Loaded.

BF: Ha... yeah. Mm.

RK: Is that your favorite way of producing? I see there's a visual environment for some musical releases now.

BD: Yeah. You mean like videos?

RK: Yeah.

BD: Well, I don't know, though. I'm not really... not really thinkin' about any videos right now.

BF: Mm, well. I mean, when you, uh... when I hear you... your songs... I see a movie in my head, whether it's a video or not. And I mean, no video could measure up completely to my own imagination, or certainly to yours. I wonder, if you worked on a video or a movie, what that would be like. Renaldo and Clara was really a gorgeous movie, and certainly the music which we've been playing from Renaldo and Clara was just gorgeous, gorgeous concert music, and private music.

BD: Well, thank you.

BF: Well... thank you, Bob, and happy birthday. I have a feeling that you're, you know, standing there kinda tugging at your collar, when your friends say 'surprise' and you walk in the door.

BD: Oh, no. As a matter of fact I don't even have a shirt on... you know?

RK: Bob, a lot of people have attributed inspirations to you, but I'd like to reverse that process and wonder if you, as a person being performed, have noted any particular changes or messages from the people and audiences that you see currently?

BD: Say that once more.

RK: When you perform, I wonder if you as a performer also receive messages from the audience, or feelings or attitudes.

BD: Oh, yeah. All the time. I think everybody feels... every performer feels...

RK: Ah. What's... well, what... what signals are you getting now? What's coming to you?

BD: Uhh... well, I don't know. You mean the last... last time out?

RK: Yeah.

BD: You know, it changes a bit from night to night. Certain people always you pick out, you know, or they pick you out or something.

BF: Mmmm. Do you get any feeling about the kinda people who go to hear music today? I see lots of young people at your concerts.

BD: Young, old, you know. Everybody goes to listen to music.

BF: Mm.

SB: The audience gets younger as you get older.

BF: You're a father. Uh...

BD: Some do, yeah.

BF: You must have some attitude about your children's music too...

BD: Uh... I don't know. Um... I don't know if I do or not. They listen to what they listen to you know, (pause)... popping on the radio here and there's a big silence.

BF: Well, we're waitin' on you Bob. We wanna know what you have to say, in somewhat... maybe you... you always said that your music speaks for you. Uh. But uh... there've been a couple of very pungent quotes that we've heard. People are always asking you about religion and people are always asking you about politics. But, uh... I remember that you used to say, you know, things that actually happen to you in your life that – I mean, I've carried stories around in my head for a long time that you told me, like... I don't know whether you either remember it yourself. I think maybe some of the things you told me in those days, you made up! But I remember a story you told once about working -guarding a pig at night as she was giving birth. You remember that story?

BD: A what?

BF: That's a story you told me, yeah.

BD: About a pig in the night?

BF: Yeah.

BD: What about it?

BF: Well, that you had to keep watching this sow to stop her from eating her children.

BD: What's that, now?

BF: Now, I've heard from other people who worked on farms that sometimes a pig gives birth and uh, eats...

BD: Oh yeah – lots of animals do that.

BF: Yeah.

BD: Yeah, yeah.

BF: And it was your job, you said, to watch this all night and to stop it.

BD: Yeah, that was a long time ago. I hadn't had any job that — for a while.
BF: Uh-huh. What you been doing lately?
BD: (laughs) Making this...but I can't remember what I was doin' lately. I've been locked up in the studio for, uh, seems like a long time.
BF: Well, uh, who is producing this latest album?
BD: Produces albums?
BF: Yeah. This next one.
BD: Oh, I don't know. Whoever wants to, I guess.
SB: Bob – is it true you're moving? (studio laughter) You can ask anyone you want!
BF: Well, how do they get in touch with you?
SB: Are you moving back to New York?
BF: A string of people would like to do that, I think.
BD: What people do that?
BF: I think there's probably a string of people all over the world who would like to produce your next album. A long line stretching blocks, you know, like...
BD: I don't know – I'm pretty hard to produce. I'm hard enough for me to produce, that's...
BF: (laughs) I think you lose – probably lose more songs than you record. I mean, probably you don't lose 'em so much any more but there are massive numbers of songs that are attributed to you and, uh, circulating recorded by you. Some of them I know you're really angry about and I've heard some of them and I think they're gorgeous. Just gorgeous. How do you feel about this avid thirst that people have to hear what you've got to say lately about practically anything?
BD: Well – I mean, you say it's true. I mean, I don't know it is.
BF: Well, uh you know, I hear from people who circulate your tapes. I hear people have circulated tapes through a kind of...
BD: A radio station in New York (clearly an aside to someone at Bob's end of the line), (to Bob Fass) Yeah.
BF: ...a kind of an underground network called Wanted Man. Have you ever heard about that?
BD: What?
BF: Wanted Man.
BD: Yeah!
BF: Have you ever heard about that?
BD: Oh, yeah! Is that... I don't think I ever recorded that, actually.
BF: (laughing) No – Wanted Man is a group of people who collect your, uh... your, uh... um, occult recordings.
BD: Oh, is that right?
BF: And they exchange them. They don't sell them.
BD: Mm-hm.
BF: And, uh, I don't know... I know you get pretty angry about some of that and, uh, I know maybe we shouldn't talk about what's been stolen from you, especially on your birthday, uh.
BD: No. Let's not talk about theft.
BF: Oh, OK, OK Is there anything that you would like to say...?
BD: Well, I would...
BF: I don't mean to impose on you, but...
BD: No, I'd just like to wish everybody Happy Birthday, you know.
BF: Oh, well, same to the rest of us and to you, and bless you, man.
BD: OK.
SB: Bob, this is Steve.
BD: OK Steve.
SB: Listen – uh, it's great you comin' out and playin' these last couple of years, and the last album we really love, and it's a beautiful affirmation...

BD: Oh, like that, man. Well, thank you... you know, well...
SB: And, uh, it's... like, a lotta artists around the world, you know, keeping up the continuum of, like, you know... hope and life and creativity and, uh, it's a great affirmation to us all, baby.
BD: Already comin' to New York.
SB: Yeah. Hey, it's great.
BD: ...seeing everybody I know. I have a lotta friends there, you know?
SB: Sure you do.
RK: When will you be here?
BD: Sometime this summer.
RK: We'll be here.
BD: Huh?...
RK: We'll be here.
BD: Well, you all come down and, uh... come on down, you know?
RK: Why did you decide to come on out right now and embark on a world tour? Any particular reason?
BD: Is this Steve?
RK: This is Robert.
BD: Oh, Robert. Well, Robert... you know, I never stop working. I've been working since, uh, '79... '78, '79, '81... I haven't stopped working, so now there's a lot of, you know... seems the last time we were in the East Coast and played, uh... See, I played Hartford and Meadowlands or somewhere, I don't know. But... you know, you can only play where people want you to play and, um, so like, I was only doing regional tours but I've never stopped working, you know. It just seems like now, uh, there's a... there's more of a demand for this show that we've... going out with now. Uh... so I don't know... nothing's changed around here. You all missed my gospel tours!
BF: Mm; no, we have... well, we have heard a lot about them.
BD: (laughs) Yeah!
BF: And, uh, we intend to be playing a lot of your gospel music.
BD: Yeah.
BF: We're... We have two, uh – two segments coming up. One is about your...
BD: You know a record you should play? There's a... there's a... I know the group used to be called The Alley Cats. Now they're called The Zarcons. I think they're pretty good.
BF: All right.
BD: You might have their record in your, uh...
BF: The Zarcons, huh?
BD: Yeah.
BF: OK. What are they like?
BD: Oh, they're young, you know? Punky rock n' roll kinda thing.
BF: You have any, uh, feeling about how music is gonna go next?
BD: Where music's going next?
BF: Yeah. I mean, a lot of what we say about music going is musicians leading the pack, and a lot of it's product. But what... what do you... I mean, how do you feel about where you're going to be listening next?
BD: What?
BF: Where are you gonna be listening next? What...
BD: Where am I gonna be listening next... I'll probably be going and listening and...
BF: To Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers.
BD: I don't know where I'm gonna be listening next. Tom Petty? Tom Petty's very good, you know. Do you play his records?
BF: Uh, yeah. We have been.
BD: Yeah, you should, 'cause...
BF: I've seen some of his videos, and they're wonderful.

BD: Oh, yeah? You can't tell much from video. I've seen... You really have to see somebody live to see what they're doing. You know that, right?

BF: Well, we've had opportunity to see you quite a bit more lately, at Farm Aid, and on, uh, the Don't Play Sun City.

BD: Sun City, yeah.

BF: What was that like?

BD: What, Sun City?

BF: Yeah.

BD: I don't know, I've never been there.

BF: Oh, I didn't expect that... I meant what was recording it like?

BD: What was, the recording of it?

BF: Yeah.

BD: I don't know. I mean, I just, uh, did my small part, you know... with Jackson Browne.

BF: Well, it sure looked good in the snatches that I've seen of it and, uh, uh, It was wonderful to see musicians a couple of times.

BD: New York now?

BF: What's that?

BD: What's happenin' in New York now? Is anything goin' on?

BF: Well, Space is the last frontier.

BD: Space?

BF: Yeah. Yeah, there's a whole new class of homeless people every fifteen minutes.

BD: Oh, wow.

SB: Manhattan gets sold every fifteen minutes.

BD: (mishearing) It hasn't just sold everything?

SB: Every fifteen minutes Manhattan gets sold, Bobby.

BD: (laughs).

SB: Every fifteen minutes.

BD: Every fifteen minutes, wow. Where are they all comin' from?

SB: Just follow the bouncing coin.

BD: It's homeless?

RK: They're the ones that don't fit any more.

BD: Yeah, well, none of us fit any more, you know.

BF: Lotta homeless dictators end up here.

BD: Who ain't homeless?

BF: Well, uh, I mean... that's true, you know. We're all... some of us are prisoners and some of us are guards.

BD: ...over their heads, I know that's true.

BF: What's true?

BD: I know that's true, what you're saying. There's a lotta people on the streets that don't have a place to go when it's raining and cold.

RK: You see them in Southern California?

BD: Yeah. You see them everywhere, you know. Seems to be more of them these days.

SB: Yeah. Marty Sheen played that movie the other night about Mitch Schneider, the guy who takes care of people on the street in Washington, and that whole struggle.

BD: Oh yeah. I missed that. I heard about that.

SB: Yeah. It's quite spectacular.

BD: Mm.

RK: Some people are worrying about nuclear things.

BD: Yeah. Well, they always are doing that since they invented that. Nuclear – God. That never moves away, does it?

RK: 'Fraid not.

BF: Well, it seems to be receding, or at least people are becoming more and more aware of it. As you said once, the answer is...

RK: Blowing in the wind!
BF: Right. Glowing in the wind!
SB: Radiation? Oh, it's just like having an X-ray. All day.
BD: Yeah, right.
BF: Wash your vegetables and have your iodine tablets, Bob. Do you think you might like to talk to some people who are calling up on our telephone?
BD: Love that!
BF: What's that?
BD: I'd love that. Let me see if I have any more time...
BF: Have you got any more quarters to put in the phone? (A discussion can be heard at Bob's end of the phone). All right. If you'd like to talk to Bob Dylan, our telephone number is 279–3407. And we'll put you on your honor. WBAI is trying to raise a little money, and if you wanna talk to Bob Dylan on WBAI... After you talk to him, call up 279–3400 and pledge your support to WBAI.
RK: And you're on the air.
C1: Hello.
BF: Hi.
C1: Hello, is Bob there?
BD: Yeah.
C1: Bob, how you doin'?
BD: OK.
C1: OK, great. I'd like to wish you a very, very happy birthday.
BD: Oh, uh, thank you.
C1: You're quite welcome. I'd just like to say I grew up with your music. I've learned more from your music than I did in school.
BD: Well. Who is this?
C1: Uh, Walter from Dumont, New Jersey.
BD: Oh.
C1: A friend of a friend of yours.
BD: Oh, right.
C1: I'd just like to say I got tickets for you in New York. I'm looking forward to it.
BD: Oh, OK. We'll look forward to seeing you.
C1: Well, I'll be there for sure. No doubt.
BD: All right.
RK: OK, thanks, thanks for calling. You're on the air.
C2: Hello, Mr. Dylan.
BF: Hello?
BD: Yeah. I can't hear him.
BF: We'll repeat it. You say it and we'll repeat it.
C2: Oh, I'd just like to ask Mr. Dylan to talk about Woody Guthrie. I'm sixteen years old. I just finished reading Bound For Glory. I was wondering if he could, like, say what it was like to know Woody Guthrie.
RK: A sixteen year old boy who just read...
BF: Bound For Glory.
RK: Wants to know what it was like...
BF: To know Woody Guthrie.
BD: Well, you know, I never knew Woody Guthrie when he was travelin' around. You'd have to probably ask Jack Elliott about that. I knew Woody in his last days, you ; know. He was just sittin' mostly in a chair, bein' wheeled in and out. And, uh, his situation had, uh, pretty much deteriorated from, uh, from when he was out rambling around, you know. So... I mean, it was a thrill. I mean, I remember it was a... I felt like I'd got a... you know. I'd made a pilgrimage and a journey and I'd accomplished what I'd set out to do, but it really wasn't it... except just, you know, opening another door or something. But I can still remember seeing Woody in the hospital and sometimes they'd be taking him out, and that's the Woody I remember. You know, he... what he looked like, you know. And he'd sing... he'd sing a song and we would play them for him. You know, it was so... it's been so long ago. I mean, it seems like the other day, but, uh... I don't really have any stories like you'd probably... the guys calling would like to hear. It's like... if he wanted to... Jack would be the guy to talk to, you know.

BF: Have you seen Jack lately?

BD: No, I haven't seen Jack in a while.

BF: We've been trying to get in touch with him, actually. He owes a lot of us money (laughs).

BD: Yeah.

BF: (Laughing) No, I...

RK: This is WBAI and you're on the air.

C3: Yeah. I'd like to say happy birthday to Bob, and it's good to hear him on BAI. Surprised me. Um, I'd like to ask him if he's looking forward to touring with the Grateful Dead. I know he's playing in, I guess, Minneapolis, Minnesota and Shott, near Buffalo and then RFK Stadium, I believe. I wonder if he's looking forward to it.

BD: I can't hear.

BF: He wants to know about your tour with the Dead and RFK Stadium.

BD: Uh, huh.

BF: He wants to know whether you're looking forward to it. We are.

BD: I don't know. I've never played that place before. I'm sure it'll be a good show. It's a stadium, uh, right? I don't know, you know.

C3: Hi. Has he ever played with Jerry Garcia before?

BF: Have you ever played with Jerry Garcia?

BD: Oh, yeah yeah. I've known Jerry for a long time. We go back a long way. Yeah, I've played with Jerry a lotta times.

C3: (laughs) It's great.

RK: Thank you for calling.

C3: Yep.

RK: This is WBAI. You're on the air with Bob Dylan.

C4: Hello.

BF: Hi.

C4: Hey. How you doin'?

BF: How are you?

C4: OK. Bob, can you hear me?

BD: Uh, yeah, barely.

C4: OK, good, great. Hey, I'm another admirer of yours, and, you know... and a songwriter to boot. And, um, I would like say happy birthday and * and * and keep it on. (* = several words in Hebrew)

BD: Ha, ha. Great.

C4: And I'm listenin', man.

BD: All right.

C4: OK. My name is David Indian, and I love you. Happy birthday.

RK: Thank you.

BD: OK.

C4: Bye-bye.

RK: I happen to know that David Indian wrote a song about the nuclear home port in New York City, Bob, where they wanna put a nuclear surface action group, and some atomic missiles and such. And the politicians think it's a good idea but a lotta people think it's crazy. And David Indian wrote a song called Nuclear-Free Harbor.

BD: Mm. Yeah. Well, um, maybe I'll get to hear it.

RK: Yeah. Are there things you think important for people maybe to be thinking about in the world, in the context of also hearing music?

BD: Uh, well... yeah.
RK: Like what?
BD: Well, I mean, you know, like what kinda... What do you mean, 'think about'? What do you mean, 'Be thinking about'?
RK: What's happening in the world that's important, that people might respond to, take part in or effect.
BD: Well, there's a lot happening in all kinds of different parts of the world. Uh, you know, Europe... if you go through Europe, it's as if people are different there. You know, they think about different things there. As if, you know... in South America they think about different things. The United States, they think about different things. Everything doesn't rotate around the United States any more than, uh, the sun rotates around the world. You know what I mean?
RK: I know what you mean.
BD: Um, so... I don't know.
RK: What are some of the things that you're thinking about.
BD: (Laughing) What was I thinking about? I don't know. I'm not thinking about... I ain't thinking about doin' anything too, you know... too profound at the moment. I'm just trying to get some... my mind is pretty much focused down on what I'm doin' here at the mom... at the present time. So I haven't really thought about, uh, the Bomb, and the,... uh, you know, the heartache and misery that seems to be swallowing the planet.
RK: Mm. It'll be there.
BD: Right.
BF: Mm. What are you doing? I mean, could you tell us a little more about the, uh...
BD: Bob Dylan?
BF: ...about the album, besides the name... Yeah, your...
BD: No, there's not much I can tell. I just started working on it, you know. Kinda get it to go right and get it done by the end of the month. So, uhh... I've had to get all my tracks together... You know, it's just the same old thing, Bob. You know what I mean? So, I've been going pretty much full throttle here.
C5: Hello, Bob.
RK: There's a new caller. Speak up and we'll repeat, so Bob can hear.
C5: Hello, Bob. Can you hear me, Bob?
BD: Yeah, barely.
C5: All right. My girlfriend saw you in Australia...
BD: Huh?
C5: My girlfriend saw you and the Heartbreakers in Australia. Is that right?
BD: I can't hear him.
RK: Saw you in Australia with the Heartbreakers.
BD: Yeah.
C5: Were you happy behind that... those shows there in Australia?
RK: Were you happy with those shows?
BD: Uh... was I what?
RK: Were you happy with those shows?
BD: I thought they were good, yeah.
RK: Why do you ask, caller?
C5: I'm just curious, 'cause it was really well received and... I don't know, it seems like Bob's kinda taken on a new vitality, more or less. I mean, he seems to be doing a lot more guitar playing, and he just seems really more charged than he's been in a long time. And I was just wondering if he's sort of changed.
BD: I'm not hearing this caller at all.
RK: He say's you've been doing a lot of good work. You've been playing a lot of guitar. It seems as if you've taken on a new vitality.
BF: And you're more charged.

BD: Oh, well. That's nice to know.
RK: Thank you for calling, and you're on the air.
C6: Can I speak to Bob Dylan, please?
RK: You are.
BF: Go ahead.
RK: Speak loudly.
C6: Hey, Bob.
BF: Go ahead. He's there. He can hear you, or we'll repeat it.
BD: ...or somethin'.
C6: Yeah. Bob Fass is a nudist. Don't you know that?
RK: (laughs). This is WBAI and you're on the air.
C7: Hello, Bob... Hello.
RK: Yes, go ahead. We'll repeat it if he doesn't hear you the first time.
C7: I'd just like to say thanks for many, many years of some great music, and wanted to ask if he would ever find time in his busy schedule to perhaps make an appearance at the, uh... the Clearwater Revival up on Croton-on-The Hudson, for a good cause.
RK: Maybe some day you could come to Croton-on-Hudson for the Clearwater Revival.
BD: Me?
RK: Yeah.
BD: Oh, sure.
RK: OK. WBAI. You're on the air.
C8: Bob? Happy birthday. I thought maybe you'd like to make a few reflections on Phil Ochs.
RK: Mm. Happy birthday and could you reflect on Phil Ochs?
BD: Phil Ochs. Oh, Phil Ochs. Um, well... I think somethin' happened to Phil, you know, when he went to Africa. And, uh, he was sick when he got back from Africa, He was sick for a few years.
BF: Someone tried to choke him.
BD: Messed his mind up also. Um, 'cause I knew him a while before that and, uh, I don't know... he got something... he got sick in Africa, that's about all I can tell you about it. I don't know much more.
RK: You're on the air.
C9: Uh, yeah. Hi, Bob. Happy birthday. I wanna ask you – I heard something... This is Larry Levinstein, you don't know me though... I wanna know, are you doin' a new movie? I heard something about Hearts Of Fire.
BD: Oh, is that a... Hearts Of Fire?
C9: Something that you were signed up to do – a new movie?
BD: Can you talk just a little bit louder?
C9: Yeah. There's a new movie, as a 60's rock n' roll star.
BD: Oh, yeah.
C9: What's the deal?
BD: I don't know. They asked me to do this movie so I read the script, you know.
C9: Yeah.
BD: And, uh, this part they wanted me to play... well it seemed, uh... I said yeah, I can play that part, you know. I know that character...
C9: Yeah.
BD: So, uh...
BF: Who wrote it?
BD: Hmm... Joe Esterhaz wrote it. He's a pretty good writer, actually. He wrote some other stuff... I've read a story he wrote once. I don't remember when, but I remember I liked it.
C9: Bobby, good luck with it, and thanks for everything. You're terrific.
BD: All right.
C9: Take care.

RK: OK. You're on the air.

C10: Hi, uh, I wanted to ask Bob Dylan a couple of things. One is, what did he mean by "everybody must get stoned". OK? And the other thing is, has he had any good dreams lately?

RK: Two questions for you, Bob. What did you mean when you said "everybody must get stoned", and have you had any good dreams lately? Did you hear that?

BD: What does it mean, "everybody must get stoned"? Yeah. Oh, I'm sorry. What... everybody what? Everybody must get stoned?

RK: Yes. What did you mean by that, and have you had any good dreams lately?

BD: No dreams. Nothing to report there.

RK: Mm, hm.

BD: Um.

RK: So what did you mean?

BD: What did I mean... "everybody must get stoned"... well now, you see that... that's like a... that's just like a... you can sort of make... um, how can you put it? "Everybody must get stoned" is like, uh... you know, when you go against the tide.

RK: Mm, hm.

BD: Um... you, you, uh... you might in different times find yourself in an unfortunate situation and, uh... so to do what you believe in sometimes... people, uh... some people, they just take offence to that. You know... I mean, you can look throughout history and find that people have taken offence to people who... who come out with a different, uh, viewpoint on things. And, um, being stoned is like... it's just a kind of a, um, a way of saying that.

[Some bars of Rainy Day Women are played]

What else am I supposed to do here? I gotta get back.

BF: Bobby?

BD: Who is... who am I talking to now?

BF: Well, this is Bob Fass. Robert Knight just played a little snatch of that song, uh...

BD: Listen, Bob Fass. I'm gonna have to go.

BF: Oh, Bob Dylan, thank you very much for talking to us. There are hundreds and thousands of people who are calling us now, and waiting to talk to you, but they'll have to wait until you get to New York...

BD: OK.

BF: ...and, uh, I really am very grateful, and I wanna wish you many, many happy years, man, and thank you for making my years more profound and deeper as I listen to your wonderful, wonderful music.

SB: See you, Bobby.

BD: Bye-bye.

SB: See you. Take care, man. Love you.

BD: All right. You all take care.

BF: Good night. You too man. Bye.

May 1986
Mikal Gilmore interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: Rolling Stone, issues 178-179, July 17th/31st, 1986, pp. 30-34,135-136.

POSITIVELY DYLAN
He recaptures the spirit of 'Highway 61' as he teams up with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers for his biggest tour ever
By Mikal Gilmore

"Subterranean," declares Bob Dylan, smiling with delight.

It is just past midnight, and Dylan is standing in the middle of a crowded, smoke-laden recording studio tucked deep into the remote reaches of Topanga Canyon. He is wearing brown-tinted sunglasses, a sleeveless white T-shirt, black vest, black jeans, frayed black motorcycle boots and fingerless black motorcycle gloves, and he puffs hard at a Kool while bobbing his head rhythmically to the colossal blues shuffle that is thundering from the speakers above his head. Sitting on a sofa a few feet away, also nodding their heads in rapt pleasure, are T-Bone Burnett and Al Kooper – old friends and occasional sidemen of Dylan. Several other musicians – including Los Lobos guitarist Cesar Rosas, R&B saxophonist Steve Douglas and bassist James Jamerson Jr., the son of the legendary Motown bass player – fill out the edges of the room. Like everyone else, they are smiling at this music: romping, bawdy, jolting rock & roll – the sort of indomitable music a man might conjure if he were about to lay claim to something big.

The guitars crackle, the horns honk and wail, the drums and bass rumble and clamor wildly, and then the room returns to silence. T-Bone Burnett, turning to Kooper, seems to voice a collective sentiment. "Man," he says, "that gets it."

"Yeah," says Kooper. "So dirty."

Everyone watches Dylan expectantly. For a moment, he appears to be in some distant, private place. "Subterranean," is all he says, still smiling. "Positively subterranean," he adds, running his hand through his mazy brown hair, chuckling. Then he walks into an adjoining room, straps on his weatherworn Fender guitar, tears off a quick, bristling blues lick and says, "Okay, who wants to play lead on this? I broke a string."

Dylan has been like this all week, turning out spur-of-the-moment, blues-infused rock & roll with a startling force and imagination, piling up instrumental tracks so fast that the dazed, bleary-eyed engineers who are monitoring the sessions are having trouble cataloging all the various takes – so far, well over twenty songs, including gritty R&B, Chicago-steeped blues, rambunctious gospel and raw-toned hillbilly forms. In part, Dylan is working fast merely as a practical matter: rehearsals for his American tour with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers start only in a couple of weeks, and though it hardly seems possible in this overmeticulous, high-tech recording era, he figures he can write, record, mix and package a new studio LP in that allotted term. "You see, I spend too much time working out the sound of my records these days," he had told me earlier. "And if the records I'm making only sell a certain amount anyway, then why should I take so long putting them together?... I've got a lot of different records inside me, and it's time just to start getting them out."

Apparently, this is not idle talk. Dylan has started perusing songs for a possible collection of new and standard folk songs and has also begun work on a set of Tin Pan Alley covers — which, it seems safe to predict, will be something to hear. At the moment, though, as Dylan leads the assembled band through yet another roadhouse-style blues number, a different ambition seems to possess him. This is Bob Dylan the rock & roller, and despite all the vagaries of his career, it is still an impressive thing to witness. He leans lustily into the song's momentum at the same instant that he invents its structure, pumping his rhythm guitar with tough, unexpected accents, much like Chuck Berry or Keith Richards, and in the process, prodding his other guitarists, Kooper and Rosas, to tangle and burn, like good-natured rivals. It isn't until moments later, as everybody gathers back into the booth to listen to the playback, that it's clear that this music sounds surprisingly like the riotous, dense music of Highway 61 Revisited — music that seems as menacing as it does joyful, and that, in any event, seems to erupt from an ungovernable imagination. Subterranean, indeed.

It was with rock & roll remarkably like this that, more than twenty years ago, Bob Dylan permanently and sweepingly altered the possibilities of both folk music and the pop-song form. In that epoch, the reach of his influence seemed so pervasive, his stance so powerful and mysterious, that he was virtually changing the language and aspirations of popular culture with his every work and gesture. But Dylan barely got started in rock & roll before he got stopped. In the spring of 1966, he was recording Blonde on Blonde and playing fiery, controversial electric concerts with his backing band, the Hawks (later renamed the Band); a few months later, he was nearly killed in a motorcycle accident and withdrew from recording and performing for nearly a year and a half.

For many, his music never seemed quite the same after that, and although much of it proved bold and lovely, for about twenty years now Bob Dylan hasn't produced much music that transfigures either pop style or youth culture. To some former fans, that lapse has seemed almost unforgivable. Consequently, Dylan has found himself in a dilemma shared by no other rock figure of his era: he has been sidestepped by the pop world he helped transform, at a time when contemporaries like the Rolling Stones attract a more enthusiastic audience than ever before. This must hurt an artist as scrupulous as Dylan, who, for whatever his lapses, has remained pretty true to both his moral and musical ideals.

In the last couple of years, though, there have been signs that some kind of reclamation might be in the offing. For one thing, there's been his participation in the pop world's recent spate of social and political activism, including his involvement in the USA for Africa and Artists United Against Apartheid projects and his appearance at the Live Aid and Farm Aid programs (the latter, an event inspired by an off-the-cuff remark Dylan had made at Live Aid). More important, there were intriguing indications in 1983's Infidels and 1985's Empire Burlesque that the singer seems interested in working his way back into the concerns of the real-life modern world — in fact, that he may even be interested in fashioning music that once more engages a pop-wise audience. And, as demonstrated by the strong response to his recent tour of Australia and Japan, as well as to his summer tour of America, there is still an audience willing to be engaged.

Of course, Dylan has his own views about all this talk of decline and renewal. A little later in the evening at the Topanga studio, while various musicians are working on overdubs, he sits in a quiet office, fiddling with one of his ever-present cigarettes and taking occasional sips from a plastic cup filled with white wine. We are discussing a column that appeared in the April issue of Artforum, by critic Greil Marcus. Marcus has covered Dylan frequently over the years (he penned the liner notes for the 1975 release of The Basement Tapes), but he has been less than compelled by the artist's recent output. Commenting on Dylan's career, and about the recent five-LP retrospective of Dylan's music, Biograph, Marcus wrote: "Dylan actually did something between 1963 and 1968, and... what he did then created a standard against which everything he has putatively done since can be measured... The fact that the 1964 'It Ain't Me, Babe' can be placed on an album next to the 1974 'You Angel You' is a denial of everyone's best hopes."

Dylan seems intrigued by Marcus's comments, but also amused. "Well, he's right and he's wrong," he says. "I did that accidentally. That was all accidental, as every age is. You're doing something, you don't know what it is, you're just doing it. And later on you'll look at it and..." His words trail off, then he begins again. "To me, I don't have a 'career.'... A career is something you can look back on, and I'm not ready to look back. Time doesn't really exist for me in those kinds of terms. I don't really remember in any monumental way 'what I have done.' This isn't my career; this is my life, and it's still vital to me."

He removes his sunglasses and rubs at his eyes. "I feel like I really don't want to prove any points," he continues. "I just want to do whatever it is I do. These lyrical things that come off in a unique or a desolate sort of way, I don't know, I don't feel I have to put that out anymore to please anybody. Besides, anything you want to do for posterity's sake, you can just sing into a tape recorder and give it to your mother, you know?"

Dylan laughs at his last remark. "See," he says, "somebody once told me — and I don't remember who it was or even where it was — but they said, 'Never give a hundred percent.' My thing has always been just getting by on whatever I've been getting by on. That applies to that time, too, that time in the Sixties. It never really occurred to me that I had to do it for any kind of motive except that I just felt like I wanted to do it. As things worked, I mean, I could never have predicted it."

I tell him it's hard to believe he wasn't giving a hundred percent on Highway 61 Revisited or Blonde on Blonde.

He flashes a shy grin and shrugs. "Well, maybe I was. But there's something at the back of your mind that says, 'I'm not giving you a hundred percent. I'm not giving anybody a hundred percent. I'm gonna give you this much, and this much is gonna have to do. I'm good at what I do. I can afford to give you this much and still be as good as, if not better than, the guy over across the street.' I'm not gonna give it all — I'm not Judy Garland, who's gonna die onstage in front of a thousand clowns. If we've learned anything, we should have learned that."

A moment later an engineer is standing in the doorway, telling Dylan the overdubs are done. "This is all gonna pass," Dylan says before getting up to go back into the studio. "All these people who say whatever it is I'm supposed to be doing – that's all gonna pass, because, obviously, I'm not gonna be around forever. That day's gonna come when there aren't gonna be any more records, and then people won't be able to say, 'Well this one's not as good as the last one.' They're gonna have to look at it all. And I don't know what the picture will be, what people's judgment will be at that time. I can't help you in that area."

"Everyone's always saying to me, 'what's Bob Dylan like?'" says Tom Petty a few nights later, seated in the tiny lounge area of a Van Nuys recording studio. Petty and his band, the Heartbreakers, have gathered here to work out material for a forthcoming album and also to help supervise the sound mix for Bob Dylan in Concert, the HBO special documenting their recent tour of Australia with Dylan. "It's funny," Petty continues, "but people still attach a lot of mystery to Bob... I think they figure that, since we've spent time around him, we can explain him, as if he's somebody who needs to be explained."

Petty shakes his head. "I mean, Dylan's just a guy like anybody else — except he's a guy who has something to say. And he has a personality that makes it his own. There's not many people that can walk into a room of 20,000, stare at them and get their attention. That's not an easy trick."

Petty may be a little too modest to admit it, but Dylan also has something else going for him these days. A good part of the excitement over Dylan's current U.S. tour owes to the singer's alliance with a band as rousing as the Heartbreakers — a band more given to propulsive rock & roll than any group Dylan has worked with in over a decade. Judging from the HBO special, the Heartbreakers can render the Highway 61 sound — that unmistakable mix of fiery keyboards and stray-cat guitars — with a convincing flair. Yet rather than simply replicate the sound, the group reinvigorates it and applies it evenly to a broad range of Dylan's music, helping bring a new coherence to his sprawling body of styles. As a result, many of Dylan's more recent songs — such as "When the Night Gomes Falling from the Sky" and "Lenny Bruce" – come across in concert with an uncommon force and conviction, perhaps even a bit more force than some of the older songs.

But Dylan isn't the only one whose music has benefited from this association. Ever since the end of the Australasian tour, Petty and the Heartbreakers seem to be on an inspired streak, cranking out blues-tempered rock and pop songs in the same impromptu fashion that Dylan so often employs. It isn't so much that the group's new music resembles Dylan's (actually, it suggests nothing so much as the reckless blues of Exile on Main Street), but rather that it seems born of the same freewheeling intensity and instinctive ferocity that has marked Dylan's most ambitious efforts.

But there is something more to it — something that belongs only to Petty and the Heartbreakers. I have seen this band on numerous occasions, both in the studio and onstage, and though they've always seemed adept and exciting, they've never struck me as particularly inspired improvisers, in the way, say, that the Rolling Stones or the E Street Band can seem. Now, here they are, jamming with unqualified verve, playing not only head to head but also heart to heart and, in the process, creating what is probably their most inspiring music to date.

"We've never done anything like this before," says Petty, fishing a pack of cigarettes from his shirt pocket "It's not like we're even thinking we're making a record... Yet here we are with enough for a double album."

Petty plants a cigarette between his lips, lights it and settles back into the sofa. "Tonight was a good night," he continues. "In fact, this has been a good time for us in general. I think we feel pretty glad to be together."

Though nobody likes to admit it, following the 1982 release of Long After Dark, the Heartbreakers more or less dissolved. Petty withdrew into his home, where he was building a state-of-the-art studio and anticipating a solo project; drummer Stan Lynch joined T-Bone Burnett's band for a brief tour; keyboardist Benmont Tench played onstage and in the studio with Lone Justice; guitarist Mike Campbell began experimenting with some new aural textures on a twenty-four-track machine in his basement, where he would eventually compose "The Boys of Summer" for Don Henley; and bassist Howie Epstein did some session work and began assembling material for a possible record of his own.

"It was reaching a point," says Campbell, "where everybody was getting a bit stale with each other, inspirationwise. We just weren't committed as a band." Adds Stan Lynch, "It's like we all faced this ultimate question: If I'm not doing what I do now, what would I do? That's a horrible thing, but we all faced it and realized we wouldn't roll over and die if we lost this gig."

Then, in 1984, inspired by some conversations with Robbie Robertson, Petty came up with an idea that couldn't be realized without the band's contribution. He wanted to make an album about the modern American South — the common homeland that most of the group's members had emerged from but had never quite forgotten. "I'd seen these people I'd grown up around struggling with that experience," Petty had said in an earlier conversation, "with all the things about that legacy they couldn't shake free of, and I think that was tearing at me." The result was Southern Accents – a work that examined the conflict between old ways and new ideals and that also aimed to broaden and update the band's musical scope. Though some band members now feel that the record was a bit overworked, they all credit it as a reconciliatory experience. "They've been real supportive of me through this record," Petty says. "I think in the last album we were in a lot of different camps... Now they laugh about Southern Accents and its sitars. They had to let me get this out of my system."

Then along came Bob Dylan. He had already employed Tench on Shot of Love, and Tench, Campbell and Epstein on Empire Burlesque, and was now looking for an electric band to support him at Farm Aid. When Neil Young, one of the event's organizers, mentioned that Petty and the Heartbreakers had also committed themselves to the show, Dylan decided to ask the group to accompany him. "He called me," says Petty, "and I said, 'Yeah, come over,' and shit, we had a great time. We rehearsed about a week, playing maybe a million different songs. That was one of the best times I ever had. We were blazing. So we went off to Farm Aid and had a great night: the Heartbreakers had a good set, and Bob had a good set But it was over too quick."

Well, not quite. Dylan had been considering offers for a possible Australian tour, but was reluctant to assemble a makeshift band. Plus, the Heartbreakers had just finished their own tour and were firming up their schedules for February. "The next thing I knew," says Petty, "we were doing the Australian tour, and we wanted to do it."

According to some reviews, the tour got off to a shaky start in New Zealand, where the opening-night audiences responded more fervently to Petty's set than Dylan's. But within a few shows, Dylan was storming into such songs as "Clean Cut Kid," "Positively 4th Street," "Rainy Day Women" and "Like a Rolling Stone," often facing off with Campbell and Petty in fierce three-way guitar exchanges and launching suddenly into songs that nobody had rehearsed, and that some band members hardly knew. "One night," recalls Tench, "Dylan turns around and goes,' "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues." 'We'd never played it... At times, that tour sounded like some bizarre mix of the Stooges and Van Morrison."

"There's nothing tentative about Dylan onstage," adds Lynch. "I've seen gigs where the songs have ended in all me wrong places, where it's fallen apart, and it's almost as if, in some perverse way, he gets energy from that chaos."

Dylan can also seem daunting in other ways. "He has more presence than anyone I've ever met," says Mike Campbell. "But when you're working together, you sort of forget about that. Then all of a sudden it will hit you. I mean, I can remember when I was in junior high school: I was in a diner eating a hamburger, and 'Like a Rolling Stone' came on. I got so excited by the song and the lyric I thought, 'There's somebody singing and writing for me.' I went out and got a guitar. I'd forgotten about that until one night in Australia, and I realized, 'This is the first song I ever learned on guitar, and here I am playing it with the person who wrote it'."

Dylan was also the object of much intense feeling in Australia. "I pretty much saw it all," says Lynch. "I saw the girl who slept in the elevator claiming to be his sister from Minnesota; I saw the one who claimed to be his masseuse, who flew in from Perth and was riding up and down the elevator trying to figure out what floor he was on. I also saw the people that were genuinely moved, who felt they had to make some connection with him, that this was an important thing in their life. They wanted to be near him and tell him they're all right, because they probably feel that Bob was telling them that it was going to be all right when they weren't all right, as if Bob knew they weren't doing so well at the time.

"They forget one important thing: Bob doesn't know them; they just know him. But that's all right. That's not shortsightedness on their part. That's just the essence of what people do when you talk to them at a vulnerable time in their lives. It doesn't matter that he was talking to them by way of a record; he was still talking to them."

Two weeks later, Bob Dylan sits on a dogeared sofa in the Van Nuys studio where Petty is working, sipping at a plastic cup full of whiskey and water. He blows a curt puff of smoke and broods over it. His weary air reminds me of something he'd said earlier: "Man, sometimes it seems I've spent half my life in a recording studio... It's like living in a coal mine."

Dylan and Petty have been holed up in this room the better part of the night, working on a track called "Got My Mind Made Up," which they have co-written for Dylan's album. By all appearances, it's been a productive session: the tune is a walloping, Bo Diddley-like raveup with Delta blues-style slide guitar, and Dylan has been hurling himself into the vocal with a genuinely staggering force. Yet there's also a note of tension about the evening. The pressure of completing the album has reportedly been wearing on Dylan, and his mood is said to have been rather dour and unpredictable these last several days. In fact, somewhere along the line he has decided to put aside most of the rock & roll tracks he had been working on in Topanga, and is apparently now assembling the album from various sessions that have accrued over the last year. "It's all sorts of stuff," he says. "It doesn't really have a theme or a purpose."

While waiting for his backup singers to arrive, Dylan tries to warm up to the task of the evening's interview. But in contrast to his manner in our earlier conversation, he seems somewhat distracted, almost edgy, and many questions don't seem to engender much response. After a bit, I ask him if he can tell me something about the lyrical tenor of the songs. "Got My Mind Made Up," for example, includes a reference to Libya. Will this be a record that has something to say about our national mood?

He considers the subject. "The kinds of stuff I write now come out over all the years I've lived," he says, "so I can't say anything is really that current. There may be one line that's current... But you have to go on. You can't keep doing the same old thing all the time."

I try a couple more questions about political matters — about whether he feels any kinship with the new activism in pop music – but he looks exhausted at the possibility of seriously discussing the topic. "I'm opposed to whatever oppresses people's intelligence," he says. "We all have to be against that sort of thing, or else we have nowhere to go. But that's not a fight for one man, that's everybody's fight."

Over the course of our interviews, I've learned you can't budge him on a subject if he's not in the mood, so I move on. We chat a while, but nothing much seems to engage him until I ask if he's pleased by the way the American public is responding to the upcoming tour. Demand has been so intense that the itinerary has been increased from twenty-six to forty shows, with more dates likely. In the end, it's estimated drat he'll play to a million people.

"People forget it," he says, "but since 1974, I've never stopped working. I've been out on tours where there hasn't been any publicity. So for me, I'm not getting caught up in all this excitement of a big tour. I've played big tours and I've played small tours. I mean, what's such a big deal about this one?"

Well, it is his first cross-country tour of America in eight years.

"Yeah, but to me, an audience is an audience, no matter where they are. I'm not particularly into this American thing, this Bruce Springsteen-John Cougar-'America first' thing. I feel just as strongly about the American principles as those guys do, but I personally feel that what's important is more eternal things. This American pride thing, that don't mean nothing to me. I'm more locked into what's real forever."

Quickly, Dylan seems animated. He douses one cigarette, lights another and begins speaking at a faster clip. "Listen," he says, "I'm not saying anything bad about these guys, because I think Bruce has done a tremendous amount for real gutbucket rock & roll – and folk music, in his own way. And John Cougar's great, though the best thing on his record, I thought, was his grandmother singing. That knocked me out. But that ain't what music's about. Subjects like 'How come we don't have our jobs?' Then you're getting political. And if you want to get political, you ought to go as far out as you can."

But certainly he understands that Springsteen and Mellencamp aren't exactly trying to fan the flames of American pride. Instead, they're trying to say that if the nation loses sight of certain principles, it also forfeits its claim to greatness.

"Yeah? What are those principles? Are they Biblical principles? The only principles you can find are the principles in the Bible. I mean, Proverbs has got them all."

They are such principles, I say, as justice and equality.

"Yeah, but..." Dylan pauses. As we've been talking, others — including Petty, Mike Campbell, the sound engineers and the backup singers — have entered the room. Dylan stands up and starts pacing back and forth, smiling. It's hard to tell whether he is truly irked or merely spouting provocatively for the fun of it After a moment, he continues. "To me, America means the Indians. They were here and this is their country, and all the white men are just trespassing. We've devastated the natural resources of this country, for no particular reason except to make money and buy houses and send our kids to college and shit like that To me, America is the Indians, period. I just don't go for nothing more. Unions, movies, Greta Garbo, Wall Street, Tin Pan Alley or Dodgers baseball games." He laughs. "It don't mean shit. What we did to the Indians is disgraceful. I think America, to get right, has got to start there first."

I reply that a more realistic way of getting right might be to follow the warning of one of his own songs, "Clean Cut Kid," and not send our young people off to fight in another wasteful war.

"Who sends the young people out to war?" says Dylan. "Their parents do."

But it isn't the parents who suited them up and put them on the planes and sent them off to die in Vietnam.

"Look, the parents could have said, 'Hey, we'll talk about it.' But parents aren't into that They don't know how to deal with what they should do or shouldn't do. So they leave it to the government."

Suddenly, loudly, music blares up in the room. Perhaps somebody — maybe Petty — figures the conversation is getting a little too tense. Dylan smiles and shrugs, then pats me on the shoulder. "We can talk a little more later," he says.

For the next couple of hours, Dylan and Petty attend to detail work on the track — getting the right accent on a ride cymbal and overdubbing the gospel-derived harmonies of the four female singers who have just arrived. As always, it is fascinating to observe how acutely musical Dylan is. In one particularly inspired offhand moment, he leads the four singers — Queen Esther Morrow, Elisecia Wright, Madelyn Quebec and Carol Dennis -through a lovely a cappella version of "White Christmas," then moves into a haunting reading of an old gospel standard, "Evening Sun." Petty and the rest of us just stare, stunned. "Man," says Petty frantically, "we've got to get this on tape."

Afterward, Dylan leads me out into a lounge area to talk some more. He leans on top of a pinball machine, a cigarette nipped between his teeth. He seems calmer, happy with the night's work. He also seems willing to finish the conversation we were having earlier, so we pick up where we left off! What would he do, I ask, if his own sons were drafted?

Dylan looks almost sad as he considers the question. After several moments, he says: "They could do what their conscience tells them to do, and I would support them. But it also depends on what the government wants your children to do. I mean, if the government wants your children to go down and raid Central American countries, there would be no moral value in that I also don't drink we should have bombed those people in Libya." Then he flashes one of those utterly guileless, disarming smiles of his as our talk winds down. "But what I want to know," he says, "is, what's all this got to do with folk music and rock & roll?"

Quite a bit, since he, more than any other artist, raised the possibility that folk music and rock & roll could have political impact. "Right," says Dylan, "and I'm proud of that."

And the reason questions like these keep coming up is because many of us aren't so sure where he stands these days – in fact, some critics have charged that, with songs like "Slow Train" and "Union Sundown," he's even moved a bit to the right.

Dylan muses over the remark in silence for a moment. "Well, for me," he begins, "there is no right and there is no left. There's truth and there's untruth, y'know? There's honesty and there's hypocrisy. Look in the Bible: you don't see nothing about right or left. Other people might have other ideas about things, but I don't, because I'm not that smart I hate to keep beating people over the head with the Bible, but that's the only instrument I know, the only thing that stays true."

Does it disturb him that there seem to be so many preachers these days who claim that to be a good Christian one must also be a political conservative?

"Conservative? Well, don't forget, Jesus said that it's harder for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven than it is for a camel to enter the eye of a needle. I mean, is that conservative? I don't know, I've heard a lot of preachers say how God wants everybody to be wealthy and healthy. Well, it doesn't say drat in the Bible. You can twist anybody's words, but that's only for fools and people who follow fools. If you're entangled in the snares of this world, which everybody is..."

Petty comes into the room and asks Dylan to come hear the final overdubs. Dylan likes what he hears, then decides to take one more pass at the lead vocal. This time, apparently, he nails it. "Don't ever try to change me/I been in this thing too long/There's nothing you can say or do/ To make me think I'm wrong," he snarls at the song's outset, and while it is hardly the most inviting line one has ever heard him sing, tonight he seems to render it with a fitting passion.

It is midnight in Hollywood, and Bob Dylan, Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers are clustered in a cavernous room at the old Zoetrope Studios, working out a harmonica part to "License to Kill," when Dylan suddenly begins playing a different, oddly haunting piece of music. Gradually, the random tones he is blowing begin to take a familiar shape, and it becomes evident that he's playing a plaintive, bluesy variation of "I Dreamed I Saw St Augustine." Benmont Tench is the first to recognize me melody, and quickly embellishes it with a graceful piano part; Petty catches the drift and underscores Dylan's harmonica with some strong, sharp chord strokes. Soon, the entire band, which tonight includes guitarist Al Kooper, is seizing Dylan's urge and transforming the song into a full and passionate performance. Dylan never sings the lyrics himself but instead signals a backup singer to take the lead, and immediately "I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine" becomes a full-fledged, driving spiritual.

Five minutes later, the moment has passed. According to Petty and Tench, Dylan's rehearsals are often like this: inventive versions of wondrous songs come and go and are never heard again, except in those rare times when they may be conjured onstage. In a way, an instance like this leaves one wishing that every show in the current True Confessions Tour were simply another rehearsal: Dylan's impulses are so sure-handed and imaginative, they're practically matchless.

Trying to get Dylan to talk about where such moments come from – or trying to persuade him to take them to die stage – is, as one might expect, not that easy. "I'm not sure if people really want to hear that sort of thing from me," he says, smiling ingenuously. Then he perches himself on an equipment case and puts his hands into his pockets, looking momentarily uncomfortable. Quickly, his face brightens. "Hey," he says, pulling a tape from his pocket, "wanna hear the best album of the year?" He holds a cassette of AKA Graffiti Man, an album by poet John Trudell and guitarist Jesse Ed Davis. "Only people like Lou Reed and John Doe can dream about doing work like this. Most don't have enough talent."

Dylan has his sound engineer cue the tape to a song about Elvis Presley. It is a long, stirring track about the threat that so many originally perceived in Presley's manner and the promise so many others discovered in his music. "We heard Elvis's song for the first time/Then we made up our own mind," recites Trudell at one point, followed by a lovely, blue guitar solo from Davis that quotes "Love Me Tender." Dylan grins at the line, then shakes his head with delight. "Man," he says, "that's about all anybody ever needs to say about Elvis Presley."

I wonder if Dylan realizes that the line could also have been written about him – that millions of us heard his songs, and that those songs not only inspired our own but, in some deep-felt place, almost seemed to be our own. But before there is even time to raise the question, Dylan has put on his coat and is on his way across the room.

"I'm thinking about calling this album Knocked Out Loaded," Bob Dylan says. He repeats the phrase once, then chuckles over it. "Is that any good, you think, Knocked Out Loaded?"

Dylan and a recording engineer are seated at a mixing board at the Topanga recording studio, poring over a list of song tides and talking about possible sequences. Dylan seems downright affable, more relaxed than earlier in the week. Apparently, the album has fallen into place with sudden ease. In the last few days, he has narrowed the record's selections down to a possible nine or ten songs, and tonight he is polishing two of those tracks and attempting a final mix on a couple of others.

So far, it all sounds pretty good – not exactly the back-snapping rock & roll I'd heard a few weeks earlier but, in a way, something no less bold. Then Dylan plays one more track, "Brownsville Girl," a piece he wrote last year with playwright Sam Shepard. A long, storylike song, it begins with a half-drawled, half-sung remembrance about a fateful scene from a western the singer had once seen, then opens up from there into two or three intersecting, dreamlike tales about pursued love and forsaken love, about fading heroes and forfeited ideals — about hope and death. It's hard to tell where Dylan ends and Shepard begins in the lyrics, but it is quite easy to hear whom the song really belongs to. In fact, I've only known of one man who could put across a performance as exhilarating as this one, and he is sitting there right in front of me, concentrating hard on the tale, as if he too were hearing its wondrous involutions for the first time. If this is the way Bob Dylan is going to age as a songwriter, I decide, I'm happy to age with him.

Twelve minutes later, the song closes with a glorious, explosive chorus. I don't know exactly what to say, so Dylan picks up the slack. He lights a cigarette, moves over to the sofa, takes off his glasses and smiles a shy smile. "You know," he says, "sometimes I think about people like T-Bone Walker, John Lee Hooker, Muddy Waters — these people who played into their sixties. If I'm here at eighty, I'll be doing the same thing. This is all I want to do — it's all I can do. I mean, you don't have to be a nineteen – or twenty-year-old to play this stuff That's the vanity of that youth-culture ideal. To me that's never been the thing. I've never really aimed myself at any so-called youth culture. I directed it at people who I imagined, maybe falsely so, had the same experiences that I've had, who have kind of been through what I'd been through. But I guess a lot of people just haven't."

He falls silent for a moment, taking a drag off his cigarette. "See," he says, "I've always been just about being an individual, with an individual point of view. If I've been about anything, it's probably that, and to let some people know that it's possible to do the impossible."

Dylan leans forward and snuffs out his cigarette. "And that's really all. If I've ever had anything to tell anybody, it's that: You can do the impossible. Anything is possible. And that's it. No more."

14 June 1986
Jon Bream Interview, Berkeley, California

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement, issue 5, p. 24.

Minneapolis Star and Tribune, Sunday, June 22, 1986.

THE MANY FACES OF BOB DYLAN
He takes off his mask before bringing his show back home
By Jon Bream/Staff Writer

Berkeley, Calif.
Bob Dylan strides through the long lobby of the Claremont Resort hotel wearing his game face. His customary sunglasses are missing. Yet, even without that mask, it's hard to predict which Dylan will surface an hour later in concert at the Greek Theater.

Poet laureate? Political rebel? Folkie? Rocker? Visionary prophet? Blasphemer? Christian? Jew?

It turns out to be a free-wheeling Bob Dylan: animated, talkative, jocular, Intense, passionate. The many sides of Dylan are evident as he proves to be a genuine soul singer — not in the R&B sense, but in terms of singing with his heart and soul — and an unabashed music fan. Backed by the simpatico Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers plus four gospel-trained singers, Dylan interprets numbers by Ray Charles, Lefty Frizzell and Ricky Nelson, recasts his own classics including "Positively Fourth Street" and "Like a Rolling Stone" and sprinkles in a handful of tunes from his most recent albums.

Neil Young is backstage after the concert. So is Annie Sampson, a former singer with the Bay Area R&B band Stoneground; she wants to give her old friend Dylan a tape of her current work. A former Dylan employee and her husband also stop by to chat with the singer in his dressing room.

"This is what happens when I stick around after," Dylan says to a visiting journalist after the well-wishers have left. "So what's happening in Minneapolis?"

"People are getting excited about your show at the Metrodome with the (Grateful) Dead," the visitor says. "It'll be the first actual concert at the Dome — you've been to Twins games there. There have been concerts in association with sporting events but no full-scale concerts. And this will also be your first concert in Minnesota in nine years."

"No. Didn't I come there on the last tour (in '83)?"

"No. And not on the 'religious' tour ('80). You got as close as Omaha."

"They're all religious tours," Dylan says with a sly smile. "This one's called the True Confessions Tour."

The superstar's game face is gone. He's joking and jiving. There are none of the usual fronts or masks he puts on for journalists. So the visitor tells the Hibbing-bred singer that he was recently named to the all-Hibbing basketball team by pro basketball star Kevin McHale. who also grew up in Hibbing.

"I can't play," says Dylan with a cup of Jim Beam bourbon and water in his hand. "Who's my substitute?"

(The next day, McHale says, "There is no substitute for Bob Dylan.")

Dylan climbs into a plain van — not even tinted windows — with his teen-age son Sam (one of his six children), his acupuncturist and a few other assistants to head for his second concert at the Greek Theater. Someone hands a cassette tape to the visiting journalist. "It's my new album," says Dylan. "Don't tell anyone where you got it. Just give it back to Gary (Dylan's valet) tonight."

The van pulls into the Greek Theater. Unlike most places where rock concerts are held, this amphitheater offers no backstage entrance, so the van must crawl through a crowd to reach the backstage area. Dylan suggests everybody get out and walk.

The van doors open and the riders hop out. The pool of people parts like the Red Sea did for Moses.

"Hi, Bob," shouts one fan.

"Great show last night," yells another.

A young woman runs up and embraces Dylan, who cooperates reluctantly, then continues walking — down the stairs to the dressing room.

The sunglasses, blue jeans and motorcycle boots come off. Dylan slips into his leather pants, white socks and Beetle boots. His wardrobe assistant shows him how to tie the decorative laces on the seams of the pants around his boots.

"I need a scarf," he tells her. "It's going to be windy tonight, right? My head gets wet. How 'bout that red one?"

She fetches a red plaid scarf from a wardrobe trunk, and he ties it around his head and looks into a mirror. The assistant suggests a hat. They compromise by tying the scarf around the singer's neck.

But first, he needs a shirt. She proffers a white basketball undershirt. He holds it up, pronounces it "OK" and then asks for something else to wear over it. They settle on a black leather vest.

Dylan pours himself a Jim Beam and water and asks, "What time it is?"

—

Bob Dylan spent his first 19 years in Minnesota. He was born in Duluth, moved to Hibbing when he was 5 or 6 and later attended the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis for a year. He maintains homes in New York and California, and he gets back to Minnesota two or three times a year, he says; his mother lives in St. Paul and his brother in a Minneapolis exurb.

What does Minnesota mean to this famous native son?

"The trees and the lakes and the clouds." he says. "And when I was growing up, the trains."

When Dylan started recording for Columbia Records in 1962 he never figured he would have the impact and influence he has had on the intellectual and artistic fabric of his times. He says he doesn't spend much time acknowledging that significance, but ponders the subject "just in passing moments."

His 28 albums have sold more than 35 million copies and his songs have been recorded by thousands of singers, but Dylan hasn't had a hit song or a best selling record in the 1980s. It doesn't bother him that he's no longer in the forefront of popular music.

"There is a myth in the music business that you need to be platinum and double platinum (with sales of million and 2 million albums)," he says. "Neil Diamond doesn't sell (records), but how many nights did he play in the (St. Paul) Civic Center? Two? Three? (Diamond played two concerts there last December.)"

"Music is a live thing," Dylan says. "On records, it's something else. For me, it's always of the moment. It always adapts to your character of the moment. That's why I can't get away from it."

On his 1980 tour Dylan shocked his fans by performing a concert of entirely new, gospel-flavored material and eschewing two decades' worth of songs that had made him famous. He says he has no problem singing songs like "Blowin' in the Wind" and "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" that he wrote more than 20 years ago.

"They're not old songs if you're still singing them," he says. ""The Star Spangled Banner" – now that's an old song. So is, uh, "Auld Lang Syne"."

Dylan's legions and social commentators have long made much ado about his religious views. Is he a born-again Christian or is he reasserting his Judaism, the religion in which he was raised? It seems he has had a strong interest in spirituality and then pursued studies from the perspective of different religious groups.

When did his interest in spirituality start?

"Before I was born," he says. He was introduced to the Bible in grade school and he has been reading it regularly ever since.

On this occasion he is shying away, for the most part, from the long, philosophical and often cryptic answers with which he has been known to confound interviewers. He might cite a line from a Neil Young song or a quote from a James Taylor interview to illustrate his point, but mostly he is direct and straightforward.

After all these years, what motivates him?

He contemplates the question. "Not greed, I hope." He ponders for a moment. "Righteous instincts."

26 June 1986
Bob Ashenmacher Interview, Minneapolis, Minnesota

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 277-280.

Dylan talks with Ashenmacher about the old times in Minnesota. The interview took place backstage prior to the concert at the Minneapolis Hubert H. Humphrey Metrodome on June 26th. The News-Tribune & Herald carrying this interview was published in Duluth on June 29th 1986.

Dylan talks
His images of the North are faint but fond

MINNEAPOLIS – Yes, Bob Dylan returns to his native northern Minnesota for visits. No, he didn't feel like an outcast in the days when he rode a motorcycle and had the plug pulled on his rock n' roll band at a Hibbing High School talent show.

And about last weeks short lived Duluth City Council proposal to name a Duluth street after him, he's puzzled and amused.

Dylan spoke freely about his youth on the Iron Range in a backstage conversation before his concert Thursday night in the Metrodome in Minneapolis. He was born Robert Zimmerman 45 years ago in Duluth, and raised in Hibbing from age 6. He left after high school graduation in 1959.

Through more than 20 years in the forefront of American music, Dylan has granted interviews infrequently. More than once he has given brooding, elliptical responses rather than straightforward answers.

A different Dylan talked plainly Thursday night. He spoke to the News-Tribune & Herald primarily because of the efforts of a close friend of his who lives in Duluth. The friend said he wanted Dylan's fondness for Duluth and the Iron Range to become known.

The backstage area was quiet. Dylan appeared from a room sectioned off by sheets hanging from the ceiling.

He wore the same outfit he would wear onstage, minus a leather vest: a blue sleeveless shirt, black leather pants with silver studs up the sides and Beatle boots. Close up, his eyes are very blue. His build is thin, almost slight. His handshake is dry, the grasp gentle. The conversation was conducted sitting atop a musical instrument trunk in the room behind the sheet. Dylan eschewed small talk. He avoided direct eye contact at first and appeared uncomfortable, even irritable. When he began hearing some old names, remembering some old impressions, he seemed to begin enjoying himself.

BA: It's surprising you wanted to talk to the Duluth newspaper. You're not talking to any others now that this tour is under way.

BD: Don't you want me to? I can go. I really can. I mean, I got things to do. I thought you wanted to speak to me.

BA: But is there something you wanted to say specifically to Duluth and the Iron Range?

BD: No, nothin'. Nothin'. (He paused, seemed to soften a bit) It's just really hard going, here, with all these one-night stands.

BA: Have you heard about this Bob Dylan Drive idea in Duluth?

BD: Yeah, I've heard about it.

BA: What do you think?

BD: (Pause) I really don't know what to think. I would think there'd be a lot of other people in Duluth they could name streets for. (He laughed a little). I think everybody who was born there should have a street named for them. I don't remember much about Duluth really, except, uh, the foghorns. (He plucked at one of the hanging sheets, glanced into an empty adjacent room). That's about it.

BA: Did you come down to Duluth from the Range much as a kid?

BD: I saw Buddy Holly there, actually. I saw a few bands in Duluth, but there weren't that many clubs happening. People who played back then usually just did it in their house.

BA: Do you remember any musicians from the Range or Duluth?

BD: There was a guy who used to live in our duplex in Hibbing named Chuckle Solberg, who a few years ago was playing piano with (a national act). And some other people from Minnesota I remember. I run into people from Minnesota in the strangest places actually.

BA: What was the Range music scene like when you were growing up?

BD: Back then it was mainly polka bands. If you went to a club it was more like a tavern scene, with a polka band. There was country music, too, that I remember. My girlfriend, Echo was her name – Echo Helstrom – her father played guitar.

BA: She lives in Los Angeles now. Do you ever hear from her?

BD: (He smiled) I see her occasionally.

BA: Was she the "Girl from the North Country"?

BD: (He smiled wider and said) Well, she's a North Country girl through and through. (He laughed. It was a nice laugh. It sounded kind).

BA: They say she was free-spirited.

BD: Mm-hm, she was just like me.

BA: Do you remember Bill Marinac?

BD: He's a string bass player. We played together. Charles Nara, he was our drummer. We had a good guitar player in that band, Monty Edwardson.

BA: People always wonder – do you ever come back?

BD: I do sometimes, in, you know, odd moments. When I'm passin' through.

BA: Once a year, maybe?

BD: Up to the Range, there? No, I don't get up there as often as that. Duluth, a little bit more often, but, you know, I haven't spent any great amount of time there.

BA: Do you like that you can visit and have it be low-key, not a bunch of fans pestering you?

BD: Yeah, it's nice when that happens.

BA: Local legend has it that at the Hibbing High Jacket Jamboree someone cut the electricity on your band because you were so loud.

BD: Yeah, I wasn't very popular when I was there. (He laughed). I don't remember that, but it could've happened.

BA: Did people sometimes not understand what you were doing?

BD: Nah, we were just the loudest band around, it was mostly that. What we were doing, there wasn't anybody else around doing. (The music scene) was mostly horn kind of stuff, jazz – there was one other band in town with trumpet, bass, guitar and drums. Mostly that type of stuff. And you had to play polkas.

BA: Did you actually play polkas?

BD: Yeah. Oh, yeah.

BA: It seems in recent years you're less guarded about discussing things like this.

BD: Well, nobody really asked me about it. Nobody much asks people where they come from or what they're doing while they're growing up, so...

BA: When you started to get successful in New York, did the national press romanticize your past in Minnesota?

BD: I don't really know. I don't know what they did.
BA: You didn't read it?
BD: Um, I didn't really keep up with it all.
BA: Could you ever see having a summer home in northern Minnesota, out in the woods somewhere?
BD: Yeah (he chuckled). Who couldn't imagine that?
BA: That's be neat.
BD: It would be.
BA: Well, Kevin McHale does it.
BD: Yeah, I saw Kevin out there (at the concert) just now.
BA: There's a great story about him seeing you at a Celtics game.
BD: He did, he came right out into the crowd and shook my hand. That was an amazing thing to do.
BA: Do you ever listen to Garrison Keillor?
BD: A few years ago I used to listen to him. I like his show. I've always liked it.
BA: Does it ever make you homesick for Minnesota?
BD: Well, ah... yeah, it does. Well, I don't get homesick for those kind of things he's talkin' about because, ah, I don't know if my upbringing was like that. But I get homesick for where it all happened.
BA: Everyone says it was a very warm home you and your brother, David, were brought up in.
BD: Well, we had a big family, like a big extended family. My grandmother had about 17 kids on the one side, and on the other side about 13 kids. So there was always a lot of family-type people around.
BA: Were you kind of an outcast when you were growing up? That's part of the myth.
BD: I really couldn't say (He laughed). To me I was perfectly right.

29 June 1986
Detroit Free Press, Mike Campbell comments

Source: TWM #994

"During one show in Australia, we were supposed to do 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky,' and (Dylan) didn't feel like doing it," Campbell remembers. "He turned around to me and said, 'You know the chords for 'All Along the Watchtower,' don't you,' and we'd never rehearsed it. I said, 'There's only three, right?' And he said, 'Yeah. Let's go.'

"You never know what's coming," Campbell says. "There'll be different songs, or we'll do the same songs in different keys. It reminds me of a high school dance band; it's more polished, maybe, but it has that looseness, that freshness, that, uh — chaos.

July or August 1986
Ian & Sylvia Message, CBC-TV

Source: Circulating tape

Ian and Sylvia, I wish I could be whereev… there where you are tonight, but I can't be. So I wish you good luck anyway and hope to see you soon.

17 July 1986
David Hepworth Interview,
Madison Square Gardens, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1057-1068.

July 15th to the 17th 1986, Dylan performed three shows at Madison Square Garden, New York. Before the third show, Dylan was interviewed by David Hepworth from Q magazine. The article was printed in Q in October 1986. Quoting from Heylin (A Life In Stolen Moments) – Dylan has little to say and apparently complains afterward that "The guy keeps asking me questions."

There's a lot of non-interview material here, but I've included it 'cause it makes rather interesting background reading. I'm afraid I'm not enamoured with the interviewer who imposes far too many of his own personal feelings. However, completeness dictates...

THE INVISIBLE MAN

Feted, imitated, slated and overrated, the world's least worldly rock star is 45 this year and in danger of being mythologised into extinction. David Hepworth met Bob Dylan – and all the little Dylans – in New York.

The man in the denim jacket hugs the battered guitar further into his chest and launches into the final verse of Shelter From The Storm, the backlighting picking out every starpoint of his tangled hair as he sings of beauty walking a razor's edge and pipes out a final solo on the harmonica attached around his neck. Awkwardly acknowledging the audience's applause he hops off the small, low stage. As he walks through the crowd people offer their muttered congratulations.

"Great, Bob."

"You did real good. Bob."

"Bob, thanks for everything."

The master of ceremonies takes the mike: "A big hand, ladies and gentlemen, for the legendary Bob Dylan."

Pause.

"And now, would you welcome to the stage, the one, the only... Bob Dylan!"

With a sweep of his arm he indicates a fair-haired man in glasses. This character is so small he's having trouble hoisting his backside on to the tall stool without dropping his guitar. The crowd stiffens. Bob Dylan is five feet, tops. And, yes, he's going to sing Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues...

THIS IS THE FIFTH annual Bob Dylan imitators contest, taking place in a Greenwich Village club called The Speakeasy. Entries are invited in six categories: folk-protest, amphetamine-rock, post-motorcycle accident, born again, freestyle and contemporary. Here on MacDougal Street they know their Dylan. When he first arrived in New York he headed like a homing pilgrim straight for the corner of Bleecker and MacDougal, making his reputation at The Gaslight, Café Rienzi, Gerde's Folk City and the other Village clubs and coffee houses, some of which still cluster around that holy intersection.

That was a quarter of a century ago. Tonight the "contemporary" Bob Dylan is midtown with Tom Petty And The Heartbreakers, playing the second of a three night engagement at Madison Square Garden, an ice-hockey facility that seats 22,000. Earlier that evening in his dressing room I'd mentioned the contest to him, saying I intended to drop by. He shook his head.

"It's crazy, isn't it? How would you feel if they were doing that about you?"

This is not something I often consider, Bob, but, well, flattered at first and then maybe a bit spooked. Don't you like the flattery?

"No, because you do get spooked by it and so you can't afford to get flattered by it. You can get trapped if you fall victim to flattery."

It would have been hard to persuade Bob Dylan that there was more affection for the spirit of his music in that cramped little alternative comedy joint than there had been in the gusty reaches of the Garden. The Speakeasy audience may have been traditionalists to the point of pedantry – applauding a particularly well-observed imitation of Dylan's harmonica work on Just Like A Woman and clicking their tongues in disapproval when a competitor tried to pass off Bringing It All Back Home material with Nashville Skyline intonation – but they were probably having a better time than those who'd paid twenty dollars and more to watch a distant silhouette act out the fiction of his rebirth for the umpteenth time.

BOB DYLAN came off his motorbike the difficult way on July 29th 1966. That's twenty years ago. George Michael was in nappies. Every live performance he's undertaken since then has been greeted as the beginning of a Return to Form. The 1986 True Confessions tour of America and Australasia – for even Dylan tours have brand names these days – is no exception.

Critics claim that his alliance with The Heartbreakers has magically invoked what Dylan called the "wild mercury sound" of Blonde On Blonde. In actual fact they no more resemble the men who played on Obviously Five Believers than the Smiths do. Instead they sound like many of the line-ups Dylan has taken on the road since he ceased working with The Band – loud, approximate and confused.

This is not necessarily their fault. Dylan is notorious for refusing to articulate what he wants. The musicians who worked with him in Dave Stuart's North London studio late last year were amazed that anyone could spend two weeks leading a band without feeling the need to give instructions from time to time. Eric Clapton, an old friend, simply watches his hands for the changes and hopes for the best.

Ronnie Wood recalls the day before Live Aid when he and Keith Richards sat around with Dylan trying to familiarize themselves with his material. Dozens of songs were picked out and arranged. The next day, just a matter of minutes before they were due to follow Mick Jagger and Tina Turner on stage in front of the world's largest television audience, Dylan announced that they would begin with The Ballad Of Hollis Brown. This was one of the few numbers they hadn't rehearsed.

Ronnie hadn't even heard it: "I thought, Hollis Brown? That's cough medicine, isn't it?" The rest you know.

IN STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL TERMS Dylan had no more right to top that Philadelphia bill than the Hooters. Last year in New York CBS presented him with an award for lifetime's sales of 35,000,000 records. Respectable, but no more. Michael Jackson has sold more copies of Thriller alone than Bob Dylan has of his thirty albums over twenty five years. And yet when Jack Nicholson used the adjective "transcendent" you know you weren't about to see Cyndi Lauper.

The three song shambles that followed would have finished most people's careers. Dylan claims never to have had one. Then he compounded the debacle by suggesting that some of the money raised by the event should be diverted to the over-mortgaged farmers of the mid-West. To the British artists sitting watching the American telecast on a large screen in a West End nightclub this seemed like typically tasteless isolationism. Picking his words carefully, Bob Geldof later commented: "I find it hard to get as concerned about people losing their livelihoods as I do about people losing their lives."

Nevertheless Dylan's remarks mustered the American musical community in a way that Band Aid and Live Aid had never quite managed. Headed up by Willie Nelson, Neil Young and John Cougar Mellencamp, Farm Aid was set to climax with a September concert in Champaign, Illinois. Obviously keen to avoid another Live Aid debacle, Dylan decided he needed a band, preferably a well-rehearsed one. He'd already worked with various Heartbreakers, notably keyboard player Benmont Tench, and the fact that his manager Elliott Roberts had recently gone into partnership with Tony Dimitriades, Petty's manager, made the liason easier to contemplate. They rehearsed together for a week and successfully closed out Farm Aid. (The event raised barely enough money to pay off one day's interest on the debts accrued by American farmers; however it was instrumental in drawing national attention to their plight).

THE TRUE CONFESSIONS TOUR should not have been the box office hit it was. Dylan's last US tour, undertaken in 1981, was not a great success. Eschewing all the old favorites, he stuck largely to songs that reflected his conversion to Evangelical Christianity. Experience suggests that Your Average Rock Fan can put up with devil worship but tends to draw the line at the old rugged cross.

Dylan wasn't being coy about it either; he thumped that bible till the dust reached the rafters. He was shaken by how violently supposedly educated audiences reacted to songs which in his view were simply direct descendants of Masters Of War or I Shall Be Released, not to mention Father Of Night or Knockin' On Heaven 's Door. What did these people think he'd been singing about all these years if it wasn't moral conflict and the prospect of salvation?

Dylan puts up a good show of not understanding the extent to which the music industry intercedes in his art. Ask him what draws a million people to buy tickets for this 40-date tour and he'll profess complete bewilderment. This pretence of ignorance is his strong shield against criticism and pressure. There he is, playing New York City on the very day his new record, Knocked Out Loaded, hits the stores. There he is, playing for the best part of three hours in front of 22,000 people and the assembled brass of his record company and how many runes does he play from this new release? Not one.

"Not even a mention," moans a CBS employee backstage.

Oh, he found room for Ricky Nelson's Lonesome Town and ancient gospel corn like That Lucky Old Sun but apparently wasn't ready to play Brownsville Girl or any of the other tracks that the American press were dutifully hailing as a Return To Form. (He'd probably read the CBS handout calling Brownsville Girl "a masterpiece"; all Bob Dylan songs of more than five minutes duration are "masterpieces")

Bob Dylan has been signed to this record company for more than twenty five years. Twenty five years of advances, options, tour support and artwork approval. He's been with CBS longer than the vast majority of their employees. He may not sell the amount of product that Michael or

Bruce or Barbra or even Journey shift but nevertheless the Company President Walter Yetnikoff makes sure he's there at the Garden with his flexible friend, ready to take Dylan and a party of twenty to a swank East Side restaurant after the show.

I feel for Yetnikoff. He spends most of his time arguing over video production expenses and Japanese twelve inch single royalties with a succession of private plane-piloting, currency-dealing, Armani-wearing, aluminium briefcase-owning artists and their managers; then twice a year he has to sit down with this smokey old gipsy who isn't remotely interested in releasing singles, shrivels up at the thought of going on the radio or TV and only ever approves pictures of himself in which his eyes are closed. It can't be easy.

(Elliott Roberts discussing possible Italian TV interviews with CBS person: "He doesn't want to do it sitting down with the camera pointing at him and he doesn't want to do it walking either." CBS person tries to look understanding.)

He's the only artist I've ever met who genuinely didn't seem to care what impression I took away. Mick Jagger wants to be feared, Bruce Springsteen wants to be loved and Sting badly wants to be admired.

Bob Dylan, ladies and gentlemen, doesn't give a shit.

EACH NIGHT AROUND SIX he is delivered into Madison Square Garden by camper van. The vehicle pulls up a few yards from his dressing room and out he swings looking like... well, rather like a middle-aged Bob Dylan imitator; mirror shades, black leather jacket with white buckskin fringes, black leather trousers, black fingerless gloves and black motorcycle boots. The expression on his face – what you can see of his face – defies you to recognise him. Consequently all activity in the area freezes as he goes by.

This is the really poisonous thing about celebrity. When you're as famous as this, every room is occupied by people discussing your imminent arrival or your recent departure. Your reputation doesn't simply go before you; it clears the streets, checks the exits, halts the traffic, screams through a bullhorn. Everyone you're introduced to has read at least one book about you. It must be like being Adrian Mole.

Dylan is followed down the corridor by three dark-haired, solemn-beyond-their-years teenagers. They are Jesse, Samuel and Jacob, the three Dylan sons, Jesse, the oldest of them at 20, is being tugged along by an animal that appears to have been the product of a brief romance between a labrador and a bus. "My God," someone hisses as the creature wheezes past, "the hound is a horse!" A bone is produced. It was probably donated by a camel. This snack is taken into Dylan's dressing room.

What's the dog called? I enquire, as the animal falls upon the bone. (It evidently hasn't eaten for quarter of an hour.)

"I'm sorry?" says Dylan.
"I said 'what's the dog's name?'"
"Could you repeat that," cupping a hand to his ear.
"I just wondered whether the dog had a name..."
"Oh, the dog. No. (Pause as we both study the banqueting hound.) No, actually he's called 'Late For Dinner'."
"Sorry?"
"No, that dog has a name that is known only to me."
Oh. So far so good.

COME INTO THIS DRESSING ROOM.
(Don't mind the middle-aged man fidgeting with the scratched acoustic guitar in the corner – he's just the spokesman for a generation).

You know, if I was Bob Dylan I'd ask to be moved. This is neither a big nor a luxurious room. On a table in a corner there are ranks of half-bottles of Jim Beam Whisky, one bottle of Stolichnaya vodka and various mixers. The low table in the middle bears a well-wishers flowers and a book of Bible stories. The furniture is chipped and battered. A portable clothes rack is being stocked by a tall, red-haired girl called Susie.

Susie commutes between Dylan and the wider world outside the dressing room. She fetches fresh motorcycle boots from the giant flight case in the corridor, puts the booze on ice, informs him that Time magazine have been waiting down the corridor for a couple of hours, even tells him what time it is.

"Is Bobby Womack out there?" he enquires suddenly.

She looks. Yes he is. (Course he is.)

"Oh. Listen... er... oh, forget it. I'm getting ahead of myself... er..."

He puts the guitar down, jumps up, disappears into the next door bathroom and expectorates noisily.

OUT IN THE CORRIDOR two men are waiting. They are Richard Marquand and Joe Esterhaz, respectively Director and writer of Hearts Of Fire, the film Dylan starts work on as soon as his tour finishes. Marquand, who made Jagged Edge, is one of America's hottest directors. The film which purports to be "about stardom and the relationship between Europe and America," also stars Rupert Everett and Fiona Flanagan, an MTV-bred ingenue who has already made two albums for Atlantic. It's Dylan's first acting role since Sam Peckinpah's Pat Garrett And Billy The Kid. Unless you count Renaldo And Clara. He doesn't.

"I don't know, man. Was that a film?"

We had Dont Look Back on British TV a couple of months ago.

Another grey smile: "I don't know, man. Half the stuff I do is someone else's idea."

(This is a stock Dylan posture. During our conversation he assures me that the collaboration with Petty, the release of Biograph, the composition of Knocked Out Loaded, his casting in Hearts Of Fire and numerous other ventures were all "someone else's idea".)

"Somebody called me from the William Morris Agency. I just read it and it seemed like I knew that character, whoever it was. It's a guy who plays oldie shows. I could relate to that. I've done all those things, really."

The challenge of acting doesn't excite him so much as the prospect of getting to play music: "Marquand says that maybe one of the bands could be Woody and Steve Jordan and somebody that Woody knows. That'd be great."

Woody, who has joined Dylan on stage for the last half-dozen numbers throughout the New York engagement, is one of his firmest friends. Although one is known as one of the deeper thinkers of his generation while the other is regarded as a lairy connoisseur of the pleasures of the flesh, they appear to pal down famously, lurching around the dressing room in an unsteady embrace after the show as Ron listens back to his guitar work on the Knocked Out Loaded track Driftin'. Woody knows how to make Dylan laugh in a very elementary way.

The Stones' guitarist is only marginally less puzzled about their friendship than anyone else: "I think we probably get on quite well because I'm quite happy if people don't particularly want to talk. I'll just carry on doing what I'm doing until he's ready."

IT'S RARE that a year goes by without another thick volume appearing in the tonier kind of bookshop, dedicated to documenting the life and anatomising the work of this obdurate individual. Within the last twelve months we've had Wilfred Mellers' tortuous musicological analysis, A Darker Shade Of Pale, Jonathan Cott's seriously glossy picture book, Dylan, and already the presses are rolling out Robert Shelton's exhaustive memoir, No Direction Home. Bob Dylan gets his fan mail between hard covers.

All these books are alike in their failure to throw any light on his more oblique songs and their frenzied attempt to read major significance into his throwaways. Groaning with footnotes and thick references to arcane Middle-Eastern works of philosophy they go in for a dismaying amount of "what Dylan is trying to say here is..." analysis. The day will doubtless arrive when we will read the words "what Muddy is trying to say here is that he has at last got his mojo working but can't as yet get it to work on the object of his desires."

The hero of all this literature claims not to be bothered by this scribbling industry: "I just don't pay any attention to it. Life's too short, man."

You must read the odd one.

"I try not to but every now and then I come across one of them at somebody's apartment or something. I was over at someone's place and there was a book there called Positively Main Street. I started reading it and it just made me crazed, you know, reading this stuff. On some level I was having a hard time separating me from the person I was reading about, you know what I mean?"

"I was feeling pretty good when I got there and then I read part of it and I just felt like another person; it was like Doctor Jekyll and Mr Hyde."

What he would make of the Telegraph I can only guess. Here is a magazine devoted exclusively to documenting the life of Robert Allen Zimmerman, a singer from Hibbing, Minnesota.

This is no cut-and-paste fanzine bashed off on the photocopier while the Inspector of Taxes is at lunch; this is a perfect-bound, color-covered, ultra devotional periodical published from Bury, Lancashire. If magazines are best run by obsessives, the Telegraph is the best. No minutae is too minute for the Telegraph. Here you can find correspondence dealing with whether Al Kooper or Mike Bloomfield wore the spotted shirt at the infamous Newport concert and the exact circumstances of Dylan's meeting with his former wife. Was it, as Tangled Up In Blue infers, in a "topless joint" or could that just have meant the Playboy Club? After all she was married at the time to Victor Lownes... The only other place you can find fact fetishism taken to this pitch is among the pages of The Cricketer.

For the benefit of those who are either impervious to the appeal of Bob Dylan or too young to have known him as anything but the last act at Live Aid, it's useful to stand back and appreciate the strength of his hold on a lot of people. Bootleg recordings are the true measure of the constancy of an artist's following. Nobody ever sold Gerry and the Pacemakers bootlegs or Donovan bootlegs or Boomtown Rats bootlegs. Neither do they market illicit recordings of Michael Jackson so it's not a simple question of fame.

People buy bootlegs of artists they feel such kinship with that it's inconceivable that they could ever be disappointed with what they hear. If you were to produce a recording of Bob Dylan boiling a kettle I could find you a few buyers tomorrow. They would file it alongside the rest of their collection: the 1961 recordings of Dylan singing Pastures Of Plenty to Woody Guthrie's friend's daughter in a New Jersey motel room; the Washington Civil Rights rally of 1963; his interview with Studs Terkel in Chicago; his Woodstock duets with George Harrison from 1970; his 1975 answerphone message; his ill-tempered telephone exchanges with A. J. Weberman ("Hey man, why don't you just get off my back?"); the video of his Isle Of Wight press conference from 1969; a matchless hovering blues called Blind Willie McTell that has become one of his most celebrated songs; the soundchecks from every date of his last world tour; the out-takes, false starts, rough drafts and abandoned masterpieces of half a lifetime.

No wonder he's careful about fans.

"Boy, coming out of the hotel tonight, it was a real zoo. I don't know who's a fan. It's a short word for fanaticism. I've always been uncomfortable in a crush of people who were fans of mine. I've always felt more comfortable with people who didn't know me. I can go really most places and nobody will recognise me except people who know who I am. I could just disappear into a crowd unless someone knows who I am and then they'll point me out to other people and then you suddenly find yourself the center of all this attention."

LIKE SO MANY ROCK STARS Dylan is a shy man who's also an incorrigible show-off. On stage in New York he eschewed all frontal lighting in the sure knowledge that his silhouetted profile alone would be quite sufficient to divert attention from Tom Petty. He only spoke a couple of times, to enquire "anyone out there running for office? No? Good," before Ballad Of A Thin Man and introduce In The Garden with the words "this is for all the people in gaol, not for doing evil things but for doing good things."

How he chooses twenty or so songs from such a repertoire is a mystery; some nights on this tour he's launched into forgotten favorites with the minimum of warning. But the sad truth is that the only artists who can win on venues like Madison are the people who can pump up their music way beyond life-size. Springsteen can handle it. Dylan can't, shouldn't even be trying. It's an undignified way to carry on. The audience who divided equally between old fans along for the nostalgic ride and tanked-up teenagers waiting for that drug song about everybody getting stoned, didn't seem to be listening much. Petty's journeyman radio rock covered their needs adequately.

The star hits stride only intermittently; Hard Rain hammered out with a father's righteous indignation; In The Garden sufficiently deeply felt to slice its way through the band's vague shuffle. Positively Fourth Street on the other hand had only curiosity value. I confessed to not understanding why he still bothered with a song so specifically addressed to a person who's been out of his life for twenty years.

"Yes, but so are folk songs. Some of those are a hundred years old, but so what?"

So Positively Fourth Street can bear the same degree of repetition as Wild Mountain Thyme?

"No... I don't know. On some level maybe. But Wild Mountain Thyme now..." He smiles and begins to pick a tune on the guitar.

(It isn't Wild Mountain Thyme. It isn't anything much.)

"Do you know the McPeake Family?"

Afraid not.

"They're a group from Ireland."

So is that what he likes listening to?

"I like the Egyptian singer Om-Kalsoum. She passed away about fifteen years ago. I bought a record of hers when I was in Jerusalem in 1972. This guy was selling them on the street corner and they were obviously bootleg records." He laughs and then decides maybe we'd better not say they were bootlegs. (I presume he means pirates, anyway.) "I like Edith Piaf a lot."

In an attempt to gradually entice him into the present decade, I enquire about people like Boy George.

"I thought that was a nice record, that Do You Really Want To Hurt Me? That and the Chameleon song. I liked him when he wore that white coat and that black hat and the braids. I don't know why he ever changed."

He's been on a heroin charge in Britain.

"He has? Poor Boy George."

I FIRST HEARD BOB DYLAN'S MUSIC in a school room. Some powerful sophisticated 6th former descended from on high to play us young pups his precious copies of the first four Dylan albums. We'd seen the name in a songwriting credit, read about "protest music" in Disc but we'd no idea what to expect really. I thought you pronounced him Die-lunn.

I can clearly remember this callow 17-year-old playing Spanish Harlem Incident on the school's mahogany-panelled Ferguson gramophone and then telling us that with this album, Another Side Of Bob Dylan, the artist had moved on and matured, leaving protest music behind him for good. I felt vaguely cheated. So it had all scarpered already, before I'd even got my denim cap.

Nobody in popular music has been measured in such a relentlessly chronological fashion as Dylan. Every review harks back to the last album. Ever since 1964 somebody somewhere has been wistfully referring to the "Dylan of old". Some said it was all over before he'd made his first record. And still people are enquiring where he's been and where he's going as if Bob Dylan has a list of tasks to discharge in his lifetime and we're worried that he might not get them all done.

"I don't know if I'll still be doing this in twenty years time. Twenty years ago I couldn't have imagined myself still doing it now. Actually I could if you don't think in terms of time. I try not to think in terms of time; years, minutes, hours and all that sort of thing. It's destructive for me to do that."

In actual fact, when people in the music business talk about time, what they're actually discussing is fashion. Pop stars aspire, above all things, to stay contemporary. It's this very prospect that Bob Dylan views with the most horror. Talking to him about the vicissitudes of the British music scene is like trying to explain the tax system of a distant planet. He doesn't understand and he doesn't care to either.

Bob Dylan reckons the proudest achievement of his entire career was to introduce the name of Woody Guthrie to a wider audience. He says, what the hell, if he were to remake Highway 61 tomorrow nobody would recognise it. And what if they did? What would they say then? What's a simple folk singer to do?

If there does need to be an argument for Bob Dylan it was provided last year by Biograph, an impeccably compiled and annotated five record box set that put All Along The Watchtower next to Solid Rock, Every Grain Of Sand next to Visions Of Johanna, and Caribbean Wind next to Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window? It proved that there was a singer who'd always lived by his own lights, more concerned with the mystery of a moment than the need to make a statement; funnier, acuter, more spiritual and more musically sophisticated than most of us had ever guessed. And there wasn't a single song among the 52 recordings that sounded even remotely dated. Needless to say Dylan denies having any part of it: "I didn't put it together and I haven't been very excited about it."

Instead he's spent the last year or so recording in studios all over the world with a bewildering variety of musicians and then shelving most of the results, boxing to keep fit and then smoking two packs of Kools a day to achieve the opposite effect, visiting Moscow at the invitation of the Soviet Writers' Union and then professing to be perplexed with his experience: "To tell you the truth I didn't understand too much of it because I didn't understand the languages too well. The peculiar thing was there wasn't anybody at this particular poetry reading that I figured bad even heard of me a little bit."

There was, however, an invitation to return with his guitar: "They said, don't do what Elton John did. He played 3,000 seat hails and the only people who got in to see him were bureaucratic people and there are a lot of bureaucrats there. It's really spooky."

What about the current squabbles between America and Russia?

"I don't know why America has got this problem with Russia because didn't the Russians finance the American Revolution? I'm sure they did. Who else would have? They finance revolutions all over the world, right? They did it then too. I think we ought to be grateful to them rather than trying to fucking blow them off the planet. But that's just my opinion and I'm not running for nothing."

Surely somebody ought to run for office?

"I don't know if there needs to be any office."

What about your fellow entertainer, the one in the White House?

"I don't know. I've seen a lot of Presidents come and go. I like the King and Queen idea. I like the idea of somebody..."

"... somebody you can trust?"

"Yes," he laughs. "Somebody you can look up to."

A queue is building up in the corridor. There are familiar raddled Manhattan faces like Andy Warhol and Ric Ocasek alongside the newer Hollywood generation represented by Timothy Hutton, Debra Winger and Maria McKee. Judy Collins, who hit Greenwich Village at the same time as Dylan, is there, looking faintly matronly and talking about Farm Aid II and "the movement" as if it were still 1962. She is charming, well-mannered and completely lacking in the mystique that helped her old friend "Bobby" make it to where the air is rare. Everybody – Tom Petty, Ronnie Wood, even Dylan's girlfriend Carole Childs – waits to be admitted to the presence. They all have one thing in common – they're all scared of him.

BACK AT THE SPEAKEASY the party is in full swing. Some misguided soul has embarked on an ill-advised version of When The Ship Comes In and the crowd up by the bar are making their own entertainment.

"Goddamn, you'll never guess who's in the bathroom!"

"The legendary Bob Dylan?"

"How'd you know?"

"Excuse me. I'd like three Heinekens and a gin and tonic for the Frewheelin' Bob Dylan..."

"Hey mister. Did anybody ever tell you you didn't look a bit like the enigmatic Bob Dylan?"

"Could you call a cab for the spokesman of a generation?"

August 1986
Sam Shepard Interview, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 731-742

Published in Esquire, July 1987 and commonly known as the "Esquire Playlet". Although in play form, there is no doubt that this interview between Sam Shepard (SS) and Bob Dylan took place and is reported as it actually happened. The interview / play is set in August 1986 shortly after the Paso Robles concert.

TRUE DYLAN
A ONE-ACT PLAY, AS IT REALLY HAPPENED ONE AFTERNOON IN CALIFORNIA

SCENE: IN THE DARK, a Jimmy Yancey piano solo is heard very softly, floating in the background. Soft, blue, foggy light creeps in, extreme upstage, revealing a large, weathered brick patio bordered by shaggy grass upstage and opening out to a distant view of the Pacific Ocean. The distant rhythmic splashing of waves is heard underneath the piano music and continues throughout the play, always in the background. The only set piece onstage is a round redwood table with a big yellow umbrella stuck in the middle of it and two redwood benches set across from each other at the table. The table and benches are set down left (from the actors' point of view).

As the light keeps rising, a short, skinny guy named Bob is seen center stage dressed in nothing but a pair of light-green boxer shorts. His arms are clasped across his chest with each hand gripping the opposite shoulder, as though warding off the cold. He turns in a slow circle to his right and then repeats the circle to the left, looking out to the ocean as his gaze passes it. He stops, facing audience, covers his face with both hands, then rubs his eyes and draws his hands slowly down his cheeks to his chin. His mouth drops open and his head slowly drops back on his shoulders to stare at the sky. He holds that position. Piano music stops abruptly. Sam, a tall, skinny guy dressed in jeans and a T-shirt, carrying a tape recorder, several notebooks, and a six pack of beer, enters from right. He stops. Bob drops his hands and stares at Sam.
Pause.
Sound of distant waves continues.

SS: Ready?
BD: Yeah. I just gotta make a couple phone calls first.

[Bob moves toward stage right, then stops]

BD: Oh, you know where I just was?
SS: Where?
BD: Paso Robles. You know, on that highway where James Dean got killed?
SS: Oh yeah?
BD: I was there at the spot. On the spot. A windy kinda place.
SS: They've got a statue or monument to him in that town, don't they?
BD: Yeah, but I was on the curve where he had the accident. Outsida town. And this place is incredible. I mean the place where he died is as powerful as the place he lived.
SS: Nebraska?
BD: Where'd he live?
SS: He came from the farm, didn't he? Somewhere.

BD: Yeah, Iowa or Indiana. I forget. But this place up there has this kind of aura about it. It's on this kind of broad expanse of land. It's like that place made James Dean who he is. If he hadn't't've died there he wouldn't't've been James Dean.
SS: Hm.

[Bob moves as though to exit stage right again, but stops again.]

BD: You know what Elvis said? He said that if James Dean had sang he'd've been Ricky Nelson.
SS: Is that right?
BD: Yeah. [pause] You need anything?
SS: Nope.
BD: You brought some beer?
SS: Yeah.
BD: I just gotta make a couple phone calls.
SS: Good.

[Bob exits stage right as Sam moves down left toward table. Just as Bob exits, the sound of screeching tires and a loud car crash comes from off right. Sam pays no attention, but goes about setting tape recorder, beer, and notebooks on table. Bob re-enters from right but with no reaction to car-crash sounds.]

BD: Who was playin' that music before?
SS: What music?
BD: That piano music.
SS: I dunno.
BD: Hm.
SS: "If James Dean sang he'd've been Ricky Nelson?" Elvis said that?
BD: Yeah. Poor ol' Ricky. I wish he was here with us today. I wonder if anyone ever told him, when he was alive, how great he was. I mean like the rock n' roll critics.
SS: You got me.
BD: You know, Emilio Fernandez used to shoot the critics that didn't like his movies. At parties.

[Bob exits stage right. Sam sits on bench facing stage right, pulls out a cassette tape and sticks it in recorder, punches a button, and the same Jimmy Yancey tune is heard coming from the machine itself. Only a snatch is heard before Bob's voice comes from offstage right, speaking on the phone. As soon as Bob's voice is heard, Sam shuts the recorder off and starts leafing through his notebook, scribbling in them now and then.]

BD: [off right] Maria? Listen, what's that thing gonna be like tonight? [pause] Yeah. There gonna be a lotta people there? [pause] Well, that's what I'm tryin' to figure out. [pause] Yeah. I don't know. How many people you think there'll be? [pause] Okay, well look, I got somebody here so. [Pause] Yeah, I know. Yeah, well, I seen their act before. Yeah, I seen it. I seen it in St. Louis. Yeah. [Pause] I dunno – '59 or '60, somethin' like that. [laughs, pause] I was around. I been around a long time. I can't count anymore. Okay, look, I'll talk to you later and see what's goin' on. [pause] Okay. Bye.

[Bob hangs up offstage. Sam looks in that direction, then returns to his notebook, cracks open a can of beer, and drinks.]

BD: [off right] Sam, what's this thing supposed to be about anyway?
SS: I dunno.

BD: [off] Are we supposed to have a theme?
SS: I got a buncha questions here.
BD: [off] You brought questions?
SS: Yeah.
BD: How many questions?
SS: Couple.
BD: What if I don't have the answers?
SS: Make it up.
BD: Okay, so ask me a question.
SS: [quickly putting a cassette in recorder] Okay, wait a second. I gotta see if this thing is working.
BD: You got a tape?
SS: [punching RECORD button] Yeah. Okay. All right. It's rolling.
BD: Ask me somethin'.
SS: Right [referring to notebooks] Let's see – okay -let's see now – okay – here we go – Do you have any ideas about angels? Do you ever think about angels?
BD: That's the first question?
SS: You want me to start with something else?
BD: [still off] No, that's okay. Angels. Yeah, now, angels now – what is it? [Pause] Oh – the pope says this about angels – he says they exist.
SS: Yeah? The pope?
BD: Yeah. And they're spiritual beings. That's what he says.
SS: Do you believe it?
BD: Yeah.
SS: Have you had any direct experience with angels?
BD: Yeah. Yeah, I have. I just gotta make one more phone call, all right?
SS: Yeah. [shuts tape off]
BD: You need anything?
SS: Naw, I'm fine.

[Sam drinks more beer, scribbles more notes. Pause. Bob's voice is heard again offstage right on phone. Sound of waves continues]

BD: [off right] Maria? Hi, it's me again [pause, laughs] Yeah, I just like the sound of your voice. Listen, what's the area code for Tulsa, do you know? [pause] Tulsa, yeah. [pause] All right. Good. [pause] Yeah, that's okay. I don't need it right away. [pause] Oh, ya did? [pause] Yeah? [pause] So, it's just a few people then? What's a few? [pause] That's more than a few. [laughs] Yeah, but, that's not what you'd call a few. [pause] Aw, I dunno. Look, I'll just have to think about it – see how the day goes – then I'll get back to you. [pause] Yeah, okay. Bye [hangs up].
SS: [after pause] You want me to come back? I could go out and come back if you want. Have some lunch.
BD: [off] Naw, you're here. Stay. I'm just gettin' some clothes on. I'll be right there. Ask me another question.
SS: Oh, okay – [punching recorder on] uh – let's see-[referring to notebook] okay – What was the first music you can remember listening to? Way back.
BD: [off] First music. First music?
SS: Yeah.
BD: [off] Live, ya mean? Live?
SS: Yeah. Live.
BD: [off] First music ever?
SS: Yeah.

[pause]

BD: [off] Polka music
SS: Really?

[Bob enters from right wearing a sleeveless T-shirt, black jeans, and motorcycle boots with brass buckles. He carries a beat-up old acoustic guitar strung around his neck with an old piece of rope. He continually fingers the neck of the guitar and keeps picking out little repetitive melody lines, short blues progressions, gospel chords – whatever comes into his mind. He keeps this up through all the dialogue, even when he's talking, rarely resting into complete silence.]

BD: [onstage now] Yeah, polka.
SS: [drinking beer] Where? Up in Hibbing?
BD: Yeah, Hibbing.
SS: Hibbing's near Duluth, right?
BD: Right.
SS: I love Duluth.
BD: Great town.
SS: That lake.
BD: Superior?
SS: Yeah. Tough town, too.
BD: [always moving, picking guitar] Especially when it freezes over. Indians come out. Fur trappers.
SS: Beaver.
BD: Yeah, beaver too. Loons.
SS: So you heard this polka music in what – dance halls or something?
BD: Yeah – no – taverns. Beer joints. They played it in all the taverns. You just walk down the street and hear that all the time. People'd come flyin' out into the street doin' the polka. Accordions would come flyin' out.
SS: Were they fighting or dancing'?
BD: Both, I guess. Mostly just having a good time. People from the old country.
SS: Polish?
BD: Some. I guess.
SS: Were they singing in Polish?
BD: They were singin' in somethin'. Swedish maybe. Some language. But you know how you don't need to know the language when it's music. You understand the music no matter what language it's in. Like when I went down and heard that Tex-Mex border music – that sounded like the same music to me even though the language was different. It all sounds the same to me.
SS: Three-quartertime.
BD: Yeah-waltz. I love to waltz.
SS: How old were you then?
BD: Aw, I dunno. Nine-ten.
SS: Did you feel like you were cut off back then?
BD: How d'ya mean?
SS: I mean being up in the Far North like that. In the boondocks.
BD: Nah, 'cause I didn't know anything else was go in' on. Why, did you?
SS: Yeah. I still do. [laughs]
BD: [sings a snatch and plays] Down in the boondocks / Down in the boondocks / Lord have mercy on a boy / From down In the boondocks.
SS: So you didn't have any big burning desire to get to New York or anything?
BD: Naw. The only reason I wanted to go to New York is 'cause James Dean had been there.

SS: So you really liked James Dean?
BD: Oh, yeah. Always did.
SS: How come?
BD: Same reason you like anybody. I guess. You see somethin' of yourself in them.
SS: Did you dream about music back then?
BD: I had lotsa dreams. Used to dream about things like Ava Gardner and Wild Bill Hickock. They were playin' cards, chasin' each other, and gettin' around. Sometimes I'd even be there in the dreams myself. Radio station dreams. You know how, when you're a kid, you stay up late in bed, listening to the radio, and you sort of dream off the radio into sleep. That's how you used to fall to sleep. That's when disc jockeys played whatever they felt like.
SS: I used to fall asleep listening to baseball.
BD: Yeah. Same thing. Just sorta dream off into the radio. Like you were inside the radio kinda.
SS: Yeah – I could see the diamond with the lights lit up and the green lawn of the outfield and the pitcher's eyes looking for the catcher's signals.
BD: But I don't know if you ever dream about music. How do you dream about music?
SS: Well, I mean, for instance, a song like Pledging My Love.
BD: Forever my darling.
SS: Yeah.
BD: What about it?
SS: Well, I used to dream myself into that kind of a song.
BD: Really? I didn't think you were that romantic.
SS: Oh yeah, I'm very romantic.
BD: So, you mean you kinda put yourself into the song when you were listening to it?
SS: Yeah. Put myself in the place of the singer.
BD: I see what you mean, [pause still moving and picking] Yeah, I guess I used to dream about music then. You have all different kinda dreams with music, though. I mean, sometimes I'd hear a guy sing a tune and I'd imagine the guy himself. What's the guy himself like? You know? Like Hank Williams or Buddy Holly or John Lee Hooker You'd hear a line like black snake moan or Mississippi Flood – you could see yourself waist-high in muddy water.
SS: Or maybe an image would come up from a line – like, I remember always seeing this image of my algebra teacher's scalp when I heard that Chuck Berry line, The teacher is teachin' the golden rule, from School Day.
BD: His scalp?
SS: Yeah, he had one of those Marine-style crew cuts where the scalp shows through on top. I still see his scalp when I hear that line.
BD: You don't hear that line much these days.
SS: Nope, [pause] So, you'd mainly imagine the singer when you heard the song?
BD: Yeah. A faceless singer. I'd fill in the face.
SS: Is that the reason you went to see Woody Guthrie when he was sick? You'd heard his music?
BD: Yeah. I heard his songs.
SS: Is there anybody in your life you wished you'd met and didn't?
BD: [quick, still playing] Yeah, Bob Marley.
SS: Really.
BD: Yeah. We were playin' in Waco, Texas, one time. And I missed him.
SS: That was pretty close to miss each other.
BD: Yeah. I wish I'd met him.

[pause]

SS: So you went to see Guthrie in the hospital.
BD: Uh-huh.
SS: And you were there at his death bed?
BD: Close.
SS: Were you with him up to where he passed?

[Long pause. Bob stops playing and thinks hard.]

BD: No.

[Bob immediately jumps back into playing and moving.]

SS: You spent a lotta time with him in the hospital?
BD: Yeah.
SS: Was he coherent?
BD: Yeah – no – he was coherent but he had no control over his reflexes. So he'd be...

[pause]

SS: What'd you talk about?
BD: Not too much. I never really did speak too much to him. He would call out the name of a song. A song he wrote that he wanted to hear, and I knew all his songs.
SS: So you played 'em to him?
BD: Yeah.
SS: Did you ask him anything?
BD: No, I mean there was nothin' to ask him. What're you gonna ask him? He wasn't the kinda guy you asked questions to.

[pause]

SS: So you just kinda sat with him for days.
BD: Yeah – I'd go out there. You had to leave at 5:00. It was in Greystone – Greypark or Greystone – it's in New Jersey. Out somewhere there. Bus went there. Greyhound bus. From the Forty-second Street terminal. You'd go there and you'd get off and you walked up the hill to the gates. Actually it was a pretty foreboding place.
SS: How old were you?

[Bob stops still. Stops picking. Thinks.]

BD: How old was I? [pause] I don't know. Nineteen, I guess.
SS: Nineteen. And what kinda stuff were you listening to back then?
BD: Oh, Bill Monroe, New Lost City Ramblers, Big Mama Thornton. People like that. Peggy Seeger. Jean Ritchie.
SS: Hank Snow?
BD: I'd always listened to Hank Snow.
SS: At that time were you fishin' around for a form?
BD: Well, you can't catch fish ' les you trow de line, mon.
SS: This is true.
BD: Naw, I've always been real content with the old forms. I know my place by now.
SS: So you feel like you know who you are?
BD: Well, you always know who you are. I just don't know who I'm gonna become.

[Pause. Bob keeps movin' and picking.]

BD: Did we ever see each other back then?
SS: When?
BD: When we were nineteen.
SS: I saw you one time on the corner of Sixth Avenue and Houston Street.
BD: What year?
SS: Musta been '66, '67. Somethin' like that. You were wearin' a navy-blue pea jacket and tennis shoes.
BD: Yeah, that musta been me. Naw, this was earlier than that. I was listenin' to all them records on Stinson label and Folkways.
SS: Stinson?
BD: Yeah. Sonny Terry, Brownie McGhee. Almanac Singers.
SS: Almanac Singers?
BD: Yeah.
SS: What about gospel?
BD: I always listened to gospel music. Dixie Hummingbirds, Highway QC's, Five Blind Boys, and, of course, the Staple Singers.
SS: What about Skip James or Joseph Spence?
BD: Yeah. Bahama mama. [pause] Skip James. Once there was a Skip James. Elmore James.
SS: Rather be buried in some old Cypress grove.
BD: So my evil spirit can grab that greyhound bus and ride.
SS: I'd rather sleep in some old hollow log than have a bad woman you can't control.
BD: Now, what was it he died of?
SS: Skip James?
BD: Yeah.
SS: Cancer of the balls.
BD: What?!
SS: Yeah. Cancer of the balls. He refused to go to any white doctors 'cause he was afraid they'd cut his nuts off.
BD: Don't blame him one bit.

[Phone rings off right. Bob exits off right, leaving Sam alone. Sam turns off tape then rewinds it a short ways and plays it back. Again, the Jimmy Yancey piano music comes from recorder. No voices As Bob's voice is heard off right on phone. Sam keeps rewinding tape, playing it back in short snatches, trying to find their voices, but all that comes out is the piano music]

BD: [off right] Four oh five? Four oh five. You're sure? [pause] I dunno. Four oh five sounds like Oklahoma City. I can't remember. [pause] All right. [pause] Yeah Four oh five. [pause] Naw, I think I'm gonna pass. [pause] I dunno. Sounds like too many record producers. [pause] Yeah. I'll just hang around here probably. [pause] Okay. All right. [pause] Yeah.

[Bob enters again, with guitar, carrying a glass of whiskey on ice. He crosses to table, sets glass down after taking a sip, then starts picking the guitar again. Sam is still trying to find their voices on the tape but gets only the piano music.]

SS: [fooling with tape] This is incredible.
BD: What.
SS: There's nothin' on here but piano music.
BD: [laughs, keeps picking] You mean our voices aren't on there?
SS: Listen.

[He lets tape play. Jimmy Yancey rolls out]

BD: [listens] That's the same music I was askin' you about.
SS: When?
BD: Before. When you first came. That's the music.
SS: Well, our voices ain't on here.
BD: Don't matter.
SS: Well, I can't remember all this stuff. How am I gonna remember all this stuff?
BD: Make it up.
SS: Well, there's certain things you can't make up.
BD: Like what?
SS: Certain turns of phrase.
BD: Try it again. It's gotta be on there. You had it on RECORD, right?
SS: Yeah.
BD: So it must be on there somewhere. You just gotta fool around with it.

[Sam rewinds, then plays tape. Their voices are heard this time, coming out of recorder].

BD: [from tape] Golden Rocket.
SS: [from tape] At that time were you fishin' around for a form?
BD: [from tape] Well you can't catch fish 'les you trow de line, mon.

[Sam shuts tape off]

BD: There. See. It was just hidin' out. [laughs]
SS: This is amazing. Where'd that music come from?
BD: Musta been on there already. Is it an old tape?
SS: No, I just bought it this morning. [Bob takes a sip of whiskey, sets glass down.]
BD: Angels.

[Sam punches RECORD button. They continue. Bob keeps moving and playing guitar.]

SS: Weird.
BD: Is it on now?
SS: Yeah. I guess.
BD: Okay. Fire away.
SS: Okay. Let's see. [referring to notebook] Do you think it's possible to have a pact with someone?
BD: A pact? Yeah. I know that's possible. I mean you should have a pact with someone. That presents a small problem for me, though – for instance, how many people can you have a pact with? And how many at the same time?
SS: Not too many. How about women?
BD: Nah, I don't know anything about women.
SS: How 'bout waitresses?
BD: Well, it seems to me that waitresses are gettin' younger and younger these days. Some of 'em look like babies.
SS: So, you don't have much hope for women?
BD: On the contrary. Women are the only hope. I think they're a lot more stable than men. Only trouble with women is they let things go on too long.
SS: What things?
BD: The whole Western sense of reality. Sometimes women have a tendency to be too lenient. Like a kid can go down and bust some old man in the head, rob a buncha old ladies, burglarize his brother's joint, and blow up a city block, and his momma will still come down and cry over him.

SS: Yeah, but that's just nature, isn't it? The nature of being a mother.

BD: Yeah, I guess so. Nature.

SS: Have you ever felt like a couple?

BD: A couple? You mean two? Yeah. All the time. Sometimes I feel like ten couples.

SS: I mean like you're a past of another person. Like you belong. That other person carries something of you around with them and visee-versee.

BD: Visee-versee?

SS: Yeah.

BD: Yeah. Sure. A couple. Sure. I've felt like that. Absolutely. Look – listen to this: [sings and plays] You must learn to leave the table when love is no longer being served/Just show them all that you are able/Just get up and leave without saying a word

SS: Who wrote that?

BD: You got me. Roy Orbison or somebody. I dunno.

SS: Roy Orbison?

BD: Naw. I dunno. Good lyric.

SS: Yeah. [writing a note] You must learn to leave the table...

BD: I mean you gravitate toward people who've got somethin' to give you and maybe you've got somethin' that they need.

SS: Yeah, right.

BD: And then maybe one day you wake up and see that they're not givin' it to you anymore. Maybe that's the way it is.

SS: But maybe you're not, either.

BD: Yeah. Maybe you haven't been givin' it to 'em for years. Maybe the rhythm's off.

SS: You know, I've heard this theory that women are rhythmically different from men. By nature.

BD: Oh yeah? I'll drink to that.

SS: Yeah. That the female rhythm is a side to side, horizontal movement and the male rhythm is vertical – up and down.

BD: You mean sorta like a flying horse?

SS: Yeah. Sorta.

BD: But then the two come together, don't they?

SS: Right.

BD: So they become one rhythm then.

SS: Yeah.

BD: So there's no such a thing as "sides" in the long run. It's all the same.

SS: It's just a theory.

BD: Yeah. Well, you can make a theory outta anything, I suppose.

SS: Do you feel those two different kinds of rhythms in you?

BD: Yeah, sure. We all do. There's that shaky, side-to-side thing and the jerky, up-and-down one. But they're a part of each other. One can 't do without the other. Like God and the Devil.

SS: Did you always feel those two parts?

BD: Yeah. Always. Like you feel the lie and the truth. At the same time, sometimes. Both, together. Like remember in Giant...

SS: The movie?

BD: Yeah. That last scene in Giant. You know that scene where Jett Rink stumbles all over himself across the table.

SS: Yeah.

BD: Well, I never did like that scene. Always felt like there was somethin' phony about it. Didn't quite ring true. Always bothered me. Like there was a lie hiding in there somewhere, but I couldn't quite put my finger on it.

SS: Yeah, I never did either. You mean where he's drunk and alone in the convention hall or whatever it was?

BD: Yeah. You know why that was? Why it felt phony?

SS: The makeup. All that gray in his hair?

BD: No, no. I wish it was the makeup. Turns out Nick Adams, an actor at that time, who was a friend of James Dean's, he overdubbed that speech because James Dean had died by that time.

SS: Is that right?

BD: Yeah. And that makes perfect sense because that don't ring true. The end of that movie. But that's what I mean – the lie and the truth, like that.

[pause]

SS: Well, what happened to his voice?

BD: Whaddya mean?

SS: I mean what happened to James Dean's original voice on the track? They must've had his voice track if they had the film on him.

BD: I dunno. Maybe it was messed up or something.

SS: Maybe it disappeared.

BD: Maybe. Just vanished. I dunno.

[Again, the sound of screeching brakes and car crash, off right. Neither of the characters pays any attention. Long pause as Bob moves and picks guitar. Sam makes notes.]

BD: Sometimes I wonder why James Dean was great. Because – was he great or was everybody around him great?

SS: No, he was great.

BD: You think so?

SS: Yeah. I mean, remember the scene in Rebel Without A Cause with Sal Mineo on the steps of the courthouse? Where he gets shot.

BD: Plato.

SS: Yeah, and he's holding Plato in his arms, and in the other hand he's got the bullets.

BD: Yeah.

SS: What was it he says? "They're not real bullets" or – no – what was it?

BD: "I've got the bullets!"

SS: Right. [suddenly screaming with his arm outstretched in imitation of James Dean] "I've got the bullets!" [back to normal voice] I mean, that's spectacular acting. Where do you see that kind of acting these days?

BD: Nowhere. He didn't come up overnight either. I mean he really studied whatever it was he was about.

SS: I guess.

BD: Well, why do you suppose – I mean what was it that he did that was so different? For instance, in that scene with the bullets. What made that scene so incredible?

SS: It was this pure kind of expression.

BD: Of what?

SS: Of an emotion. But it went beyond the emotion into another territory. Like most actors in that scene would express nothing but self-pity, but he put across a true remorse.

BD: Remorse?

SS: Yeah. For mankind. A pity for us all. This wasted life. This dumb death of an innocent kid. The death of the innocent.

BD: So he actually did have a cause then?

SS: I don't know.

BD: "Rebel with a Cause." See, that's the devil's work.

SS: What?

BD: Words have lost their meaning. Like rebel. Like cause. Like love. They mean a million different things.

SS: Like Hank Williams?

BD: Naw, you can never change the meaning of Hank Williams. That's here to stay. Nobody'll ever change that.

SS: Did you used to listen to him a lot?

BD: Overload. Who can you listen to if you can't listen to Hank?

SS: Did he mean the same thing to you as James Dean?

BD: Yeah, but in different ways. They both told the truth.

SS: They both died in cars.

BD: Yeah.

SS: A Cadillac and a Porsche.

BD: He was on his way to Ohio, I think. Some gig in Ohio.

SS: I saw the car he died in. Cadillac coupe, convertible. I looked in the back seat of that car and this overwhelming sense of loneliness seized me by the throat. It was almost unbearable. I couldn't look very long. I had to turn away.

BD: Maybe you shouldn'ta looked at all.

SS: Maybe. [Pause] Are you superstitious?

BD: Naw.

SS: You had a crash, right? A motorcycle.

BD: Oh, yeah. Way back. Triumph 500.

SS: What happened?

BD: I couldn't handle it. I was dumbstruck.

SS: How do you mean ?

BD: I just wasn't ready for it. It was real early in the morning on top of a hill near Woodstock. I can't even remember exactly how it happened. I was blinded by the sun for a second. This big orange sun was comin' up. I was driving right straight into the sun, and I looked up into it even though I remember someone telling me a long time ago when I was a kid never to look straight at the sun 'cause you'll get blinded. I forget who told me that. My dad or an uncle or somebody. Somebody in the family, I always believed that must be true or else why would an adult tell you something like that. And I never did look directly at the sun when I was a kid, but this time, for some reason, I just happened to look up right smack into the sun with both eyes and, sure enough, I went blind for a second and I kind of panicked or something. I stomped down on the brake and the rear wheel locked up on me and I went flyin'.

SS: Were you out?

BD: Yeah. Out cold.

SS: Who found you?

BD: Sara. She was followin' me in a car. She picked me up. Spent a week in the hospital, then they moved me to this doctor's house in town. In his attic. Had a bed up there in the attic with a window lookin' out. Sara stayed there with me. I just remember how bad I wanted to see my kids. I started thinkin' about the short life of trouble. How short life is. I'd just lay there listenin ' to birds chirping. Kids playing in the neighbor's yard or rain falling by the window. I realized how much I'd missed. Then I'd hear the fire engine roar, and I could feel the steady thrust of death that had been constantly looking over its shoulder at me. [pause] Then I'd just go back to sleep.

[Phone rings off right. Bob turns and look in that direction but doesn't move toward it. He stops playing guitar. Phone keeps ringing. He just stares off right. Lights begin to fade very slowly. Bob stays still, staring off right. Sam stops recorder, then rewinds and punches PLAY button. The Jimmy Yancey music fills the room, joining the sound of waves. Lights keep dimming to black. The phone keeps ringing. The waves keep crashing. Jimmy Yancey keeps playing in the dark.]

17 August 1986
National Film Theatre, Dylan-Marquand chat, London, England

Source: Circulating tape

Richard Marquand (RM) meets Bob Dylan (BD) in front of the National Film Theatre in London where both are about to have a press conference.

RM: Hey, Bob, how are you doing?
BD: Okay, all right.
RM: I've seen Jack there.
BD: Huh?
RM: I've seen Jack there.
BD: No… okay.

17 August 1986
Hearts Of Fire Press Conference, London, England

Source: the Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 931-937.

Dylan, Fiona Flanagan (FF) and Rupert Everett (RE) face the press at the National Film Theatre in London on August 17 1986, for discussions on their upcoming film Hearts Of Fire produced by Richard Marquand (RM). Identifiable among the questioners are Philip Norman (PN) and John Bauldie (JB). This has been taken from the circulating tape.

RM: This film really is a film about stardom. It's a film about whether you can handle stardom when the hot light actually comes to shine on you. Can you, in fact, deal with your dream when it becomes reality? And it's also a love story. We set up an incredibly hot triangle of forces between the two men who are basically vying for various reasons in... for the favours of this young, rather talented, American girl called Molly McGuire when she comes to this country. Incidentally, it is, in fact, set in the world, the contemporary world of music so that, in fact, there is a lot of music within the film but it's all integral and organic to the story.

Bob, you've directed a film yourself, Renaldo & Clara, and you're not very well known for singing or speaking other people's words. Why did you decide to commit to this film?

BD: Well, it was just, you know, the right time, right place, right words.

The right words? OK!

Questions to Marquand, Fiona, Everett

PN: I'm Philip Norman from the Sunday Times and I'd like to know why one of the biggest poets and musicians of this century feels he has to play someone who's a retired star. Why isn't he a performing star, as he is, such a great star? Why is he bothering?

RM: That's a nice question.

BD: Well, it's just a movie...

PN: I want to know more.

BD: It's just a movie. You know.

PN: Why aren't you writing poetry? Why aren't you doing the things you're really great at?

BD: Excuse me?

PN: Why aren't you writing poetry and doing the things you're really best at?

BD: Well, I do! But I'm just taking some time off here, you know, getting into something a little different.

PN: Does that mean you're relaxing?

BD: Yeah.

PN: So you're not going to be trying?

BD: Excuse me?

PN: So that means you're not going to be trying?!?

RM: That's leading the witness.

BD: Oh no, no, I'm gonna be trying very much.

Bob Dylan's written four songs for this movie. Can he tell us anything about those, please?

BD: Well, I haven't written those songs just yet (laughter).

Well, they tell us that you have.

BD: I'm about to... (laughter)

What are they going to be about?
BD: They're gonna be about the movie.
Are they going to be protest songs?
BD: I hope so, yeah, (laughter) if Richard allows them to be.
Protesting about what?
BD: Protesting about the, well, elements in the movie, you know. You have to see the movie.
PN: You seem very uncertain, Mr. Dylan. Do you know a great deal about this movie yet?
FF: It's ten thirty in the morning!
BD: Yeah. I know enough about the movie. I didn't write the movie though, you know. A lot of the questions you maybe want to ask the writer.
PN: Nobody's interested in anybody but you.
BD: What?
PN: Nobody's interested in anybody but you, in this hall.
BD: Ah...

questions to Everett and Marquand

I'm from the Guardian. Can I ask Bob Dylan, if he says it's the right place as well as being the right time, is that place England? What do you think of England since you were last here? Do you like England?
BD: Oh, yeah, I love England.
What are your thoughts on this country at the moment?
BD: Well, I just got here yesterday, haven't been sleeping since then.
Are you looking forward to working here?
BD: Yeah.
You took your name from Dylan Thomas. Have you ever been back to Wales? I see you're going back there now. Are you still interested in Dylan Thomas?
BD: Oh, yeah.
Will you be making a trip back to his village, to where he was born and wrote?
RM: We're gonna be very close (Marquand whispers to BD).
BD: We're gonna be very close. (with a loud laugh)
How were you persuaded to do this film with Mr Marquand? What sort of bargaining chips did he use?
BD: I don't have any bargaining chips.
But why did this film stand out as opposed to any other?
BD: Well, you know, I'm not really doing nothing right now. Seemed like a good thing to do.
What about you Richard, how hard did you pursue him?
RM: I don't think I really pursued you Bob, did I?
BD: I don't think so.
RM: I heard that he was interested and we turned up at the house and we had an afternoon together and we seemed to like each other.
(to BD:) Did you like me?
BD: Yeah. I liked you? We drank a lot.
RM: That helped.
BD: After that...

In the words of Billy Parker, it says here you say: "You wake up, you're a star! But there ain't nothing to you no more. You're empty." Is that a sentiment that you would agree with?
BD: Some stars are like that, yeah.
Are you?
BD: No, I'm not like that, but I'm playing another character who is like that. I'm getting into my character right now! (laughter, applause)

Can you tell us what it is you find fascinating with this character?

BD: Well, he's a very self-made person, you know. Nobody ever gave him anything. He had to take it all.

PN: Why didn't you write the script yourself?

BD: I couldn't have written a script like this. This is beyond me.

PN: I don't think it is.

BD: (laughs)

PN: Why are you so modest?

BD: (laughs more)

PN: Why are you pretending to be inadequate? You're one of the great writers of this age.

BD: Well, thank you. thank you!

PN: Why don't you write a script yourself?

BD: I don't know. I'm just trying something different right now, you know.

Questions to Fiona & to Marquand about financing and distribution.

Could I ask Bob, are they going to give you any time off when they're doing the film, so you could sneak off and play, and if you're not, when are we going to see you play next?

BD: I don't know.

When are we going to see you play next?

BD: We've just finished a tour, so maybe sometime in a couple of years.

What are your plans after this film, Bob?

BD: Oh, just maybe drift around. Then we're goin' on another tour. Then we may be touring again.

PN: Are you easily bored, Mr. Dylan?

BD: I'm never bored!!

PN: Have you any notion of how bored you're gonna be doing this picture?

BD: Well... (disgusted) maybe you'll be around. (laughter)

This film is about stardom and how to handle stardom. Will you be drawing on your own experience on how to handle it?

BD: No, not really, you know. I don't consider myself a big star, other people do.

You are a poet and a singer and you are taking on the role of an actor which is, by its very nature a very different kind of role. How are you gonna handle that?

BD: Ah, I'll find some way.

inaudible comment... could be playing a very expressive role.

BD: Oh, I'll figure it out.

PN: Can I ask why you want to be an actor?

BD: I just want to see what it's like.

PN: But you've seen what it's like before.

BD: I wanna see it again (laughs)

PN: It obviously sickened you. It obviously put you off, because you haven't done it for ten or twelve years.

BD: Well, we'll see.

Is this the first time that you have to follow a script?

BD: No, I think I had to do it once before.

In Pat Garret and Billy The Kid was it more of an improvisation... you improvised the part or did you follow a script?

BD: Well, yeah, you know, we used to do TV shows where I used to have to follow a script.

A big thing in America is the music. How does this go along with the Bob Dylan protest songs of the sixties that you're apparently gonna be writing and singing in this film?

BD: I don't know.
You feel good about America at the moment?
BD: I've always felt good about America! Yeah. America's got big you know. It's not like... it's like there's all kinds of different parts to it, you know.
The parts that you used to write about, you felt very bitter about, very contemptuous about.... and you were very funny about it. Why aren't you funny about Ronald Reagan?
BD: Well, I mean, what's so funny about that? (laughter)
It's a terrible joke on the world!
BD: Wow, it's all a joke!
...inaudible...
BD: That doesn't sound like an English accent to me, does it?

BD: Well, I don't know. The sixties are gone you know.
Do you regret the myth of the legends that surround you?
BD: No.
But you give that impression.
BD: Well, you know, impressions can be misleading.
Have you lost your enthusiasm?
BD: For what?
For life and for writing.
BD: Nah!

Mr. Dylan, you've talked today about doing this picture because it's different you've said. You, in the past, have been in charge of your own destiny as an artist. But recently we've seen you collaborate with Sam Shepard to write an epic song. Here you're going to collaborate with others to make a movie. Does this mean that you've seen a change in your own artistic career and you're now going to do more things that involve collaborating with others or being involved in other people's projects, rather than simply doing your own work?
BD: Yes. It's not so much other people's projects as, you know, finding somebody to work on the same project with.
How did the project with Sam Shepard evolve?
BD: Well, I don't know, we wrote a bunch of things a few years ago and...
If you were rewriting The Times They Are A-Changin' now, if you were writing it now, how would you write it different? Or would you?
BD: No, it would be the same.
Would you say the eighties are same as the sixties or is there something different to protest now?
BD: Well, you know, if something's good, it transcends that, whatever generation or date, you know, that you write it.

questions to Fiona, Everett & Marquand

Bob Dylan, a lot of musicians have made entirely successful attempts to cross over into films. What impressions have you got from acting by, for example, Mick Jagger and David Bowie.
BD: I like them all in the films and Chris, I don't know...
Have you studied their attempts in any way? Tried to learn anything from them? Do you watch many films? If so, what sort of films?
BD: I don't remember the last film I saw. Couldn't have been... must have been great, I don't know...

...(inaudible comment)... bought all the albums and now we're forty. Have you got anything to say to them?

BD: Just keep buying them! (laughter) Who's buying them?

What are you reading at present?

BD: I was reading a biography of Ulysses S. Grant.

He used to get very drunk I believe.

BD: Who did?

Ulysses S. Grant.

BD: Yeah, well I haven't got to that part yet (laughter)

What else about him is interesting to you? A drunken civil war general from the Northern side. I thought you sympathized with the South.

BD: Ah. I thought he was OK.

RM: The artists have to rehearse this afternoon so we've only got five minutes.

Can we just try to get one fact out of this press conference?

RM: Which fact would you like, sir?

How much longer are you going to continue making great music?

BD: Huh?

How much longer are you going to continue making great music?

BD: I don't know. Maybe a couple of weeks.

How much are they paying you to make this movie?

RM: I've already answered that. I can tell you it's a very reasonable sum.

BD: It's not enough. (laughs)

...(inaudible comment)... you did the last tour with Petty for the money. Can we take that to be a new philosophy of yours?

BD: I'm always doing tours for the money! I mean, you know, what's so new about that?

Where did you learn Belle Isle?

BD: Huh?

Where did you learn Belle Isle?

BD: Where? I don't know

JB: Bob, I was watching The Maltese Falcon recently, and it was full of lines that sounded as though you could have written them. Do you recall watching that film before you wrote the Empire Burlesque songs?

BD: Which film?

JB: The Maltese Falcon.

BD: I might have seen it. Were there lines from the movie in there?

JB: Lots of them.

BD: Were there really?

JB: Yes, Is it one of your favorite films, that?

BD: I don't remember. Which lines were they?

JB: Do you want a list?

interrupted by questions about shooting of the concert scenes

Although you are playing a retired rock star in the movie are you actually appearing live?

RM: You mean will the concerts be open to the public?

Well... (inaudible)

BD: Me, yeah.

RM: There are a series of concerts throughout the film going from small and up to large. They will not be open to the public. They will be controlled film events.

Are you deliberately elusive with the press or just shy?

BD: I don't know. (mumbling)

Can I just ask, are the Heartbreakers gonna be in the movie and are you gonna tour with the Heartbreakers again?

BD: I don't think they're in this movie.

Are you going to perform with them again or is that finished now?

BD: Maybe.

Questions to the others

What are your impression of the British press? (laughter)

BD: The press is, like, the same all over the world, you know. They're the same all over.

September 1986
Anti-drug message, Hearts of Fire locations, probably Wales

Source: Circulating tape

This is Bob Dylan. I'm in England right now working, so I can't be there tonight, but I'd like to say that I think Chabad is a worthy organization helping people in need. Helping to set them free from the misconceptions and devastation which is destroying their lives from within. Of course, this is a fierce battle, for those responsible for poisoning the minds and bodies of America's youth are reaping great profits. If you can help Chabad to help others who have fallen victims to the lies and deceits of those who are much more powerful, do so.

20 September 1986
Christopher Sykes interview #1, Colston Hall, Bristol

Source: Getting to Dylan, BBC Arena documentary

CS: Is there a particular scene in the film either as written or looking ahead that you think is specially significant?

BD: Not really. I don't even know the scenes in the script to tell you the truth, you know. (laughs) They're all good, I guess. But I'm a perfectionist maybe in other areas than movie making. It's helpful to work with these… some of these people that know so much more about it… Rupert… Some of these other people… Guys that play… (mumble) promoter… these guys are good, you know. So they just make you good.

26 September – 9 October 1986
Excerpt from "Venue" (Bristol) #115

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement, #6, pp. 17-18.

Only 2nd and 3rd paragraphs are copied below. The rest of this longish article brings no other direct quotes from Dylan.

Colston Hall Revisited

Last Thursday, Music Video West were producing a demo tape for a local band called Kick City when the telephone rang. The caller said that a client of his needed studio space urgently. On being told that there was no possibility of this at such short notice, he explained that his client was important but refused to reveal his identity.

At this point an American voice in the background was heard to say, "It's okay. You can tell the guy who I am." The name disclosed came as something of a shock to the man at MVW, who was understandably sceptical. By the time the client's credentials had been established, it was too late. He's changed his mind and had decided to blow the whole thing out. Music Video West had just turned down the spokesman for a generation.

30 September 1986
"Film '86", Electric Ballroom, Camden Town, London, England

Source: Circulating tape

The "Film '86" crew manages to get a lengthy interview with Richard Marquand and they ask Dylan for this very brief comment on his filming partner, Fiona Flanagan. Dylan is filmed in his trailer.

Q: In the film, Dylan co-stars with one Fiona who plays a fast rising musician. What dis he make of her?

BD: It was very easy to play opposite Fiona, because she is so good. I mean, she's one of the most dynamic performers I think I've ever really seen. She's very spontaneous and always wants the last word, you know. I think she's gonna go far doing anything she wants to do.

17/18 October 1986
Christopher Sykes Interview, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1069-1080.

During the filming for Hearts Of Fire in Canada, Dylan is interviewed on a number of occasions by Christopher Sykes from the BBC who is trying to put together a 'special' interview for the Omnibus program. The following is a transcript from the final program transmitted in the UK in September 1987. This session almost certainly took place on October 18, 1986 in Dylan's trailer on the set in Hamilton, Ontario. One of the other sessions was a 'dry run' interview which occurred a day earlier and this follows after the program transcript.

CS: One evening between scenes, in a kind of no man's land in the suburbs of Toronto, Dylan asked us into his trailer. He wasn't committing himself to an interview, proper, but said we could talk for a while and see how things went.

BD: We're just testing out here now, nothin' is for sure, we're just casting people here.

CS: We're casting a little scene. This is for our BBC documentary about the making of Hearts of Fire with special reference to Bob Dylan.

BD: Exactly!

CS: So tell... Actually. Bob...

BD: Wait a minute, wait a minute, just wait a second. I'll be right back...

Throughout the interview, Bob is sketching a picture of Sykes and there are many illusions to this picture and distractions because of it.

CS: How do you decide when to talk to people and when not to?
(Dylan laughs)

CS: I hope this isn't some horrible practical joke?

BD: Do you think I'm talking now?

CS: I don't know, maybe just playing around.
(Dylan laughs.)

CS: Why's it so amusing?

BD: I'm surprised you haven't really asked these questions of some other... er... like a Roger Daltrey, say, or Peter Townsend...

CS: Well, of course, I would.

BD: ...or Paul McCartney!

CS: If I'd been commissioned to make a movie that involved them, then I suppose I would be. I would be asking...

BD: You would have to, wouldn't you?

CS: Yeah.

BD: Well, you know, I'm not gonna say anything that you're gonna get any revelations about... It's not gonna happen.

CS: I'm saying, I'm not trying to do that. I hope you realize that...

BD: Could you grow your beard just a little bit more, er... like, next time? (referring to the sketch)

CS: Grow it?

BD: Yeah, grow it!

CS: I'd cut it off for you, you know that... So, you're not really doing anything you're telling us. It's just like...

BD: No. I'm trying to satisfy your need to probe into my private life and thoughts here in a way that's not going to embarrass me or... hopefully confound me... hopelessly. Hopefully not confound me. Okay, just press on...

CS: Could you tell me what you're doing?

BD: Huh?

CS: What are you doing?

BD: Well. I'm just gonna draw a... er... somethin' here. I'll show you what I'm gonna draw. Ordinarily I can draw... if it's good I'll show it to you, if not, forget it.

CS: And you talk while you're doing it? Because...

BD: Yeah, sure. I can talk while I'm doing it!

CS: ...the thing we were talking about earlier... I'm intrigued by this idea that your songs, a lot of them, are constructed like movies.

BD: My songs are?

CS: They have a very many things to say. Yeah. They are, like, compressed.

BD: Which ones?

CS: All Along The Watchtower, for example, I heard it by Hendrix first. I have to say... But something I really love is the song and I listen to totally different versions of it. It's like very tight visual imagery...

BD: Yeah.

CS: ...as though it's been written at enormous length and then had things stripped out of it, leaving only just these kind of key images and then sort of suggestions of sound and stuff in it. I suppose what I want to know is, when you write a song, am I right about you doing it like that?

BD: No.

CS: How do you...

BD: Many ways...

CS: They're stories with visual images. That's what I'm saying. Like the...

BD: I don't know whether they are... They are, whatever they are, to whoever is listening to them. Er... no. I don't do those things. I don't have any plan. I don't have any set way of writing songs.

CS: That's a very amusing idea.

BD: Huh?

CS: That's a very amusing idea.

BD: What, writing songs?

CS: No, drawing this picture.

BD: Wait till you see it! (laughing)

CS: Are you going to sign it?

BD: Am I gonna sign it? I may not even show it to you! Ha! Ha!

CS: I read this wonderful article once about Schubert...

BD: Yeah?

CS: ...and this guy was saying, I've never forgotten this, he said that listening to all these Schubert songs you have to think that he was connected to some kind of pipe down which all this stuff came.

BD: A pipe?

CS: Yeah, some sort of a pipe or conduit, you know. 'Cause he couldn't kind of grasp that this guy Schubert was writing all these songs himself.

BD: Yeah?

CS: The question was where did they kinda come from? He was saying that you could only really... he managed to write in a kind of way that chilled you a bit, you know? And he said you could only speculate on who or what the other end of the pipe was connected to. Now, I suppose, I want to know where all your songs come from.

BD: Well, I can't tell you that cause I'm not God, y'know? God only knows those things.

CS: Well, some people think... (laughing)... you are. I dunno.

BD: Well, (laughing) they said that about Eric Clapton too, didn't they?

CS: You just write them just like someone punches... ah...

BD: I just write 'em.

CS: ...rivet holes?

BD: ...just write 'em. I don't know. You know? I just write 'em cause nobody says you can't write 'em. Not least where I come from...

CS: The actual business and technical stuff of how you lay it out – there's plenty of people who know how to do that, but you know how to tell stories.

BD: Really?

CS: Well, you like to do stories in songs.

BD: Not really.

CS: No?

BD: I don't know how many stories I've written.

CS: Just some observations?

BD: Yeah, I wouldn't call them stories. Stories are things which have a beginning middle and end. My things are more like... er... short... er short attention span things that happens in a group of crowded people... that goes down... er... very quickly so... er... you, er... normally I wouldn't even notice it.

CS: I have to look at my list! I don't usually find it that difficult to speak to... to ask most people questions but someone of...

BD: Here's your list. I'll bet! (The list has been used by Bob for his drawing) Here's your list.

CS: Oh, right.

BD: ...Right here. Alright... This is fucked up here...

CS: You know...

BD: ...This is not right

CS: I mean, you know how people think you're some kind of shaman, don't they?

BD: Shaman?

CS: Yeah. Just a word. I mean, that has to want of a better word...

BD: Yeah? I don't know, man. I mean, I wish you'd tell some people that write... keep writin' me... I don't know what people think of me. I only know about what, you know, record companies say to you... you know and er... you know, managers, people like that... you know, people... that want you to do things... I only know, I only hear about that stuff.

CS: Can you just tell me something about this business, Bob, again, about what other people seem to want to do with you, and what you feel about that?

BD: It's not me! It's everybody, you know? Everyone's a puppet master. Nobody likes to control puppets and pull their strings without saying that. "I am nobody's puppet, nobody pulls my strings" You know? And er... I'm sorry. I just don't... er... I don't like that scene.

CS: You see, I think... Oh. I'm sorry...

BD: Let me see... Wait. I just got one more thing to do. But that's all... that's all...

CS: You see. I think that does mean that... You insist that everyone's more or less the same. I think you're extraordinarily special, that you manage to be nobody's puppet.

BD: Listen, I've come through good times and bad times. You know? So I'm not fooled by good times, bad times. Right now. Yeah, you're makin' a movie, you know? You're playin' some big tours... but I've seen the bottom too, you know? So er, you know... if you can work, you know, that's the most... all you can ask. In this day and age, you can't take that for granted. Just, to work is, is... er... to be able to work is, is what a person should strive after, you know?

CS: I think I know what you mean but a lot of people in England, watching our film... when they hear that, you know, where we've got a lot of unemployment...

BD: Yeah and it stinks too!

CS: ...they might think it's all very well for Bob Dylan to say that. I mean, he's got a whole lot of money and stuff!

BD: Whole lot of money?

CS: You don't mean money, do you?

BD: I don't mean money! I started out with no money. Don't tell 'em that! I don't want to hear about the money! I had less money than anybody I know, when I started out. I had no money! I mean, if you're talking about... er, you know... paper money... er... and, and, and money in the bank or value, wealth, er... what do you call... er... you know, possessions and all that stuff. I had nothing, you know? So, it's not like I went out and got into music to make money. There wasn't any money to be made in music when I was in... If you could just support yourself, you were doing good. There wasn't any money. It wasn't this big, big... er... billion dollar industry, that it is today. And people do go into it, er... just to make money because it's a... er... it's proved that you can make money in that field. But... er... that's a sad thing, you know? I guess... because it changes the quality of the... er... work that's being done and you can tell if you listen to the... you know, popular tastes of people. Er, what they've been given is a different thing than... er...

CS: Do you know, Bob, about the song...
(Bob holds up the sketch and an unknown female voice responds) That's good! That's very good!

CS: It looks extremely flattering! Can you say a bit more, Bob, about the sort or music that you say people are being fed out of this, what I suppose is this vast money-making machine?

BD: Well, it's going to... It's about to change... It's about to change... It's about to change... It will change. Yeah... er... y'know, machines are making most of the music now. Have you noticed that? Have you noticed that, that all songs sound the same? I mean. I don't know if you've noticed that... I mean, that, er, maybe you could be hearing one song, you know... that you could take the lyrics from another song and put it right on to, eh... because the rhythms are the same, and the drums are the same, and the machines can only do so much, you know. They can only, you know, make it sound different so many different kind of ways. So it doesn't sound different, sounds all the same. And er... that's good, for the industry, because a lot of people are, er... invent these machines and need, you know... and sell these machines plus it's also very good because a person... er... Now, the good things you can do with them is, er, you could... you could have your own little band, like a one man band, with these machines, you know what I mean? But that's not the point. The point really isn't to be a one man band unless you can play an instrument like a one man band, you know? I remember Roger McGuinn, years ago, used to take a tape recorder up on stage long before synthetic music became popular and he used to play the background track from one of his songs and he'd stand there and sing it! That was done... I think he was probably the first person to ever do that! But that type of music doesn't have any roots and it doesn't have any foundation to it, y'see, and, er, so...
Man. I really messed your hair up on one side here...
And then there's a lot of kids, all around, they just don't like it and so what they're doing is they're buying instruments and playing. But they don't listen to those records either. They're listening to the old records. So there's a lot of young groups, young kids that are playing music, which I see, which play the old style of music. And they're all kids now but in four or five years they won't be and, and that, that, that's all gonna turn around... all gonna turn around. That's what I see, anyway...

CS: Is that gonna be good?

BD: Oh yeah, yeah. Er... because, you know, there are certain rules and regulations to it. I mean, er... you just don't just sit down and write a song, you know what I mean. . There's a certain amount of learning you have to go through to get to that point.
And ah... not only living experience but, I mean, you also have to learn how to play an instrument. Some kinda... you know, you have to carry some kind of tune. I guess. So yeah, that is gonna be good. That is gonna be good. (long pause). I just said it would be!

CS: In the hotel I'm staying in, I'm in room 801, and in 802, I find that there's a girl called Sara Dylan.

BD: Really? Jesus!

CS: I had a drink with her and she tells me she's your sister.

BD: Uh, boy! What's she look like?

CS: She says that she looks very like you.

BD: I mean...

CS: I mean, she's dark and she's ten years younger than you and she has this extraordinary delusion.

BD: Well, there are people who follow me around, you know, and they have passports and they have driver's licenses and they all have Dylan as their name. Er, you know, there isn't... What can I do about that? I mean, I can't do nothing about that. They change their name on their birth certificate, and all that, you know? What are you asking me about? I don't know.

CS: I suppose because I found it slightly frightening. I mean, you know?

BD: Well, you should report her to the local constable or something. She's an impersonator. I guess, you know? I don't know.

CS: One does think about John Lennon getting shot and maybe you have to worry about something like that. Or what if you've made some kind of decision that you're not going to.

BD: What decision?

CS: Well. I mean you don't have sort of security people around you and so on, I mean, and you came... you apparently flew up to Toronto...

BD: Oh some... many times I have security people around me! Only you just can't see them, that's all! Nobody knows ever who's with me or who's not. I don't advertise who I come in with.

CS: But is that something that bothers you ever? I mean, the idea that because you are very famous, someone who thinks they love you might want to kill you?

BD: Well, that's always the case, isn't it? (laughs) Isn't that the way it always happens? Aren't you usually killed by the person who loves you the most? I don't know. I mean, Jesse James was, supposedly. I mean, some guy got in close to him, you know, who he thought was his good friend...

CS: What do you think of the drawing?

BD: Ah, I don't know. Bunch of things that I don't like about it, but I'll get it right. It's like, uh, I got enough love around me, you know? So I don't need no people's love. I don't need to go out to play to a crowd of twenty, thirty, fifty-thousand people for their love. Some performers have to, you know, but I don't. I got enough love, just er... in my immediate surroundings, so... so I don't care... I don't need er... Do you know what I'm talkin' about?

CS: I'm... listening... because I am fascinated by what you're talking about and so that would account for...

BD: Well, it accounts for why a lot of entertainers do what they do. Because they want the love of a... er... of another group of people, you know. I don't do it for love. I do it because I can do it and I think I can do it and I think I'm good at it, ya know? And that's all I do it for.

CS: Is that... does that explain why the other evening at that sort of mock concert, you didn't sort of say anything to the audience? You know, people in the press said well people turned up to this thing and why didn't Dylan just say hello?

BD: What was I supposed to say hello for? It doesn't have nothin' to do with me. I'm out there making a movie. I'm not there in no crowd! What? Are you serious?

CS: Yeah. I'm serious. That's what they said.

BD: Well, why didn't you tell 'em?

CS: No. I mean. I just read it in the paper. And that made me wonder. I thought, why didn't you say it? I would. If it were me I'd feel the pressure. I'd feel the pressure.

BD: Naw! I'd say...

CS: I'd feel the pressure.

BD: No, no matter what you say it's not enough, is it? You know if I coulda gone out there and said, "Hello everybody? How ya doin' out there?" And they'd say, "Play a song, Bob, play a song!" And I'd say. "Oh man. I don't feel like it right now." And then that would be in the press – Dylan didn't... er... Dylan was grumpy. He's moody. He's a recluse. He came out for a few minutes. He said hello to the audience and he went back into his trailer or something... into the seclusion of his own little kingdom. Which is what, you know, people would say. I'm just actually quoting you almost verbatim on something that has been said.

CS: So you say its always a losing situation.

BD: What?

CS: In terms of...

BD: Not for me! 'Cause I don't play that game. Ah, maybe I'm not done yet. Still got something I wanna do... I don't play that game. And you wouldn't either if you were in my shoes. You wouldn't play that game. People treat famous people all the same... doesn't matter what the person's famous for. You could be famous for... er... er... shooting of a President or something. You know what I mean? You're still famous. They put your name across all the newspapers. You're famous for somethin'. You could be a famous fashion designer, a famous movie star, or famous Wall Street executive – so depending on your degree of fame – you're just famous. People react to famous people, y'know? So if you talk to famous people – and I guess I'm one of them because I have a certain degree of notoriety and fame, umm -everybody just kinda copes with it in a different way. But really nobody seems to think it's what they went after, you know? Lot of people go after fame and money, but they're really after money. They don't really want the fame, you know? Because fame is the... er... you know, to walk down the street and... or to go somewhere, and have people... It's like when you look through a window... Say, you're passing a little pub or a little inn, and you look through the window and you see all the people eating, talking and carrying on. You watch outside the window, and you can see them all be very real with each other, as real as they're gonna be. Because when you walk into the room, it's over! You won't see them being real anymore. That's usual.

CS: That's you and not me!

BD: No, no, no. Me, and even if you're in a room, you'll notice that things have changed. Things have changed just because a person walks into a room that can be a focus point for everybody, you know? I don't know. Maybe that's got something to do with it. I really can't say. I don't pay any attention to it!

CS: Is it a drag then? No, you just said you don't pay any attention to it.

BD: No, I don't pay any attention to it! Just don't! Life is short, you know? And, what do most people want from me? They want your autograph. Nobody knows me and I don't know them! You know? They walk up and they think they know me because I've written some song that, er, happens to... er... bother them in a certain way and they can't get rid of it, you know, in their mind. That's got nothing to do with me! They still don't know me. And I still don't know them. So they walk, you know, up as if, ah, "Excuse me," you know, as if we're long lost brothers or sisters, or something! You know, that's kinda... you know. I think I could prove that in any court!

CS: You're very generous towards people, autograph hunters, aren't you? I mean. I noticed that, particularly at Bristol. I mean, you had to sign about sixty. You know. I mean you could choose not to do that.

BD: Well, sometimes, ah, it's easier to be polite than it is to be rude. Sometimes, the other way around.

CS: And how do you judge when? Which way...

BD: My instincts. There's a song we used to sing called Trust Yourself. Sort of like that... that was kinda about that... (Trust Yourself can be heard playing in the background.)

CS: I don't know that song.

BD Now, if you really want to make this documentary great, you'll go back and get a clip.

CS: You know we'll do it!

BD: Trust Yourself.

CS: Yes!

BD: You'll stick that in right there. (Holding up his finished sketch and a copy of Lyrics, he continues) See the similarities here? I'm not sure I'd show this to anybody actually.

CS: When you were jamming with the others the other night...

BD: I hope you're gonna give me a break here to get ready for my scene!

CS: Yeah. I'm just gonna... about to do that, thanks.

BD: Been talking too long (almost as an aside)

CS: Okay. Well look, well, thank you very much, Bob.

BD: Okay, I don't know if we answered any questions or not, but... (now referring to, the sketch) Wha'd'ya think?

CS: It looks very good.

BD: You oughta see it like that, you know (hanging the sketch on a cupboard). I think maybe I'll keep it in here for awhile, kinda remind me of you when you leave.

CS: You said, "People say I can't act, but they say I can't sing either."

BD: I said that?

CS: Yes.

BD: You sure it wasn't Rupert who said that? (laughs).

CS: Well, I'd like you to say it now.

BD: What?

CS: So this is my question to get you to say it: How do you rate your acting potential?

BD: My what?

CS: Your acting potential.

BD: What are we doing here?

CS: I just want you to say this line; that you've got to remember, this scripted line: "People say I can't act, but they say I can't sing either."

BD: Who said I can't act? Haha, I mean, who?

CS: You said it.

BD: Oh, gee. I don't remember saying that. Why would I say something like that?

CS: Can I ask you, what makes a good song?

BD: Melody. Rhythm. That stuff, I guess. But mostly it's sentiment. Whether you can identify with what the sentiment of the song is, what the song says, as a song. That's what makes a good song. Someone would say, "this is a good song," and someone else would say, "That's a good song". Whether it's true for anybody makes it a good... anything. You can't say that about a tree or a leaf or a vegetable though. You only say that about man-made things. Nobody ever judges God's creations, right? Nobody ever says, That tree looks prettier than that tree. There's no judgment in nature. Did you ever notice that?

CS: So how's it done, to make all these good songs?

BD: I don't know. I have no idea.

CS: Is writing songs a disciplined thing, like a job?

BD: No, no. Some people do work like that, I know what you mean. For me it's if I have enough time to concentrate. I need that. A lot of times I might think of something, but if I'm not in the right place to carry it through, it just won't get done. Won't happen. I don't really think of myself as a writer, actually. I mean, there are guys around who are trained as writers, to observe. I don't think of myself as a writer, I really don't. I write songs, y'know, but I just write the lyrics to those songs to sing. Sometimes the lyrics change before I get 'em into the studio to record them, and then when I get 'em out of the studio I'll make changes when I have to play them live. So they will change.

CS: Not only do you change the words to the songs when you sing them – I can understand that – but sometimes you change the treatment from performance to performance. You play around with it, so that it's not a fixed thing.

BD: I do, yeah, but I've just sort of done it out of necessity. Maybe I have a show on the road and I need to do songs, so I'm forced up to it. I'll do songs that I think are important to put in a particular place. You know, one day a ballad singer was someone who carried the news from town to town, or set himself up somewhere where he could play things to people who could understand them in a certain way. I don't know of any today who are still doing that. Now, things are a little bit more worldwide. Then, if there was a fire in one county, you might not even hear about it in the next county. Now, with communication being so widespread, everybody knows about everything no matter where it's going on – or they think they know about it. That's a whole other subject. I don't even think you really know about it anyway, even if you do see it on TV or hear it on the news, I still think you have no idea what's going on. If what you're seeing is even a replica of anything that really has happened, or is happening. I wonder about the time when all those guys, Mozart and Haydn and even Beethoven himself, and Strauss, Chopin, you know, those guys were the pop heroes of their day, but there must also have been ballad singers around -more so than today even – and they'd have been playing in all the drawing rooms of the court, for audiences of maybe six people, so the people never got to see them. I used to see street singers – I used to be one! I did it for two or three years, but I ran into people that had been doing it for twenty or thirty years, and boy, they knew how to handle a crowd, that's for sure.

CS: Do you know how to do that?

BD: Handle a crowd? Yeah, I can make enough noise to handle a crowd.

CS: You were talking about doing your songs differently in concerts...

BD: You know why that happens? It's because a lot of times my records were made... especially in the '70's... I took a lot of songs into the studio that I really wasn't that familiar with. I just had written them, so I don't know... and it depends on what musicians you have playing with you – like, what can they do, you know? And sometimes I've been in the studio with bands – just studio guys that have been put together – and you have to figure out which way this band's gonna play, especially if you want to do six songs in a session.

CS: You like to get it over and done with, don't you? You don't want to spend a year doing an album, like some of these other stars now do...

BD: I wouldn't mind spending a year on an album, I mean, if it was worth my while (laughs).

CS: Worth your while?

BD: If somebody said to me to try to do a certain thing that took a year or something like that. I don't know why you'd spend a year on an album. I guess you could go off to Rio for part of the time, y'know, record down there, and then maybe take a quick ride to Paris, record there for a couple of weeks. Ha, ha. I don't know how you'd spend a year on an album. How's it done? I don't know.

CS: To get it right?

BD: Well! That must be the reason! To get it right. I always figure it can always be more right, so you can always wonder about that. I know I have.

CS: Do you listen to your albums?

BD: No, I really don't. I overhear them sometimes when other people have 'em on, but I don't listen to them. I don't listen to anybody's albums really. Most records – new records- you buy, check them out, see what somebody's doing, but as for sitting down and needing to hear it, y'know, time and time again, throughout your day and night just to feel connected to something, I don't hear nothing around like that these days. I mean for me, you know. Other people may find that for them those songs do that.

CS: Do you have an idea about the way you'd like your album to be listened to – just coming out of radio or buses...?

BD: Yeah, well, look man, I gotta go, I'm out the door.

CS: But can we just keep this thing going a little bit. It's probably much more interesting to us than it is to you.

BD: I gotta eat though! I gotta see somebody.

CS: Do you know what I mean? That there might be a way in which you sort of imagine them being listened to?

BD: No, I don't. I don't. I don't know where that fits in to what we're talking about.

CS: I was looking through your lyrics. There aren't very many political songs in there.

BD: I don't know which of my songs was ever political.

CS: Masters Of War is.

BD: I don't know if even Masters Of War is a political song. Politics of what? If there is such a thing as politics, what is it politics of? Is it spiritual politics? Automotive politics? Governmental politics? What kind of politics? Where does this word come from, politics? Is this a Greek word or what? What does it actually mean? Everybody uses it all the time. I don't know what the fuck it means. Left, right, rebel. Some people are rebels. Let's see. Afghanistan are rebels, but they're OK. Nicaragua's got rebels and they're OK. Their rebels are all right. But in El Salvador the rebels are the bad guys. If you listen to that stuff you go crazy. You don't even know who you are any more. It don't make any sense to me. I don't see good guy, bad guy. It's that Dave Mason song, "There ain't no good guy, there ain't no bad guy, there's only you and me and we just disagree." True or what?

CS: We all have our favorite rebels I guess.

BD: Yeah! That must be it!

CS: Who do you admire?

BD: Who is there to admire now? Some world leader? Who? I could probably think of many people actually that I admire. There's a guy who works in a gas station in LA -old guy. I truly admire that guy.

CS: What's he done?

BD: What's he done? He helped me fix my carburetor once.

CS: You are serious, aren't you, about the gasman?

BD: Hmm.

CS: You're putting a lot of work and a lot of time into this film, and then you say you're not going to see it.

BD: Oh. I may see it. I might go see it. I don't know. I'm not sure about the date it's gonna open. (Laughs).

CS: You say it's a joy to work with Fiona, that she's got what it takes.

BD: I think so. I think she could be the next Joan Crawford. (laughs).

CS: I think I meant as a singer.

BD: I'm talking about acting. As a singer? She could be the next anybody. She don't have to be the next anybody; she could be the first one like her.

CS: What does it take?

BD: What do you think? What do you really think?

CS: Well, the trouble is I can't use my answer.

BD: Well, gimme an answer and I'll say it.

CS: Well, the kind of talent which is rather indefinable, and some kind of determination to use it despite feeling that it's terribly difficult and so on, and also despite all the pressures from other people to get you to do something else rather than doing that: to survive all the manipulation and negotiation that I suppose goes with people wanting to use this talent that you happen to have, to get what they want, which might not be the same as what you might want to be doing. That kind of thing, I suppose.

BD: Well!

CS: Do you make friends with these people you're working with? I'm kind of interested.

BD: (Laughs) You should work in Beverley Hills, man! You should have a little clinic! (Laughs). Charge people $500 for every 10 minutes.

CS: Like Prince's Dr Feelalright?

BD: Yeah!

CS: Do you like Prince's stuff?

BD: Prince? Yeah. Who don't like Prince? Well, I guess I could name a few! (Laughs) No, he's a fantastic guy, ain't he? He can do anything, can't he?

CS: Do you have any future movie plans?

BD: Yeah I do have plans to make a movie with Alan Rudolph next fall.

CS: With who?

BD: Alan Rudolph. He's a movie director. He's a bright guy, It's a complicated story, about a piano player who gets into trouble because of a good buddy of his, and then he winds up doing some book work for a woman whose husband has disappeared, marries her, then falls in love with her daughter. And the other guy finally shows up again and the movie comes to a screeching halt.

CS: So how do you decide which kind of a script attracts you? Or, why this one? Because I've got to tell you, when I read this script I just thought... well, as it turns out I can see it's all working, but when I first read the script, I've got to be honest, I didn't think it looked too good.

BD: Well, I'd heard that too, you know. I heard that But... I dunno. I guess it's better than it looks!

CS: Quite a bit of it's changed. You mentioned to me the other day that you're writing a novel.

BD: Nah, nah.

CS: Was that a joke?

BD: I started... You always like to think you're writing a novel. To write a novel you've got to be able to concentrate on it for a long period of time. I know people who've written 'em, and they just stick with 'em for a year or more maybe and live pretty cut off in the meantime. I don't know if I could do that because I tour and move around. Maybe someday. Maybe I'll have something to say.

CS: You like the names of places, don't you? Like Baton Rouge.

BD: Belfast! (laughs) Whitney Houston (laughs). Sounds like the name of a town, don't it? I love the sound of words, yeah.

CS: Sometimes you often use the phrase "who cares?" Obviously you care, deeply, about certain things – and I suppose I'd like to know what those are.

BD: I suppose you would!

CS: I suppose you're not going to tell me either, so I suppose I'll forget it...

10 November 1986
Juno Awards, CBC-TV, Toronto, Ontario

Source: Circulating tape

Bob Dylan presents a Juno Award to Gordon Lightfoot. Dylan keeps his gloves on even when shaking hands with Gordon Lightfoot, which may confirm the story of his hand injury given in "Chronicles, Volume One" (p. 145).

Hostess: Each year the Canadian Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences pays tribute to a Canadian artist for his or her outstanding artistry and international achievement in music. Tonight recipient's career has bridged more than two decades and his music has touched millions. The poetic excellence of this balladeer has made him a legend in our time. From musicians breaking into entertainment business by learning to play "Early Morning Rain" to the vast number of performers who have recorded this song, he has inspired many. But who inspires Gordon Lightfoot? When asked, "Who is your favorite songwriter?" Gordon said, "Of all them altitudes around, I'd have to go with Bob Dylan." Ladies and gentlemen, Bob Dylan.

[long applause while Dylan is trying to find a way from his backstage room to the scene; Hostess nervously laughs]

Hostess: Bob Dylan.

BD: Ah. Sure it's good to be here and to give this award to Gordon. I've known Gordon for a long time. I know he's been offered this award before, but he has never accepted it, because he wanted me to come to give it to him. So… [audience laugh]. Anyway, he's somebody of a rare talent and all that. And here's a videoclip now of his recent and not so recent achievements.

[short film plays]

BD: All right, here he is now, Gordon Lightfoot.

[BD and GL can be barely heard talking off mike]

23 November 1986
Donald Chase interview for San Francisco Chronicle

Source: The Rolling Telegraph Supplement #6, p. 21

BLOOD ON THE TRACKS
By DONALD CHASE
London

THREE OR FOUR bars into the bluesy-country-rock number, before he can even begin singing, Bob Dylan is pelted with lighted cigarettes and cries of "Off! Off! Off!" To the audience of punks and skinheads, the singer's musical gentleness is as passé as his halo of chestnut hair.

After Dylan's exit, Fiona, his young backup, restores order by ripping into the hard-driving "Hair of the Dog." Then at song's end, she 'calls Dylan back onstage, admonishing the audience that "if it wasn't for him, we wouldn't be here."

Dylan reappears—to huzzahs. But his craggy face is wearily impassive. He knows too much to be moved by the crowd's fickle enthusiasm.

"This business is gonna eat you up," he says later to Fiona. "Just like it was gonna get me. It's this big machine. It gets you in its teeth, it sucks everything out of you. You wake up, you're a star. So... you're a star! But there ain't nothing to you no more. You're empty."

As Billy Parker in the currently shooting "Hearts of Fire," Dylan is "perfect casting," says director Richard Marquand. In the drama-with-music. which 20th Century Fox will release next summer, the musical legend plays a legendary musician emerging from a decade-long self-imposed exile in rural western Pennsylvania.

Parker agrees to perform in England because of the opportunity to promote Molly McGuire (Fiona), his protégée-heartthrob. But his arrival coincides with her fall for Brit rock-sensation-of-the-moment James Colt (Rupert Everett).

"It's not exactly like me doing Shakespeare," says Dylan of his role. "It's not a stretch in that sense. You could say that (like Parker) I'm somebody who became famous through music and that I had certain feelings about fame."

All this is by way of suggesting that, despite their similarities, Parker is a character separate from Dylan. "Really," Dylan says, "there are a hundred guys I know who could have played this role."

Not that Dylan is taking this assignment casually. According to Marquand, before accepting the role, Dylan not only asked, "Do you think I can do it?" but also submitted to what the director calls "a private screen test." And there is on the set whenever Dylan is shooting, a dialogue coach.

Whatever insecurities Dylan may have had about acting, Marquand says he had "very definite ideas" about his character. "He contributed ideas about what might have happened in Parker's past, making it rougher than what I had been thinking."

"It's a much more professional way of making a movie," Dylan says, comparing the give-and-take on this project with his less collaborative association in 1973 with Sam Peckinpah on "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid."

"That was Peckinpah's kingdom—and he was sort of a madman. He kept saying, 'It's my movie, my movie'."

In fact, though, to a significant extent, "Hearts of Fire" is Marquand's movie, providing him an opportunity to put on film some of his own notions about American innocence and European experience.

With his 1960s and '70s frame of reference, Dylan's crusty 40-year-old rocker is certainly more experienced than Fiona's 19-year-old Molly, Marquand allows. "But they're Americans" he says, "and so they both come to Europe as innocents.

"I'm talking about London as an overcivilized place with its sense of the past. And on top of that you have this superstructure of elegance and music and fashion and, in the background, guerrilla warfare and people being blown up in Harrods (department store). It's the Europe that attracts and frightens Americans at the same time, this freewheeling yet eccentric world personified in the film by James Colt, who's trapped in the pitfalls of fame that Billy decided to avoid and Molly is now threatened with."

FIONA—NEE Fiona Flanagan—is the 25-year-old singer-songwriter who became a hot pop figure last year with the release of her first LP, "Fiona," and its follow-up, "Beyond the Pale." "She sort of reminds me of myself at 19," Fiona says of Molly McGuire. "I can remember arriving in New York from a town in New Jersey that's probably not too different from Molly's hometown, and not knowing where the Upper West Side was—though it's kind of self-explanatory, isn't it?

"And I've been harassed in the studio as she is, and I've been in relationships with men I worked with. A lot of the scenes in the movie are scenes I've had at home. I'll be in the middle of one and it doesn't seem like I'm acting—it's a little scary."

Rupert Everett has little firsthand knowledge of the music world—and in fact will be singing publicly for the first time in "Hearts of Fire." But the British-born star of "Another Country" and "Dance With a Stranger" says he, too, is playing close to the vest here: His own admiration for Dylan corresponds to his character's respect for Parker.

"Our characters were originally written as adversaries," Everett recalls, "but Richard Marquand and Bob and I decided that was too simple—and boring—and not necessarily true. Instead, we now really like each other, which makes things interestingly complicated when all starts to go wrong because we love the same girl."

The music in "Hearts of Fire" will extend the film's generational and cultural contrasts. Everett will sing arrogant, hi-tech English '80s numbers (by the Brit group Wang Chung); Fiona will do mainstream contemporary American rock; and Dylan's music (including two new songs by Dylan himself) will have its roots in the '60s.

"It's supposed to be Parker's old stuff," Dylan says, "but I didn't want to emphasize that too much because I don't really like nostalgia. (It's) stuff I (personally) could have written then—or that I could write tomorrow."

In all, 22 song tracks have been prerecorded for "Hearts of Fire"—too many, everyone agrees.

"I don't think," says Marquand, "you can expect people to sit still for three minutes, 20 times, while someone sings a song. But I also can't forget music is central to the characters' lives. So the plan is to have some full songs, as well as many parts of songs, and integrate them with a story that—I hope—will say something about what it's like to be human in 1987."

(Donald Chase is a frequent contributor to City Lights.)

October(?) 1987
Date and place unknown; Kurt Loder interview for Rolling Stone

Published in Rolling Stone Nov 5 – Dec 10, 1987. Available at expectingrain.com

KL: Did you start out wanting to be a star?

BD: Not really, because I always needed a song to get by. There's a lot of singers who don't need songs to get by. A lot of 'em are tall, good-lookin', you know? They don't need to say anything to grab people. Me, I had to make it on something other than my looks or my voice.

KL: What was it that made you decide to become a rock & roll songwriter?

BD: Well, now, Chuck Berry was a rock & roll songwriter. So I never tried to write rock & roll songs, 'cause I figured he had just done it. When I started writing songs, they had to be in a different mold. Because who wants to be a second-rate anybody? A new generation had come along, of which I was a part – the second generation of rock & roll people. To me, and to others like me, it was a way of life. It was an all-consuming way of life.

KL: What was the rock scene like when you arrived in New York in the early Sixties?

BD: What was happening was Joey Dee and the Starliters, which was, like, a twisting scene. There was a big twist craze. There were little pockets, I guess, all across the country where people were playin' rock & roll music. But it was awfully difficult. I knew some guys that played in the Village, and to make some extra money they would play in midtown clubs like the Metropole, which used to be a burlesque house on Seventh Avenue. Those were pretty funky places. You could play for six hours and make ten dollars, and there'd be some girl stripping all the time. Pretty degrading gig. But economics being what they are, you got to make some kinda money to exist with electric instruments. That's what got me out of it, actually. It was just too hard.

KL: So you opted for folk music.

BD: Folk music creates its own audience. Because you can take a guitar anywhere, anytime. Most of the places we played in the early days were all parties – house parties, rent parties. Any kind of reason to go play someplace and we'd be there.

KL: Were you surprised by the public reaction to your early songs, or by your eventual mass acceptance?

BD: Not really. 'Cause I paid my dues. It didn't happen overnight, you know. I came up one step at a time. And I knew when I'd come up with somethin' good. For instance, "Song to Woody," on my first record: I knew that no one had ever written anything like that before.

KL: Still, given your unique style of writing and singing, you did seem an unlikely candidate for stardom on the pop scene in the mid-Sixties.

BD: Well, I wasn't tryin' to get onto the radio. I wasn't singin' for Tin Pan Alley. I'd given up on all that stuff. I was downtown, you know? I wanted to make records, but I thought the furthest I could go was to make a folk-music record. It surprised the hell out of me when I was signed at Columbia Records. I was more surprise than anybody. But I never let that stop me [laughs].

KL: Did you ever feel that you had tapped into the Zeitgeist in some special sort of way?

BD: With the songs that I came up with?

KL: Yeah.

BD: As I look back on it now, I am surprised that I came up with so many of them. At the time it seemed like a natural thing to do. Now I can look back and see that I must have written those songs "in the spirit," you know? Like "Desolation Row" – I was just thinkin' about that the other night. There's no logical way that you can arrive at lyrics like that. I don't know how it was done.

KL: It just came to you?

BD: It just came out through me.

KL: By the time of "Desolation Row," in 1965, you had gone electric and had been more or less drummed out of the purist folk movement. Was that a painful experience?

BD: No. I looked at that as an opportunity to get back in to what I had been into a long time ago and to take it someplace further. Folk-music circles were very cold, anyway. Everybody was pretty strict and severe in their attitudes; it was kind of a stuffy scene. It didn't bother me that people didn't understand what I was doing, because I had been doing it long before they were around. And I knew, when I was doin' that stuff, that that hadn't been done before, either. Because I'd known all the stuff that had gone down before. I knew what the Beatles were doin', and that seemed to be real pop stuff. The Stones were doing blues things – just hard city blues. The Beach Boys, of course, were doin' stuff that I didn't think had ever been done before, either. But I also knew that I was doing stuff that hadn't ever been done before.

KL: Did you have more of a drive to write back then? More of drive to make it?

BD: Well, yeah, you had all those feelings that had been bottled up for twenty-some years, and then you got 'em all out. And once they're out, then you gotta start up again.

KL: Do you still get inspired the same way these days?

BD: I don't know. It's been a while since, uh ... What moves you to write is something that you care about deeply. You also have to have the time to write. You have to have the isolation to write. And the more demands that are put on you, the harder it is. I mean, it seems like everybody wants a piece of your time at a certain point. There was a time when nobody cared, and that was one of the most productive times, when nobody gave a shit who I was.

KL: Life gets complex as the years go by.

BD: Yeah. You get older; you start having to get more family oriented. You start having hopes for other people rather than for yourself. But I don't have nothin' to complain about. I did it, you know? I did what I wanted to do. And I'm still doing it.

KL: A lot of fans would say that the Band, which was backing you up in the mid-Sixties, was the greatest group you ever had. Would you agree?

BD: Well, there were different things I liked about every band I had. I like the Street Legal band a lot. I thought it was a real tight sound. Usually it's the drummer and the bass player that make the band. The Band had their own sound, that's for sure. When they were playin' behind me, the weren't the Band; they were called Levon and the Hawks. What came out on record as the Band – it was like night and day. Robbie [Robertson] started playing that real pinched, squeezed guitar sound – he had never played like that before in his life. They could cover songs great. They used to do Motown songs, and that, to me, is when I think of them as being at their best. Even more so than "King Harvest" and "The Weight" and all of that. When I think of them, I think of them singin' somethin' like "Baby Don't You Do It," covering Marvin Gaye and that kind of thing. Those were the golden days of the Band, even more so than when they played behind me.

KL: What were some of the most memorable shows you guys did together?

BD: Oh, man, I don't know. Just about every single one. Every night was like goin' for broke, like the end of the world.

KL: It's funny, the music business was small back then, primitive. But the music that came out of it was really affecting. Now the business is enormous, yet it seems to have no real effect on anything. What do you think was lost back there along the way?

BD: The truth of it all was covered up, buried, under the onslaught of money and that wolfish attitude – exploitation. Now it seems like the thing to do is exploit everything, you know?

KL: A lot of people are happy to be exploited.

BD: Yeah.

KL: They stand in line.

BD: Yeah, exactly.

KL: Have you ever been approached to do a shoe ad or anything?

BD: Oh, yeah! They'd like to use my tunes for different beer companies and perfumes and automobiles. I get approached on all that stuff. But, shit, I didn't write them for that reason. That's never been my scene.

KL: Do you still listen to the artists you started out with?

BD: The stuff that I grew up on never grows old. I was just fortunate enough to get it and understand it at that early age, and it still rings true for me.. I'd still rather listen to Bill and Charlie Monroe than any current record. That's what America's all about to me. I mean, they don't have to make any more new records – there's enough old ones, you know? I went in a record store a couple of weeks ago – I wouldn't know what to buy. There's so many kinds of records out.

KL: And CDs too.

BD: CDs too. I don't know. I've heard CDs. I don't particularly think they sound a whole lot better than a record. Personally, I don't believe in separation of sound, anyway. I like to hear it all blended together.

KL: The Phil Spector approach.

BD: Well, the live approach. The world could use a new Phil Spector record, that's for sure. I'd like to hear him do Prince.

KL: Do you think Prince is talented?

BD: Prince? Yeah, he's a boy wonder.

KL: Lately he's seemed to be a little trapped inside of it all.

BD: Well, there must be a giant inside there just raving to get out. I mean, he certainly don't lack talent, that's for sure.

KL: Who are some of the greatest live performers you've ever seen?

BD: I like Charles Aznavour a lot. I saw him in sixty-something at Carnegie Hall, and he just blew my brains out. I went there with somebody who was French, not knowing what I was getting myself into.

Howlin' Wolf, to me, was the greatest live act, because he did not have to move a finger when he performed – if that's what you'd call it, "performing." I don't like people that jump around. When people think about Elvis moving around – he didn't jump around. He moved with grace.

KL: Mick Jagger seems to jump around onstage a bit too much, don't you think?

BD: I love Mick Jagger. I mean, I go back a long ways with him, and I always wish him the best. But to see him jumping around like he does – I don't give a shit in what age, from Altamont to RFK Stadium – you don't have to do that, man. It's still hipper and cooler to be Ray Charles, sittin' at the piano, not movin' shit. And still getting across, you know? Pushing rhythm and soul across. It's got nothin' to do with jumping around. I mean, what could it possibly have to do with jumping around?

KL: Showbiz?

BD: I don't know. Showbiz – well, I don't dig it. I don't go to see someone jump around I hate to see chicks perform. Hate it.

KL: Why?

BD: Because they whore themselves. Especially the ones that don't wear anything. They fuckin' whore themselves.

KL: Even someone like Joni Mitchell?

BD: Well, no. but, then, Joni Mitchell is almost like a man [laughs]. I mean, I love Joni, too. But Joni's got a strange sense of rhythm that's all her own, and she lives on that timetable... Joni Mitchell is in her own world all by herself, so she has a right to keep any rhythm she wants. She's allowed to tell you what time it is.

KL: Well, what about Chrissie Hynde?

BD: Chrissie Hynde's a rock & roll singer who really should go back and study some country music. She should go deeply into the heart of that stuff and then come back bout. Because Chrissie Hynde is a good rhythm guitar player. That's all you gotta be is a rhythm guitar player and singer, and she writes good, and she's got good thoughts. She knows what's right and wrong.

KL: So you're not saying women shouldn't be performers, are you?

BD: No, absolutely not, man

KL: Do you see any bands of merit on the scene today? What about U2? They're friends of yours, aren't they?

BD: Yeah, U2 will probably be around years from now. John Cougar Mellencamp, he'll be around as long as anybody will be. Sure, there's people. But, you know, as time goes on, it gets just a little more diluted... In many ways, what's happening now in music is very corrupting. Especially European rock & roll – it's so weird. It all comes out of what America did, but it's so far from the early guys, like Little Richard and Chuck Berry. That was so pure, you know? But what's become of it? It's become degraded... Like, I like U2 a lot, but, well, U2 are actually pretty original. But they're Irish; they're Celtic – they've got that thing goin'. You've gotta get away from America in order to make anything stick. America will just bombard you with too much shit. You have to make a conscious attempt to stay away from all the garbage. Whereas in the past, I don't remember ever having to make a conscious attempt to stay away from anything. You could just walk away, you know? Now, you walk away, it gets you no matter where you are.

KL: Do you think there's any point today in people getting together – the way they did in the Sixties – to try to change things?

BD: Well, people are still strivin' to do good. But they have to overcome the evil impulse. And as long as they're tryin' to do that, things can keep lookin' up. but there's so much evil. It spreads wider and wider, and it causes more and more confusion. In every area. It takes your breath away.

KL: because so many of the things that were scorned in the Sixties, like living you life just to make money, are accepted now?

BD: Yeah. But it isn't really accepted. Maybe in America it is, but that's why America's gonna go down, you know? It's just gonna go down. It just can't exist. You can't just keep rippin' things off. Like, there's just a law that says you cannot keep rippin' things off.

KL: Have you ever considered moving to another country? Where would you feel more at home?

BD: I'm comfortable wherever people don't remind me of who I am. Anytime somebody reminds me of who I am, that kills it for me. If I wanted to wonder about who I am, I could start dissecting my own stuff. I don't have to go on other people's trips of who they think I am. A person doesn't like to feel self-conscious, you know? Now, Little Richard says if you don't want your picture taken, you got no business being a star. And he's right, he's absolutely right. But I don't like my picture being taken by people I don't know.

KL: But you are a star....

BD: Yeah, well, I guess so. But, uh...I feel like I'm a star, but I can shine for who I want to shine for. You know what I mean?

1987
Source not given, reproduced in RTS

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement #11, p.19

Dylan in sex romp scandal

SINGER Bob Dylan cried out, "Wow, what a woman," while having sex with a Sydney dancer, a court was told in Sydney.

The woman, 41-year-old Gypsy Fire, is suing the Melbourne Truth newspaper for obscene and blasphemous libel over an article published on July 26 last year. The article alleged:

- She had been Dylan's sex slave during his Australian concert tour last year
- She had danced semi-naked before him
- She had massaged his feet believing he was Jesus Christ
- Afterwards she had lit candles and masturbated.

John Sackar, QC, for the Truth, told the Castlereach Street local court that Gypsy Fire had written to publishers Transworld in September offering a manuscript of her experiences. "I positively know that it will be a number one seller, just as I know that I will be with Bob Dylan," Miss Fire wrote.

"Our passionate desire was so wild and oh, so hot and erotic. I threw him down on the bed and rode him as hard as I could," the court heard. "His eyes were amazing as he said 'Wow, what a woman'. I'll never forget that," Miss Fire said in the witness box.

After they had finished, she had asked him for four tickets to his concert and he had given her seven. Mr Sackar said the dancer's prosecution of the Truth was nothing more than a blatant publicity stunt, and that she was "not displeased" with the publicity.

March 1987
Peter Landecker's story behind the "Dylan: Words & Music" play

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement #8, pp. 19-26.

WORLD PREMIERE
A Multi-Media Musical

DYLAN:
WORDS&MUSIC

A Play by Peter Landecker based on the Words and Music of Bob Dylan

Musical director: Bob Johnston
Starring: Bob Miles
Produced by John Meal

After I read Tarantula, I became scared. I was supposed to portray this guy and I couldn't even come close to understanding his book. At first the book seems like random, unconnected jumble nonsense. Upon closer study it still seems that way, but I got this unmistakable feeling, there was great, profound meaning that I was somehow missing. I was scared because I knew he wrote the book and he knew exactly what he was doing and I didn't. I was eighteen at the time. He was about 23 when he wrote it. He was everything I could ever possibly dream of achieving and more, considerably more. I didn't have a prayer of portraying this guy and having the portrayal be truly full and accurate. I knew it and I was scared. I had already done a lot of acting in a lot of different plays but I never had portrayed someone who had really existed, a real person. It's much harder to do this than come up with an original character. And Dylan is so present in the public mind. Everyone has some sense of who this guy is. I knew this. People were going to come in and see me as Dylan and compare. Their Dylan to my Dylan. If the two were anywhere near close, than they could forget that I wasn't the real Dylan and then really enjoy the show. So what I was after was getting close to what people perceive him to be.

I worked hard. I spent the most time learning all the lines and trying to make them believable, like they weren't memorized lines. I worked with John, who was directing the play. John had put the show together originally in South Africa and he had portrayed Dylan there. Some friends of his had put together a revue of Dylan music together and he gathered some poetry, monologues, and interviews of Dylan and performed them in between his friends song presentations. Apparently the show went over quite well in South Africa. Now it was a few years later in Santa Barbara, California. I don't know how he ended up there, but it was mostly because he was getting paid by the Santa Barbara Repertory Theatre Company to act in one of their shows. The theatre company was actually part of the Santa Barbara City College. John, being a rather shrewd fellow, saw an opportunity to put together a version of the Dylan show. As a workshop production of Santa Barbara City College, the show would be protected from potential lawsuits from Dylan and the people who own his music and writing.

I chanced upon a xeroxed flyer announcing auditions for an actor to play Dylan and for musicians. At the auditions, John handed me the Writings & Drawings book by Dylan and asked me to read The Ballad of Frankie Lee & Judas Priest. I knew I wanted the part. Actors know when they Want the part. It doesn't mean you're going to get it, but it sure helps. Anyways, I got the part.

I didn't really like working with John. His idea of directing was "Say it like this...". He had done the part and he wanted me to say the lines exactly as he had said them. There's no arguing with the Director. But John was a nice guy. I needed all the help I could get. So I said the lines as he wanted and for the most part, it was a good way to say them.

The show was a success by Santa Barbara standards. And it was a great summer. Most days were spent at the beach, then do the show, and go out and party till early in the morning, sleep till early in the afternoon and start again. I was 19, I was in love, I was happy and I knew it. I suppose everyone has that one summer they'll always look back on. That was mine.

Before I had even auditioned for the Dylan show, my grandparents had invited me to go to Europe with them (My grandfather, a professor, was going to be giving lectures in England & Sweden). This, of course, was an offer I could not refuse. But the show was doing good business and got held over. So I was either going to have to leave the show or not go to Europe. I ended up leaving the show. On my last performance, everyone gave me a surprise party and I got a framed program signed by everyone with the show. John ended up taking over the part, I had a great time in Europe, and the show lasted a few more weeks before closing.

Portraying Bob Dylan had a profound impact on my life. I don't know if I knew it at the time or not. Perhaps the most immediate effect was that I became more confident, maybe even cocky. I think I acquired some of Dylan's intolerance for falsity and pretense. But more importantly, Dylan inspired me. Here was someone who had achieved something that really mattered. He was and still is a tremendously powerful, positive force in this world, and he had done it through writing and performing. Key to all this is that Dylan stays true to his own conscience. "I never thought of myself as breaking the rules, because I never really acknowledged the rules in the first place", he once said. Yet he is someone who can distinguish what really matters and what doesn't.

Returning from Europe, I continued my studies at U.C.L.A. in the theatre arts department. This was a very non-Dylan kind of a thing to do, but it was the right thing for me. Since I was a child, I knew I loved the theatre. I was now learning about all aspects of live stage – acting, directing, lighting, costuming, sets, box office, etc. By the time I was a junior, I could look back on about 40 theatre productions that I had been involved with (mostly as an actor). In retrospect, I considered almost all of them a waste of time. They just didn't have any meaningful impact. Either the material was trivial, or the presentation was amateur, or boring, or confused by some director's wild vision. In any case, I was very frustrated by the ineffectiveness of theatre. The big exception was the Dylan show. It was different.

First of all, the potential audience is big. People who'd never consider going to the theatre would be interested in seeing the Dylan show. If the point is to have impact, then the more people and the more different types of people the better. Also the format of the Dylan show was different. The audience was acknowledged and performed to, like at a concert. So the "pretend" element of theatre is not there. The show was about a lot of things, important issues and messages, but it's not preachy and didactic – like so much political theatre. It's a funny an entertaining show. And the more I learned about Dylan, the more fascinating and important he became. It was around this time, Dylan was putting out his "born again" albums out. At the time it seemed like an incredibly odd thing for him to be doing. Some of the messages on the "Slow Train Coming" album seemed to be in direct conflict with some of the most basic messages Dylan had been associated with from his previous work. An interview from the L.A. Times revealed that Dylan truly had "a born again experience... there was a presence in the room that couldn't have been anyone but Jesus." These developments made Dylan even more fascinating, mysterious, and important.

In my third year at U.C.L.A., I put together my own version of a Dylan show. I asked a few of my musician friends to each learn a Dylan song or two. With less than a week of rehearsal, we presented an informal version of the show to about 100 students and faculty. We sat the audience in a semi-circle, about half sitting in chairs and the rest sitting on the floor on pillows and on platforms. The show was a big success. It was intimate and powerful and moving and funny. I applied to some student fund and to my pleasant surprise got a few thousand dollars to put the show on at the Ackerman Grand Ballroom in the student union. We spent most of the money putting together a multi-media show to accompany the music. UCLA let us use their state of the art sound and projection equipment. We seated the audience on the stage (again in a semi-circle) and built our stage as an extension of the existing one. A giant rear-projection screen was our backdrop. It all worked pretty well. We only did about four shows. The fourth was hastily arranged just to video the show.

A few days later, I got a call from a guy named Joel who had produced and directed and conceived the stage show TOMMY. Joel was all enthusiasm about the Dylan show. He wanted to produce it at The Westwood Playhouse, a midsize Equity house in L.A. We were all quite excited until Joel called a meeting of the entire cast and then didn't show up.

Less than a month after that, I was driving my car on Sunset Blvd. near UCLA and I spotted an interesting looking figure wearing leather boots and a leather jacket on a typically hot L.A. day. He looked a lot like Dylan. He was looking in the window of a Jewish deli, and then crossed the parking lot to return to his car which was being filled with gas at the corner gas station. By the time I approached him he was getting back into his car, a big baby blue station wagon.

"Are you Bob Dylan?"

"Yeah"

It was indeed him. He was uncomfortable and disappointed he'd been recognized. He was nervous and shy.

"I just portrayed you in a play at UCLA..."

"Oh yeah, I heard something about that"

"Look, we were hoping to do a professional version of the show, do you think it's possible to get the rights from you to do that"

"Yeah, I suppose. Talk to Sal Bonafede at Management 3"

I was in shock.

"What's that? Management what? Sal Who?"

Dylan repeated himself and told me he had to get going as he drove off.

It turns out that Management3 is a group that manages performers run by Jerry Weintraub, Sal Bonafede, and someone else. Their clients at the time included Frank Sinatra, Neil Diamond, John Denver, Dylan, and some others. Sal Bonafede used to be one of Elvis Presley's managers.

I called Sal up and told him Dylan had told me to talk to him. We set up a meeting. Joel accompanied me to their office in the heart of Beverly Hills. Management 3 takes up the entire top two floors of the building. The walls are literally covered with gold and platinum records. The furniture is all beautiful antiques. Sal is a big, loud, friendly Italian. I told him about the Santa Barbara and the UCLA shows and the gas station meeting. Sal was responsive, he thought it sounded like a good show. He warned us that he hardly ever spoke to Dylan, yet he would try and see what he could do about getting us the rights.

Six months later, absolutely no progress had been made. Sal had referred us to Dylan's attorney. Joel had an attorney who was calling Dylan's attorney most every day. I was calling as well, but neither of us could get through. He wouldn't speak to us. It seemed like a dead end.

I graduated college. I got involved in other theatre projects, and got some work in TV soap operas.

In the fall of 1983, an amazing thing happened. Driving my car on the Pacific Coast Highway from Malibu towards Santa Monica, I somehow noticed that Bob Dylan had just ridden by me on his bicycle going the opposite direction. I made a quick U-turn and caught up with him as he turned left onto a small residential road by the ocean. I didn't have to ask if it was him this time. I rolled my window down.

"Hi – remember me? from the gas station. I'm Peter Landecker, the guy who wants to do the show about you."

"Yeah, Yeah, I remember. Hey, I'm tired of riding my bike. Why don't you park your car and we'll walk together"

In a second or so, the car was parked and we were walking along this beautiful road on this beautiful sunny day.

I told him of my frustrations in dealing with his people. He assured me it was fine with him for me to do the show, but he said it really wasn't up to him. I didn't understand this. I said, "These people work for you, don't they?"

We talked about the show, which songs are included and why. Dylan asked if "Idiot Wind" was in. I said no and asked why he singled out that one. "It's one of the most theatrical, dramatic ones", he said. I told him we used "Hezekiah Jones" in the show, an early, unreleased talking blues. "Oh No!", he said "that thing should be dead and buried!"

I asked about the music he was playing in his sets. This was right after he had gone on tour and only played the Gospel oriented music. I was concerned he was forever abandoning his past work. He assured me he was going to continue playing a variety of music from throughout his career. He told me that when you go out on tour, there's a set of selected songs that basically remain the same and in the same order throughout the tour.

We had stopped walking right outside the driveway of Dylan's house in Malibu. I was praying he'd invite me in, but it wasn't to be. Before we parted ways, Dylan assured me he'd tell his attorney to give me the rights to do the show.

As I walked to my car, the reality of what had just occurred sunk in. This second coincidental meeting had been so perfect, I couldn't have dreamed it up any better. I knew there was no stopping me from doing the show now. It was fated.

And sure enough, after some correspondence between myself and Dylan's office and a lot of research and script re-writes, a registered letter arrives from Dylan's attorney: "Bob Dylan has instructed me to give you the rights to do the show. We will give you a proposal within the week." I was very happy. I thought this meant I had the rights. The waiting was over! Yippee!

But no. I won't go into it all, but it was another two years before the Agreement was signed by myself and Dylan. There were legal problems. I had created a property (the Play) completely out of someone else's material (Dylan's words & music). There was really no precedent for this to base a contract, and whenever attorneys are doing something that there's no precedent for, they get very nervous and cautious. Further complications included the fact that Dylan doesn't own a lot of his own songs, nor does he have full control over his own words from magazine and newspaper interviews. I was learning lessons. One important step was to acquire an attorney whom I could afford and yet had as much clout as Dylan's attorney. These things are important if you want to get a phone call returned.

During those years of waiting for attorneys to produce results, I continued work on the script and staged two incognito productions. First, in a church, I did it as a one man show, singing all the songs myself. It worked on that same intimate level as when it was first done at UCLA. Then, still without rights, I got together some musicians and re-staged it at a small theatre in Hollywood. Of all the mini-prepatory productions, this one was the weakest. I had spread myself too thin. The theatre was wrong. The musicians were wrong. The show worked but it wasn't special and if it wasn't special, it wasn't right. As my mother says, "…another fucking learning experience."

The Agreement between myself and Dylan turned out to be 10 pages, single spaced. It gave me exclusive worldwide rights to stage the show. It took a third meeting with Dylan to get him to sign the document that had finally been completed. A friend of mine gave me a tip that Dylan was going to be rehearsing with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers at a soundstage at Universal Studios. This was right before Farm Aid and they'd never played together. I got into the studio lot by saying I had a delivery (which was in a way the truth – I had my script and the unsigned contract that I was going to leave with Dylan). Sure enough, I found myself on this near empty soundstage with Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers playing away. It was The Heartbreakers, me, and about 3 crew members. Dylan hadn't arrived yet. I sat myself on a couch in a corner and sucked it all in.

Dylan arrived and they started playing some of the tunes from Empire Burlesque like Clean Cut Kid, Trust Yourself, and I Remember You. Dylan was having a great time. They did Louie Louie and Dylan cooked. I so wish I had had a tape recorder. When Dylan was going to start into Forever Young, he was having trouble remembering the first lyrics. I looked it up in my script and gave him the right words "May God bless and keep you always..." He looked at me appreciatively and started into the song just he and his acoustic guitar and Benmont Tench playing piano. If it sounds like it was great, take my word for it, it was. After a few more incredible numbers, they took a break. First I spoke with Tom Petty. It was clear Petty was thrilled to be playing with Dylan. I asked how this union came about and he smiled, "It's been a long process." I could relate.

When I spoke to Dylan, he told me he'd sign the Agreement. He said he wasn't going to involve himself in the production but he wished me the best of luck. I told him that was fine, all I really needed was for him to sign the Agreement.

Returning from a vacation in late 1985, I found a letter from my attorney, "I've got. some good news for you", it stated. He had signed it. Persistence and patience had paid off. I was more relieved than anything else. The celebration won't really come until opening night.

Ask any Producer... the hardest part of the job is acquiring rights to the material, and the next job is a close second in difficulty, time consumption, and challenge. Raising money. My first hope was to find a rich Producer who would become my partner and solve the fundraising issue. I met with a number of these kind of potential producers. Everyone agreed, it's a great project but they were all unwilling to commit to the financial stakes of live theatre. At one point, I was in partnership with a big time Hollywood Producer, who was going to raise the money with a few phone calls. He ended up backing out because someone in Dylan's organization said he didn't like one of the Producer's previous projects.

I was getting tired of living in Los Angeles, and I knew it wasn't the right place to open the show. A few exploratory trips to San Francisco convinced me it's the perfect place for this show. I moved to San Francisco in August of 1986 with the rights but still no funding. I contacted a very helpful organization called Bay Area Lawyers For The Arts and through them set up a Limited Partnership offering to raise money. The first money came in from a local businessman whom I still have not met or spoken to. His secretary called me up after I'd sent him a letter, she said she was messengering over a $10,000. check. A nice beginning. I found my Producer, John Neal, through an ad in the local theatre magazine, Callboard.

Completely set now on making this the best production possible, I held a nationwide talent search to find the right person to portray Dylan. The auditions attracted a lot of people and attention from the media. Not surprisingly, New York was where I found the best candidates. From the New York auditions, I found Bob Miles. Bob is a great singer/songwriter/musician in his own right. He looks and sound remarkably like Dylan and has got the heart and soul and talent to do the part justice. Bob Miles and Bob Dylan are friends. Miles house-sat Dylan's house in Woodstock when Dylan went to play at the Isle of Wight Festival. The guy knows the material. I feel very lucky to have found him.

Another great find has been our Musical Director, Bob Johnston. (Another Bob!) Johnston is a legendary record producer. He produced Dylan's great albums Blonde On Blonde, Highway 61 Revisited, John Wesley Harding, Nashville Skyline, and a bunch of others. He knows everyone in the music business and everyone loves him. He is a remarkable man, a joy to be around. Johnston is overflowing with enthusiasm for this project. He is putting together the band of musicians and singers, arranging the music, and rehearsing the performers.

It had always bee n a dream of Bob Miles to someday work with Bob Johnston. Miles and myself went to Johnston's home a few weeks back. Johnston lives about two hours outside of San Francisco in the gold mining country. We sat in this room that had once occupied by hundreds of gold miners and had hardly changed in 150 years. Johnston, his family, and a few other friends and myself spent the night listening to Bob Miles perform one after another of his own compositions. Johnston played some of his music as well. This evening cemented the commitment and relationship between us, the three key creative elements of the show. Johnston thinks Miles is a great, major talent and says he's going to record an album with him.

We have an excellent group of designers working on the show. Nancy Lytle and her Mind's Eye Productions are producing an extensive rear and front projection multi-image slide show to complement the musical parts of the show. The Designer of our set is Bo Henry, is head of one of the best scene shops in the world, having built sets for The Olympics ceremonies, Liberty Weekend, The Democratic Convention, rock tours of the Stones, Dead, Bowie, etc.

We have set the site and the opening date for DYLAN: WORDS & MUSIC, A Multi-Media Theatre Concert. The elements are in place. I'm doing everything I can to insure that this project meets it's potential. It's a matter of getting things done, continuing to find the right people, keeping deadlines, and keeping the spirit.

There are a lot of themes to the show, but the key ideas expressed are about being an individual, staying true to one's conscience, taking chances, and following through on ones beliefs and hopes.

DYLAN: WORDS & MUSIC will have it's World Premiere performance on April 24, 1987 at the Zephyr Theatre on the corner of Market & VanNess (25 VanNess). Previews start April 15. For tickets and information call (415)861-6895 or (415)546-9400.

31 March 1987
Phil A. Roddy interview

Source: Look Back #15

EXCLUSIVE LOOK BACK INTERVIEW by P. A. Roddy

This was one of those things that happens to other people, not me. I'm assistant manager of a health club in Connecticut. At 9 p.m. on Tuesday, March 31, I received a call from my manager, asking me to do him a favor. He was scheduled for some minor surgery the next day, but he had received a phone call from his boss asking if we could make the facilities available for an unnamed big shot after hours on Wednesday. Since I was scheduled to close Wednesday night, I told him it would be no problem. Nothing in all this struck me as unusual, since we get this type of request about five times a year. Usually, its for some crime figure trying to unwind during a trial. Wednesday was to be different, however.

The club closed at 9:30 p.m. At 10:25, a limousine pulled up, and two men came to the door. As I admitted them, I couldn't believe what I was seeing: Bob Dylan, accompanied by a big black man, obviously a body guard, exploded past me and headed for the locker room.

It was almost too much to absorb. I'd followed Dylan since high school, subscribed to Look Back, collected some tapes (not nearly as many as some, judging from the ads in the magazine), and been lucky enough to see shows in the New York area in '74, '75, '78, '81, and '86. I just couldn't figure out how to act. I decided to just leave him alone and try to pretend it was just another customer.

It was obvious from observing him, that this was a man who knew his way around Nautilus equipment. He worked out for a full 40 minutes, shedding his gray sweatshirt about a third of the way through. The muscles I noticed during the show I saw last July were still in evidence, and he really put everything into the repetitions. For a slightly smaller than average guy, and a forty-five year old one at that, he's pretty strong, being at the R level on the leg lift station.

After the Nautilus portion, he swam for twenty minutes in our Olympic sized pool, and then headed for the Jacuzzi. By this time, I'd relaxed enough to approach him. The body guard kept a close eye, and appeared ready to pounce at any false move.

I introduced myself to Dylan as he was about to enter the bubbling water, and to my surprise he was totally relaxed and friendly. I guess an hour-long workout will soften up even the most prickly of people. Even when I told him I was a fan, he didn't tense up or anything. In fact, he seemed grateful for the company.

At this time, emboldened by his warmth, I decided to go all the way and ask him if it would be possible to interview him for a magazine I subscribed to. He agreed without hesitation, but with two conditions: 1) I would have to conduct it in the Jacuzzi with him, and 2) no tape recorder.

I got out of my clothes in about fifteen seconds, grabbed a clipboard with workout sheets (blank on the back) and a ballpoint pen, and plunged in. The following is as close to a verbatim transcript as you can get, thanks to the shorthand lessons I took on a whim in high school (actually, not on a whim. There was a girl taking the class I was doing anything to get close to).

PR: Do you work out often?
BD: ....(inaudible)
PR: Do you mind if I turn down the Jacuzzi a bit? Thanks.

PR: You look pretty accomplished around the club. How often do you work out?

BD: I try for two, three times a week. It gets hard, you know, when you're never in one place very long. I've got a full set-up back in California, and when we're on the road I can provide for it, but on nights like this, I just have some of my people hunt a place up.

PR: Well, I'm glad we could accommodate you.

BD: Yeah, this is a real nice place. Sometimes when I've been on the road, I've just settled for what I could get. Stuff like running early in the morning, chin-ups on tree limbs, just crazy stuff.

PR: So physical fitness isn't something new for you? I thought maybe you were trying to match Springsteen or something.

BD: God, not him again. It's like I can't make a move without someone seeing visions of the Boss. I have Steve Douglas with me in 1977 and everyone gets all excited. Never mind that I've been in love with his playing since those early Duane Eddy recordings. No, it had to be because I was impressed by Springsteen. Don't you think if I'd been that impressed I would have had his sax player, Clarence or whatever... (turns to guard) Tony, it's Clarence, right?... yeah, Clarence with me on that tour? And now this. I've been trying to keep myself in shape since I went to Durango to make that movie with Sam Peckinpah and had to ride that horse. That taught me I'd better not take my body for granted.

PR: Well, it never looked to me like you had a weight problem.

BD: It's funny. In high school, I just couldn't get rid of my baby fat. And when I got to New York, way back when it just wasn't a problem, I couldn't afford to eat. Then a little later, I just couldn't eat. I went two years without food, almost. You ever see that movie, Dont Look Back?

PR: Yeah, I bought the tape this summer.

BD: Good. (laughs) You never see me eat in that film, do you? I never ate on that whole tour, not anything that got to my stomach, anyway. (laughs) The only time I did eat, I got horribly sick and wound up in the hospital. That was Albert, though. No control of any of his appetites.

PR: I thought there were other things affecting you at the time.

BD: There were. Now I know everyone thinks I was a walking Dow chemical plant, but what kept me from eating were my teeth. I just couldn't chew, and the less I ate, the worse my teeth got. When I had that motorcycle accident, they did some root canal work for the next year and that took me out of pain I'd been in for two fucking years.

PR: That's amazing, I never knew.

BD: No one did, they just let their imaginations take over and created all kinds of fantasies for themselves.

PR: So, at that time you began to exercise?

BD: Not really, other than walking. I did one thing though. Man, did I eat. You name it. People try and read so much into songs. You know that song, Country Pie? That's what it was about. Pie. In fact, for the first time in six years, I began to have a bit of a weight problem. By the time of that Isle of Wight thing, everyone was on my case, my wife, my mother, the papers. So, when we got back home, I got some stuff like trampolines, a bike, and got back to normal real quick.

PR: This is incredible...

BD: Yeah, hard to believe, isn't it? We take our health for granted when we're younger and then have to pay the price when we get older. Now, I wouldn't want anyone to get the wrong idea from this, that I'm so vain I've got to have myself look like I'm twenty or something stupid like that. I just believe you've got to have some control and discipline or you're just asking for trouble. And there's enough trouble as there is.

PR: What about when you went on the road again.

BD: Well, in that tour with the Band, what was that? '73 or '74, I made a half-assed attempt to keep in shape by having a basketball court available. Can you imagine Richard Manuel taking an outside shot? (sighs) Poor Richard. Anyhow, in the Rolling Thunder tour it was just impossible. Traveling the way we did by bus, working on the film. I just fell into bad habits.

PR: So when did you finally get it together for good?

BD: I would say on that world tour in '77. I had to, it was nothing more than self-defense really. And I've stayed true to it up until now.

PR: What are you doing in this area, by the way?

BD: They had some salute to the Gershwins, George and his brother Ira a couple of weeks ago, and they wanted me to look at the tape they'd done for TV, see if I had any problems with it. At least I look in good shape.

PR: So, you going to make a new album, or...

BD: Phil, I've really got to go, I'm getting like a prune. You've got a good place here. Take care of yourself.

And that was that. He threw a robe on and scooted out, obviously dressing in the limo. The only regret I have was I meant to ask him if he still liked chickens as much as before.

(Note:) This interview came in just before deadline from reader Phil Roddy. Phil asked us to make it clear that there is no tape of this interview, but he did send us a photocopy of the shorthand notes he took during his talk with Dylan. The pages are waterspotted and bear a faint trace of chlorine.

21 May 1987
Los Angeles Times magazine,
Dylan's "encomium" on Jerry Weintraub

Source: Los Angeles Times Magazine, 21 May 1987; as quoted in TWM #1089

First there was Denver and eventually Frank
Followed by Dorothy Hamill
And as we all know, others came wanting to deal
He was Man of the Year
The Wiz of the Biz
And accolades too many to count
The dream and the scheme
Turned the bread into cream
Success it continued to mount…

June 1987
Elliott Mintz Interview For "Vision Shared", Malibu, California

Source: Fragments used to narrate "Vision Shared" TV & Radio special; complete transcript in TWM No. 1396 (4064). 23Aug98

This goes back to the 1987 BBC Radio 2 Dylan-on-Guthrie interview, which I last mentioned in 3743. I am assured that the following is a transcript of everything that the BBC received from Dylan's people. The circumstances were a little unusual but, as far as I can understand it, the Beeb does not have a full question-and-answer recording of this interview, simply a selection of Dylan's responses with the questions removed:

I heard him on records over at somebody's house, Folkways records. Uh, Grand Coulee Dam, Pastures Of Plenty, uh, This Land Is Your Land, Gypsy Davy, Pretty Boy Floyd, Talking Columbia Blues, Little Red Wagon, How-Di-Do, Tom Joad, uh Vigilante Man. Uh, what was different about it? It was very different. His trip was different. His trip was different because it was, he was, uh, I don't really know if I can actually, ya know, it's hard to say. There are so many reasons why he was so different. It's a... you could fill a book on it. Uh, he had a sound first of all. Everybody has a sound. You have to have a sound and he had that. He had a particular sound and, besides that, he said something that seemed to be needed to be said. To go along with his sound. And, uh, that was highly unusual to my ears. Usually, you'd have one or the other, ya know. He said something. He had an attitude. And he always had something to say. He always could find something to say about anything and I liked that. Um, as far as him... his style of music playing, I liked that. I liked the way he played the same. Uh, and I liked the things that he said when he sang. And that, that coupled with the fact that I'd never heard of him before, I mean, so, that set me, that I had a lotta (chuckles), a lotta... a lotta lost time to make up. I mean, I really had to find out who this guy was and, ya know, everything I could about him, ya know, which I tried to do at that... when I first heard of him... when I first heard him, not of him. I think I was over at somebody's house, who was a lawyer. He was also a folk singer, yeah. He had Woody Guthrie and Cisco Houston records. Anyway... anyway, to answer your question, I first heard Woody Guthrie on record.. uh.. over at.. er.. a house party. Everybody has their own sound. And that's what grabs you first, is the sound. Um, well, it was a simple.. it was very simple, more or less a Carter Family type sound. I don't think it was too far off of that. I started singing his songs; I started learning his songs. There was a time I did nothing but his songs. I mean, he's written so many, ya know. And I... er..., did a few of his songs, the ones that I knew, that I could find, uh, then I tried to find more. I read his book, I read Bound For Glory, which a professor, a folk music professor at the University of Minnesota, loaned to me to read. It was not a book you could, er, that they sold in a bookstore. I was loaned a copy to read it and I read it and I dug it. I thought it... it preceded On The Road by quite a few years, actually. I thought Bound For Glory was the first On The Road. Kerouac's book came out, as I can r... as I recall, I read Kerouac's book in... '59 maybe, 'f course, it changed my life like it changed everyone else's, ya know. Uh, Woody Guthrie's book was published in the late '40s, I believe. Uh, they didn't have paperbacks, I believe, when his was out, and, uh, I really didn't know. I didn't know if he was dead or alive, to tell you the truth. And then I found out, I slowly found out where he was. By that time, I think I'd been... I was completely taken over by him... um... by his spirit or whatever, ya know. And, um, I couldn't believe that I'd never heard of this man. I think, I think, I think that alone was.. Uh, I mean, he had so much to o.. (?).. to give, ya know, as, ya know, as ... you could listen to his songs and actually learn how to live. Know what I mean? Or know how to feel. If you weren't sure quite how to feel about a certain something, whatever it may be, if he covered it in his songs, most likely he touched upon a subject, and, ya know, he was a guide. Now, I don't know, I wasn't around when... I went to... When I met him, he was not functioning with all his facilities at a 100%, ya know. But the person I saw.. uh.. I was there more as a servant than as somebody there... I mean, I knew all his songs and I went there to sing him his songs. Ya know, that's all I went there to do and that's all I did. There wasn't much to talk with him about. I never really talked too much to him. He couldn't talk anyway. He was very jittery. He always liked the songs and he'd ask for certain ones. (Laughs) I knew them all. I was like a Woody Guthrie jukebox, ya know. I did, I knew them all, but, ya know, but never in my.., never did I think... I knew that I wasn't really the best at doing Woody Guthrie imitations. I never really was about doing Woody Guthrie imitations. I wanted to... Jack Elliott was the expert at that, ya know, anyway. He came along at a different time, not so much from me but from the generation now. I mean, the generation now, I still remember that time, the generation now, I don't know what they remember, ya know. They remember, they go back maybe as far as David Bowie which, as time goes on, will be saying a lot, too, ya know. Woody was like a... I think he did a whole lot more than he ever knew he did, ya know. I don't know, I mean, Woody Guthrie, though, if he was now, if he were around now, still believing what he was believing, of course he'd be very disillusioned, ya know. Everything happens in its own time, ya know. Woody Guthrie was who he was because he came along at, in the time he came along in. What would he think, I mean, if he knew what was happening with unions nowadays? I don't know. I mean, er, those things were like a dream. Uh... he was like a link in the chain for me, ya know, like I am for other people and like we all are for people. We're all just links in the chain. And, er, there's a certain type of innocence that, um, I never regained again after, uh, maybe, I guess, after he passed away, I don't know. Or, with.. there was an innocence to Woody Guthrie. I know that's what I was looking for, ya know. Um, whether it was real or not or whether it was a dream, who's to say, ya know, but, uh, like a lost innocence or something, ya know. It's hard.. it's just, ya know, it's... after him, it's over, it was over, ya know, it's over.

Spring or Summer 1987
Comments on Richie Valens, highway near Malibu, California

Taken from a long version of the "La Bamba" trailer available on Home Video cassettes only. (Not DVDs).

BD: I remember Richie, yeah, I saw him at one of his last shows.
Q: You did?
BD: Mm-hmm.
Q: What did you think about him? Was he any good?
BD: Was he good? Oh, yeah, he was good, yeah.
Q: Was this 17-year-old a ??? for you? (uninterlligible)
BD: For anybody.

6 August 1987
Tom Petty comments on "Jammin' Me"/"Got My Mind Made Up"

Source: TWM #1080

"That was a real collaboration. We did that by saying the lines out loud to each other from the newspaper. It's hard to tell who wrote that because one guy might have started the sentence and another finished it. Bob came out and said 'I got this idea for a song called Jammin' Me. Like too much information'. So we put a pad down and picked up a newspaper and just started coming up with lines. We had a lot of fun doing it, we wrote 8 or 9 verses. I was playing him the album and he liked the riff from one of the songs and said 'Let's take a riff like that and write a song for me'. So we wrote two songs , one which was on his album Got My Mind Made Up and Jammin' Me, but he never got round to that one. He only did it once in rehearsal. I took it to Mike Campbell because I thought the words were really good and I didn't think the riff was too much. Mike had some great idea for it, so I asked Bob if I could put it on the album and he said sure".

(Tom Petty quoted in a UPI news item, quoted in LONDON FREE PRESS)

24 August 1987
US magazine feature on Elvis' death anniversary

Source: TWM 1081

"US" magazine in the States (24 Aug 1987 issue) took the passing of the anniversary of the death of Elvis Presley to ask some celebrities how they felt. Dylan is quoted:

When I first heard Elvis' voice I just knew that I wasn't going to work for anybody; and nobody was going to be my boss. He is the deity supreme of rock & roll religion as it exists in today's form. Hearing him for the first time was like busting out of jail.

I think for a long time that freedom to me was Elvis singing "Blue Moon of Kentucky". I thank God for Elvis.

September 1987
Time Out story by Simon Garfield

Source: TWM 1105

A story told by TIME OUT reporter Simon Garfield, partly against himself. He sent a hand-written note to Dylan's room: "Dear Robert, Mr Garfield of TIME OUT magazine in London would be delighted to make your acquaintance". Ten minutes elapse before a reply comes back (Presumably in Robert's own hand): "As in the cat?".

6 September 1987
Robert Hilburn interview for Los Angeles Times

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement #10, pp.19-20

Los Angeles Times
Monday, September 7, 1987

BOB DYLAN'S FIRST ISRAEL CONCERT A HITS MISSED AFFAIR
By ROBERT HILBURN

TEL AVIV—"I'll be your baby tonight," Bob Dylan crooned sweetly near the start Saturday night of what observers here described as the most significant rock concert in this young country's existence.

Anyone, however, who expected Dylan to live up to the obliging sentiments of that teasingly romantic song simply didn't know the acclaimed songwriter's long history of independent action.

The result was another dramatic chapter in Dylan's colorful record of heading one way when his audience was looking for him in the opposite direction.

Rather than tailor the show to songs that resolved the questions here about his politics and religion (a concern of part of the audience), or put all his "hits" into a tidy nostalgia package (the hope of a much larger segment), Dylan stuck pretty much to the assortment of interesting but less familiar numbers that he used on several of his recent U.S. dates with the Grateful Dead.

This meant fans eager for "Like a Rolling Stone", "The Times They Are A-Changin'" or other Dylan anthems of the '60s had to listen instead—after waiting up to 20 years to see him in person—for songs like "Joey," "Señor" and "I and I."

The result was like two trains passing in the night. Dylan on one track singing many of the songs that were generally well-received on the Dead tour (but with considerably less bite at times), and the audience on the other, waiting to celebrate the music that had meant so much to them for so long.

The forces finally got together during the encore. Dylan—backed by Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers plus three female vocalists—offered "Blowin' in the Wind," "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" and the evening's big surprise: "Go Down, Moses," a traditional spiritual built around the line, "Let My People Go," one of the most emotional phrases in the Jewish culture.

One song noticeably absent was "Neighborhood Bully." The controversial 1983 song about standing up for one's rights, even with force if necessary, was widely interpreted as a defense of Israel. Sample line: "The neighborhood bully has been driven out of every land / He's wandered the earth an exiled man / Seen his family scattered his people hounded and torn / He's always on trial for just being born."

"I hadn't even thought of that song," Dylan said Sunday, sitting in his hotel room on the Mediterranean. "I probably should have but I didn't. It would seem to be an appropriate song. Maybe I'll play it in Germany," he added, laughing.

Though many in the audience said they were touched by the inclusion of "Go Down, Moses," it wasn't enough to those interviewed after the concert to erase the disappointment of the evening. Some also felt the inclusion of "In the Garden," one of the songs associated with Dylan's born-again Christian period, sent a mixed signal about his current religious stance.

"People I know have been waiting 10 years for the night Bob Dylan would perform in Israel," said a 24-year-old engineer, standing in the rear of the nearly deserted Hayarkon Park after the concert. "And he doesn't do his hits, the songs that we want to hear. What if this is the only time he plays here?"

Still, most of the three dozen fans questioned before and after the concert saw the night as a historic moment and expressed appreciation that Dylan was one of the first major rock artists to perform here.

The show was the opening date in a six-week Dylan-Petty European tour that also includes a Jerusalem concert tonight. (A second Hayarkon Park show Sunday was canceled because of what the promoter said were technical difficulties in getting the equipment from here to Jerusalem.)

Reviewers for Tel Aviv's four largest newspapers, however, weren't interested in the sociology of Dylan's visit. They looked at the evening in the narrowest of entertainment terms, using such words as boring, monotonous, flat and withdrawn to describe his song selection and/or manner. They also said his voice sounded tired.

Before seeing the reviews, Dylan acknowledged Sunday that his performance had been sluggish. "I just couldn't get things rolling on stage," said the bearded singer, who had traveled here for 12, hours by private bus front. Egypt; so he could see the country.

"Maybe it was just that I was tired... jet lag or something. But it happens some nights when you just feel like you are on a sinking boat. There's nothing you can do about it, but I think things started moving toward the end."

Dylan wasn't so willing to concede a problem in the area of song selection. "I don't understand this hits business," he said forcefully.

"I never think about whether a song is a hit. I don't even know what has been a hit some places. We went to France and they asked why I didn't do 'Man Gave Names to All the Animals' [a minor 1979 composition], because they said it was No. 1 there. No 1. And I didn't even know it was released there."

"Besides, you can't just stand there and guess what the audience wants to hear. I went to see Frank Sinatra at the Greek Theatre and he didn't do any of the records from the Capitol days. But I still liked seeing him."

On paper, Dylan's first concert ever in Israel promised to be as one-sided as a fixed prizefight. Here was the most acclaimed songwriter of the rock era playing in Israel's largest city, for an audience that strongly identified not only with his socially-conscious music, but with his Jewish roots. Many of those interviewed in the crowd saw the concert as a public gesture of his support for the country.

And, sure enough, the mood of the nearly 35,000 people was eager and adoring before the concert at the outdoor Hayarkon Park—a sprawling park on the outskirts of the. city, with temporary fences erected in the concert area. With a nearly full moon and perfect temperature, it could have been an ideal California night.

Much of the audience, according to a local observer, consisted of Americans who moved here in the early 70s with old Dylan albums in hand as they searched for the idealism outlined in his songs, and young Israelis who now share many of those ideals.

"The thing about the '60s that is so in with young people here is that Israel right now is like the States in the '60s in some ways," said Matan Hermony, 18, as he waited on the park grass Saturday with friends for the concert gates to open.

A recent high school graduate who enters the compulsory Israeli Army soon, Hermony was one of the several young people questioned who drew parallels between Israel's controversial 1982 Lebanon War and the Vietnam War.

"To tell the truth, I am afraid of war.... I don't want to die. My friends and I turn to songs like 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' because they are very meaningful to us." When Dylan walked on stage, hundreds of fans lit candles in salute, while a few shot off flares that lit the sky.

Younger members of the crowd pressed toward the stage while older ones stood to the sides and rear, a few hugging loved ones. There were lots of misty eyes during 'Blowin' in the Wind.' Even if the show didn't live up to all the audience's long-held dreams, it was a night that few here will forget.

On Sunday, Dylan, who avoids explaining his actions or reflecting on others' interpretations of him, shifted uneasily on his chair when asked if people should interpret his visit here in Big Statement terms. Though he expressed warmth for Israel, he said simply that he is willing to play anywhere people want him.

"I'd like to play Egypt," he said. "You know the Jews and Arabs have the same father. They're brothers. Basically, there shouldn't be a problem between them. They're both Semitic people. If someone is anti-Semitic, they're anti-Arab as much as anti-Jew. The problem is politics."

"I felt right at home in Egypt. I wasn't surprised because Egypt-land is in all our blood. I didn't go to see the Pyramids. I wanted to see the prison where Joseph was in and the place Abraham took Sarah."

27 November 1987
Dylan quotes from Ron Wood on the David Letterman show

Source: TWM1143

Ron Wood and (the wit and wisdom of) Bob Dylan

On 27 November 1987, Ron Wood appeared on the David Letterman show on U.S. television, mainly to promote his new book. This is called RON WOOD: THE WORKS and contains drawings of his famous friends plus his reminiscences. During the programme, he referred to Dylan as "Mr. Zimmerman". In the book and on the programme, he mentions that it was his (that is, Wood's) guitar that Dylan used on his (that is, Dylan's) appearance on the LETTERMAN show, back in March 1983. In the book, he mentions that Dylan was camping out in the grounds of Shangri-La Studios when Eric Clapton was recording NO REASON TO CRY there in early 1976. He talks a little more about their appearance at LIVE AID and one or two other tales.

The following sentence should lift the heart of most readers: "And of course, we've got tons of tracks on tape that may one day see the light of day – things recorded in studios, in basements, hotel rooms".

A couple of stories. Wood mentions that he first met Dylan at a Faces party at The Greenhouse in LA just after he did his first solo album I'VE GOT MY OWN ALBUM TO DO in 1974. Pete Grant introduced himself by saying "Hi, I manage Led Zeppelin" to which Dylan retorted: "Hey, I don't come to you with my problems". A couple of years later, at THE LAST WALTZ, Neil Diamond came off stage and said to Dylan, "You'll have to be pretty good to follow me". Dylan came back with: "What do I have to do, go on stage and fall asleep?"

19/26 December 1987
New Musical Express U2 interview

Source: TWN 1144 excerpt

U2 and Dylan

NEW MUSICAL EXPRESS (19/26 Dec 87) managed a few, most interesting Dylan references in a U2 article/interview. It seems that a part documentary/part 'live shoot' film is being made of their USA tour. A soundtrack LP is planned and one of the songs is a "half-finished U2/Dylan collaboration, Prisoner of Love". They did it at a soundcheck in Nashville.

The article mentions that they recorded half the album at the Sun Studios in Memphis. And also, in a different section, that their recent studio company has included Dylan and B.B. King (another song is 'When love comes to town', originally written for B.B. King). It is not clear whether Dylan's studio presence is limited to one half-written collaboration or not, or even whether this included Dylan's recording involvement or not, nor even whether Dylan's presence was at Sun Studios or not. However, you can bet Dylan would really go for the chance to record at Sun.

In the same article, Bono says Dylan is "very hung up on actually being Bob Dylan". As an example, he says that he and Dylan were trading lines and verses off the tops of their heads; Dylan came up with what Bono calls an "absolute classic", but Dylan then said, "Nah, cancel that" as he thought they were too close to what's expected of him. And the lines:

> I was listenin' to the Neville Brothers, it was a quarter of eight
> I had an appointment with destiny, but I knew she'd come late
> She tricked me, she addicted me, she turned me on my head
> Now I can't sleep with these secrets, that leave me cold and alone in my bed.

1988
Joe Smith interview for his book, "Off the Record: An Oral History of Popular Music"

Source: Off the Record: An Oral History of Popular Music, pp. 163-165.

Bob Dylan

Bob changed the nature of songwriting like no other individual. His impact on what was happening and what was to come is incalculable. And he remains as major a pop star as there ever was.

Little Richard, Carl Perkins, and Jerry Lee Lewis were the people I listened to before I got into folk music. But their scene wasn't happening anymore. It was over. The Kingston Trio and Harry Belafonte stopped having hits in the late-fifties. I heard Leadbelly somewhere and that's what got me into folk music, which was exploding. To me, it seemed like the only thing to do. I had never heard much of it growing up, except the country stuff like Bill Monroe, the Stanley Brothers, and Hank Williams.

New York was the center of activity for folk music, the mecca. Everything was coming out of New York, but I didn't go there as quickly as I could. I managed to get there in a roundabout way. It was all that I ever thought it was supposed to be. It was happening. It was a learning process because there were so many people there who knew more than I did. I picked up on what I could and I worked at it. When I got to New York, there was a small crowd of people my age, but most of the people I met were five to ten years older than I was. As far as I could remember, the scene there stayed that way until the middle-sixties when things started to turn toward more professional-type things.

When I began to record, with the early records, there used to be people in the hallways with songs for me to record. I never used any of them, but I met people who could just sit down at a piano and bang out original songs. I already had my own material, but people were always surprised to find that I was doing only folk songs and my own songs. At that point, I didn't even consider myself a songwriter. Back then I was just carrying on.

All those early songs were first drafts that I never even sang other than when I began to record. Recording was so new to me that when the sessions were scheduled, you had to deliver. You couldn't go into the studio without songs. So whenever my sessions were scheduled to happen, I would just hole up and write songs on the road, or even at the sessions themselves. Today you write a song and think about it and change a few lines. In the old days, you wrote them up in ten minutes and that was it.

I felt passionate about all those songs because I had to sing them. They were written for me to sing, To stand in front of people and sing, I have to care about the songs. As I remember, I cared about all that stuff I wrote about.

I would meet the Top 40 people when I was out on the road, and it was surprising to me that they knew my work. All the club singers who had hit records that I knew of in the late-fifties or early-sixties crossed paths with me, and I knew my work was being perceived out there. To what degree I never knew. I knew my work was appreciated on a pure level, but I didn't know how long these songs would be around. 1 never really could imagine way back then that I'd still be singing the same songs in the eighties.

I wasn't surprised by the reaction I got in 1965 at Newport. Going electric was a natural progression. I had been hanging around with different people, playing different material in small gatherings and at other festivals. Newport got more media attention because it was larger than the other festivals. The way people reacted was nothing I could have prepared for, but by that time I knew pretty much what I was doing onstage.

Anytime there's a change there's a reaction. I'm conscious of criticism. It always bothers you when you think you've been treated unfairly, and I felt I received a lot of unfair criticism from the so-called rock music press. It hurts, but I always managed to get through all that and come out the other side. You get used to it after a while. Music isn't one thing or another. With most good performers you can hear all kinds of music in their music. Most performers who are rock solid you can hear country or gospel in their voices or their instruments. I don't feel that anybody is really bound down by one thing, unless you're George Jones.

People think they know me from my songs. But my repertoire of songs is so wide-ranging that you'd have to be a madman to figure out the characteristics of the person who wrote all those songs. I don't bother much with how people view me. It's hard sometimes to live up to their expectations. I like my audience a lot, and whether it's 50 people or 50, 000 there's immediate feedback on both sides. So I've never really been bothered by preconceived expectations because right there that night the truth always comes out.

Some people want to lock me into the sixties, and that's OK. It's like Paul Kantner of the Airplane said, "If you can remember anything about the sixties, you weren't really there." And that's pretty much correct. I can't imagine people making such a big fuss over the sixties unless things are so dull now that they have to think of some time when things were better. If you think back, it really wasn't that much better. It was tougher in so many ways. I'm not really a nostalgic person so I don't buy into the sixties thing like a lot of people seem to do.

People ask me if it's hard being me. I answer, "To a degree, but it's not any more difficult than being George Michael." You can't really complain about who you are, whoever you are. You just have to make the most of it, and that's all that can be expected of you.

20 January 1988
Rock n' Roll Hall Of Fame Induction, New York City, New York

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 559-560.

Speech given by Bruce Springsteen on January 20, 1988, at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City and Bob Dylan's reply on the occasion of Dylan's induction into the Rock n' Roll Hall Of Fame. Present in the audience were George Harrison, Little Richard, Mick Jagger, Neil Young, Harry Belafonte, Elton John, and over 100 of the greatest names in the history of modern music.

"The first time that I heard Bob Dylan I was in the car with my mother. And we were listening to, I think, maybe WMCA and on came that snare shot that sounded like somebody kicked open a door to your mind... from Like a Rolling Stone. And my mother who was, she was no stiff with rock and roll, she liked music, she listened. She sat there for a minute and she looked at me and she said, 'that guy can't sing.' "

"And... but I knew she was wrong, you know. I sat there, I didn't say nothin'. But I knew that I was listening to the toughest voice that I'd ever heard. It was lean and it sounded somehow simultaneously young and adult. And I ran out and I bought the single and I came home, I ran home and I put it on, the 45, and they must have made a mistake in the factory because a Lenny Welch song came on. And the label was wrong. So I ran back and got it, and I came back and I played it. Then I went out and got Highway 61 and it was all I played for weeks. I looked at the cover with Bob in that satin blue jacket and the Triumph motorcycle shirt. And when I was a kid, Bob's voice, somehow it thrilled and scared me, it made me feel kind of irresponsibly innocent and it still does. It reached down and touched what little worldliness I think a 15-year-old kid in high school in New Jersey had... had in him at the time."

"Dylan, he was a revolutionary. The way that Elvis freed your body, Bob freed your mind. And he showed us that just because the music was innately physical did not mean it was anti-intellect. He had the vision and the talent to expand the pop song until it could contain the whole world. He invented a new way a pop singer could sound. He broke through the limitations of what a recording artist could achieve, and he changed the face of Rock and Roll forever and ever."

"Without Bob, the Beatles wouldn't have made Sergeant Pepper, maybe the Beach Boys wouldn't have made Pet Sound, the Sex Pistols wouldn't have made God Save The Queen, U2 wouldn't have done Pride in the Name of Love, Marvin Gaye wouldn't have done What's Going On? Grand Master Flash might not have done The Message, and The Count Five could not have done Psychotic Reaction. And there would never have been a group named The Electric Prunes, that's for sure. But the fact is that to this day, where great rock music is being made, there is the shadow of Bob Dylan over and over, and Bob's own modern work has gone unjustly underappreciated for having to stand in that shadow. If there was a young songwriter... If there was a young guy out there writing a Sweetheart Like You, writing the Empire Burlesque album, writing Every Grain Of Sand, they'd be calling him the new Bob Dylan."

"That's all the nice stuff I wrote to say. About three months ago, I was watching TV and a Rolling Stone Special came on, and Bob came on. And he was in a real cranky mood. It seemed like he was kind of bitching and moaning about how his fans don't know him, and nobody knows him, and that they come up to him on the street and kind of treat him like a long lost brother or somethin'. And speaking as a fan, I guess when I was 15 I heard Like a Rolling Stone, I heard a guy that, like I've never heard before or since, a guy who had the guts to take on the whole world and made me feel like I had 'em too. Maybe some people mistook that voice to be saying somehow that you were going to do the job for them, and as we know as we grow older, there isn't anybody out there that can do that job for anybody else."

"So I'm just here tonight to say thanks, to say that I wouldn't be here without you, to say that there isn't a soul in this room that does not owe you their thanks. And to steal a line from one of your songs, whether you like it or not, 'You was the brother that I never had.' "

Bob's reply and acceptance speech went:

"Thanks Bruce That was great. Well, I'd like to thank the Board of Directors on the Rock n' Roll Hall of Fame for inducting me. And I want to say hello to Muhammed Ali. I'd like to thank a couple of people who are here tonight who helped me out a great deal coming up – Little Richard, who's sitting over there, I don't think I'd've even started without listening to Little Richard. And Alan Lomax who is over there somewhere too. I spent many nights at his apartment house listening to and meeting all kinds of folk music people which I never would have come in contact with. And I want to thank Mike Love for not mentioning me. And, er... I play a lot of dates every year too. And peace, love and harmony is greatly important indeed, but so is forgiveness, and we've got to have that too. So thanks."

The reference to Mike Love is due to the fact that Love had previously made derogatory comments about other artists.

The Wicked Messenger #1169 gives one more quote from Dylan that appeared in US Rolling Stone:

The Rock n' Roll Hall of Fame Revisited Again

The latest issue of ROLLING STONE out in the States, to no one's surprise, has extensive coverage of the Rock n' Roll Hall of Fame, complete with colour pix, Dylan appearing in seven of them. There were a number of additional points in the text. While other reports mentioned that Elton John was upset because not all his party could sit at the table, this mix-up was caused by the fact that George Harrison had invited Dylan to join him at that table prior to Elton's arrival. In addition, unlike previous years, there was an attempt to organise the jam beforehand. Paul Shaffer went round asking. Dylan's response was "Anything you want", while Bruce said he would, too, if Dylan did "Like A Rolling Stone". Shaffer stated, "Between me and Bill Graham, we made a tentative list and, in our back pocket, we knew we were going to do 'Like A Rolling Stone'".

May(?) 1988
Gabriel Byrne recollections, Tour rehearsals, New York(?)

Source: TWM1250

Quoted in roughly mid-July, actor Gabriel Byrne said this:

“About five weeks ago I was watching Bob Dylan rehearsing in New York for his tour. I’ve always was a huge fan of his, and there we were, Dylan’s girlfriend, his manager, two friends of mine and myself. She said he was in great form and he’d play something for me. He came over and I asked him to play “Clean Cut Kid” and he said “Yeah, that’s a good Bob Dylan song”. He always refers to himself in the third person. When he finished, he said “How’s that for you, Gaybo?”. I was so in awe that I didn’t even hear him play. Eventually I said that was great. What do you say to Bob?”

June(?) 1988
Backtrack / Catchfire / Do It The Hard Way Cameo Appearance

Source: http://imdb.com/title/tt0096875/

Dylan (BD) plays an eccentric visual artist (uncredited). In his only scene (lasting 50 seconds) he converses with Milo played by Dennis Hopper (DH):

BD: I haven't seen Ann Beth in a long time. Her forms aren't exactly simpatico. Who did you say you were working for?

DH: I work for Bank of America. I need a hundred pieces for lobbies up and down the state here. I really need to talk to Ann!

BD: For banks Ann's stuff ain't any good. Too distracting, too literal. Gets in the way of business as usual. Use something less threatening, more abstract. My friend Laddie Dill, he works in concrete.

DH: Yeah, I used to work in concrete, too, shoes. Art! Huh! Fuckin' artist.

20 July 1988
Edna Gundersen interview for USA Today

Source: USA Today, 29 July 1988, p. 04.D

BOB DYLAN ROLLS BACK IN CLASSIC STYLE
USA TODAY – McLean, Va.
By Edna Gundersen

With each emergence, Bob Dylan risks nostalgic references to his glorious past, comparisons that sometimes dismiss him as a waning force, in a state of artistic atrophy.

Not so this summer. Dylan is flexing considerable musical muscle in a quietly launched tour that is becoming the sleeper hit of the season. By popular demand, the tour is being extended through late October and may go to Europe.

In some of the best reviews of his career, critics are praising the pop prophet's impassioned performances. Rolling Stone called his show "extraordinary no-frills rock & roll."

"It's wonderful to be appreciated by the press," Dylan says of the media fanfare. "I've had it both ways and it is definitely better to be looked upon favorably."

Fans are delighting in his decision to revive the classics. He explains, "If I played only songs off the latest record, that would be a disregard for all the songs that got me here."

The tour is generating wide attention, despite an almost unnoticed start June 5 and a dearth of the usual promotional tools: interviews, videos, photo sessions, press conferences.

In a throwback to simpler times, Dylan is letting his raucous roadhouse show do the communicating. He's touring by bus, and after 30 years as traveling troubadour, he still finds the grind gratifying.

"I've never minded touring," he says in his first comments to the press this year. "Touring is part of playing. Anybody can sit in the studio and make records, but that's unrealistic and they can't possibly be a meaningful performer. You have to do it night after night to understand what it's all about.

"I've always loved to travel and play my songs, meet new people and see different places. I love to roll into town in the early morning and walk the deserted streets before anybody gets up. Love to see the sun come up over the highway.

"Then, of course, there's playing on the stage in front of live people, feeling hearts and minds moving. Everybody don't get to do that. Touring to me has never been any kind of hardship. It's a privilege."

His current show is unusual on several fronts:

- Dylan is reaching deep into his catalog, performing chestnuts like Maggie's Farm, Just Like a Woman and Blowin' in the Wind, as well as obscurities like Boots of Spanish Leather, Absolutely Sweet Marie and Joey. Many haven't been performed in more than a decade. Some are radically rearranged. It's an interesting nod to history from an embattled artist who has struggled to shed the icon mantle.

- In an era when rock concerts are increasingly formal and tightly scripted, Dylan modifies the set list nightly. He and the band rehearsed about 75 songs from his repertoire of 600 and have yet to duplicate a show.

"Every time he goes on the stage, he's totally unpredictable," says Dylan spokesman Elliot Mintz. "One reason he does it is to keep the show exciting and fresh for himself. And he's aware people enjoy hearing so many of his great songs."

- Most artists tour primarily to peddle their newest records. Dylan is performing only one song, Silvio, from his current Down in the Groove (Columbia) – a simply arranged, insightful album with cameos by the Grateful Dead, Eric Clapton and Ron Wood.

- Backed by guitarist G.E. Smith (Saturday Night Live), drummer Christopher Parker and bassist Kenny Aaronson, Dylan is clearly the front man, not the shadowed figure next to Tom Petty or the Grateful Dead, with whom he's shared stages in recent years.

- The show is amazingly spare, almost anti-show: subtle lighting, modest equipment, no costumes, no lasers, no pyrotechnics. The low-key visuals allow the audience to hone in on Dylan's vengeful vocals and haunting anthems.

Characteristically, Dylan is humble about the hoopla. Reminded of his induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame this year, he says, "Of course it was a great honor to be included, but more important was the recognition of Leadbelly and Woody (Guthrie), seeing them get the respect they deserve."

5 August 1988
Kathryn Baker Interview, Beverly Hills, California

Sources: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 281-286;
The Stars And Stripes – Wed. September 7, 1988 ("Bob Dylan on Bob Dylan"), p. 17;
The Spectator, 17 September 1988, Hamilton, Ontario, ("Dylan's still on the road and ridin' high").

An interview with Kathryn Baker of Associated Press that was syndicated for publication throughout North America. The interview took place at the Italian restaurant Il Cielo in Beverley Hills following Dylan's three nights at the Greek Theater in Holywood on 2-4 August 1988. This article comes from the Columbia periodical The State of September 16th 1988. Other sources that have been checked include the Stars And Stripes (the U.S. Forces newspaper) of September 7th 1988 which is basically identical in content and the Hamilton Spectator of September 17th 1988 which is just a scaled down version with no additional information or quotes. The Miami News of 23rd September omits quite a few segments but does contain two new paragraphs on Shakespeare which are presented at the end of this transcript.

HE'S 47 AND STILL GOING STRONG

Beverly Hills, Calif – How many times have the rumors spread through some nightspot –"Bob Dylan's supposed to show up?" This time it's no rumor. Dylan is due here soon for a very rare interview. The site of this event is Il Cielo, a lovely Italian restaurant.

The violin music is soothing but it doesn't block out memories of Dont Look Back, the 1967 documentary that included Dylan's razor-tongued evisceration of a hapless magazine reporter, or the more recent snippet in the Rolling Stone 20th anniversary TV special that showed Dylan bitterly complaining about fans who dare to approach him because his songs have touched them. "That has nothing to do with me", he griped.

Dylan doesn't make an entrance, he materializes, slipping in through the back. He is polite, subdued, nervous about doing an interview. After settling in a chair, he checks all around him like a skittish colt suddenly released into an unfamiliar corral. He puts the ubiquitous sunglasses on the table, quietly dismisses mineral water, accepts white wine, asks "Will it bother you if I smoke?". Invited to go ahead, he takes out a packet of Salems. He says he quits occasionally. He sits forward and answers questions earnestly, looking directly at the interviewer with his big blue eyes.

Dylan looks fit at 47, and he isn't slowing down. He's on his third tour in three years, just released Down In The Groove, his seventh LP in eight years and is already thinking of another for next year when he also hopes to tour the Soviet Union. He's also planning to launch a movie and TV production company.

He has just completed three high-energy, sell-out performances at Los Angeles Greek Theatre. Since going on the road in June. Dylan is proving that, far from being over the hill, he's at the top of his form.

The tour has drawn critical raves and has been extended at least through Oct. 16-19 when he'll do a four-night stand at New York's Radio City Music Hall, his first performance at the legendary theater.

Backed by a tight, three-piece rock band led by guitarist G. E. Smith of Saturday Night Live renown, Dylan has rejuvenated his classic material, resurrecting such gems as Boots Of Spanish Leather, Times They Are A-Changin' and Masters Of War.

"When I'm singin' my songs, it never occurs to me that I wrote them," Dylan says.

"If I didn't have a song like Masters Of War, I'd find a song like Masters Of War to sing. Same thing with Times They Are A-Changin'. If I didn't have a song like that, I'd go out and look around and I'd search around until I found one like that, you know."

There's a line in Masters Of War about being afraid to bring children into the world. Dylan, now divorced, has five.

"I don't sing that line," he jokes. "I love children. I always taught that if you were blessed to have them, you just had more of them. They're protection from the world."

His eldest daughter just married, suggesting a possible new phase in his life. The rebel voice of the 1960's is after all nearing 50.

"I wouldn't mind being a grandfather, or a great grandfather for that matter," he says, "but I don't know if that has anything to do with age. I know people in their 30's who are grandparents. I don't know how old I am. I mean, people tell me how old I am, but I have no way of knowing if they're tellin' me the truth or not."

When his children were young he moved them from New York to Malibu, Calif., to protect them from the effects of fame and "so they grow up in a little more country environment, at least hear the birds singing."

"There's just something instinctive that tells me that a man must support his family, no matter what. As it is, I'm doing what I do because I've been given to do it," he says.

"But most of the people who work 9 to 5 have got to support families, and there's a tremendous disregard for that. You don't see much of that being heralded with heroic words and fancy awards. But that's what makes the world either rise or fall, that commitment to family."

The lead song on Down In The Groove – the Wilbert Harrison blues song, Let's Stick Together – echoes that sentiment. "It might be tough for a while, you might consider the child / Cannot be happy without his mom and his pappy; let's stick together..."

The album surprised some critics because it is mostly covers of other composers songs. There are only two Dylan originals, plus two collaborations with Grateful Dead songwriter Robert Hunter, including the single Silvio.

Dylan said he picked the other material because he liked it. Down In The Groove establishes Dylan as recording artist with the strength of style to transcend the source of the material.

"There's no rule that claims that anyone must write their own songs," he says. "And I do. I write a lot of songs. But so what, you know? You could take another song somebody else has written and you can make it yours. I'm not saying I made a definitive version of anything with this last record, but I liked the songs. Every so often you've gotta sing songs that're out there. You just have to, just to keep yourself straight."

The other reason for the others is inevitable. He didn't have enough material of his own for an album.

"Writing is like such an isolated thing. You're in such an isolated frame of mind," he says. "You have to get into or be in that place. In the old days, I could get to it real quick. I can't get to it like that no more. It's not that simple."

"I mean, just being able to shut yourself off for long periods of time, where you're so isolated no one can get to you, mentally or physically, you know? You need to be able to do that in order to come up with that kind of stuff."

"You're always capable of it in your youth and especially if you're an unknown and nobody cares – like if you're an anonymous person. But once that all ends, then you have to create not only what you want to do, but you have to create the environment to do it in, which is double-hard."

"I don't write about things," he says, "I write from inside of something, and I sing and play the same way. It's never about that 'something', hoping to touch it. It's rather from the inside of it reaching out."

Dylan said that he does have five or six songs for a new album. And he's part of an incognito group, The Wilburys, that includes George Harrison, Roy Orbison and Tom Petty and has an album coming out later this year.

In the past few years, he's concentrated on touring – with the Grateful Dead, Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, now with this pared-down band that has Dylan alone out front most of the time, performing selections from the vast catalog of an almost 30-year career. Nobody would blame him for just putting his feet up for a while.

"I really don't have any place to put my feet up," he laughs. "Well, we want to play 'cause we want to play... Why tour? It's just that you get accustomed to it over the years. The people themselves will tell you when to stop touring."

This tour has brought Dylan the critical praise that seems tougher for him to come by than it is for other artists. He seems to be held up to a higher standard because of his own bigger-than-life image, and that irritates him.

"It's irritating. It's real irritating," he says. "It's not that somebody can't come and not like what you're doing, that's OK. But I've done tours before where people got real personal with their reviews in a real early time when we were on the road, and for some reason all the towns that we were about to play, they'd like to pick these things up. So it was like intentionally telling people to stay away."

"I don't know. I go through a lot of that, and then even when you're not doing what they say you're doing, people expect to see that. It's like when we were playing after being booed in Newport or something (in 1965 he brought an electric band to the folk festival). I mean, for the next six months, people want to see that same show that got booed, and they want to boo to."

He is interrupted: Does he have a request for the restaurant's violinist? "Sure," he says, "Love Me Or Leave Me".

Dylan's unexpected tastes and perspectives often perplex his public though he insists he is not, as frequently described, "enigmatic".

"I don't know what that word means," he protests.

"I would like to think that I couldn't be categorized. Who wants to be categorized? That happens because of all the stuff I do, not because of who I am or anything. And I don't even know if that's a true fact because that's nothing much to concern me. You can't make it too long on being an enigma."

If his critics can't categorize him they certainly can't accuse him of playing it safe. He seems to depend on literary and spiritual references that keep him constantly searching for new influences.

He stunned the public in 1979 when he came out with the emotional gospel LP Slow Train Coming. The lead song, Gotta Serve Somebody, won him his only Grammy, an honor he considers "an accident". The album was one of Dylan's strongest ever and went platinum (1 million copies sold).

"Gospel music is about the love of God. And commercial music is about the love of sex," Dylan says.

After following up with Saved and Shot Of Love, Dylan, who was born Jewish, seemed to drift away from the Jewish message, though themes of redemption tinged Infidels and Empire Burlesque.

His current religious leanings are the object of speculation. "Religion has nothing to do with faith," is all he'll say publicly on the subject. But another of his gospel songs, Death Is Not The End, turned up on Down In The Groove.

So did the Tin Pan Alley tune When Did You Leave Heaven. And at a recent concert he delighted the crowd by bursting into I'm In The Mood For Love.

Last year he appeared on a PBS tribute to George Gershwin. He was surprised when the producers invited him to participate. "I said, Are you sure? You sure there might not be another Bob Dylan?"

Dylan has always been intrigued by Gershwin's music, he says, " 'cause it sounds like sophisticated city stuff, but there's a country, backwood, alley cat element to it that for some reason he was able to capture."

"There are smells and tastes in these songs for some reason. And I was used to hearing Nina Simone sing a lot of George Gershwin songs a few years back, and they were very close to the folk songs that I was singing."

Folk songs have an honored place in Dylan's current repertoire, a purposeful homage to his roots. He plays the standards Barbara Allen and Golden Vanities on stage, and included his own arrangement of Shenandoah on Down In The Groove.

Earlier this year, he was inducted into the Rock n' Roll Hall Of Fame and played Like A Rolling Stone, the anthem of the rock generation, at the ceremony. But folk music is in his heart. He contributed a cut to the recent LP honoring Leadbelly and Woody Guthrie. Born Robert Zimmerman in Minnesota – he later legally changed his name – Dylan migrated to New York in part to visit Guthrie in the hospital. He soon became a sensation playing his songs of biting social commentary in Greenwich Village. But he infuriated folk purists when he took up the electric guitar by the mid 60's. Ironically, Dylan is now in a better position than the purists to champion folk music in the 80's.

"People don't know folk songs anymore," he says "I mean hardly anybody sings them anymore, and people think that people who play the acoustic guitar and write their own songs are folk singers, but that's not necessarily true. They're writing their own songs but they're not really based on anything. So I thought, well, if I'm going around again, I'm going to sing folk songs, because, first of all, I love 'em, and the lyrics in them are – I mean, they're incredible stories, and that's where I got a lot of my stuff from in the early years – and still do. Folk songs are still better, even though they're not commercial, they're still better than 90 percent of the stuff you hear on the radio."

From the Miami Times:

"Have you ever seen a Shakespeare play? I mean, it's like the English language at it's peak where one line will come out like a stick of dynamite, and you'll be so what-was-that! But then the other stuff is rolling on so fast you can't even think, and then you have to struggle to catch up to where you are in the present. And folk songs are pretty much like the same way."

"Of course, nobody writes like Shakespeare either," he said, "But you know, it don't matter. Those things can still be performed. They don't have to be written – just like folk songs."

8 September 1988
Rolling Stone Feature

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1081-1082.

From Rolling Stone, September 8th, 1988 – Feature entitled The 100 Best Singles of The Last Twenty-Five Years

LIKE A ROLLING STONE Bob Dylan Columbia May 15th, 1965

"DYLAN WAS A REVOLUTIONARY" Declared Bruce Springsteen when he inducted Bob Dylan into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame last January. "The way that Elvis freed your body Bob freed your mind." Like a Rolling Stone the single that brought Bob Dylan into the Top Ten for the first time, must be counted among his most liberating forays.

Dylan, who rose to prominence as a folk singer in the early Sixties, had not yet fully defined his electric sound at the time of the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited in 1965. Consequently it was an unlikely combination of players who turned up at CBS Studios in New York City to help record Like a Rolling Stone. According to the critic Ed Ward, Dylan's ironclad dictum for the late blues guitarist Michael Bloomfield was "I don't want any of that B.B. King shit." Al Kooper, then a session guitarist, was too intimidated by Bloomfield to play guitar. Instead, he begged the producer, Tom Wilson, to let him sit in on organ.

Asked about the song today, Dylan responded with this statement which he asked to be printed as it stands:

> The song was written on an old upright piano in the key of G-sharp, then later at Columbia Recording Studios transferred to the key of C on the guitar. The chorus part came to me first and I'd sorta hum that over and over: then later figured out that the verses would start low and move on up The first two lines which rhymed "kiddin' you" with "didn't you" just about knocked me out; and later on, when I got to the jugglers and the chrome horse and the princess on the steeple, it all just about got to be too much. I recorded it last on a session after recording a bunch of other songs. We took an acetate of it down to my manager's house on Gramercy Park and different people kept coming and going and we played it on the record player all night. My music publisher just kept listening to it shaking his head saying "Wow man, I just don't believe this". An A&R man from Columbia Records was also there. He kept saying this is gonna be a hit single and couldn't be cut. He was anticipating people at the record label saying it was going to be too long. I think that was a big thing to overcome at that time, the length of the song.

Indeed, when it hit the airwaves in the summer of 1965, Like a Rolling Stone upended every established idea about what a single should be. Against the concision of most Top Forty fare, the song – which ran for more than six minutes – heightened awareness about the limitations of that format and hastened the inception of more progressive FM stations.

Dylan's idiosyncratic singing greatly expanded the range of vocal styles that could be heard on mainstream radio, and the songs lyrics – which attacked pretense and social privilege with vengeful glee – broadened the themes artists could tackle. In the heady days of 1965, it seemed that if a song so ambitious, uncompromising and innovative could be a Top Ten hit, anything was possible The tough poetic voice of Like a Rolling Stone has inspired an incalculable number of equally individualistic voices to rise up and join it over the past twenty-three years.

7 November 1988
Donny Lalonde vs. Sugar Ray Leonard fight, Las Vegas, NV

Source: The Ring March 1989 issue, as quoted in RTS #16, p.9.

WHO HIT DONNY LALONDE?

Dylan's friendship with boxer Donny Lalonde has already been observed – as indeed was a be-shaded Dylan on the video of the Lalonde–Sugar Ray Leonard championship fight. However in the March 1989 issue of 'The Ring', the US's premiere fight magazine, there's an account of Dylan's appearance at the fight by Phil Woolever. Woolever reports that Dylan "sat restlessly, staring ahead" throughout he fight. Pretty strange behaviour! It seems Bob was in Lalonde's dressing room before the fight and some of his "acoustic classics" were used to psych the fighter up. "Dylan looked like someone you could talk about the fights with. It was a correct impression" Woolever reports. "I'm not a fight fan, I just like to watch guys I know fight," said Bob. However "Dylan's eyes came to life as he spoke of long jabs to the body, crashing right hands.." When Golden Boy Lalonde was finally knocked over, Bob was naturally disappointed. "I thought it was sad," he confessed, "I thought Donny was gonna go a little longer, ya know?

9 February 1989
Rolling Stone featurette on Stevie Wonder

Source: RTS #16, p.9.

GENIUS IS A TERRIBLE WORD

The February 9 issue of Rolling Stone (The Hall Of Fame issue) had an extensive quote from Bob Dylan, speaking the praises of inductee Stevie Wonder: "If anybody can be called a genius, he can be. I think it has something to do with his ear, not being able to see or whatever. I go back with him to about the early '60s, when he was playing at the Apollo with all that Motown stuff. If nothing else, he played the harmonica incredible, I mean truly incredible. Never knew what to think of him really until he cut Blowin' In The Wind. That really blew my mind, and I figured I'd better pay attention. I was glad when he did that Rolling Stones tour, cuz it opened up his scene to a whole new crowd of people, which I'm sure has stuck with him over the years. I love everything he does. It's hard not to. He can do gut-bucket funky stuff really country and then turn around and do modern-progressive whatever you call it. In fact, he might have invented that. he is a great mimic, can imitate everybody, doesn't take himself seriously and is a true roadhouse musician all the way, with classical overtones, and he does it all with drama and style. I'd like to hear him play with an orchestra. He should probably have his own orchestra."

June 1989
El Diario Vasco Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 743-744.

The following interview, conducted by an unknown individual, took place in Los Angeles just before Dylan flew to Europe and was reported as being between recording and preparing his next film. It appeared in the Spanish periodical 'El Diario Vasco' on June 18 1989. The text might not seem typical Dylanese, but note that this was translated from English into Spanish and later back to English again, clearly losing some of Bob's "eloquence" along the way. However, eloquently translated by Inaki Aguirrezebal.

BOB DYLAN: «LLEVO MUCHOS ANOS A FLOTE; POR ALGO SERA»

Dylan arrived in San Sebastian in the early morning and hid away in the hotel until the hour of the concert, registered as Donald Pump.

DV: What is the film about?

BD: It's the most exciting plan I've been involved in. The film is more than a film starring Bob Dylan. Being sincere on it's own is not enough. You are mistaken, if you are not sincere with your heart you have failed. But I cannot say what it's about until we start to shoot. The film is going to signify a lot. If you could say what, you direct it! But I can't tell you, the same as I can't explain my songs. It's a sense of reality that I assume and the majority of people who listen to me are going to understand. It will work on a level of reality where we can meet me and my work. There are things which can't be explained.

DV: Bob Dylan is known for his weakness for women. Why?

BD: I think the majority of women are beautiful. Many of them seem as if they have come out of a picture. They are vulnerable and also strong.

DV: You said in an interview a few years ago "Goddesses are not real".

BD: A beautiful woman is like a goddess. She is on a pedestal.

DV: During the filming of Renaldo & Clara you improvised a lot with his character and Joan Baez contributed to the bedroom scenes.

BD: Joan knew me very well in and out of bed so we were able to make the scenes realistic and entertaining for the audience.

DV: Do you think you've reached the top?

BD: How many years have I been afloat? Many. There must be some reason for it.

DV: Elvis Presley?

BD: A relic from the past.

DV: Frank Sinatra?

BD: He is on the way to becoming a relic. When that happens to me I'll retire.

DV: Bob Dylan?

BD: I will carry on traveling up the road.

DV: Until when?

BD: It depends on several things, like the public, my dreams and how much strength I have left. (Smiling, he said) Why, I'm like any other person, just about managing to stay afloat.

AT THE CROSSROADS:
IN RELATION TO HIS CURRENT ATTITUDE ON THE WOMAN FRONT BOB IS NOT TOO SPECIFIC

BD: I am at a kind of crossroads in my life which I am able to endure. I can feel the attraction but also I can manage to distance myself. I admire beauty more than anything but now I don't feel I must possess it. The ideal man or woman does not exist. When you sing to someone you don't actually sing to a man or a woman. You sing to someone to arouse something in them which is buried and once this person has found it you begin to relate and you want to continue doing it, and then you stay with that person. But two people who are in love are not just the property of one another. There's a third element intermingled and this third element is an ideal. They owe it to one another to love the same ideal and this is what they ought to share. If this doesn't exist, it's not love. That's important.

DV: Is it true that during your bad periods when everything seems to be a waste of time, you prefer to be with animals or spend more time with your children because they are more straightforward and less confusing?

BD: The worst time of my life was when I tried to find something in the past. Like when I went back to New York for the second time. I didn't know what to do. Everything had changed. I also tried to sing and write at the same time which sometimes drove me mad. To write is one thing and to sing is something completely different. One opposes the other and I can't write with the energy with which I perform and I can't perform with the same energy with which I write.

DV: Lots of times you've said that you have had to fight. Against what?

BD: With the past. When I conjure up a picture from the past it's almost something masochistic. I've had splendid moments that I want to save. I have been in the darkness... now I want to concentrate solely on the light.

21 September 1989
Edna Gundersen interview for USA Today

Source: Rolling Telegraph Supplement, no 19, by Clinton Heylin, pp. 26-28.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1989 USA TODAY
Dylan on 'Mercy,' for the record
By Edna Gundersen
USA TODAY

LOS ANGELES — Bob Dylan's new album, Oh Mercy (Columbia), is being hailed by critics as his best in years.

And what does Bob Dylan say? The 10 songs were among the easiest he's written.

"Most of them are stream-of-consciousness songs," he says, "the kind that come to you in the middle of the night, when you just want to go back to bed."

"The harder you try to do something, the more it evades you. These weren't like that."

Like Prince, Dylan is unpredictable and not given to explaining career moves or work habits. Rare clues are hungrily gobbled by fans and peers. He recently detailed the making of Oh Mercy, poised to sweep critics' year-end lists.

Last year's Down in the Groove included six cover songs. This time, Dylan chose to use only originals, partly to appease his label. Oh Mercy is the first record on a new contract, "so it's good to have your own songs, at least on the first one," he says with a laugh.

He also felt compelled to recommit himself to songwriting and recording.

"Some people quit making records," he says. "They just don't care about it anymore. As long as they have their live stage show together, they don't need records. It was getting to that point for me. It was either come up with a bunch of songs that were original and pay attention to them or get some other real good songwriters to write me some songs. I couldn't find any other songs."

At the urging of U2 singer Bono, Dylan teamed with producer Daniel Lanois (U2, Peter Gabriel) who in turn enlisted New Orleans musicians.

"Bono had heard a few of those songs and suggested that Daniel could really record them right," Dylan says. "Daniel came to see me when we were playing in New, Orleans last year and... we hit it off. He had an understanding of what my music was all about."

"It's very hard to find a producer that can play," Dylan says. "A lot of them can't even engineer. They've just got a big title and know how to spend a lot of money. It was thrilling to run into Daniel because he's a competent musician and he knows how to record with modern facilities. For me, that was lacking in the past."

"He managed to get my stage voice, something other people working with me never were quite able to achieve."

Generally, Dylan finds studios confining and artificial. Unlike colleagues of his stature, he is ill at ease with huge, budgets and long stints in "factory-oriented" studios.

"The meter's running all the time," he says. "The cost is unrealistic. I mean, you could put up a wing of a hospital!"

Last spring in Lanois' New Orleans studio, "Daniel just allowed the record to take place any old time, day or night" Dylan says. "You didn't have to walk through secretaries, pin-ball machines and managers and hangers-on in the lobby and parking lots and elevators and arctic temperatures."

Dylan also embraced Lanois' counsel, granting carte blanche in shaping the brooding atmospherics. Typically, producers cowed by Dylan's brilliance keep hands-off, which may account for untailored results in the past Dylan prefers a take-charge, producer, "someone who knows my music inside out saying, 'You could do better than that you could surpass that.' "

"Me being me is just one person," he says. "You need help to make a record, In all the decisions that go into making a record. People expect me to bring in a Bob Dylan song, sing it and then they record it. Other people don't work that way. There's more feedback."

Interview and review, 1D

He's still painting his masterpiece
By Edna Gundersen
USA TODAY

LOS ANGELES — Bob Dylan, whose biting lyrics and cogent nasal vocals revolutionized rock, finds himself tongue-tied meeting the press.

"These things usually make me clam up," admits the 48-year-old singer/songwriter shortly after arriving at a hotel suite for a rare interview. "You feel you're supposed to deliver some kind of great profound statement. You can't push people to respond to you. They either do or they don't."

Most do. Dylan, a musical chameleon, reluctant icon and willful nonconformist, has commanded attention since his first album was released in 1962. Less visible on charts in the '80s, he remains one of rock's most prolific and influential figures, steadily performing, recording and defying expectations.

Oh Mercy, out this week, is the 35th LP in his staggering catalog. Rolling Stone, Time, Musician, the Los Angeles Times and Philadelphia Inquirer have weighed in with raves. Critics also are applauding his trio-backed tour, which began in June and continues indefinitely.

Dylan and George Harrison are discussing a follow-up to last year's extraordinary Traveling Wilburys collaboration with Tom Petty, Jeff Lynne and the late Roy Orbison. Dylan, who lives in Malibu, is looking into film production opportunities and is stockpiling songs for his next LP. Clearly, the archetype of folk/rock is eyeing the '90s. The embodiment of '60s counterculture Is fed up with nostalgia.

"From '66 on, I was trying to raise a family and that was contrary to the whole epidemic of the '60s," says the divorced father of five. "Most people were running away from home and trying to get away from their parents. That was never intentional on my part, trying to run away from anything. My family was more important to me than any kind of generational '60s thing. Still is. To find some meaning in the '60s for me is real far-fetched."

During 2½ hours, Dylan sips coffee, smokes six Marlboros and resists invitations to reveal personal details. Cagey, guarded and fidgety, he's also affable, polite and self-deprecating, speaking in a throaty drawl and sometimes wondering aloud if he's saying anything interesting.

He wears jeans worn at the knees, snakeskin cowboy boots, a turquoise sweatshirt and a black leather jacket he never removes. Tousled brown curls and a sparse beard frame a face set with penetrating blue eyes. Now and then, an engaging boyish smile melts his grim concentration.

A quarter-century ago, his Like a Rolling Stone and Positively 4th Street were high on the charts. Bobby Zimmerman of Hibbing, Minn., had become, literally, a folk hero. Not fond of reminiscing, he is hard-pressed to nail down highlights: a tent concert with ex-lover Joan Baez, maybe a 1978 show in England.

"It's not a good habit to think, 'This was such a great show,' because you've got to play another one the next night. Maybe it was great, but so what? It's over."

Dylan's early gems — Maggie's Farm, Subterranean Homesick Blues, Mr. Tambourine Man — are classic rock radio staples and the backbone of his shows. Does the focus on his initial work suggest he's painted his masterpiece?

"An easy way out would be to say, 'Yeah, it's all behind me, that's it and there's no more.' But you want to say there might be a small chance that something up there will surpass whatever you did."

"Everybody works in the shadow of what they've previously done. But you have to overcome that."

Since arriving in the limelight with an arsenal of brilliant songs, Dylan has been dogged by his myth—enigma, guru, protest prophet in defense, he became a master of masquerades, protecting his privacy behind smokescreens. Now he shrugs at mention of his image.

"It's been years since I've read anything about myself. (People) can think what they want and let me be. You can't let the fame get in the way of your calling."

"Everybody is entitled to lead a private life. Then again, God watches everybody, so there's nothing really private, there's nothing we can hide. As long as you're exposing everything to the power that created you, people can't uncover too much."

Biographies and articles that speculate on his musical motives or love life are "not even worth responding to," Dylan says. "All that's important is who really knows you, who really cares for you. There's only a few people in your life you care to have know everything about you. It's not important to set the record straight It's more important to keep myself together and be able to function."

Dylan stoked curiosity and controversy from the start. He shocked folk purists by going electric at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival. And the Jewish-born singer's conversion to Christianity in the late 1970s and subsequent trilogy of Christian-themed albums baffled all. The press labeled Dylan "born-again." His Dylanesque response now: "If that's what was laid on me, there must have been a reason for it."

"Whatever label is put on you, the purpose of it is to limit your accessibility to people. There had been so many labels laid on me in the past that it didn't matter anymore at that point What more could they say?"

As for the content of those three LPs and subsequent releases, Dylan says, "You'd never hear me saying that stuff is religious one way or the other. To me, it isn't. It's just based on my experience in daily matters, what you run up against and how you respond to things."

"People who work for big companies, that's their religion. That's not a word that has any holiness to it."

Often declared pop's greatest living songwriter, Dylan considers himself a singer first "My reason for getting into songwriting was having something to sing. My songs aren't written for great singers. They're written for me."

He jots ideas and lyric fragments in a notebook, and pares songs to skeletal simplicity. "I make it as small or as narrow as possible rather than make it a big, broad, grand thing. By keeping it so narrow, emotion plays a great part."

And he writes with performing, not recording, in mind. "The song is going to live or die" on stage, he says. "On record, it's deceiving. You hear it in privacy, so it creates its own world when it plays itself for you. But when you see that person doing it live, you can tell if it's real or somebody up there wasting your time or faking it. Faking it is real popular."

Though his set list changes radically, Dylan's signature Like a Rolling Stone crops up almost nightly. He's never tired of it. "I always play as if nobody out there has ever heard of me. If you don't do that, you get too complacent and you can't read a crowd. You start assuming too many things."

Dylan assumes audiences want to hear his songs, not his speeches, so he seldom utters a syllable, reasoning, "It just doesn't seem relevant anymore. It's not stand-up comedy or a stage play. Also, it breaks my concentration to have to think of things to say or to respond to the crowd. The songs themselves do the talking. My songs do, anyway."

Once mercurial and acid-tongued, he says time tempered his nature.

"I feel like I've gotten a lot more tolerant of everything." Dylan says, laughing self-consciously. "I don't ascend and descend as much—mood swings and what have you. I'm trying to stay away from anything that even has an air of getting under my skin."

21 October 1989
Adrian Deevoy Interview, Narragansett, Rhode Island

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, 1083-1090.

This interview was conducted in Dylan's hotel room in Narragansett, Rhode Island on October 21st 1989. Dylan had performed the day before in Poughkeepsie, New York and was to perform the following day at the University of Rhode Island. This was published in Issue 39 of Q Magazine (December 1989). Adrian Deevoy, staff writer for Q had been led quite a song and dance to obtain this interview and the first half of his article provides background details (these have been omitted here, but do make interesting reading)

Apparently, Kramer offered Deevoy advice on how to "discuss the best way to talk to Bob."

- Don't treat it like an interview. It has to be a conversation. Bob will clam up or wander off if you fire a volley of questions at him. Try not, in fact, to ask any question.
- Do not treat him like a God. It wigs him out.
- Don't ask who Mr. Jones is or the motorcycle crash, any of that corny Dylanologist stuff.
- Don't pretend you know about anything you don't. He'll see through you straight away.
- Don't attempt to get the ultimate Dylan interview. Do not attempt to delve into his soul. He finds it insulting.
- Don't ask what specific lyrics mean.
- Don't dredge up old out-of-context quotes. He won't answer you.
- Don't use notes. Bob feels it inhibits the conversation. And finally, if you must use a tape recorder try not to make a big deal about it. He may not feel like having his voice recorded.

And now for the essential part of the article.

We arrive at the seaside chalet where Dylan is staying in Narragansett just in time to see his tour bus pulling away into the sunset. For the first time yet, Kramer panics and instructs the driver to "follow that bus" and pull out in front of it in a manly Miami Vice-like maneuver. Amid much dust and screeching of brakes the bus is stopped and its doors opened to reveal one shaken driver but no Dylan. "We got him!" whoops Kramer. "He's in his room."

The room is low-ceilinged, wooden and so cramped Dylan would have to step outside to change his mind. Mercifully he does neither. The double bed almost touches the four walls. You observe that it has been subjected to some recent blanket-rumpling action. Outside, the ocean sighs. There is no telephone. A girl of handsome Scandinavian aspect sits silently in one corner, flaxen curtains of hair covering her eyes. A rhinoceros in a dog-suit – whose name is sometimes only known to Dylan and sometimes Late For Dinner – is curled up on the floor, casting a wary eye at the visitors, shifting occasionally because it is lying on a Wellington boot.

The Wellington – shiny and black with a red toe cap – contains, as does its fellow boot, Bob Dylan's leg. The legs are positioned maybe a foot from a vast, flickering TV screen. Dylan stares at the unfocused set seemingly engrossed in a program in which a fat lady is explaining the no-nonsense way to make a giant Swiss roll.

Then he looks up, smiles like a sleepy child and rises a trifle unsteadily to greet us. He is wearing a brace of anoraks – one waterproof and black, one hooded and leather. The sea-spray on the latter, the tousled tresses blown flat by the breeze and the exhausted dog, now asleep, suggest an energetic stroll along the beach earlier this evening. The small stain on the pale pastel sweat shirt alludes unfortunately to the recent ingestion of baked beans. His jeans, in the autumn of their life, are instantly familiar to any Dylan trouser-enthusiast worth his salt as those worn on the '75 Rolling Thunder tour. The narrow cheeks are unevenly thatched with sparse beard, his eyes are laughing and electrically blue. He is, dare one say it these days, quite beautiful. You can't help but notice also that his very famous nose – hooked and noble – is running.

He exudes a saintly dignity that fills this admittedly tiny room and possibly quite a bit of the adjoining bathroom. Whatever charisma is, you are swiftly made aware, Bob Dylan has it king size, on ice, deluxe, by appointment, club class, squared, plus VAT, with fries to go.

So what do you say to this legend? How can you impress upon him that your intentions are honorable, that you are on his side, that you deeply respect his immeasurable contribution to popular music, poetry, culture, the arts, your life? Crikey! Here goes.

How the devil are you?

Will he storm out? Will he rasp, "What do you mean 'devil'?" and launch into a terrifying verbal assault? Will he mutter darkly about one-legged kings on a savior's chocolate moped? Funnily enough, he does none of these. Instead, he laughs, a coarse staccato giggle – heh, heh, heh and extends a warm, remarkably soft right hand boasting a yellow inch-long thumb nail.

Then he speaks. "Yeah." he says, "very good." And he laughs again, revealing, if anything, a slight nervousness. The charming soft "r" sound – "vewry" – that launched a thousand speech impediments in the '60s isn't nearly as prominent in his speaking voice. Although it's reassuring to note later that, he does pronounce "bury" so that it rhymes with "marry" and actually talks in the strangely italicised manner you hear on his records, invariably choosing to emphasise the wrong word in the sentence.

BD: You gotta sit here on the bed with me, (he says innocently.) We'll talk here.

He smoothes the eiderdown and pats the space next to him. The girl perches on a pillow at the head of the bed. Kramer lies behind us. Dylan puts his hand on the tape recorder. "See what you need to do with this," he offers moving closer, "is this." He wedges the machine between our hips. "That should be OK there." By now he is virtually on my lap. He smells musty yet sweet, like a baby who smokes 20 a day. It's a ludicrous situation and not a little fresh for a first date.

AD: It's very good to meet you at last.
BD: Thank you, (he says politely and bursts out laughing.) Heh, heh, heh...
AD: Tell me about the live thing. The last tour has gone virtually straight into this one.
BD: Oh, (he begins establishing brief, cautious eye contact.) it's all the same tour. The Never Ending Tour...
AD: What's the motivation to do that?
BD: Well, (his eyes move back to the giant Swiss roll [now ready for the oven]), it works out better for me that way. You can pick and choose better when you're just out there all the time and your show is already set up. You know, you just don't have to start it up and end it. It's better just to keep it out there with breaks, you know, with extended breaks.
AD: Does that lend itself to reassessing stuff. The songs are being constantly reinterpreted almost.
BD: Like which one? (he asks quickly.) Like what? People do say that. To me it's never different. To me... there's never any change.
AD: The live show is quite improvisational.

BD: It can be, (he smirks.) Some nights more than others! Heh, heh. Some nights it's very structured. Some nights it just sticks right to the script and other nights it'll skip.

AD: What makes it take off?

BD: It's hard to say. It's hard to say. It's the crowd that changes the songs.

AD: You stopped playing the harmonica for a while recently...

BD: Uh... yeah, (he looks confused.) When was that? Oh yeah. Sometimes I do, yeah. Those are the things that get set up and it's hard to bury them. Once there's no harmonicas on the stage you don't play them. Then there's always some problem with harmonicas.

AD: Like picking up the wrong one...

BD: That can be very unfortunate when that happens, (he frowns.) You've probably seen that happen a few times. Heh heh heh. Very unfortunate. You can be playing an entire harmonica solo and not be able to hear it and you'll be in the wrong key. You can usually tell by the faces in the crowd, you look and see if it's in the right key. If it's in the wrong key it's, Aauugh! (He puts his hands over his ears and grimaces.) Then you can make an adjustment to it. Heh heh heh.

AD: What about your piano playing? (His technique has been likened to a man constructing a treehouse).

BD: My piano playing is very, very elementary, (he shrugs.) It's either keyboard or guitar orientated. My stuff isn't too keyboard orientated but it can be. Can be. My tonality is very simple. It's very... uh... three chord stuff. It's not like Elton John where he can modulate within the same phrase or the same bar. That sort of stuff. It depends what you can hear in your head.

AD: What about your voice? Are you pleased with the way it's sounding at the moment?

BD: Mmmmm... (he smiles inscrutably.) Ah, that's a thing that's very hard to really pin down. You know, whether you want it that way or not. Trying to adjust the moods of the different songs can be tricky sometimes.

AD: Do you ever feel limited by it? (Dylan is warming to the subject now.)

BD: Yeah. Sure. My voice is very limiting. Vocally it's just good enough for me. It's good for my songs. It really is good for my songs. My type of songs.

AD: You can't imagine Pavarotti singing one of your songs?

BD: It wouldn't suit that kind of material in a big way, (he deadpans).

AD: What was your relationship with Lanois like?

BD: Very good.

He has now settled into a pattern of unnervingly regular eye-contact. The Swiss roll is consigned to history.

My feeling and my hope is that we could work again together... because... he made it very painless.

AD: Has it often been a painful experience?

BD: You usually work with people who don't, with me anyway... you fall into working with people who for one reason or another happen to be there but don't have a great understanding of what it is that you're trying to do. They might know your name and they might know some of the songs but they don't really have a great understanding and the heart to be able to get under it and push it up and make something out of it. They'd rather say, Well show it to me and let's record it and let me think what else I can put on it.

AD: Did you discuss the lyrics with him? Would he ask what certain sections were about? Would he need to know that to help create an atmosphere?

BD: Ah.

He pauses, fishes in his anorak pocket and lights his only Marlboro of the interview.

We didn't really do that. Some songs might have had more lyrics than necessary and he might have said which verse to keep, maybe whole verses. Generally there weren't too many problems in the lyrics. It was more... in fact there wasn't any problems with them at all.

AD: They're very pared down. Were you particularly strict in the editing? There's no excess.

BD: Daniel's real good at that, (he says evasively, propelling a column of smoke floorwards.)

AD: Is that something you don't have the natural discipline to do yourself?

BD: No. It's something which gets overlooked, (he grins, apparently enjoying the cat and mouse game.)

AD: Prior to making an album are you constantly jotting ideas down, absorbing atmosphere examining things?

BD: Yeah, those songs on that last album were songs which had come to me during that last year and they were pretty much as you hear them on the record. There were some changes but not with the idea of the song picture.

AD: Do you ever write something and think, 'No that hasn't captured what I was trying to say?' That doesn't get across the emotion I was trying to convey?

He sits silently for a moment and then almost shouts, "Do what?" Kramer had mentioned this device – he'll pretend he hasn't heard personal questions.

AD: Once again. After writing something do you ever think, 'That's not what I really feel?'

BD: Eh? (He pauses smiling.) Oh, all the time. Yeah, it happens all the time. You don't what it is you're saying anyway and uh... when you start, ah, filling in, the result might be something you'd never even thought about. And uh, you uh, it's usually easier to settle for that rather than to go back and find out why it's not what you wanted it to be to begin with.

AD: But do you? Do you delve back into it?

BD: Sometimes you need to.

AD: Can it be a painful thing? There's a couple of raw-nerve things on Oh Mercy.

BD: Well... only if there's a record deadline... heh, heh, heh.

AD: Do you never think, I can't write about this. It's too sensitive at the moment?

BD: Eh?

AD: Is subject matter ever too delicate at the time or are you ever too tender to write about a situation?

BD: Ah. (He stubs out his cigarette and strokes his beard pensively.) No.

AD: You plunge in?

BD: Yeah, you usually plunge in from something... there's a hole there to begin with. And uh, without that there's no place to go. Rather than sit around and try to concoct something. It's usually just in there.

AD: Is it easier to write when you're miserable? Is writing when you're happy more difficult than when you're unhappy?

BD: Well, you try to do neither really. You really don't want to ah... as strange as it might sound... it's just as easy to write from a miserable point of view on something where you're projecting a great deal of contentment and in the same way it's as easy to write from a great deal of contentment about something that you're projecting a lot of misery into. The way you do it, that's a different thing. What style you use. What vocabulary and all the... verbal gymnastics that make up a song or a poem or anything.

AD: Some of the Oh Mercy songs have a sermon-like feel to them.

BD: Well, if they do, that must be, (he laughs silently.) If the shoe fits, you know...

AD: Whilst on the other hand some have a very confessional feel...

BD: Well maybe.

He reaches down to tickle the dog who is snoring at his feet.

It's possible...

AD: On some you're hectoring and on others you're opening your heart...

BD: Sure. Sure.

AD: Was that something that was apparent at the time?

BD: No not really.

He raises his voice slightly above the increasingly loud and alarmingly human-sounding dog-snores.

When the songs were put together that's the way they came out.

AD: Does anyone intervene where the lyrics are concerned or is that solely your area?

BD: No-one has ever said to me, 'Change that lyric. Make it more this way or that way.' I mean, that might be an unfortunate thing that no one has ever done that, heh, heh, heh. Sometimes you wish somebody would!

AD: Have you made your lyrics consciously less cryptic?

BD: Well, uh, no. You see these songs weren't consciously anything. They were mostly just streams-of-consciousness stuff.

AD: But is being cryptic in your writing something you've veered away from? Songs like Changing Of The Guard on Street Legal.

BD: Yeah. Maybe. Maybe. We used to do that song Changing Of The Guard quite a few times, quite a bit a few years ago. And the more we did it, the less cryptic it became.

AD: How do you mean?

BD: Doing it night after night, it becomes a lot less cryptic to the person singing it.

AD: What? Less cryptic to you?

BD: To me, yeah.

AD: It's a very dream-like song.

He nods vigorously.

BD: Yeah, yeah... (Then reconsiders.) It could have used some editing a song like that.

AD: Do your different bands re-interpret songs? Not just musically, do they introduce new elements to you?

BD: You know, (he says leaning forward) It Ain't Me Babe* was on the radio the other day and it never really occurred to me how different it was as a hit to how it was in my repertoire.

AD: Are there some that are "of their time" that you wouldn't perform now?

BD: No. Not really. Because none of my song are what you call "top singles". Singles get dated. You hear a lot of groups, there's a lot of groups going around and they fall into an Oldies type bag, right? A nostalgia trip. Well, that's because all these people have had hit singles...

AD: Which you've always cleverly avoided.

BD: Heh! Cleverly avoided! That's a nonsense, isn't it? Who wants to cleverly avoid hit singles? Everybody'd like 'em. But it's just not been my lot to have them.

AD: You never know, Everything's Broken might be a hit.

BD: You know Times They Are A-Changin' was a hit in Britain (he nods). It was a Top 10 Hit. Here it wasn't but there it was and so (Everything Is Broken) could be a hit. It'd be good. It certainly deserves to be.

AD: If you say so yourself.

BD: Yeah, (he giggles) I do!

AD: There's a good "buzz" about Bob Dylan in Britain at the moment. It's like 1965 again.

BD: Well '61 was my first year in Britain. Yeah, '61.

AD: You played in the Pindar Of Wakefield...

BD: Is that a club?

He starts clicking his vast thumb nail excitedly.

Ewan MacColl and Peggy Seeger had a club and one night Martin Carthy brought me down there to play. At that time there was all those ballads and the only place you could get them was like Southern Mountain kinda ballads but they'd be one step removed from the real old time ballads that were from the old country. There were a bunch of people that helped me out with that stuff in the very early '60s: Martin Carthy, Bob Davenport... just a lot of folk singer type people who ran into me. It was before... well The Marquee Club was happening then. Who was playing there then? Alex? Alex Korner. Alexis Korner. That was happening. Blues. A lot of my early stuff was taken from all the stuff that those guys taught me then.

AD: Are you one of the great white blues singers?

BD: Probably not... if that's a category. Who wants to be called that? Jimmie Rodgers was that, if anything. People call him a white blues singer.

AD: Do you still feel most at home with the blues?

BD: Well only because the structure is so simple and you can say what you want to say in such an immediate kinda way. Just the two lines and the one line. And the form is rather attractive because it's so simple.

A cork pops. The dog wakes up and stretches out to a quite startling proportion; Dylan pats its head and it settles again. The girl brings over two plastic beakers of champagne. Dylan sets his aside and doesn't look at it again.

AD: Do you remember playing Blackbushe?

BD: Yeah! (the nail starts clicking again) That was a big show. Who was on that?

AD: Eric Clapton, Joan Armatrading, Graham Parker.

BD: Graham Parkerl That was a good show. A lot of people. That was very memorable.

AD: In your top hat.

BD: Oh the hat. (He winces).

AD: Can you remember your feelings when you went over to Britain in '65 and '66?

BD: Mm, (he screws up his face in concentration.) '65? Naw. Not much. It's pretty much blocked out of my mind. Blotted out. I don't know. What was happening on that tour... Donovan! Donovan was happening. What else?

AD: Have you watched Dont Look Back?

BD: Oh many years ago. It's very hard for me to look at anything that has to do with me.

AD: Have you seen Eat The Document? (an unreleased, much bootlegged film shot by D.A. Pennebaker on Dylan's '66 European tour, widely regarded as his most "psychedelic" period.)

BD: A couple of times, yeah.

AD: Do you remember at one point you're being ferried around London with John Lennon after a serious night's indulgence, Pennebaker's filming and you're about to be sick?

BD: Oh... (he chuckles). In the back of a cab? Very sick, I was. It was an enjoyable ride but a very sick one! Bumpy. Very bumpy!

AD: Do you recall the exhilaration of the time?

BD: No, (he says dismissively.) My memory really doesn't focus too well on cab rides.

AD: No, not the cab ride, the whole period?

BD: Oh that particular time, (he laughs apologetically.) No, they went by rather quickly. But it was an exciting time.

AD: You still sing a lot of songs from that time.

BD: My songs hold up for me.

AD: Do you find, when you sing them now, that you realise things you didn't realise at the time?

BD: (The nail goes again) Oh sure. You never... It's difficult to grasp the whole picture at any given time. You're always thinking of something you should have said or... something you should have done.

AD: You've actually rewritten songs. You revised Tangled Up In Blue.

BD: It did get re-written on the tour where Mick Taylor (1984) was playing the guitar.

AD: Why was that?

BD: Ah, I can't remember... (This seems to be the truth) Er... because the original lyrics weren't fair to me because they just didn't feel right at the time.

Then something happens. Appearing both amused and deeply baffled he looks up and says,

BD: Hey, whatever happened to Max Jones?
AD: Mr Max Jones?
BD: Yeah, Mr Max Jones.
He enthuses apparently laying to rest one of rock's great unanswered riddles.
He was a journalist... wrote about jazz for the Melody Maker way back. I used to see him, then it stopped. Whatever did happen to him? Mr Max Jones...
AD: Could Oh Mercy be described as a bleak record?
BD: It could but then again it needn't be. A lot of that might have to do with the different textures of instrumentation on it rather than the songs themselves.
AD: Whose idea were the crickets on Man In The Long Black Coat?
BD: It wasn't my idea! (Everyone in the room, even the girl, laughs) If they work...
AD: Has it become increasingly difficult to write? Or are you still as prolific as hell?
BD: Oh no. Not at all. You know, the odd song will come to me every now and then and there'll be some kind of responsibility on my part to, you know, make it work, take it down. But a lot of my ideas don't even get developed anymore.
AD: Why is that?
BD: Daily life just sort of knocks 'em out of the way.
AD: It's not as simple as it was when you were young?
BD: Not really, no. When you're younger you got nothing else to do but just write.
AD: Do you strive to change that?
BD: Well, such is life, you know? You can't worry about it. You can't say... in no kind of way are you ever gonna to hear me say that there wasn't any chance for me to write enough songs.
AD: Have there ever been blocks? Times when you've thought, 'I need to write but can't.'
BD: Maybe sometimes in the past but no more. There's too many more important things in life other than the need to write. Especially when you get on a little bit the need to write becomes less fulfilling. Things replace it and also there's the simple fact that you've written so much anyway. If you don't have it by now... My songs are to be done live. This last record here came out of nowhere really. There certainly wasn't any plan on my part to make any statement.
AD: Where will it all lead? Apart from The Tour With No End, what's left?
BD: Well you're always on a tour with no end... As long as the people are there. It's the people who decide when you should pack it in.
AD: Do you enjoy life on the road? It's very divorced from the real world.
BD: You've got to get used to it, you know?
AD: But it isn't like real life.
BD: In some ways it is and in some ways it isn't. It's nice to go back home every night and see the fireplace and bed, food on the table and things that you recognise around you.
AD: But you haven't done that for some time...
BD: No. But you never can tell. It could be around any corner.
AD: You seem always to have been "on the road, heading for another joint," moving on from situation to situation, relationship to relationship. Has severing connections become easier or is it always difficult?
BD: Moving around isn't really... (he searches unsuccessfully for a word)... it's not like it's that difficult. You can hold up connections. Connections will hold up if they're strong and meant to be held up. If they're not they won't.
AD: That's a suitably profound note to end on.
BD: Yeah, it is.

He smiles broadly and touches my arm signalling the end of this interview.

As the light begins to fade, the man Van Morrison calls this world's greatest living poet squints myopically out towards the cold, grey sea. He rubs his face, more than likely contemplating something too complex for mere mortals to ever comprehend. Then he sniffs, pulls out a crumpled tissue and blows his very famous nose.

30 January 1990
Commandeur dans l'ordre des Arts et des Lettres à Bob Dylan
Le Ministère de la culture, le Salon des Maréchaux, Paris, France

Sources: The Telegraph #36 ("They call him The Commander"; Summer 1990, pp. 44-54), TWM #1676.

Okay, merci beaucoup de tout mon coeur pour l'honneur que vous me faites et me touche énormément. Mille fois merci. A thousand thank you's.

[Thank you very much, with all my heart, for the honour that you are doing to me and which touches me deeply. Thank you a thousand times.]

27 June 1990
The "Surprise" Interview, Reykjavik, Iceland

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, p. 1091.

At a private party after the show in Reykjavik the above conversation between Dylan and the guy who pumped up Dylan's bicycle took place. Obtained through the Internet from Olof Björner.

How do you like Iceland?
BD: Disgusting!

How do you like the Icelanders?
BD: Wow, man!

How do you like the Laugaurdshalle? [pronounced in Icelandic]
BD: Is there something wrong with you?

How do you like Esja Hotel?
BD: An Eskimo joint!!

How do you like the Leif Ericson airport?
BD: Tell me another one?

Icelandic food?
BD: I don't like whales!

What about the Icelandic girls?
BD: Haven't noticed any!

How do you like the air I gave you?
BD: Oh! It's you!! Thank you very much!!! What kind of air pump do you use?

31 August 1990
Edna Gundersen Interview, Lincoln, Nebraska

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1093-1095.

An interview with Edna Gundersen for USA Today. This took place on August 31, 1990 in Lincoln, Nebraska on the day of the concert at the Bob Devaney Sports Center. The article that appeared in the European edition of USA Today was in a considerably abbreviated form.

ROCK ICON IS HAPPY WITH HIS PLACE
The poetic revolutionary reflects on his charmed life in an exclusive

Lincoln, Neb. – On the opening day of the interview Nebraska State Fair, Bob Dylan is the star attraction, performing in a rocking 90 minutes of mostly early hits. Most of the Devaney Sports Center's 6,000 cheering fans are college students who weren't yet born when rock's poetic revolutionary held a generation rapt with the show's climax, Like A Rolling Stone. It's been 30 years since he left college himself to stake a claim in the Greenwich Village folk scene. How does it feel?

"In some ways, it felt older to be 30 than to be 60 or however old they say I am," Dylan says after the show.
"How old am I now?" He's 49. "That's what they say, but nobody knows my real birth date," he counters teasingly.
His take on aging: "You just can't help it."

Dylan whose new Under The Red Sky album is out this week, is the only living rocker in Life's list of the century's 100 most important Americans. Still godlike to many, he admits he's less hungry these days.

"You reach a certain place and that's sufficient," he says. "Sometimes there is no higher. How much higher can Michael Jackson go? Or Madonna? You get your territory and you're content with that."

Friendly and direct, Dylan talks freely about his work – in the present tense, anyway. He steers clear of ancient history (the 1960's), Dylan mythology or anything remotely personal.

"People can learn everything about me through my songs, if they know where to look. They can juxtapose them with certain other songs and draw a clear picture. But why would anyone want to know about me? It's ridiculous."

Informed that his childhood home in Hibbing, Minn., recently sold for $84,000 (twice it's appraised value), Dylan says only, "Well, they better check the furnace."

Clad in a crisp white shirt, cap, jeans and heavy black boots, Dylan clutches a cup of coffee backstage. Clearly tired, he's nonetheless witty and enthusiastic, even as he faces a 334-mile bus ride to Hannibal, MO., for the next nights show.

For the third year running, Dylan has surfaced with a tour and album. Red Sky is the 36th in a canon dating back to 1962. The Traveling Wilbury's second album – "a whole lot better than the first," he promises – was recorded last spring and is due in October. A tour may follow, if Dylan, George Harrison, Tom Petty and Geoff Lynne can co-ordinate schedules.

"It's not a drain at all," he says of this years frantic pace. "Billy Idol's got the right idea. It's a charmed life. It beats 9-to-5 now, it did then and it will tomorrow."

"You gotta stick it out though. That's all there really is at the end of the line in this business. B.B. King and Chuck Berry are still working. Little Richard is as good now as he was then."

Dylanologists debate whether the constantly evolving performer is as good now as when he transformed pop with his nasal singing, literary imagery and folk/rock meld. "He doesn't have a problem living up to his past," says Ian Woodward, British author of The Wicked Messenger, the 10-years-old definitive Dylan newsletter. "People's expectations are the problem."

Woodward recently heard Dylan perform a staggering repertoire over six London concerts. "The range he covers is enormous. There's a strain in music that goes back to small-town America, rockabilly, rock n' roll, rhythm and blues, folk and country. He's keeping that strain of music alive. I don't see anyone who could carry that baton."

Yet the most quoted songwriter of our time approaches his work with a journeyman's humble dedication.

"It's just another record," Dylan says of Red Sky. "You can only make the records as good as you can and hope they sell."

Red Sky's 10 originals are less introspective than the atmospheric confessions of last year's Oh Mercy. Dylan's playful, minimalistic lyrics are set to bouncy rock, fleshed out by George Harrison, Elton John and the late Stevie Ray Vaughan.

The title cut, about a boy and a girl "baked in a pie," is a Grimmlike tale "intentionally broad and short, so you can draw all kinds of conclusions," Dylan says. TV Talkin' Song, a wry attack on television and false gods, is based on a speech he and rocker Dave Stewart heard in London's Hyde Park.

The lighter fare, like the waggish romp Wiggle Wiggle, elicited a lukewarm review from Rolling Stone. "Good reviews don't hurt you, but they don't help either," Dylan says dismissively. "It's better to have a record the critics hate that sells 10 million copies than one the critics love that sells 10."

Though a prolific recording artist, Dylan considers performing his primary outlet. He complains that Columbia has not adequately pushed his albums. The label told him Oh Mercy's title hurt sales because it didn't refer to a specific song.

"They have a point, OK? But it's discouraging when you ask the vice-president of your record company why he hasn't sold more of your records and he says, "Well, the title isn't all that great"." Dylan laughs, "Everybody gripes about their record company. I'm no exception."
He is one when it comes to self-promotion. Red Sky songs were conspicuously absent in recent shows. ("They haven't settled in yet.") Cornering him for a publicity photo is impossible.
"It rubs me the wrong way, a camera," he says, "It doesn't matter who it is, someone in my own family could be pointing a camera around. It's a frightening feeling. It's not really an instrument that's been elevated to that world of art. It's a machine. Cameras make ghosts out of people."

He's more at ease discussing music philosophy. "People say music is intended to elevate the spirit. But you've got a lot of groups and lyrics projecting emptiness and giving you nothing, less than nothing because they're taking up your time."

"Music," he says, "should aim for the soul not the groin."
"It's not difficult to get people throbbing in their guts. That can lead them down an evil path if that's all they're getting. You gotta put something on top of that."

He grins when told that Milli Vanilli declared themselves more talented than Dylan and Paul McCartney. "Who is Milli Vanilli?" Dylan asks, truly stumped. Not every chart-climber is an artist, he says. But talk of art strays too close to the taboo topic of Dylan's unwitting sainthood. "What kind of artistry is equal to the silver glisten on a river or a sunset or lightning in the sky? What kind of man's artistry can compare to the great artistry of creation?"

On that note, he's heading for the bus. "I got a lot of miles to go," he says. And like most Dylan utterances, something resonates beneath the surface.

20 February 1991
Bob Dylan's Acceptance Speech
The Grammy's 1991, Radio City Music Hall, New York City, NY

Source: Circulating tape

You know my daddy didn't leave me too much...
He was a very simple man. But he did tell me one thing, he said, 'Son...'
[Long pause while he stared at the plaque and the audience tittered nervously]
...He said so many things you know...

[Pause]

...but he did say, you know it's possible to become so defiled in this world that even your own mother and father will abandon you. But if that happens, God will always believe in your own ability to mend your own ways.
Thank you.

25 February 1991
Unidentified Interview, Guadalajara, Mexico

Source: In His Own Words

Does the album title "Under the Red Sky" refer to the current war in the Middle East?

BD: No, not really. The record was released before the hostilities began. But it's relevant, I'd say. But so are the songs I wrote thirty years ago.

March 1991
Eliot Mintz Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 745-756.

The interview between Eliot Mintz (EM) and Dylan, which took place in a Los Angeles Hotel, was part of a three hour Westwood One Radio Station special broadcast throughout the US during May 1991. The interview proper reputedly took place during March 1991. The entire broadcast was devoted to the recently released Bootleg Series boxed set.

Only the Bob Dylan related segments are included here.

Prior to Elliot Mintz's interview with Dylan, there was a run through of Bob's greatest hits during which Bob makes occasional short comments. These are listed first.

Every show that we've done is on a bootleg record.

My role as an artist would be to stay true to my art. But who says it's art, though? Who calls it art? Not me. My stuff don't hang in museums.

I can't write those songs today, no way. Even the simplest songs, if I look at it that way. I couldn't do that now. I'd be a fool to try.

That song's (The Times They Are A-Changin') got something because it holds up night after night. You can sing it all the time, you know, and it's always new.

I mean all my songs can be played electric, either electric or non-electric. I mean, they're just songs.

I had to write what I wanted to sing because what I wanted to sing nobody else was writing.

I wish someone would come along and sing some songs that I could do. I mean, it would be such a burden taken off my shoulders, you know. I mean, it's heavy man.

Someone who's invisible has no secrets to conceal. You see, we're all invisible because the soul is invisible.

All the songs I've wrote are love songs. I don't think I've ever written one song that's not been a love song.

Anybody that expects anything from me is just a... a borderline case, you know. Nobody in any kind of reality is kind of expecting anything from me. I've already given them enough. What do they want from me, you know?

I never know one album to the next what kind of songs I'm gonna be doing. It amazes me that I even continue to make albums.

None of my songs are any good. It's the way that they're formed. Hoagy Carmichael songs are much better than that.

I'll just have to hope that in some kind of way this music that I've always played is a healing kind of music. I mean, if it isn't then I don't want to do it.

Look, look, with me they do all kinds of things. If people don't get an interview – if they can't have an interview, er... God know's why they would want one, but if they can't have one and if they must have one, for instance, then they'll write their own on me. They've done it in the past.

And now for the interview with Elliot Mintz.

A couple of weeks ago on a rainy California night, I sat down with Bob at a Los Angeles hotel where we embarked on an evening of conversation. It began like this.

BD: Right, when you did your first interview with John was it like this?
EM: My first interview?
BD: You did interviews with him all over the world, correct?
EM: All over the world including one...
BD: You could have been in Osaka, Japan, at a hotel.
EM: And I was.
BD: Like this.
EM: And I interviewed him once in this hotel.
BD: In a bungalow?
EM: In a bungalow, yes.
BD: We got it, let's go.
EM: [Dylan is strumming a tune] What are you playing, Bob?
BD: A guitar... This is called a six string guitar.
EM: When you listen to the Bootleg Collection, you hear a demo for Like A Rolling Stone, not a demo but obviously you're playing it for other musicians in a studio and it's done as a waltz. The first and obvious question, when Rolling Stone did a list of the 100 best songs ever written, 100 best rock songs ever written, Like A Rolling Stone was way up there. You responded to a questionnaire of theirs where you talked about the song. Is it fair to say that you would consider that one of the best songs, if not the best song, you've ever written?
BD: Oh that's, you know, that's not... to me its not any better or any worse than, you know, any of the other songs I've written in that period. It just happened to be one of the one's that was on the Hit Parade and it's managed to survive because of that.
EM: But you don't have any particular affection for that song beyond the others?
BD: Oh yeah, to me its alive, you know.
EM: In the past 12 or 18 months the highest cultural award in France, The Rock And Roll Hall Of Fame induction, Lifetime Achievement award Grammy.
BD: Yea, but you're not talking about Nobel Peace Prizes, you know. Come on, let's... you know really.

BD: Well no-one really teaches themselves guitar and harmonica you know, you just got to, you know, when you don't know anything, at first like you get a book or something and you learn. What I remember is like learning a couple of chords out of some books and then just going out to watch people, you know, to see.. to see how they're doing it, how they play those chords and where other people are playing you just... You don't really go so much to hear what they're... to hear 'em you just go to see how they're doing what they do, you know, try to get up as close as you can and just see what their fingers are doing and, you know, in that early stage its just more like a learning thing you just... And that, sometimes can take, you know, years, many years, sometimes it takes people many years, sometimes it takes people... to me I kinda picked it up rather quickly but I didn't really play with that much technique. People didn't really take to me because of that, because I didn't really go out of my way to learn all... As much technique as some other people. So I just kinda blazed my way through all that stuff, you know. I would hear somebody do something, and finally get past a certain point and say well what do you want from that? I mean, you can learn, you know, you might wanna learn the song or the lyrics, or you might wanna see how they're playing, you might wanna pick that up, that style they're playing. I don't know. I mean, I just stayed up day and night and just er, barn-stormed my way through all that stuff. And then I heard Woody Guthrie one time before I got... heard Woody Guthrie then it all came together for me.

BD: The first Woody Guthrie song I heard, I think, was probably called Pastures Of Plenty. He used to write a lot of his songs from existing melodies you know, a couple of those other ones... Grand Coulee Dam, and they just really impressed me, you know. I mean, they just had a mark of originality about them or the lyrics did.

BD: When I met him he was not functioning with all his facilities at 100 per cent, you know. But the person I saw... I was there more as a servant than as somebody there ... I mean I knew all his songs and I went there to sing him his songs. He always liked the songs and he'd ask for certain ones. I knew them all. I was like a Woody Guthrie jukebox.

BD: He was like a link in the chain for me, you know, like I am for other people, like we all are for people. There's a certain type of innocence that I never regained again. Maybe I guess after he passed on. I don't know, you know. There was an innocence to Woody Guthrie like a lost innocence or something you know. Its hard you know, because after him there was... it was all over, you know, it was over.

BD: [Regarding the Witmark Demos] You sit there in a room with a guitar or a piano, and there's a tape recorder and then you just er... sing your song, you know into the recorder. In that particular room they had photographs up, they had boxes stacked up at the sides of the wall, some kind of boxes and mimeographed songs like sheets. Up the side in boxes and photographs of people with cigars in their mouth. You know, at parties or just... and formal photographs of people who were like earlier on, earlier, people who started these things.

EM: Tin Pan Alley.

BD: Tin, yeah, well no, it wasn't that. Tin Pan Alley, wasn't that that Brill building thing at the front? You know, it was in the same neighborhood. It seems like so long ago, don't it?

EM: It was. It was thirty years.

BD: I had to write what I wanted to sing because, what I wanted to sing nobody else was writing.

EM: Who Killed Davey Moore. The song on the Bootleg Collection is played with a tremendous power, tremendous strength, tremendous indignation and a bit of anger as well. Can you recall the circumstances under which you created that?

BD: No, but it was done at the same time as the Hattie Carroll song. Yeah, its like those two songs kinda went together, they were in a group, you know. One got left off the record for some reason, yeah it was, er.... Maybe those songs were done the same week, the same night even, they're both very similar.

EM: They're very similar. Here are two songs where the question was always one of blame.

BD: Blame?!?

EM: Yea, blame. Hattie Carroll was just a maid in the kitchen.

BD: Well, well, but to me those songs were never about blame they were more about justice than anything else.

EM: Subterranean Homesick Blues; you know that there are an awful lot of people who spend a great deal of time looking for those Bob Dylan lines, just those great lines. Boom, boom, boom, boom.

BD: Like a treasure hunt or something, right.

EM: Like a treasure hunt.

BD: Yeah, like you get a map and go off and find the treasure somewhere.

EM: Or you hear things in your brain and it kinda, you know, goes back and forth.

BD: Exactly, yeah, yeah.

EM: And this particular tune has got a lot of those in 'em. I'm sure it must be very, very boring to you to hear your lines quoted back to you, but for the listeners... Does it by the way? That's an assumption, does it bore you to hear your own lines quoted back to you?

BD: Not really.

EM: "You don't need a weatherman to know which way the wind blows" or "20 years of schooling and they put you on the day shift". Subterranean Homesick Blues, how fast did it come to you? Do you have any recollection of where you were when you wrote that song? How it came down. If it was all done in, you know, like in one sitting. Any recall at all?

BD: Um... No... Something like that, you know, you can't be sure how much of it was made up before hand, how much you made up right on the spot, you know. A lot of it could have been made up right there.

EM: When you say "Right there" do you mean like at the recording studio?

BD: I mean right there, during it.

EM: Do you have any recollection about Subterranean Homesick Blues, creating the song, anything come to mind?

BD: No, not really, just maybe the band that was playing the song... The atmosphere where it was done, it was one of those songs that was done. No, you know, it was just thrown out with a bunch of other stuff, you know, it was kicked around.

EM: Do you ever just tire of having to be Dylan, of having to subject yourself to all the stuff that Bob Dylan has to be subjected to.

BD: Well, Bob Dylan doesn't really have to subject himself to anything more than me.

EM: Yes, he does.

BD: You mean like this interview?

EM: Yes, that would be one example.

BD: Alright. Yea, its important to encourage me to do things, if that's the question, yea, yea. Everyone needs some encouragement to do some thing. It's hard for me to start my own motor you know, but outside of that there's not really that much of a problem.

EM: I have a couple of Bob Dylan quotes that I would like to just get your comments on, if anything comes through. First quote "The closest I ever got to the sound I hear in my mind was on individual bands on the Blonde On Blonde album, its that thin, that wild, mercury sound, its metallic, its bright gold with what ever that conjures up, that's my particular sound" close quote. First of all did you say that?

BD: No, it doesn't sound like anything that would have come out of my mouth.

EM: I was quoting from Playboy magazine, the last interview that was done with you.

BD: Well, there you go, they could have just, you know...

EM: So first of all you are not acknowledging that the quote is...

BD: Look, with me they do all kinds of things. If people don't get an interview, if they can't have an interview, God knows why they would want one, but if they can't have one and they must have one, for instance you know, they'll write their own on me, they've done it in the past. That's not a, you know, that's not a crime to do that. So when you say this was attributed to me, you know it maybe or it may not be true.

EM: Well, you're saying its not true. You're saying...

BD: No, no, to me, it's... when you just... you repeat it, you say this to me but... it's ... just because it's got my name on it, to me doesn't mean that it was said by me, it could have been a misquote, it could have been pieced together. Well, let me take another tack at it, lets say it is exactly what came out of my mouth and there's really no reason to elaborate on it.

EM: Well, the question that was going to build had you said yes, I said that, I was going to say what's intriguing to me is that on the Bootleg Collection, we don't hear that sound. The sound that comes off the Bootleg is something very fundamental. It is not quote "a wild, mercury sound, metallic and bright gold".

BD: Yeah, you know why? Because that sound, that's unobtainable.

On the subject of people covering his songs, Bob Dylan once said –

BD: If a person is writing a song he can usually sing it the way he means it to be sung, you know.

He also said:

BD: Somebody wanted to use a song that I wrote and you know, who can object to that?

BD: It never bothered me. I mean, it would be otherwise, you know, I mean, if somebody sings your song, for any purpose its... makes you feel better than if they didn't touch it at all, you know. Its some kind of reward, you know, for just the time you put in doing it.

EM: Farewell Angelina was popularized by Joan Baez, did you like her version of it?

BD: Oh, it was wonderful, init?

EM: How come that at the time you created such a beautiful song did you choose not to record it, choose not to release it?

BD: Well, people have been asking me that for a long time, you can't use them all, you know, there's a limit, you know, you just...

EM: So, you're saying basically there was no specific reason, that there was just no space on the disc for it, that there were other songs that you thought were better.

BD: Well, on something like that you're really asking the wrong person, because at that time nobody had really given me that much control over my records, and what was on and what was off.

EM: So somebody else like a producer, maybe made the choices to what songs...

BD: Yeah. You know, in those days you just went in and you played what ever you had and, you know, you never knew how it was going to be used.

BD: [Referring to Mama You Been On My Mind] That was one of the California songs, Big Sur songs. There was a batch of them, there was like... Joan Baez could tell you probably more about that than me. She drove me once from the airport to her house and that song might have been written during that trip in the back seat of her car.

EM: There was one other person who you talked about in interview who you really admired, really loved, really respected, and never met, but just ran into in an elevator once – Johnnie Ray. What was it about Johnnie Ray that touched you that way, that affected you that way?

BD: Do you remember Johnnie Ray?

EM: Very, very well.

BD: Well. Yeah he was, well, he just had a lotta heart didn't he. He was hard of hearing too, you know.

EM: Wore a hearing aid.

BD: Yeah. He was a stylist you know, before there was such a thing. Well, but you could say everybody was a stylist. Except not like him you know, he kinda carried that pathos thing, you know, that... Didn't he carry that thing kinda far. Just all of a sudden he'd just break down and cry on stage.

EM: He would break down on stage. Seem like he'd cry, cry and cry.

BD: How long's it been since you seen someone break down and cry singing a song... Well in Mexico they do it every night really. You know if you go down to South America you'll see it more often than you will in the States.

EM: And Judy Garland did that, and Edith Piaf did that too, and James Brown I think did that too. And I think Joe Cocker did that once or twice.

BD: Alright. Well that's something to reach for. The perfect teardrop.

BD: My role as an artist would be to stay true to my art.

EM: I presume you would feel you have. If you were to listen to the Bootleg recordings round 1960 – '61 thru today as we record this.

BD: Well. Who says its art though? Who calls it art? Not me.

EM: You don't consider it art?

BD: No. My stuff? No. Why should it be? My stuff don't hang in museums.

EM: What is it?

BD. It's performance. It's like dance. It's like anything else you go to a stage and you see, you know. You see movement on the stage, it's like a play. It's a dance. It's all that stuff that happens on the stage. That's what makes the records you see, it's not the other way round.

BD: You'll do things which you know, certain nights, are just great. You'll know they're great and you get no response, and then you'll go someplace else and you just don t have it that night, you just don't have it for a variety of reasons. You don't have it and you're just kinda going through it and it's always gotta be consistent. You get it to a place where it can be consistent. I mean, that's just the way it's got to be. Get it to a place where it's consistent and it's that level where it stays on. It can get great which is really, you know, triple consistent but I done a thing where I might have had a temperature of 104 or I might have been kicked in the side that day I could hardly stand up. I've done shows where I could hardly stand up, where it's been painful to stand there. That's kinda humiliating in a way, because, you know, there's no way you can be as good as you wanna be, you just know it. Before it even starts you know you're not going to be as good, not only as you wanna be, but as you can be and only one time I've ever wanted to replay a show and that was in Montreal. We played a show in Montreal in 1970 and I had a temperature of 104, couldn't even stand up, and the promoter said "You gotta play this show" and we played the show and I didn't have nothing, nothing and there was a response, you'd think the Pope was there. And I've played other shows where I've had everything happening, just re-wrote the book, nothing, no response.

BD: I'm just thankful I can play on the stage and people will come to see me. I don't want to be on that stage, I mean I got no business being there. You get up, you might not want to be there, it might be the last thing in the world you, wanna do but you must do that you must go there and somehow just kick in. You know it's got to start someplace my shows usually act... I'm usually in no frame of mind before a show, none whatsoever and I have to kick in at someplace along the line. Usually it takes me one or two songs, sometimes it takes me much longer than that. Sometimes it takes me to the encore, if I get an encore.

EM: Any thoughts about the song Wallflower?

BD: No. Really it's just a sad song, sad experience, one of those pathetic situations in life, that can be so overwhelming at times.

BD: The songs take you through different trips you see. I mean, you know, what's there to smile about? How you gonna sing Hard Rain's Gonna Fall or Tangled Up In Blue or With God On Our Side or Mr Tambourine Man or Like A Rolling Stone or, you know, License To Kill or Shot Of Love or Poisoned Love, you know, or any of... How can you sing that with a smile on your face? I mean, it would be kinda hypocritical.

EM: [Regarding Blood On The Tracks] An awful lot of people have commented on that album. I mean that one seemed to stick with people for a very very long time and I think you once said somewhere that I saw in my notes that you were surprised about the number of people who were so moved and so impressed and so touched by that album, when they ask this, for the most part the album in many cases expresses such enormous sadness...

BD: Well look, everybody says sadness, everybody says all that stuff like, you know, people write better from rejection than acceptance, you know, like people say you can't write good songs if you're happy, you know. Who wants to think that, you know? Who wants to hear a happy song, you know? A lot of people do.

EM: Tangled Up In Blue and If You See Her Say Hello from Blood On The Tracks, did all those songs represent a specific particular period for you?

BD: Yeah. That was my painting period. That was my excursion into the world of art, you know learning how to paint on canvas. It was almost like 'the medium is the message' type trip, you know, It's like they are paintings those songs or they appeared to be, or they seemed to try to be, or want to be. They have to be songs anyway, so they have to be something, right and they're done in... It's kinda hard to explain, but they're more like a painter would paint a song as to compose it, more than a song-writer would write a song as to write it. It was like those songs were like a burst of... At the time they were like coming forth with like a, just a burst of new insight.

BD: Yeah, painting's cool you know. To see something, to be able to see it with your eye, to get it to your brain, to get it into your hands so you can put it, er... transfer it from out there to over here, enjoy it so to speak.

EM: Painting songs. I never heard that expression.

BD: Painting, yeah. Well, you know, maybe some other people have done it but that's really doing it, that's really doing it. That's like taking a brush you know, and painting those songs onto a canvas. They're all painted, that's what they are you know.

BD: Foot Of Pride; that's an outtake.

EM: Does anything come to your mind about composing it?

BD: Yea, no, nothing. Oh, not about composing it. Composing it was alright, it probably had a bunch of extra verses that probably... most likely weren't necessary, they should have been... they should have been combined. But, the reason why it was never used was because the tempo speeded up, but there wasn't any drum machine used on that, the tempo just automatically took off, for some vague and curious reason.

BD: [Regarding Blind Willie McTell] He was just a very smooth operating bluesman. His songs always reminded me of... As trains, but that 's just my hang up, you know, trains. And his vocal style, and his sound seems to fit right in with that lonesome sound. His kinda, you know, Ragtime... kinda thing on a 12 string guitar, so it made everything he did sound, you know, give it a little higher pitch. You know, you could probably call... You could probably call... you could probably say he was the Van Gogh of Blues. You could probably say he was the Van Gogh of the country Blues.

EM: When The Night Comes Falling From The Sky. I mention the title to you, does anything come to your mind about the composition, of about where you were at when you were recording it, when you were composing it?

BD: Composing it, yeah. Um... you know, it was bits and pieces of different places that went into writing that. Lines overheard here and there, you know, strung together over a long period of time, resulted in that particular piece. Its not that uncommon for someone who writes a song or is known to be a songwriter, to just go somewhere and sit around and just, you know, sit there for a long time and do something where you're going to throw yourself into the atmosphere of overhearing a lot of people talking to people, talking to other people. If you're ever hung up for things to say you can always use that, you know, old trick. It works better sometimes than sitting in a room, staring at the wall and trying to, you know, compose there.

EM: How concerned are you about the legacy you leave behind, I hope you live for another 65-70 years?

BD: Yea, legacy?

EM: How history will remember you, do you ever think about it?

BD: Yeah, legacy, yeah, definitely, sure legacy.

EM: Talk to us about it.

BD: Well, legacy that word is very similar to the word legend, that word which is also very similar to the word legion. Okay, and in the bible that's the devils name.

EM: Legion?

BD: Ah, ah. So when you're asking me about leaving a legacy, there's nothing really that there'd be any great interest, on my part, in leaving because of the nature of the word itself.

EM: Being synonymous with the Devil?

BD: Yeah, to me that's a little to close to... you know.

EM: Different word...

BD: Legacy?

EM: It goes back to legion.

BD: Legion, it's the same word.

EM: Let me find a different...

BD: Legend is the same word. A legend is the same thing, you know. We might be getting all too heavy, you know, for a Westwood One show. We're talking about the devil...

EM: Well, its a very heavy network.

BD: Well, they may censor that, you know, but, um...

EM: How would you like people to remember you, a 100 years from now?

BD: If they remember me at all its devilish, because that means that there's been a legacy left, and you don't want to leave a legacy. If you try to attain some type of righteousness in this world you don't want to leave a legacy. A legacy of what, you know? Its all, it's all in the mind anyway.

EM: So, as part of your overall musical contribution, the fact the kind of music that you have made, that's an area that you own. Just nobody else messes with that, that's the Bob Dylan experience. You take no personal pride or satisfaction in the fact that you have to some degree preserved that form of the American musical experience? You just view it as...

BD: Yea, it was mine to do, mine to give, mine to show up at the right time to do, and that's just the way it all happened.

EM: Was this a difficult experience? You have a history of resisting this kind of thing, the interview experience talking about your songs and you've been very...

BD: No, this is enjoyable for me.

EM: It is?

BD: Oh, yea, this has... this has, you know, as long as we're, you know, got a purpose in it, this is okay for me.

EM: Some people upon hearing the past 3 hours that we've shared here together, and in advance I thank you for your time and your honesty with all of this stuff, some of them might have come away saying, gosh, I don't know why he just isn't more proud of what he's done, what he's written, what he's contributed. You know, I don't understand why he doesn't, you know, just give himself a little pat on the shoulder at the very least.

BD: Pride? No, pride goes before a big downfall, you've heard that, we've all heard that.

EM: Some degree of satisfaction?

BD: No, not unless you were expecting some kind of downfall. No, pride, what is there to be proud about. What is there to be proud about, that we made another record? Is that something to be proud about? Is it something to be proud that you made, you know... built another building? Is it something to be proud, you know, that you built another highway? That you have a new automobile on the road? Is it something to be proud about that you've invented a new fertilizer?

EM: What about having the 30 years, created this enormous body of work that has touched, inspired, influenced so many millions of people all over the world, does somebody not take some degree of a little bit of joy in that?

BD: Not really, not really. You can't do that. There's too many other people that have done far superior things than me, in the same field.

EM: Your overall relationship with the press, the Bootleg Series covers a 30 year period, 30 years of public awareness for the most part...

BD: Well, my struggle or strife or whatever with the press isn't necessarily with the press, you know, it might be with like... it's like with certain publications at certain times tend to take liberties with you that... er... don't really seem like the right thing that they should treat ya, you know. Maybe a few of those or sometimes it happens that there's a reporter, maybe there's all kind of performers that don't like a certain type of journalist or reporter a certain one because of, you know... who've burned them, you know, burned them, you know, by either promising something they didn't deliver or having something come out in a way that the person who was involved never was told about it. Something like that, you know like that kinda stuff. People don't like that kinda stuff, they don't mind being interviewed and having, you know, some kind of slant on whatever it is you're doing by whoever's doing it to you. You can just let that, you know, wash off that just rolls away. But the other stuff, in some kinda way, don't and, you know, you don't want to be reminded of them people, you know, but they are specific people, you know, specific that would do something like that. So, no there's no problem with the press for me, its just, you know, it's just liars and hypocritical people and ambitious people that wanna, you know, that step over you, you know, use you to walk on.

EM: [Regarding evangelical songs] Do you ever view those records as being any different to the records that came before them or since them?

BD: Well, yeah, they're all different.

EM: How so?

BD: In many, many ways.

EM: Give me an example.

BD: Well, the content of the songs was much different, had a different vibe, you know...

EM: The vibe could be called spiritual.

BD: Yea, religious, religious vibe.

EM: The song Every Grain Of Sand seems to suggest, if one was to listen to it, and especially on the Bootleg Collection, that you believe that this is a directed purposeful universe where "every hair is numbered like every grain of sand". Am I reading too much into it?

BD: No!

EM: Or is that an honest depiction of how you see the world?

BD: Yea. You can say that.

EM: There are no accidents?

BD: Accidents?

EM: No accidents in the world, that everything that happens, happens because its supposed to happen.

BD: Yea, but that's not what the song says though, the songs talking about coincidences, not accidents.

EM: Coincidences?

BD: Yea, yea. Well, forget about accidents, you know. Accidents can happen, you know, but coincidences, you know, they are bound to happen.

EM: Do you believe, literally that, taking your words again that "every hair is numbered like every grain of sand" that someone, some entity, something has put all of this in order for some special...

BD: Yeah! Yeah! Yeah!

EM: You do?

BD: Oh yeah, yeah.

EM: This song goes to sometimes to suggest that you, in the song, wrestle with that one a little.

BD: Not really, not really. Just because its got an order and a purpose doesn't mean the way its coming down is written in stone. Everything changes, have to leave room for something to change. I like to give things enough space so I can change when I feel.

BD: None of my songs are that good, its the way they're performed, that's what it is. Hoagie Carmichael songs are much better than mine, so are George Gershwin's and Irvine Berlin, too.

EM: You just said quote "none of my songs are that good anyway" close quote and then you talked about the others.

BD: My songs are simple, you know. They've just got a... they're very simple to do. That doesn't mean they're any better, you know.

EM: You don't believe the statement that you just made that none of your songs are any good? That's not an accurate description.

BD: Hank William's songs are all better than mine.

EM: What makes you so special then? What is this whole... this whole experience thing if its not the songwriting?

BD: It's the performing of that song, you're not going to get nowhere with just a good song, you've got to be able to perform it too.

EM: And you would acknowledge that the way you perform your material is exceptional or unique.

BD: To the material itself, you know, only to that... nothing about me is exceptional.

EM: How has the imposition of success made it more difficult for you. I mean presumably people think, well, his success made it easier for him, made it better for him, made it happier for him, made it more fulfilling, more rewarding for him.

BD: Success! Well it depends, like to the outside world, someone might look at my life and think of it as being a great success, but, you know, maybe from my point of view that wouldn't necessarily be true.

EM: Is it? Do you view yourself as a success?

BD: It's not for me to view myself, that's arrogant, you know. Its arrogant for people to view themselves in any kind of way, its a kinda arrogance, you know. Where's arrogance going to get you, really?

EM: Let me phrase it differently, you've received so many public accolades over the years, and you've received obviously the approval not only of the public but of your peers.

BD: Oh, yes of men and women.

EM: And your peers, people who you respect, musicians who count, who matter...

BD: Very true, that's very true.

EM: Do you view that as some kind of demarcation of success? Does that touch you in a way of saying I guess I did good, I guess I did right, I guess I made some kind of musical contribution? Or do you say, well, you know, none of that stuff has anything to do with me and I'm really indifferent to it?

BD: Well, you say both things, you know. There's no sense to limit yourself and put yourself in a box to say one thing and to be held account for that, a person can fall in a trap by doing that to himself, you know. There's no reason to be extreme like that, especially if you're dealing with, you know, the limitations of success in America.

EM: Do you feel fulfilled with your work to date?

BD: Well, my work fulfils me, but that's all it has to do, you know. That's not saying a lot.

EM: But it does, you know, in a... the question is you do feel that you're living up to your creative potential?

BD: Well... no... sometimes.

EM: There are, I think, about 11 million people listening to us tonight.

BD: There better be...

EM: There are a lot of people listening to us tonight and I assume that a number of them would have liked to have been in this chair, asking you these questions and I'm sure that I overlooked a couple that they would liked to have asked.

BD: They could be someday.

EM: And I hope next time around it will be one of them. The thing that I would like to ask you; Is there anything that I have not asked you? Is there anything that you'd like to say to them, anything that you'd like to just say to the gang, just an open platform to the people who have been with you now on this odyssey for 30 years, the people who presumably are going to go out and buy this amazing collection of songs. You've been asked all the questions anything you just want to say to them about you or anything. Take the air, take the microphone, talk to them. Any thought you want to communicate to them?

BD: Erm... Well it, it, just, you know... don't forget to look over their shoulder, you know, something might be coming.

EM: Like what, Bob?

BD: Like a train.

28 March 1991
Joe Queenan Interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 939-946.

With Bob at home and Joe Queenan on the other end of a telephone, the interview portion of the following article took place on March 28th 1991. Although intended for the New York Times, it found it's way into the more down-market magazine Spy (July 1991 issue). See the separate article at the end of this 'interview' for more background to how the session came about and find out why Bob et al. weren't best-pleased at being 'taken for a ride'.

Forever young'?
Sorry, no. Bob Dylan – suddenly 50 years old – has declined into a loopy, very occasionally inspired parody of his once-great self. JOE QUEENAN explains what happened and asks Dylan about his future, "Yeah, well, um well, you know, things could change at any time," Dylan says. Don't count on it.

THE FREE-FALLIN' BOB DYLAN
EXCLUSIVE POLYSYLLABIC

AS A COOL OCTOBER EVENING FALLS ON EISENHOWER HALL at the US Military Academy at West Point, about an hours direct drive north of New York City, the women inside selling calico piglets, cow-shaped oven mitts and pussycat chess sets are looking a bit glum. Of all unlikely things, West Point's Eisenhower Hall has been the site of a crafts fair this day, and it seems to have been a success. The women, though, no doubt hoped that they would make lots of extra sales to the crowd gathering for the performance at the Hall that night – Hal Linden with the Rockettes. For synergistic marketing, you couldn't do much better than to combine calico piglets with Hal Linden belting out the Liza songbook. Unfortunately, Linden and the Rockettes have canceled and the audience that has shown up for the replacement act is not buying.

True, there are hundreds of couples in their forties, and that's a pretty good age group if you're selling cow-shape oven mitts, but these 40 year olds look like college-professor types. Maybe they would go for antique cow-shaped oven mitts? There are a few teenagers in freshly laundered tie-dyed T-shirts. As potential customers, the worst are the people who look the way the farmers in these parts did around 1850 – the men with their beards and shapeless hats, the women, a lot fewer of them, with their hair very simple and no make-up and big clunky shoes. Finally, hundreds of cadets have arrived, all dressed in gray. This strange brew of locals requires an explanation. It is simply this: of all unlikely things, the performer this night at Eisenhower Hall at the U. S. Military Academy at West Point is Bob Dylan.

If any institution could be described as a place where none is the number, where black is the color, where the masters of war stick guns and sharp swords in the hands of young children, that institution is West Point. The appearance there of the man who wrote "The Times They Are A-Changin'", "Blowin' in the Wind", "With God on Our Side" and other songs intended to make the Pentagon tremble seems a little incongruous. However, when it is suggested to Barbara Sarff, assistant director for the theater, that Dylan's booking may have culturally anomalous overtones, she replies, Eisenhower Hall is a performing arts center that sponsors a wide range of cultural events in the Hudson Valley region.

And why should a mere publicist at Eisenhower Hall find it curious and ironic that Bob Dylan is playing West Point when Dylan himself, a man who was once widely believed to be divine, does not? Some months later, when I ask him about the West Point show in an interview, Dylan says, "Uh, the West Point show... was that before New York?" Reminded that it was indeed before he performed at the Beacon Theater in New York, Dylan responds, "Oh... okay. That was probably flown in – that show was, uh, just booked in that... because it was in that area." He ignores a hint that the implications of this appearance are interesting: "It was a decent show. It – no, it was a great show, wasn't it? There was a large pit there, and they didn't allow people to go across it." To the question of whether he felt strange playing to a sea of gray-uniformed cadets, Dylan says only, "Well, every show is different, you know? There wasn't anything unusual about it, except my recollection is that there might have been some problems that particular evening because of the stage setup. My recollection of the show is more in that area instead of the crowd or the facility where the show was happening. They seemed to be an enthusiastic crowd." Pressed further on whether he saw any incongruity in singing protest songs to this particular audience, Dylan says, "Do you remember when this show was?"

Getting an interview with Bob Dylan is only slightly less difficult than persuading Pol Pot to free up some time on his calendar. Requests are submitted in writing and relayed to Dylan by his press agent, Elliot Mintz, who then transmits the message that the request either has been turned down or has "fallen into the category of a nonrejected request." Once a request becomes a nonrejected request, Mintz alerts the potential interviewer to "windows of opportunity" during which Dylan may be in the right mood to chat. In this case the first window of opportunity was expected to open around February 20, six weeks after the original request. But Mintz said Dylan was too overcome by receiving a Lifetime Achievement Grammy award to agree to an interview and instead had retreated first to Mexico then to a "tropical island with no telephones". Mintz eventually said that a brief conversation on Thursday, March 28, was not inconceivable. But he could not promise that Dylan would call this reporter nor could he specify what time of day Dylan would call, if in fact he did call. The most Mintz could do was to say that if Dylan did not call on Thursday, he would never call. Mintz seems to have taken PR lessons from Samuel Beckett. At an unappointed hour on the appointed day Mintz called to say that he was on his way over to Dylan's house to see if Dylan was "up for it." Said Mintz. "If this comes down, it will take place at around 9:30 p.m. If he's not up for it. I'll call to say that he's not". At 10:20, Mintz called to say Dylan was ready to talk.

If we had no other evidence than this haziness about West Point that Dylan has become completely oblivious to his legend and to the world as a whole, we might speculate that these responses were a Dylanesque joke at a reporter's expense, that he was toying with his interviewer as he had done so often and so famously in the sixties. Unfortunately, we have lots of other evidence. The first exhibit might be Dylan's appearance at the Grammy Awards last spring. If any of the tens of millions of people watching had not already realized that Bob Dylan, poet, wit, heartrending vocalist, hipster, scourge had turned into Bob Dylan, somewhat pathetic kook – well, now they knew.

Wearing one of those distinctive hats of his that make him look like a refugee from Hee Haw. Dylan first played an incomprehensible Gatling-gun version of "Masters of War". Then Dylan bemused his patient listeners with this acceptance speech: "Well, uh, all right... Yeah... Well, my daddy, he didn't leave me too much; you know, he was a very simple man, and he didn't leave me a lot. But what he told me was this: he said, 'Son', he said, um..." A long pause. "He said so many things, you know. But he did say, he said, 'It's possible to become so defiled in this world that your own mother and father will abandon you. And if that happens, God will always believe in your ability to mend your own ways'. Thank you." Tantalizing; inscrutable, nuts.

Not to Dylan, though. When he is asked about the Grammy performance he sounds downright jolly, taking the whole thing in stride. "That song may be retired," he says. He goes on: "The flu greeted me that morning in a big way. All my drainpipes were stopped up. Those kinds of things just happen to me the night of... the night I'm going to be on a big TV show and the inside of my head was feeling like the Grand Canyon or something. It was not a good night for me. But the song would have come of probably better if my head had been able to get more or less into it." Why did he play "Masters of War" that evening? "We just did that one... You know, war going on and all that."

Dylan's nonchalance has its charm. One can almost admire him for taking this approach to an occasion of such monumental insincerity and commercialism as the Grammys. With a lot of effort, one might even divine some profoundly apt sentiment in his speech. Maybe in a convoluted way one can explain the value of breaking one of his classics into shards – if you want non-perfect renditions of oldies, that's what the Beach Boys are for. Maybe one could look at it this way. But nothing can excuse the hat.

BOB DYLAN TURNED 50 ON MAY 24, 1991 ("WELL. TO ME IT'S JUST ANOTHER BIRTHDAY", he says), and it seems clear that the second 25 years of his life have been less kind to him than the first. He is still capable of writing stunning songs – like the one for his current video – "Series of Dreams" – and it might be too much to ask of anyone to stay brilliant and pure while those around him, ourselves included, sink into dullness and compromise, but his degeneration has been painful to witness.

In 1966, Dylan suddenly withdrew from the public and spent eight quiet years mostly in Woodstock, New York – not so far from West Point, as a matter of fact. He claimed to have injured himself badly in a motorcycle accident, but many believe that the accident was trivial and that Dylan was really using it as an excuse to escape the mounting pressures and obligations of superstardom. By the time of his retreat to the country at age 25, Dylan had recorded two very good albums (Another Side of Bob Dylan, The Times They Are A-Changin'), two magnificent albums (The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, Bringing It All Back Home) and two albums that neither he nor anyone else would ever surpass (Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde). He had become the object of more international fascination than any individual since Byron. He had proved himself to be the wittier and more moving composer and performer of folk songs to have come out of the folk movement, and the writer of the more important protest songs in the days of the civil-rights movement. He had made a second career, as it were, in rock n' roll and had become arguably the most important figure in rock history – more important than Elvis because he wrote his own songs, full of musical imagination; more important than the Beatles because of his sway over John Lennon, his lyrics (I Am the Walrus – sounds like Dylan on his day off) and his bluesiness; more important than the Rolling Stones because, well, he was more important than the Rolling Stones. He had dominated the ultrahip Warhol-Chelsea Hotel scene and had taken more drug earlier than Lou Reed; he was a very sharp dresser.

And Dylan's influence was pervasive. A partial list of the things Dylan is primarily or exclusively responsible for would have to include protest music, hostile press conferences, Jimi Hendrix's hair, cheap sunglasses, pretentious liner notes, singer-songwriters with horrible voices, two-record sets, turning the Beatles on to marijuana, and sincere, pastry-faced folksingers who make every subway on the planet a living hell.

Given the apex of political, musical and lyrical coolness that Dylan had reached in 1966, it should come as no surprise that the subsequent acts of his life have been less satisfying. For a quarter of a century he has suffered from the fact that had he hit his head a bit harder one July afternoon in the Catskills, he would be regarded as the rock James Dean, the tortured genius who lived fast, died young and left an exquisite corpse. The Jim Morrison cult would have looked like some minor sect compared with the posthumous religion of Dylan. As music critic Stephen Fried says, Dylan's early demise would have suited some people just fine: "Critics want rock stars to make three great albums and then die." Which a surprising number have been more than willing to do.

But Dylan did not die. Instead, he lived on to make one album, Blood on the Tracks, that may just be the equal of Blonde On Blonde, three others that are worth buying (John Wesley Harding, Desire and Slow Train Coming) and three others that are worth thinking about buying (Shot Of Love, Infidels, Oh Mercy).

Dylan lived to become a born-again Christian in the 1970s. (He was raised Jewish and his real name is Robert Zimmerman. Despite his conversion, he appeared on the Chabad telethon in 1989 performing "Hava Negila" as part of a trio called Chopped Liver.) Dylan lived to bloat his raw, crackling sound grotesquely with full-tilt, hydrocephalic, late period-Elvis production values – the uptown horns, the Jimmy Smith organ swells, the oohing-and-aahing girl backup singers who make Dylan sound as if he were being held hostage in an abandoned warehouse by Gladys Knight and the Pips. And, perhaps worst of all, Dylan lived to appear in the never-released 1986 film Hearts Of Fire, in which he plays an ageing rock star who raises chickens.

With Infidels in 1983 and Oh Mercy in 1989, each of which has a handful of fine songs, Dylan raised hopes that he could return to something like his old form. After Infidels, these hopes were greeted with Empire Burlesque, a record of which Neil Diamond would be proud; after Oh Mercy, these hopes were greeted with Under The Red Sky. Under The Red Sky includes the song 'Wiggle Wiggle'. Its lyrics run. "Wiggle, wiggle, wiggle, like a bowl of soup/Wiggle, wiggle, wiggle like a rolling hoop" (Actually these are not the most embarrassing lyrics Dylan has ever written. Those lyrics are from his 1979 song "Gonna Serve Somebody". 'You may call me Terry, you may call me Timmy/You may call me Bobby, you may call me Zimmy.') Peter, Paul and Mary made 22-year-old Bob Dylan a songwriting star with their massively successful recording of "Blowin' in the Wind" in 1963. Says Peter Yarrow. "One can surmise that [Dylan] does these things from the heart and doesn't scope out the sagacity of everything he does. That's what keeps him clean." He adds, "What we're seeing is works in progress that didn't work."

"There aren't many steady-on albums," says Joan Baez, who also helped make Dylan famous almost three decades ago. Indeed, Dylan may finally have achieved the mediocrity and near oblivion he has seemed, perversely, to seek for so long. His work with the Traveling Wilburys is fun but silly. (Noel Stookey, the "Paul" of Peter, Paul and Mary says of the Wilburys "It's a little like going bowling.") Biograph, released in 1985, is a 53-song compilation that is impressive only because it reminds you of Dylan's past. The three-CD Bootleg Series Volumes 1-3, issued by Columbia last spring, contains a lot of alternate tracks and unrelated songs that were probably left off Dylan albums because they were the ninth-best cuts he'd recorded that week. Never a great commercial success, Dylan has had sales of about 300,000 copies with his recent albums (M.C. Hammer's latest has sold 15 million). As a result of sixties nostalgia, college students do feel they should own one Dylan record, so he has become to campuses of the early 1990s what John Coltrane was to campuses of the early 1970s.

Dylan will continue to put out record after record; he will continue to tour and tour and tour. Only now, any hope for a sustained return of Dylan's wit, intelligence and passion may finally – finally- have died. If his audiences still had that hope, he would disappoint them, but he does not even do that.

THE REASONS FOR DYLAN'S ARRIVAL AT THIS PASS ARE A SUBJECT OF ENDLESS FASCINATION to his admirers. Some point to Dylan's split from his wife, Sara Lowndes, with whom he had four children, in 1977. (Among other problems, Mrs. Dylan was shocked to find that her rock-star husband had strayed into the arms of other women while he was on the road.) Others wonder whether Dylan's fondness for intoxicants has begun to tell on him.

Mick Taylor, the ex-Rolling Stones lead guitarist whose playing helped make Dylan's 1983 album Infidels such a success, clearly idolizes Dylan. Nevertheless, he is puzzled as to why Dylan would leave a profoundly beautiful song like "Blind Willie McTell" off Infidels while including several so-so tracks. Does anyone working with Dylan ever try to intervene when the songwriter makes such decisions? "There are certain people who can sit down and say things to Bob Dylan," Taylor says. "He just doesn't have to listen to them." If the results are so often so painful, though, you wonder why Dylan releases about an album a year. Taylor speculates that this decision has little to do with Dylan's boundless creative energy. "It's to fulfill contracts, I guess," says Taylor. "When he made Infidels, you could see that he was really inspired, and that he's a really great singer when he's relaxed. But when I talked to him recently," he said, "You know me, Mick; I can only write songs when my back is to the wall."

Dylan volunteers the same answer when asked why he makes records. "Usually my records are turned in on some kind of a contractual deadline" he says. "If they didn't want me with the company, they wouldn't continue to give me a contract. They're just records that are fulfilling my contract, which they give to me." He laughs merrily. Asked if there are some records he cares about more than others. Dylan replies, "Well. yeah. There are some that stay with you longer than others... To me, though, there's something about all of them that I get something out of. They're just not all filler." Does that mean there is some filler on his records? "Some filler," says Dylan. "Oh, yeah – depending on what your standards of filler might be. There's a filler, and then there's songs that aren't performed as good as they could be for all kinds of reasons. There's some songs buried on my records that are good songs that just aren't performed well, and then there's some songs that are performed well that aren't necessarily very good songs."

Dylan's work habits certainly don't encourage consistency. "He doesn't like to explain things," say Taylor. "He comes into the studio and starts playing the piano, and you just have to make sure the engineer has the tape running." Responding to the complaints of fussbudgets who have taken him to task for his carefree, let's-make-an-album-and-get-out-of-here-by-mid-night approach to recording, Dylan has periodically enlisted respected producers to help him make well-engineered bad records to stand in contrast to his early badly engineered great records. Fortunately, these producers have usually failed to change Dylan's ways, thus saving him from making the kind of gorgeous, fake records that Paul Simon – with his ingenious brand of tribal Muzak – has perfected.

"People say that [I make a lot of records]," Dylan says. "Well, Willie Nelson puts out maybe ten times as many records as me. Merle Haggard puts out a record all the time. You know, it's all part of a racket."

It may be a racket, but no one can accuse Dylan of micromanaging his career. Consider his new video, a quintessential Dylan project in that it features a terrific song, "Series of Dreams," that Dylan inexplicably left off Oh Mercy. When Dylan is asked how much input he supplied to the project, he replies, "Not much. They had me come downtown to a meat-packing place and photographed me walking around." Told that the video intersperses elastic 1960s Dylan footage with ominous pictures of Jack Kerouac's grave, he exclaims, "What?! Why'd they put something like that in there?" Then he thinks about it. "Maybe it had something to do with the song. But it's not me that made that video. Nobody's even shown it to me. This was something that was done with very little participation on my part."

Both Dylan's relentlessness and his perversity are evident in his concerts. He has been performing almost non stop for 17 years – on the Never-Ending Tour, as he called it in 1988. Will he tour forever? "Oh, yeah. When you start out, that's what you want to do. You want to be able to work in this arena no matter what. In good times or bad times." Like Chuck Berry, like Ray Charles, Dylan crosses the country and the world, performing over and over in the same halls, year after year. And like those artists, he has been doing what amounts to an oldies show: more than half of his West Point concert, for instance, consisted of songs written before 1966. But at least Dylan has made it the world's strangest, sloppiest oldies show. Usually the tour bands simply scaffold his songs with indiscriminate session-man rock. The British punk-folkie Billy Bragg admires Dylan for the way he performs live. "He's not letting them wallow in nostalgia. He plays "Wiggle Wiggle" with the same conviction that he plays "The Times They Are A-Changin'" He's deconstructing his songs right in front of your very eyes. He's trying to demythologize himself."

He's succeeding. At his concert late last year at New York's Beacon Theater, the audience repeatedly tried to sing along with hits such as "Like a Rolling Stone" Dylan was having none of that. By speeding up the songs or spitting out the lyrics in mangled Dylanese, he made it impossible for anyone to sing along with him. "They can't do that, and they never could," he says, with more assertiveness than at any other point in the interview. "That was never my thing; nobody could ever sing along with me. Well, maybe a couple people down in front in the first row, but outside of that it's very difficult to sing along with me because it's never clear to me where my own voice is going." He goes on, laughing, "Well, you know, 20,000 people singing "Darkness on the Edge of Town," you know, like... one night Bruce [Springsteen] had everybody singing that with him, and it sounded pretty good, and it's something people think about, but it's never really occurred to me to make people do that."

Maybe anarchy is better than a roomful of thickened, balding dads accompanying the Four Tops on their 65,000th identical rendition of "It's the Same Old Song," but it's still an oldies show. Dylan, however, says it isn't his fault if the majority of the songs he performs are more than 20 years old. A decade ago he tried to do new songs. The response was terrible. "People didn't like those tunes," he says. "They rejected all that stuff when my show would be all off the new album. People would shout, 'We want to hear the old songs'. You know... at a certain point, it doesn't really matter anymore."

WELL, EXACTLY. ON A CHILLY OCTOBER NIGHT IN WEST POINT, DYLAN CHARGES HIS way through number after number. He plays "Gates of Eden" and "Blowin' in the Wind," and the rows of cadets look on in delight, oblivious to the meaning or probably even the identity of the songs in their mutated forms. One oldie ends this way:

And I hope that you die
And your death'll come soon
I will follow your casket
In the pale afternoon
And I'll watch while you're lowered
Down to your deathbed
And I'll stand o'er your grave
'Til I'm sure that you're dead.

The words are unintelligible, but the folkies are happy. The Audi owners are enjoying themselves. The Garth Hudson impersonators are glad they came. The kids in the tie-dyed sixties-retro T-shirts seem pleasantly surprised by how loud the band is playing. The cadets applaud. Even without the Rockettes, "Masters of War" goes over pretty well.

Now see just what Dylan's men had to say about the above interview/article by Queenan -

I SPY A RAT, DYLAN'S AGENT SAYS OF MAGAZINE INTERVIEW
WASHINGTON POST

When Bob Dylan turned 50 recently many folks meditated on what it all meant. But only Spy, the funny and often acerbic New York magazine, ran an interview, which didn't sit well with Dylan's media consultant, Elliot Mintz. Mintz thought the interview request was for a cover story in the New York Times Magazine at a time that also saw the release of Dylan's Bootleg set and the Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award. Mintz agreed to set something up with writer Joe Queenan.

The interview was actually a 15-minute phone conversation, but it was enough for Queenan, a writer for both Spy and Forbes who says, "I basically slam people most of the time."

The story had indeed been assigned by the Times, and what Queenan says he turned in was a tough 7,000-word analysis – "flip, direct, sarcastic, not the Times voice" – suggesting that Dylan's work after his 1975 album Desire left much to be desired and that, with a few notable exceptions, he had remained stuck in his early '70s sound and made some bad choices, particularly in movies and religions. The Times magazine said no, although the Arts and Leisure section offered to buy the interview portion of the piece, fresh Dylan quotes being a precious commodity. This time Queenan said no and sold the story to Spy, which toned it down a bit and ran it in July without any suggestion that its origins and access to Dylan lay elsewhere.

Mintz, who says he was informed about the shift after the fact, called it "a gross misrepresentation. Bob would never have agreed to an interview with Spy."

Queenan, who says he lost money waiting for Dylan and Mintz to make up their minds, says: "I wish I had never started that piece."

As for the call, "I ended it. I couldn't stand it anymore. It was like talking to Arlo Guthrie -he just didn't sound like Bob Dylan. He just didn't care."

4 April 1991
Paul Zollo (SongTalk) Interview, Beverly Hills, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 947-963.

The interview took place in a bungalow of the Beverley Hills Hotel on April 4th. The resulting article – Bob Dylan The Song Talk Interview – by Paul Zollo (PZ) was eventually published in the Winter 1991 Issue (Volume 2, Issue 16) of SongTalk, the newspaper published by the National Academy of songwriters. There is an occasional contribution from Elliott Mintz (EM).

"I've made shoes for everyone, even you, while I still go barefoot"
— from "I and I" by Bob Dylan

"Songwriting? What do I know about songwriting?" Bob Dylan asked, and then broke into laughter. He was wearing blue jeans and a white tank top T-shirt, and drinking coffee out of a glass. "It tastes better out of a glass," he said, grinning, His blonde acoustic guitar was leaning on a couch near where we sat. Bob Dylan's guitar. His influence is so vast that everything that surrounds him takes on enlarged significance: Bob Dylan's moccasins, Bob Dylan 's coat.

"And the ghost of 'lectricity howls in the bones of her face
Where these visions of Johanna have now taken my place.
The harmonicas play like skeleton keys and the rain
And these visions of Johanna are now all that remain"
— from "Visions of Johanna"

Pete Seeger said, "all songwriters are links in a chain," yet there are few artists in this evolutionary arc whose influence is as profound as that of Bob Dylan. It's hard to imagine the art of songwriting as we know it without him. Though he insists in this interview that "somebody else would have done it," he was the instigator, the one who knew that songs could do more, that they could take on more. He knew that songs could contain a lyrical richness and meaning far beyond the scope of all previous pop songs, that they could possess as much beauty and power as the greatest poetry, and that by being written in rhythm and rhyme and merged with music, they could speak to our souls.

Starting with the models made by his predecessors, such as the talking blues, Dylan quickly discarded old forms and began to fashion new ones. He broke all the rules of songwritng without abandoning the craft and care that holds songs together. He brought the linguistic beauty of Shakespeare, Byron, and Dylan Thomas, and the expansiveness and beat experimentation of Ginsberg, Kerouac and Ferlinghetti, to the folk poetry of Woody Guthrie and Hank Williams. And when the world was still in the midst of accepting this new form, he brought music to a new place again, fusing it with the electricity of rock and roll.

"Basically, he showed that anything goes," Robbie Robertson said. John Lennon said that it was hearing Dylan that allowed him to make the leap from writing empty pop songs to expressing the actuality of his life and the depths of his own soul. "Help" was a real call for help, he said, and prior to hearing Dylan it didn't occur to him that songs could contain such direct meaning. When we asked Paul Simon how he made the leap in his writing from fifties rock and roll songs like "Hey Schoolgirl" to writing "Sound of Silence" he said, "I really can't imagine it could have been anyone else besides Bob Dylan."

"Yes, to dance beneath the diamond sky with one hand waving free, silhouetted by the sea,
circled by the circus sands,
With all memory and fate driven deep beneath the waves,
Let me forget about today until tomorrow."
— from "Mr. Tambourine Man"

There's an unmistakable elegance in Dylan's words, an almost biblical beauty that he has sustained in his songs throughout the years. He refers to it as a "gallantry" in the following, and pointed to it as the single thing that sets his songs apart from others. Though he's maybe more famous for the freedom and expansiveness of his lyrics, all of his songs possess this exquisite care and love for the language. As Shakespeare and Byron did in their times, Dylan has taken English, perhaps the world's plainest language, and instilled it with a timeless, mythic grace.

"Ring them bells, sweet Martha,
for the poor man's son
Ring them bells so the world will know that God is one
Oh, the shepherd is asleep where the willows weep and the mountains are filled with lost sheep."
— from "Ring Them Bells"

As much as he has stretched, expanded and redefined the rules of songwriting, Dylan is a tremendously meticulous craftsman. A brutal critic of his own work, he works and reworks the words of his songs in the studio and even continues to rewrite certain ones even after they've been recorded and released. "They're not written in stone," he said. With such a wondrous wealth of language at his fingertips, he discards imagery and lines other songwriters would sell their souls to discover.

The Bootleg Series, a recently released collection of previously unreleased recordings, offers a rare opportunity to see the revisions and regroupings his songs go through. "Idiot Wind" is one of his angriest songs ("You don't hear a song like that every day," he said), which he recorded on Blood On The Tracks in a way that reflects this anger, emphasizing lines of condemnation like "one day you'll be in the ditch, flies buzzin' around your eyes, blood on your saddle." On The Bootleg Series, we'd get an alternative approach to the song, a quiet, tender reading of the same lines that makes the inherent disquiet of the song even more disturbing, the tenderness of Dylan's delivery adding a new level of genuine sadness to lines like "people see me all the time and they just can't remember how to act."

The peak moment of the song is the penultimate chorus when Dylan addresses America: "Idiot wind, blowing like a circle around my skull, from the Grand Coulee Dam to the Capitol." On the Bootleg version, this famous line is still in formation: "Idiot wind, blowing every time you move your jaw, from the Grand Coulee Dam to the Mardi Gras"

His song "Jokerman" also went through a similar evolution, as a still unreleased bootleg of the song reveals. Like "Idiot Wind," the depth and intensity of the lyric is sustained over an extraordinary amount of verses, yet even more scenes were shot that wound up on the cutting room floor, evidence of an artist overflowing with the abundance of creation:

> "It's a shadowy world
> skies are slippery gray
> A woman just gave birth to a prince today
> and dressed him in scarlet
> He'll put the priest in his pocket, > put the blade to the heat
> Take the motherless children off the street
> And place them at the feet of the harlot"
> — from "Jokerman" on Infidels

> "It's a shadowy world
> skies are slippery gray
> A woman just gave birth to a prince today
> and she's dressed in scarlet
> He'll turn priests in to pimps > and make all men bark
> Take a woman who could have been Joan of Arc
> And turn her into a harlot"
> — from "Jokerman" on Infidels

Often Dylan lays abstraction aside and writes songs as clear and telling as any of Woody Guthrie's narrative ballads, finding heroes and antiheroes in our modern times as Woody found in his. Some of these subjects might be thought of as questionable choices for heroic treatment, such as underworld boss Joey Gallo, about whom he wrote the astounding song "Joey". It's a song that's remarkable for its cinematic clarity; Dylan paints a picture of a life and death so explicit and exact that we can see every frame of it, and even experience Gallo's death as if we were sitting there watching it. And he does it with a rhyme scheme and a meter that makes the immediacy of the imagery even more striking:

> "One day they blew him down in a clam bar in New York
> He could see it coming through the door
> as he lifted up his fork,
> He pushed the table over to protect his family
> Then he staggered out into the streets of Little Italy."
> — from "Joey"

"Yes, well, what can you know about anybody?" Dylan asked, and it's a good question. He's been a mystery for years, "kind of impenetrable, really," Paul Simon said, and that mystery is not penetrated by this interview. Dylan's answers are often more enigmatic than the questions themselves, and like his songs, they give you a lot to think about while not necessarily revealing much about the man.

In person, as others have noted, he is Chaplinesque. His body is smaller and his head bigger than one might expect, giving the effect of a kid wearing a Bob Dylan mask. He possesses one of the worlds most striking faces; while certain stars might seem surprisingly normal and unimpressive in the flesh, Dylan is perhaps even more startling to confront than one might expect. Seeing those eyes and that nose, it's clear it could be no one else than he, and to sit at a table with him and face those iconic features is no less impressive than suddenly finding yourself sitting face to face with William Shakespeare. It's a face we associate with an enormous, amazing body of work, work that has changed the world. But it's not really the kind of face one expects to encounter in everyday life.

Though Van Morrison and others have called him the world's greatest poet, he doesn't think of himself as a poet. "Poets drown in lakes," he said to us. Yet he's written some of the most beautiful poetry the world has known, poetry of love and outrage, of abstraction and clarity, of timelessness and relativity. Though he is faced with the evidence of a catalogue of songs that could contain the whole careers of a dozen fine songwriters, Dylan told us he doesn't consider himself to be a professional songwriter. "For me it's always been more con-fessional than pro-fessional," he said in a distinctive Dylan cadence. "My songs aren't written on a schedule."

Well, how are they written, we asked? This is the question at the heart of this interview, the main one that comes to mind when looking over all the albums, or witnessing the amazing array of moods, masks, styles and forms all represented on the recently released Bootleg Series. How has he done it? It was the first question asked, and though he deflected it at first with his customary humor, it's a question we returned to a few times.

"Start me off somewhere," he said smiling, as if he might be left alone to divulge the secrets of his songwriting, and our talk began.

ST = SongTalk, BD = Bob Dylan

ST: Okay, Arlo Guthrie recently said, "Songwriting is like fishing in a stream; you put in your line and hope you catch something. And I don't think anyone downstream from Bob Dylan ever caught anything."

BD: [Much laughter]

ST: Any idea how you've been able to catch so many?

BD: [Laughs] It's probably the bait. [More laughter]

ST: What kind of bait do you use?

BD: Uh... bait... You've got to use some bait. Otherwise you sit around and expect songs to come to you. Forcing it is using bait.

ST: Does that work for you?

BD: Well, no. Throwing yourself into a situation that would demand a response is using bait. People who write about stuff that hasn't really happened to them are inclined to do that.

ST: When you write songs, do you try to consciously guide the meaning or do you try to follow subconscious directions?

BD: Well, you know, motivation is something you never know behind any song, really. Anybody's song, you never know what the motivation was. It's nice to be able to put yourself in an environment where you can completely accept all the unconscious stuff that comes to you from the inner workings of your mind. And block yourself off to where you can control it all, take it down...

Edgar Allen Poe must have done that. People who are dedicated writers, of which there are some, but mostly people get their information today over a television set or some kind of a way that's hitting them on all their senses. It's not just a great novel anymore. You have to be able to get the thoughts out of your mind.

ST: How do you do that?

BD: Well, first of all, there's two kinds of thoughts in your mind: there's good thoughts and evil thoughts. Both come through your mind. Some people are more loaded down with one than another. Nevertheless, they come through. And you have to be able to sort them out, if you want to be a songwriter, if you want to be a song singer. You must get rid of all that baggage. You ought to be able to sort out those thoughts, because they don't mean anything, they're just pulling you around, too. It's important to get rid of all them thoughts.

Then you can do something from some kind of surveillance of the situation. You have some kind of place where you can see it but it can't affect you. Where you can bring something to the matter, besides just take, take, take, take. As so many situations in life are today. Take, take, take, that's all that is. What's in it for me? That syndrome that started in the Me Decade, whenever that was. We're still in that. It's still happening.

ST: Is songwriting for you more a sense of taking something from someplace else?

BD: Well, someplace else is always a heart beat away. There's no rhyme or reason to it. That's what makes it so attractive. There isn't any rule. You can still have your wits about you and do something that gets you off in a multitude of ways. As you very well know, or else you yourself wouldn't be doing it.

ST: Your songs often bring us back to other times, and are filled with mythic, magical images. A song like Changing Of The Guard seems to take place centuries ago, with lines like "They shaved her head/she was torn between Jupiter and Apollo/a messenger arrived with a black nightingale...". How do you connect with a song like that?

BD: [Pause] A song like that, there's no way of knowing, after the fact, unless somebody's there to take it down in chronological order, what the motivation was behind it.

[Pause] But on one level, of course, it's no different from anything else of mine. It's the same amount of metric verses like a poem. To me, like a poem. The melodies in my mind are very simple, they're just based on music we've all heard growing up. And that and music which went beyond that, which went back further, Elizabethan ballads and what not...

To me, it's old [laughs] It's old. It's not something, with my minimal amount of talent, if you could call it that, minimum amount... To me somebody coming along now would definitely read what's out there if they're seriously concerned with being an artist when they get to be Picasso's age. You're better off learning some music theory. You're just better off, yeah, if you want to write songs. Rather than just take a hillbilly twang, you know, and try to base it all on that. Even country music is more orchestrated than it used to be. You're better off having some feel for music that you don't have to carry in your head, that you can write down. To me those are the people who... are serious about this craft. People who go about it that way. Not people who just want to pour out their insides and they got to get a big idea out and they want to tell the world about this, sure, you can do it through a song, you always could. You can use a song for anything, you know. The world don't need any more songs.

ST: You don't think so?

BD: No, they've got enough. They've got way too many. As a matter of fact, if nobody wrote any songs from this day on, the world ain't gonna suffer for it. Nobody cares. There's enough songs for people to listen to, if they want to listen to songs. For every man, woman and child on earth, they could be sent, probably, each of them, a hundred records, and never be repeated. There's enough songs. Unless someone's gonna come along with a pure heart and has something to say. That's a different story.

But as far as songwriting, any idiot could do it. [Laughs] It's just not that difficult of a thing. Everybody writes a song just like everybody's got that one great novel in them.

There aren't a lot of people like me. You just had your interview with Neil [Young], John Mellencamp... Of course, most of my ilk that came along write their own songs and play them. It wouldn't matter if anybody ever made another record. They've got enough songs.

To me, someone who writes really good songs is Randy Newman. There's a lot of people who write good songs. As songs. Now Randy might not go out on stage and knock you out, or knock your socks off. And he's not going to get people thrilled in the front row. But he's gonna write a better song than most people who can do it. You know, he's got that down to an art. Now Randy knows music. He knows music. But it doesn't get any better than "Louisiana" or "Cross Charleston Bay" [Sail Away]. It doesn't get any better than that. That's like a classically heroic anthem theme. He did it. There's quite a few people who did it. Not that many people in Randy's class.

Brian Wilson. He can write melodies that will beat the band. Three people could combine on a song and make it a great song. If one person would have written the same song, maybe you would never have heard of it. It might get buried on some... rap record. [Laughs].

ST: Still, when you've come out with some of your new albums of songs, those songs fit that specific time better than any songs that had already been written. Your new songs have always shown us new possibilities.

BD: It's not a good idea and it's bad luck to look for life's guidance to popular entertainers. It's bad luck to do that. No one should do that. Popular entertainers are fine, there's nothing the matter with that, but as long as you know where you're standing and what ground you're on, many of them, they don't know what they're doing either.

ST: But your songs are more than pop entertainment...

BD: Some people say so. Not to me.

ST: No?

BD: Pop entertainment means nothing to me. Nothing. You know, Madonna's good, she's talented, she puts all kinds of stuff together, she's learned her thing... But it's the kind of thing which takes years and years out of your life to be able to do. You've got to sacrifice a whole lot to do that. Sacrifice. If you want to make it big, you've got to sacrifice a whole lot.

It's all the same, it's all the same. [Laughs]

ST: Van Morrison said that you are our greatest living poet. Do you think of yourself in those terms?

BD: [Pause] Sometimes. It's within me. It's within me to put myself up and be a poet. But it's dedication, [Softly] It's a big dedication.

[Pause] Poet's don't drive big cars to the supermarket. Poets don't empty the garbage. Poets aren't on the PTA. Poets, you know, they don't go picket the Better Housing Bureau, or whatever. Poets don't... Poets don't even speak on the telephone. Poets don't even talk to anybody. Poets do a lot of listening and... and usually they know why they're poets! [Laughs]

Yeah, there are... what can you say? The world don't need any more poems, it's got Shakespeare. There's enough of everything. You name it, there's enough of it. There was too much of it with electricity, maybe, some people said that, some people said the light bulb was going too far.

Poets live on the land. They behave in a gentlemanly way. And live by their own gentlemanly code.

[Pause] And die broke. Or drown in lakes. Poets usually have very unhappy endings. Look at Keats' life. Look at Jim Morrison, if you want to call him a poet. Although some people say that he really is in the Andes.

ST: Do you think so?

BD: Well, it never crossed my mind to think one way or the other about it, but you do hear that talk. Piggyback in the Andes. Riding a donkey.

ST: People have a hard time believing that Shakespeare really wrote all of his work because there is so much of it. Do you have a hard time accepting that?

BD: People have a hard time accepting anything that overwhelms them.

ST: Might they think that of you, years from now, that no one man could have produced so much incredible work?

BD: They could. They could look back and think nobody produced it. [Softly] It's not to anybody's best interest to think about how they will be perceived tomorrow. It hurts you in the long run.

ST: But aren't there songs of yours that you know will always be around?

BD: Who's gonna sing them? My songs really aren't meant to be covered. No, not really. Can you think of... Well, they do get covered, but it's covered. They're not intentionally written to be covered but okay, they do.

ST: Your songs are much more enjoyable to sing and play than most songs –

BD: Do you play them on piano or guitar?

ST: Both.

BD: Acoustic guitar?

ST: Mostly.

BD: Do you play jazz? It never hurts to learn as many chords as you can. All kinds. Sometimes it will change the inflection of a whole song, a straight chord or, say, an augmented seventh chord.

ST: Do you have favorite keys to work in?

BD: On the piano, my favorite keys are the black keys. And they sound better on guitar, too. Sometimes, when a song's in a flat key, say B flat, bring it to the guitar, you might want to put it in A. But... that's an interesting thing you just said. It changes the reflection. Mainly in mine the songs sound different. They sound... when you take a black key song and put it on guitar, which means you're playing in A flat, not too many people like to play in those keys. To me it doesn't matter. [Laughs] It doesn't matter because my fingering is the same anyway. So there are songs that, even without the piano, which is the dominant sound if you're playing in the black keys -why else would you play in that key except to have the dominant piano sound? – the songs that go into those keys right from the piano, they sound different. They sound deeper. Yeah. They sound deeper. Everything sounds deeper in those black keys. They're not guitar keys, though. Guitar bands don't usually like to play in those keys, which kind of gives me an idea, actually, of a couple of songs that could actually sound better in black keys.

ST: Do keys have different colors for you?

BD: Sure. Sure. [Softly] Sure.

ST: You've written some great A minor songs. I think of "One More Cup of Coffee" -

BD: Right. B minor might sound even better.

ST: How come?

BD: Well, It might sound better because you're playing a lot of open chords if you're playing in A minor. If you play in B minor, it will force you to play higher. And the chords... you're bound, someplace along the line, because there are so many chords in that song, or seem to be anyway, you're bound someplace along the line to come down to an open chord on the bottom. From B. You would hit an E someplace along the line.

Try it in B minor. [Laughs] Maybe it will be a hit for you. A hit is a number one song, isn't it? Yeah.

ST: When you sit down to write a song, do you pick a key first that will fit the song? Or do you change keys while you're writing?

BD: Yeah, yeah. Maybe like in the middle of the thing. There are ways you can get out of whatever you've gotten into. You want to get out of it. It's bad enough getting into it. But the thing to do as soon as you get into it is realize you must get out of it. And unless you get out of it quickly and effortlessly, there's no use staying in it. It will just drag you down. You could be spending years writing the same song, telling the same story, doing the same thing.

So once you involve yourself in it, once you accidentally have slipped into it, the thing is to get out. So your primary impulse is going to take you so far. But then you might think, well, you know, is this one of these things where it's all just going to come? And then all of a sudden you start thinking. And when my mind starts thinking, "What's happening now? Oh, there's a story here," and my mind starts to get into it, that's trouble right away. That's usually big trouble. And as far as never seeing this thing again.

There's a bunch of ways you can get out of that. You can make yourself get out of it by changing key. That's one way. Just take the whole thing and change key, keeping the same melody. And see if that brings you any place. More times than not, if that will take you down the road. You don't want to be on a collision course. But that will take you down the road. Somewhere.

And then if that fails, and that will run out, too, then you can always go back to where you started. Yeah, because anything you do in A, it's going to be a different song in G. While you're writing it, anyway. There's too many wide passing notes in G [on the guitar] not to influence your writing, unless you're playing barre chords.

ST: Do you ever switch instruments, like from guitar to piano, while writing?

BD: Not so much that way. Although when it's time to record something for me, sometimes a song that has been written on piano with just lyrics here in my hand, it'll be time to play it now on guitar. So it will come out differently. But it wouldn't have influenced the writing of the song at all.

Changing keys influences the writing of the song. Changing keys on the same instrument. For me, that works. I think for somebody else, the other thing works. Everything is different.

ST: I interviewed Pete Seeger recently –

BD: He's a great man, Pete Seeger.

ST: I agree. He said, "All song writers are links in a chain". Without your link in that chain, all of songwriting would have evolved much differently. You said how you brought folk music to rock music. Do you think that would have happened without you?

BD: Somebody else would have done it in some other kind of way. But, hey, so what? So what? You can lead people astray awfully easy.

Would people have been better off? Sure. They would have found somebody else. Maybe different people would have found different people, and would have been influenced by different people.

ST: You brought the song to a new place. Is there still a new place to bring songs? Will they continue to evolve?

BD: [Pause] The evolution of song is like a snake with its tail in its mouth. That's evolution. That's what it is. As soon as you're there, you find your tail.

ST: Would it be okay with you if I mentioned some lines from your songs out of context to see what reaction you might have to them?

BD: Sure. You can name anything you want to name, man.

ST: "I stand here looking at your yellow railroad in the ruins of your balcony.... " [from Absolutely Sweet Marie].

BD: [Pause] Okay. That's an old song. No, let's say not even old. How old? Too old. It's matured well. It's like old wine. Now, you know, look, that's as complete as you can be. Every single letter in that line. It's all true. On a literal and on an escapist level.

ST: And is it that truth that adds so much resonance to it?

BD: Oh yeah, exactly. See, you can pull it apart and it's like, Yellow railroad? Well, yeah. Yeah, yeah. All of it.

ST: "I was lying down in the reeds without any oxygen /I saw you in the wilderness among the men /I saw you drift into infinity and come back again... " (from True Love Tends To Forget).

BD: Those are probably lyrics left over from my songwriting days with Jacques Levy. To me, that's what they sound like.

Getting back to the yellow railroad, that could be from looking some place. Being a performer you travel the world.

You're not just looking off the same window every day. You're not just walking down the same old street. So you must make yourself observe whatever. But most of the time it hits you. You don't have to observe. It hits you. Like "yellow railroad" could have been a blinding day when the sun was so bright on a railroad someplace and it stayed on my mind.

These aren't contrived images. These are images which are just in there and have got to come out. You know, if it's in there it's got to come out.

ST: "And the chains of the sea will be busted in the night..." [from When The Ship Comes In]

BD: To me, that song says a whole lot. Patti LaBelle should do that. You know? You know, there again, that comes from hanging out at a lot of poetry gatherings. Those kind of images are very romantic. They're very gothic and romantic at the same time. And they have a sweetness to it, also. So It's a combination of a lot of different elements at the time. That's not a contrived line. That's not sitting down and writing a song. Those kind of songs, they just come out. They're in you so they've got to come out.

ST: "Standing on the water casting your bread/while the eyes of the idol with the iron head are glowing... " [from Jokerman].

BD: [Blows small Peruvian flute] Which one is that?

ST: That's from Jokerman.

BD: That's a song that got away from me. Lots of songs on that album [Infidels] got away from me. They just did.

ST: You mean in the writing?

BD: Yeah. They hung around too long. They were better before they were tampered with. Of course, it was me tampering with them [Laughs]. Yeah. That could have been a good song. It could have been.

ST: I think it's tremendous.

BD: Oh you do? It probably didn't hold up for me because in my mind it had been written and rewritten and written again. One of those kind of things.

ST: "But the enemy I see wears a cloak of decency..." [from Slow Train].

BD: Now don't tell me... wait... Is that When You Gonna Wake Up?

ST: No, that's from Slow Train.

BD: Oh, wow. Oh, yeah. Wow. There again. That's a song that you could write a song to every line in the song. You could.

ST: Many of your songs are like that?

BD: Well, you know, that's not good either. Not really. In the long run, it could have stood up better by maybe doing just that, maybe taking every line and making a song out of it. If somebody had the willpower.

But that line, there again, is an intellectual line. It's a line, "Well, the enemy I see wears a cloak of decency," that could be a lie. It just could be. Whereas "Standing under your yellow railroad," that's not a lie.

To Woody Guthrie, see, the airwaves were sacred. And when he'd hear something false, it was on airwaves that were sacred to him. His songs weren't false. Now we know the airwaves aren't sacred but to him they were.

So that influenced a lot of people with me coming up. Like, "You know, all those songs on the Hit Parade are just a bunch of shit, anyway." It influenced me in the beginning when nobody had heard that. Nobody had heard that. You know, "If I give my heart to you, will you handle it with care?" Or "I'm getting sentimental over you." Who gives a shit? It could be said in a great way, and the performer could put the song across, but come on, that's because he's a great performer not because it's a great song. Woody was also a performer and songwriter. So a lot of us got caught up in that. There ain't anything good on the radio. It doesn't happen. Then, of course, the Beatles came along and kind of grabbed everybody by the throat. You were for them or against them. You were for them or you joined them, or whatever. Then everybody said, Oh, popular songs ain't so bad, and then everyone wanted to get on the radio. [Laughs] Before that it didn't matter. My first records were never played on the radio. It was unheard of! Folk records weren't played on the radio. You never heard them on the radio and nobody cared if they were on the radio.

Going on into it farther, after the Beatles came out and everybody from England, Rock and Roll still is an American thing. Folk music is not. Rock and Roll is an American thing, it's just all kind of twisted. But the English kind of threw it back, didn't they? And they made everybody respect it once more. So everybody wanted to get on the radio.

Now nobody even knows what radio is anymore. Nobody likes it that you talk to. Nobody listens to it. But then again, it's bigger than it ever was. But nobody knows how to really respond to it. Nobody can shut it off. [Laughs]. You know? And people really aren't sure whether they want to be on the radio or whether they don't want to be on the radio. They might want to sell a lot of records, but people always did that. But being a folk performer, having hits, it wasn't important. Whatever that has to do with anything... [laughs].

ST: Your songs, like Woody's, always have defied being pop entertainment. In your songs, like his, we know a real person is talking, with lines like, "You've got a lot of nerve to say you are my friend."

BD: That's another way of writing a song of course. Just talking to somebody that ain't there That's the best way. That's the truest way. Then it just becomes a question of how heroic your speech is. To me, it's something to strive after.

ST: Until you record a song, no matter how heroic it is, it doesn't really exist. Do you ever feel that.

BD: No. If it's there, it exists.

ST: You once said that you only write about what's true, what's been proven to you, that you write about dreams but not fantasies.

BD: My songs really aren't dreams. They're more of a responsive nature. Waking up from a dream is... when you write a dream, it's something you try to recollect and you're never quite sure if you're getting it right or not.

ST: You said your songs are responsive. Does life have to be in turmoil for songs to come?

BD: Well to me, when you need them, they appear. Your life doesn't have to be in turmoil to write a song like that but you need to be outside of it. That's why a lot of people, me myself included, write songs when one form or another of society has rejected you. So that you can truly write about it from the outside. Someone who's never been out there can only imagine it as anything, really.

ST: Outside of life itself?

BD: No. Outside of the situation you find yourself in.

There are different types of songs and they're all called songs. But there are different types of songs just like there are different types of people, you know? There's an infinite amount of different kinds, stemming from a common folk ballad verse to people who have classical training. And with classical training, of course, then you can just apply lyrics to classical training and get things going on in positions where you've never been in before. Modern twentieth century ears are the first ears to hear these kind of Broadway songs. There wasn't anything like this. These are musical songs. These are done by people who know music first. And then lyrics. To me, Hank Williams is still the best songwriter.

ST: Hank? Better than Woody Guthrie?

BD: That's a good question. Hank Williams never wrote This Land Is Your Land. But it's not that shocking for me to think of Hank Williams singing Pastures of Plenty or Woody Guthrie singing Cheatin' Heart. So in a lot of ways those two writers are similar. As writers. But you mustn't forget that both of these people were performers, too. And that's another thing which separates a person who just writes a song...

People who don't perform but who are so locked into other people who do that, they can sort of feel what that other person would like to say in a song and be able to write those lyrics. Which is a different thing from a performer who needs a song to play on stage year after year.

ST: And you always wrote your songs for your self to sing -

BD: My songs were written with me in mind. In those situations, several people might say, "Do you have a song laying around?" The best songs to me – my best songs -are songs which were written very quickly. Yeah, very, very quickly. Just about as much time as it takes to write it down is about as long as it takes to write it. Other than that, there have been a lot of ones that haven't made it. They haven't survived. They could. They need to be dragged out, you know, and looked at again, maybe.

ST: You said once that the saddest thing about songwriting is trying to reconnect with an idea you started before, and how hard that is to do.

BD: To me it can't be done. To me, unless I have another writer who's around who might want to finish it... outside of writing with the Traveling Wilburys, my shared experience writing a song with other songwriters is not that great. Of course, unless you find the right person to write with as a partner... [laughs]... you're awfully lucky if you do, but if you don't, it's really more trouble than it's worth, trying to write something with somebody.

ST: Your collaborations with Jacques Levy came out pretty great.

BD: We both were pretty much lyricists. Yeah, very panoramic songs because, you know, after one of my lines, one of his lines would come out. Writing with Jacques wasn't difficult. It was trying to just get it down. It just didn't stop. Lyrically. Of course, my melodies are very simple anyway so they're very easy to remember.

ST: With a song like Isis that the two of you, wrote together, did you plot that story out prior to writing the verses?

BD: That was a story that [laughs] meant something to him. Yeah. It just seemed to take on a life of its own, [laughs] as another view of history [laughs]. Which there are so many views that don't get told. Of history, anyway. That wasn't one of them. Ancient history, but history nonetheless.

ST: Was that a story you had in mind before the song was written?

BD: No. With this Isis thing, it was Isis.... you know, the name sort of rang a bell but not in any kind of vigorous way. So, therefore, it was name-that-tune time. It was anything. The name was familiar. Most people would think they knew it from somewhere. But it seemed like just about any way it wanted to go would have been okay, just as long as it didn't get too close. [laughs]

ST: Too close to what?

BD: [Laughs] Too close to me or him.

ST: People have an idea of your songs freely flowing out from you, but that song and many others of yours are so well-crafted; it has an ABAB rhyme scheme which is like something Byron would do, interlocking every line -

BD: Oh, yeah. Oh, yeah. Oh, sure. If you've heard a lot of free verse, William Carlos Williams, e.e. cummings, those kind of people who wrote free verse, your ear is not going to be trained for things to sound that way. Of course, for me it's no secret that all my stuff is rhythmically orientated that way.

Like a Byron line would be something as simple as "What is it you buy so dear / with your pain and with your fear?" Now that's a Byron line, but that could have been one of my lines. Up until a certain time, maybe in the twenties, that's the way poetry was. It was that way. It was... simple and easy to remember. And always in rhythm. It had a rhythm whether the music was there or not.

ST: Is rhyming fun for you?

BD: Well it can be, but, you know, it's a game. You know, you sit around... you know, it's more like, it's mentally... mentally... it gives you a thrill. It gives you a thrill to rhyme something you might think, "Well, that's never been rhymed before." But then again, people have taken rhyming now, it doesn't have to be exact anymore. Nobody's going to care if you rhyme 'represent' with 'ferment', you know. Nobody's gonna care.

ST: That was a result of a lot of people of your generation for whom the craft elements of song writing didn't seem to matter as much. But in your songs the craft is always there, along with the poetry and the energy.

BD: My sense of rhyme used to be more involved in my songwriting than it is... Still staying in the unconscious frame of mind, you can pull yourself out and throw up two rhymes first and work it back. You get the rhymes first and work back and then see if you can make it make sense in another kind of way. You can still stay in the unconscious frame of mind to pull it off, which is the state of mind you have to be in anyway.

ST: So sometimes you will work backwards, like that?

BD: Oh, yeah. Yeah, a lot of times. That's the only way you're going to finish something. That's not uncommon, though.

ST: Do you finish songs even when you feel that maybe they're not keepers?

BD: Keepers or not keepers... you keep songs if you think they're any good, and if you don't... you can always give them to somebody else. If you've got songs that you're not going to do and you just don't like them... show them to other people, if you want.

Then again, it all gets back to the motivation. Why you're doing what you're doing. That's what it is. [Laughs] It's confrontation with that... goddess of the self. God of the self or goddess of the self? Somebody told me it was goddess of the self. Somebody told me that the goddess rules over the self. Gods don't concern themselves with such earthly matters. Only goddesses... would stoop so low. Or bend down so low.

ST: You mentioned that when you were writing Every Grain of Sand that you felt you were in an area where no one had ever been before -

BD: Yeah. In that area where Keats is. Yeah. That's a good poem set to music.

ST: A beautiful melody.

BD: It's a beautiful melody too, isn't it? It's a folk derivative melody. It's nothing you can put your finger on, but, you know, yeah, those melodies are great. There ain't enough of them, really. Even a song like that, the simplicity of it can be... deceiving. As far as.. a song like that just may have been written in great turmoil, although you would never sense that. Written but not delivered. Some songs are better written in peace and quiet and delivered in turmoil. Others are best written in turmoil and delivered in a peaceful, quiet way.

It's a magical thing, popular song. Trying to press it down into everyday numbers doesn't quite work. It's not a puzzle. There aren't pieces that fit. It doesn't make a complete picture that's ever been seen.

But, you know, as they say, thank God for songwriters.

ST: Randy Newman said that he writes his songs by going to it everyday, like a job -

BD: Tom Paxton told me the same thing. He goes back with me, way back. He told me the same thing. Everyday he gets up and he writes a song. Well that's great, you know, you write the song and then take the kids to school? Come home, have some lunch with the wife, you know, maybe go write another song. Then Tom said for recreation, to get himself loose, he rode his horse. And then pick up his child from school, and then go to bed with his wife. Now to me that sounds like the ideal way to write songs. To me, it couldn't be any better than that.

ST: How do you do it?

BD: Well, my songs aren't written on a schedule like that. In my mind it's never really been seriously a profession... It's been more confessional than professional. Then again, everybody's in it for a different reason.

ST: Do you ever sit down with the intention of writing a song or do you wait for songs to come to you?

BD: Either or. Both ways. It can come... some people are... It's possible now for a songwriter to have a recording studio in his house and record a song and make a demo and do a thing. It's like the roles have changed on all that stuff. Now for me, the environment to write the song is extremely important. The environment has to bring something out in me that wants to be brought out. It's a contemplative, reflective thing... Feelings really aren't my thing. See, I don't write lies.

It's a proven fact: Most people who say I love you don't mean it. Doctors have proved that. So love generates a lot of songs. Probably more so than a lot. Now it's not my intention to have love influence my songs. Any more than it influenced Chuck Berry's songs or Woody Guthrie's or Hank Williams'. Hank Williams, they're not love songs.

You're degrading them songs calling them love songs. Those are songs from the Tree of Life, There's no love on the Tree of Life. Love is on the tree of Knowledge, the tree of Good and Evil. So we have a lot of songs in popular music about love. Who needs them? Not you, not me.

You can use love in a lot of ways in which it will come back to hurt you. Love is a democratic principle. It's a Greek thing.

A college professor told me that if you read about Greece in the history books, you'll know all about America. Nothing that happens will puzzle you ever again. You read the history of Ancient Greece and when the Romans came in, and nothing will ever bother you about America again. You'll see what America is.

Now, maybe but there are a lot of other countries in the world besides America... [laughs]. Two. You can't forget about them [laughter].

ST: Have you found there are better places in the world than others to write songs?

BD: It's not necessary to take a trip to write a song. What a long, strange trip it's been, however But that part of it's true, too.

Environment is very important. People need peaceful, invigorating environments. Stimulating environments.

In America there's a lot of repression. A lot of people who are repressed. They 'd like to get out of town, they just don't know how to do it. And so, it holds back creativity. It's like you go somewhere and you can't help but feel it. Or people even tell it to you, you know?

What got me into the whole thing in the beginning wasn't songwriting. That's not what got me into it. When Hound Dog came across the radio, there was nothing in my mind that said, "Wow, what a great song, I wonder who wrote that?" It didn't really concern me who wrote it. It didn't matter who wrote it. It was just, it was just there.

Same way with me now. You hear a good song. Now you think to yourself, maybe, "Who wrote it?" Why? Because the performer's not as good as the song maybe. The performer's got to transcend that song. At least come up to it. A good performer can always make a bad song sound good. Record albums are filled with good performers singing filler stuff. Everybody can say they've done that. Whether you wrote it or whether somebody else wrote it, it doesn't matter. What interested me was being a musician. The singer was important and so was the song. But being a musician was always first and foremost in the back of my mind. That's why, while other people were learning... whatever they were learning. What were they learning way back then?

ST: Ride, Sally, Ride!

BD: Something like that. Or Run, Rudolph, Run. When the others were doing Run, Rudolph, Run my interests were going more to Leadbelly kind of stuff, when he was playing a Stella 12-string guitar. Like, how does the guy do that? Where can one of these be found, a 12-string guitar? They didn't have any in my town. My intellect always fell that way. Of the music. Like Paul Whiteman. Paul Whiteman creates a mood. To me, that creates a mood. Bing Crosby's early records. They created a mood, like that Cab Calloway, kind of spooky horn kind of stuff. Violins, when big bands had a sound to them, without the Broadway glitz. Once that Broadway trip got into it, it became all sparkly and Las Vegas, really. But it wasn't always so.

Music created an environment. It doesn't happen anymore. Why? Maybe technology has just booted it out and there's no need for it. Because we have a screen which supposedly is three-dimensional. Or comes across as three-dimensional. It would like you to believe it's three-dimensional. Well, you know, like old movies and stuff like that that's influenced so many of us who grew up on that stuff. [Picks up Peruvian flute] Like this old thing here, it's nothing, it's some kind of, what is it?... Listen: [Plays a slow tune on the flute]. Here, listen to this song. [Plays more.] Okay. That's a song. It don't have any words. Why do songs need words? They don't. Songs don 't need words. They don't.

ST: Do you feel satisfied with your body of work?

BD: Most everything, yeah.

ST: Do you spend a lot of time writing songs?

BD: Well, did you hear that record that Columbia released last year Down In The Groove? Those songs, they came in pretty easy.

ST: I'd like to mention some of your songs, and see what response you have to them.

BD: Okay.

ST: One More Cup Of Coffee [from Desire].

BD: [Pause] Was that for a coffee commercial? No.... It's a gypsy song. That song was written during a gypsy festival in the south of France one summer. Somebody took me there to the gypsy high holy days which coincide with my own particular birthday. So somebody took me to a birthday party there once, and hanging out there for a week probably influenced the writing of that song.

But The Valley Below probably came from someplace else.

My feeling about the song was that the verses came from someplace else. It wasn't about anything, so this "valley below" thing became the fixture to hang it on. But "valley below" could mean anything.

ST: Precious Angel [from Slow Train Coming]

BD: Yeah. That's another one, it could go on forever. There's too many verses and there's not enough. You know? When people ask me, "How come you don't sing that song anymore?" It's like it's another one of those songs: it's just too much and not enough. A lot of my songs strike me that way. That's the natural thing about them to me.

It's too hard to wonder why about them. To me, they're not worthy of wondering why about them. They're songs. They're not written in stone. They're on plastic.

ST: To us though they are written in stone, because Bob Dylan wrote them. I've been amazed by the way you've changed some of your great songs -

BD: Right. Somebody told me that Tennyson often wanted to rewrite his poems once he saw them in print.

ST: I And I. [from Infidels].

BD: [Pause] That was one of them Caribbean songs. One year a bunch of songs just came to me hanging around down in the islands, and that was one of them.

ST: Joey [from Desire].

BD: To me, that's a great song. Yeah. And it never loses its appeal.

ST: And it has one of the greatest visual endings of any song.

BD: That's a tremendous song. And you'd only know that singing it night after night. You know who got me singing that song? [Jerry] Garcia. Yeah. He got me singing that song again. He said that's one of the best songs ever written. Coming from him, it was hard to know which way to take that [Laughs]. He got me singing that song again with them [The Grateful Dead].

It was amazing how it would, right from the gate go, it had a life of its own, it just ran out of the gate and it just kept on getting better and better and better and better and it keeps on getting better. It's in its infant stages, as a performance thing. Of course, it's a long song. But, to me, not to blow my own horn, but to me the song is like a Homer ballad. Much more so than A Hard Rain, which is a long song too. But, to me, Joey has a Homeric quality to it that you don't hear everyday. Especially in popular music.

ST: Ring Them Bells. [From Oh Mercy]

BD: It stands up when you hear it played by me. But if another performer did it, you might find that it probably wouldn't have as much to do with bells as what the title proclaims. Somebody once came and sang it in my dressing room. To me [laughs]. To try to influence me to sing it that night. [Laughter] It could have gone either way, you know.

EM: Which way did it go?

BD: It went right out the door. [Laughter] It went out the door and didn't come back, listening to this song which was on my record, sung by someone who wanted me to sing it... There was no way he was going to get me to sing it like that. A great performer, too.

ST: Idiot Wind [From Blood On The Tracks].

BD: Idiot Wind*. Yeah, you know, obviously, if you've heard both versions, you realise, of course, that there could be a myriad of versions for the thing. It doesn't stop. It wouldn't stop. Where do you end? You could still be writing it, really. It's something that could be a work continually in progress.

Although, on saying that, let me say that my lyrics, in my way of thinking, are better for my songs than anybody else's. People have felt about my songs sometimes the same way as me. And they say to me, your songs are so opaque that, people tell me, they have feelings they'd like to export within the same framework. My response, always, is to go ahead, do it, if you feel like it. But it never comes off. They're not as good as my lyrics. There's just something about my lyrics that just have a gallantry to them. And that might be all they have going for them. [Laughs]. However, it's no small thing.

12 June 1991
Eduardo Bueno Interview(?), Budapest, Hungary

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1097-1100.

This interview with Dylan, supposedly conducted by Eduardo Bueno in Budapest on June 12, 1991, was published in the Telegraph, Issue 42. It is a fake. Eduardo Bueno summed it up pretty well himself in a letter to the Telegraph, reprinted in No. 44:

A brief synopsis:

During Dylan's concerts in Brazil (Jan 1990), Bueno wrote a first-hand account of the tour for Brazilian periodical O Estado de Sao Paulo. He made it "clear... that I had never talked to Bob Dylan himself." When the article appeared (Feb 12, 1990), Bueno found it considerably changed. To quote Bueno:

> "The reporter (Luis Andre Fonseca) had rewritten everything, invented several of the stories, printed fake names... and worst of all, had put a lot of words into Dylan's own mouth. And he published it under my name."

Bueno threatened to sue the paper, the reporter was fired, the paper printed an apology... end of story?

No, because in Aug 1991, another fake interview was published in Eduardo Bueno's name in Zero Hora, Porto Alegre, Brazil:

> "Dylan was playing shows in Brazil again and someone who said he was from O Estado offered Zero Hora 'an exclusive interview with Bob Dylan done by Eduardo Bueno, in Budapest', where Dylan had, in fact, recently played... Everything... was well researched: the name of the hotel, the name of the stadium where Dylan played, and so on. I have my suspects but I've been unable to prove anything against anyone..."

At Bueno's instigation, Zero Hora published a retraction with apologies. In writing about Dylan's concert at Porto Alegre that year, Bueno had another "opportunity to tell the readers that the 'Budapest interview' had never taken place."

Bueno further couldn't understand how this fake could wind up inside the Telegraph because "it isn't difficult to spot that most of Dylan's answers had obviously been taken from previous interviews."

The interview, as it appeared in the Telegraph, follows:

ANGELS, VAMPIRES, THE BIBLE, MICK JAGGER,
THE NEW HAT, AND THE ILL-FATED GIG IN TRANSYLVANIA

Budapest: Wednesday, June 12, 1991. On the terrace of his suite at the Buda Penta Hotel, overlooking the lovely district of Castelo, the oldest part of the city of Buda, and the River Danube, Bob Dylan spoke to Eduardo Bueno about... well, all sorts of things, really. The interview was printed in the Brazilian magazine, Caderno 2, on June 20, 1991, under the title "Bob Dylan Breaks His Five- Year Silence".

EB: When this tour began, back in Italy, everything seemed a bit tense. Yugoslavia, the first Eastern European country you've played in your 30-year career, is also going through pretty tense times right now. What do you think of what's been happening in Europe in the last couple of years?

BD: You're saying that you thought that the tour began in a tense sort of way?

EB: Well, a little bit. Don't you think so?

BD: Uhmmm...

ED: Well, anyway, what do you think about what's happening in Eastern Europe now that you're here for the first time

BD: I've been here before, in 1978 or '79, on holiday... Do you know anything about the history of Central or Eastern Europe?

EB: A little.

BD: Well, then you must know that these countries don't have a really solid national unity. More important than that, they don't have an ethnic unity. These countries are countries that were created, invented. They're not organic. They were sort of toys on the big nation's tables. So what's happening now is simply a return to the natural order of things.

EB: Are you in favor of separatist movements?

BD: I'm not really interested in governments or countries. I think that the individual, the man alone, just him, the single being, is what really matters. I'm in favor of the absolute freedom of the individual. I think that politics is the devil's instrument. Politics kills. Politics is dirty. Politics is corrupt. I mean, everybody knows that.

EB: The best government is the one which doesn't govern...

BD: Yes. Thoreau was always right about that... Is this what you wanted to talk to me about?

EB: No, I wanted to talk about angels.

BD: Angels?

EB: Yes. In an interview you did with Sam Shepard in Esquire magazine, he asked you what were your thoughts about angels and you didn't finish giving him an answer because the telephone rang and you went to answer it and when you came back, the subject was changed.

BD: Well, The Bible says that angels exist.

EB: That's exactly what you said before. But do you believe in angels?

BD: Of course. I believe in everything that The Bible says... and according to The Bible, there are five angels for each human being.

EB: Do you read The Bible a lot?

BD: Yes.

EB: All the time?

BD: Always.

EB: Which are your favorite books in The Bible?

BD: Leviticus and Deuteronomy.

EB: What do you think about the Apocalypse?

BD: It will not be by water, but by fire next time. It's what is written.

EB: Which edition of The Bible do you read?

BD: King James's version.

EB: That's not really a Fundamentalist version of The Bible, is it?

BD: I've never been Fundamentalist. I've never been Born Again. Those are just labels that people hang on you. They mean just about as much as Folk Singer, Protest Singer, Rock Star. That's to say that they don't mean anything at all.

EB: I heard you wanted to go to Transylvania in Romania, to the area where Bram Stoker was inspired to write Dracula.

BD: Yes, but the trip was cancelled, or maybe just postponed.

EB: It was here in Budapest that Bela Lugosi was born – the greatest movie Dracula. Did you know that he died shouting, "I'm immortal! I'm King of the Vampires!"?

BD: I think he was Dracula incarnate.

EB: Do you believe in vampires?

BD: Sure. The world is run by vampires. Wherever you go, there are vampires. The music business is controlled basically by vampires.

EB: How is your relationship with the music business, with your record company and so on?

BD: Well, my business is to write songs, to make records and to play shows here and there. Basically, that's it. I'm not very interested in what the men who run the record companies, or the producers, or the music publishers have to say to me. None of them has ever told me anything interesting in the last 25 years. Last year, the vice-president of my record label told me that Oh Mercy didn't sell many copies because the record's title didn't mean anything. Well, it meant something to me! After that, somehow I felt all the more determined to make my records the way that I like to make them. But none of my records sell very many copies, do they?

EB: What records are you listening to nowadays?

BD: Hey, you know, I can't understand why there are so many new records. There are thousands of new records every week, and most of them mean absolutely nothing. I don't want to sound too conservative, you know what I mean, but there are already enough good old records. Nobody needs new records that don't do anything new.

EB: In Brazil, your tour manager told me that you only listened to old things – Bill Monroe, things like that.

BD: That's true. That's what I listen to the most: Bill Monroe, Hank Williams, Big Mama Thornton, Jean Ritchie, Blind Willie McTell, rural blues, country blues. But I like rap too. I listen to rap a lot. I hear a bit of dance music sometimes. My sons and daughters like it. One of them's a big Guns n' Roses fan.

EB: You know, when you sang Knocking On Heaven's Door in Ljubjana and Belgrade, I had the feeling that the audiences in the East were much more connected with the spirit of the song than Western audiences, who probably now associate that song with Guns n' Roses.

BD: Guns n' Roses are OK. Slash is OK. But there's something about their version of that song that reminds me of the movie Invasion Of The Body Snatchers. I always wonder who's been transformed into some sort of a clone, and who's stayed true to himself. And I never seem to have an answer.

EB: In Portuguese, the title of that movie is Soul's Vampires.

BD: Great title.

EB: On your 50th birthday, an English newspaper, The Independent, asked a lot of people what they'd give you as a birthday present. Mick Jagger said, After what I saw on the Grammys, a new hat and some good songs.

BD: Well, a new hat I've already got. It's here. It's called a Borsalino. I bought it in Milan, five days ago, for $75. New songs? Well, I don't think he's ever written a song like Masters Of War. But to do my show, I don't need to be moving from here and there. But I love Mick, I always did.

EB: Your tour to Brazil was postponed from June to August. Some of the newspapers said you were frightened of the cholera epidemic.

BD: Did they say that? Well, I think you know better than me what newspapers are like.

EB: What did you think of Brazil?

BD: Well, I'd been there before. I don't really want to say too much about it, but... a few sewers wouldn't do the country any harm. That'd help with the cholera too... I think we've already talked more than enough, don't you think so?

EB: One last question, then. What are your plans for the future?

BD: Oh... I generally don't even know what I'm doing next week. Well, I know now, today. I guess my plans are to go on writing, recording and performing live. My life's been pretty much like this for as long as I can remember. To tell you the truth, I think that my life is getting better all the time. I think that the older you are, the better you get. So I'm gonna keep on for a long time. If you come see me when I'm 90 years old, you'll find me on a stage some place.

13 August 1991
Porto Alegre Interview, Brazil

Source: The Telegraph, #41 (Winter 41), pp. 83-85.

Next stop Porto Alegre, Brazil. Here Dylan played before a large audience (around 30,000) in environmentally hostile conditions. There were no surprises this time around, but local journalists did manage to get a short interview with him – he talked to them two at a time giving them five minutes each. What follows are extracts from the interviews as printed in the local rag. It's not riveting but few of you may have the chance to read it elsewhere. Bear in mind that we've had to translate it.

PORTO ALEGRE INTERVIEW – August 13, 1991

Q: Do you think that your public see you as a kind of prophet, as a musician with messages?

BD: No, people never see me in that way.

Q: How would you define Bob Dylan's kind of rock music?

BD: However you prefer. It is what it is, you know. It is "guitar music", violin, flute...

Q: Taking a trip down memory lane, what are the most significant moments in your career?

BD: I don't look back.

Q: How do you see the new arrangements you make of the old hits?

BD: It's the same music, the same words, the same ideas.

Q: This is the second time you've come to Brazil. Have you had the opportunity of getting to know anything about the work of Brazilian musicians?

BD: A little bit.

Q: Do you like anything in today's pop or rock?

BD: I don't like anything special. I like Elvis Presley and Dean Martin.

Q: But when people include you in this classification, does that bother you? Sometimes. Sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't.

BD: Do you usually compose when you are on a tour? Yes.

Q: Are you composing something now during your Brazilian tour?

BD: Yes, maybe Brazil will inspire me with a new song.

Q: Are you going to be playing any songs from your last album, Under The Red Sky?

BD: Maybe.

Q: Did you like the way Under The Red Sky turned out?

BD: Hum... Some albums, you know... It was OK. It could have been better.

Q: Do you ever think it would be a good idea to do new things, to follow new ways, to make a different kind of music?

BD: No, I don't think so. The best thing is to continue in the same way.

Q: Do you still listen to Leadbelly or Woody Guthrie's folk music?

BD: Yes.

Q: Do you think that that kind of music, prison or plantation songs, makes any sense in today's global village?

BD: Yes, it still does.

Q: What kind of music do you listen to when you are at home?

BD: Hum... every kind of music.

Q: What do you think of Brazil?

BD: People are friendly. They're not quick. They got things to say.

Q: Are you interested in politics?

BD: No, I'm not very interested in that stuff.

15 September 1991
Chabad Telethon, KCOP-TV Studios, Hollywood, California

Source: Circulating tape.

BD: What do you want me to say?
XX: Tell 'em to give back the books!
BD: Oh yeah, give back the books. Ah, and give plenty of money to Chabad, it's my favorite organization in the whole world, really. They do nothing but good things with all the money. The more you can give, the more it's gonna help everybody.

XX: I think the people out there… Millions of people that are watching us, they heard us talk about the cry of these books. And these are books that have suffered for 70 years behind those bars of the Lenin Library. Mr Gorbachev said he was gonna give them back, Mr Yeltsin says he is gonna give them back, everyone say they're gonna give them back. Bob, tell them to give it back.
BD: Yeah, give it back. Give the books back.
XX: If Bob Dylan says to give it back, then give it back!

XX: Bob tell them what to do!
BD: Call and call and call some more until you get somebody to answer and give what you can. Thanks for inviting me down here.
XX: God bless you, Bob. Happy New Year.

20 November 1991
Dylan on Buddy Rich's biography, Chicago Sun-Times, LA, CA

Source: Chicago Sun-Times (LA Times), p. 44

Bob Dylan has 'Rich' plans

HOLLYWOOD Bob Dylan wants to make a movie about a musician, but it's not about any of the music figures who have been associated with him. The musician? The late jazz drummer Buddy Rich.

"Ever see Buddy Rich?" Dylan asked during an interview. "To me, he was the essence of rhythm – and he (led) an interesting life." Dylan's not thinking about playing Rich. But he has obtained rights to a Rich biography.

February 1992
Robert Hilburn Interview, On U.S. Tour

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 757-767.

This interview by Robert Hilburn was published in The Los Angeles Times Magazine on February 9th 1992. It was also syndicated and appeared in various newspapers across the U.S. (The News & Observer, Raleigh, N.C., Saturday, Feb 15, 1992 – being one in many collectors hands), U.K. (Guardian, February 13th 1992) and elsewhere. None of the syndicated versions seems to have anything over and above that published in the L.A. Times article printed below, in fact, these are generally scaled-down versions.

Hilburn actually joined Dylan and the crew on board the tour bus one night during part of the Mid-West Concert Tour.

WHAT BECOMES A LEGEND MOST? A NEVER-ENDING TOUR, A NEW AUDIENCE AND KEEPING THE MYSTERY ALIVE.

Bob Dylan stares idly at the paperback book that someone has brought aboard his custom tour bus, which is speeding through the snowy Wisconsin countryside in the midnight hour. He has just finished a concert in Madison and is now on this way to South Bend, Ind., where he'll play again in 20 hours.

The shiny, 278-page book, titled "Tangled Up In Tapes Revisited," is an exhaustive chronicle of the last half of Dylan's 32-year career and a testimony to the public's continuing obsession with the most influential songwriter of the rock era. The book lists every song Dylan has sung – and in what order – at most of his concerts from 1974 to 1989.

If the book's contents reveal every detail of his recent performing career, the color portrait on the cover – an expressionless Robert Allen Zimmerman, circa the late '80s, eyes concealed by dark glasses – is a teasing reminder of everything else Dylan has kept hidden these many years. Like the man himself, the drawing gives away almost nothing.

On the bus this night, the real Dylan, who has placed his own dark glasses on the table in front of him, flips quickly through the book. He's sitting in the dining nook and shows more interest in when the coffee will be ready than in the book.

Other performers might be curious enough to look back on, say, an earlier show they played in Wisconsin. (For example, from Page 164: On Nov. 1, 1978, at the Dane County Memorial Coliseum, Dylan sang 27 songs, opening with "She's Love Crazy" and "Mr. Tambourine Man" closing with "Forever Young" and "Changing of the Guards") Or maybe a more recent one along the same highway, 11 years later. (Page 209: July 2, 1989, at the Marcus Amphitheater in Milwaukee; 17 songs, starting with "Early Morning Rain" and ending with "Maggie's Farm".)

Dylan finally just hands the book back to the man who brought it aboard the bus.

Told he is welcome to keep it as a souvenir, Dylan says, "Naw, I've already been all those places and done all those things."

Then he pauses slightly and adds, with a trace of a smile, "Now if you ever find a book out there that's going to tell me where I'm going, I might be interested."

BOB DYLAN HAS ALWAYS BEEN A POP OUTSIDER, AND THERE ARE a few signs, as he enters his sixth decade, that he is surrendering his independence. When he first appeared in the folk clubs of New York's Greenwich Village in the early 1960s, there was an element of choirboy innocence – and mischief- in the smoothness of his cheeks and the gentleness of his smile. He not only taught rock n' roll to think during that decade but he also showed a stubborn refusal to play by anyone else's rules.

Today, Dylan can still disarm you with a sudden smile, but there is weariness in the eyes. It's the instinctive suspicion of a survivor who knows, after years of public scrutiny, the dangers of letting down his guard.

On May 24, 1991, Dylan turned 50, and the media thought it would be ideal time to try to put this cultural hero – and puzzle – into perspective. But he refused more than 300 requests for interviews, agreeing only to a brief telephone Q&A that ended up in Spy magazine, another in a journal published by the National Academy of Songwriters and a radio interview syndicated by Westwood One.

Instead, he hit the road, in your tour of what Dylan-watchers now call the "Never-Ending Tour" – an ongoing road show that to date has racked up 450 performances and been seen by about 3 million fans in the United States, Europe and South America. By design, the tour has avoided the usual media glare. Dylan has concentrated on smaller venues and turned his back on the sort of superstar hoopla that would put him in a national spotlight. Madison was one of the final stops on a trek last year that took him from Burlington, Vt, to Zurich, Switzerland.

A notable exception to his low-profile stance during his 50th-birthday year was the infamous Grammy Awards appearance in New York City last February. During the '60s, a conservative pop Establishment declined to honor the prolific Dylan with a Grammy. The ice broke a bit in 1979, when Dylan won the Best Male Rock Vocal award for his song, Gotta Serve Somebody. At the 1991 awards ceremony, a new generation of directors of the National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences tried to make up for the years of slight with a Lifetime Achievement award. Instead of a mellow Dylan, caught up with the sentimentality of the occasion, taking the stage, he remained an outsider.

Exhausted after a flight from Europe and suffering from the flu, he looked disheveled and distracted. And on a night when most of the country was caught up in the fervor and patriotism of the month-old Persian Gulf War, he and his band launched into a blistering if all but unintelligible version of "Masters of War":

Come you masters of war
You that build all the guns
You that build the death planes
You that build the big bombs
You that hide behind walls
You that hide behind desks
I just want you to know
I can see through your masks

It was classic Dylan – enigmatic and provocative. Fans and reporters asked themselves what had happened. There were whispers about drugs or drinking. But Dylan remained outside of the controversy: no apologies made, no answers offered.

For much of his career, Dylan's reluctance to explain himself or his actions seemed to be a strategy to heighten interest in his legend. Now, on the bus to South Bend, with a reporter allowed along for the ride, he sounds genuinely uninterested in his own notoriety. He wants no part of the confessional talk that fuels most celebrity interviews. Most of all, he has no patience with dissections of his famous past.

"Nostalgia," he says sharply, "is death."

As he gazes across the tour bus table, Dylan even smiles wickedly as the reporter suggests the hackneyed headlines that editors might have tacked on the birthday retrospectives that never appeared:

"Mr. Tambourine Man Turned 50!"

"Bringing It All Back Home."

Or – and this suggestion draws a full-scale laugh – "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

There's no hostility in his manner, but he fences instinctively, warding off certain questions. He listens to – and ignores – one after another until one catches his interest. He dismisses old-days inquiries as "ancient history" and counters a query about his personal life with, "Do people ask Paul Simon questions like that?" Like a lot of artists, he feels that his work expresses all that people need to know about him.

"It wasn't me who called myself a legend," he says sternly and suddenly in response to a question about his revered place in work. "It was thrown at me by editors in the media who wanted to play around with me or have something to tell their readers. But it stuck."

"It was important for me to come to the bottom of this legend thing, which has no reality at all. What's important isn't the legend, but the art, the work. A person has to do whatever they are called on to do. If you try to act a legend, it's nothing but hype."

But isn't it flattering that critics and artists have pointed to him as rock's most important songwriter? He just shakes his head.

"Not really," he continues, more softly. "Genius? There's a real line between genius and insanity. Anybody will tell you that."

CHICAGO'S AMBASSADOR, EAST ON THE HISTORIC AND TONY GOLD Coast, is one of the city's grand old hotels, the home of the Pump Room restaurant where everyone from gangsters (Al Capone) to Presidents (Nixon and Reagan) have dined. The hotel also has its share of showbiz ties. Alfred Hitchcock shot scenes with Cary Grant here in the late '50s for "North by Northwest" and Led Zeppelin caused a stir in 1977 by throwing a couch out of an 11th-floor window.

On the Never-Ending Tour, Dylan does a lot of sleeping on one of two tour buses as they eat up the miles between concert cities. But today, Dylan has unobtrusively checked into the Ambassador, which is a short drive from the Evanston campus of Northwestern University, where he is scheduled to perform at 9 p.m.

It was in Chicago in 1974 that Dylan, with the Band in tow, returned to live performing after an eight-year hiatus prompted by a reported motorcycle accident in 1966 and his subsequent desire to spend more time with his family. The atmosphere then, however, was dramatically different.

About 6 million mail orders were received for tickets to the tour's 40 shows. The city was abuzz with reporters from around the world, all seeking an exclusive interview, and with scores of fans hoping for private audiences with the man frequently referred to as the "spokesman for his generation," Dylan's hotel at that time was on alert – security had been warned about Dylan-seekers – fans with a "glazed look" in their eyes.

Today, the midafternoon atmosphere at the Ambassador East is relaxed – just the usual flow of guests, most of them in town on business. Dylan is upstairs in his room, relaxing until the bus picks him up around 7 p. m. for the ride to Northwestern McGaw Hall, a basketball gym-cum-auditorium. Tonight he'll play for about 3,500 fans, a crowd a little more than a fifth the size of the one that gathered at Chicago Stadium in 1974. But these small halls are his choice; he prefers the intimacy and audience rapport they provide.

By the time he has driven over freezing streets to the concert site, a heavily bundled crowd is filling into the hall. As they unwrap their mufflers and take off their hats, another contrast between then and now is made clear. Until the mid-'80s, Dylan played chiefly to fans from his own generation. How he performs to mostly college-age audiences, young people who weren't even alive when "Blowin' in the Wind," recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary, hit No. 2 in 1963, fans who see him less as a superstar or personal savior than as a gifted artist, an American icon.

Kevin Martell is 20 years old and seeing Dylan for the first time. He and two friends sit quietly in the hall waiting for the show to begin, displaying none of the raucous exuberance usually found at rock shows. When he talks about why he wanted to see the show, he sounds a bit like he's signed up to hear an honored novelist or historian deliver a lecture.

"There are a few bands today, like U2, that talk about real issues," he says. "But I think the '60s artists were the ones who were really into it, and Dylan is one of the few you can still see. I think songs like 'Masters of War' are as important today as when he wrote it. He's like a legend."

A few rows away, Robert Blackmon, 19, a chemical engineering student, can reel off a long list of his favorite new bands – including Jane's Addiction, Nirvana and Primus – that he feels speak directly to the frustrations and aspirations of his generation. But, like Martell, he sees Dylan from a broader perspective: "He has a timeless, universal quality," Blackmon says.

The band walk out on stage first, a three-man group made up of guitarist John Jackson, bassist Tony Gamier and drummer Ian Wallace – veterans whose collective resume range from Asleep at the Wheel, the lighthearted Western swing band, to King Crimson, the arty veteran British rock group. They've been on the road with him now for more than a year.

There is a charge of electricity as the houselights dim. Without a word of greeting, Dylan, in a black shirt and striped black pants, steps to the microphone. With a quick glance back at the band, he starts to play. The lighting is so dim that it's hard to make out his features, but his familiar raspy voice is unmistakable.

Dylan seemed at times in the '70s and early '80s to be fighting his way through concerts -stiff and largely motionless as he faced challenging audiences that often complained about anything in his song selection or arrangements that didn't conform to their expectations. But now, in his introverted way, he enjoys the interaction with the audience. He's comfortable enough on stage to move a bit, and there's an occasional trace of playfulness in his eyes. And there's no rush to get it all over with – the instrumental interludes between verses get more of an airing-out than in the past.

Over the next 90 minutes, he runs through songs from the ‘60s, 70s and 80s – love songs and social commentaries, mostly his own songs and some by other writers. Dylan surprises the older fans early in the set by gliding in to a tender, shields-down rendition of Nat King Cole’s pop ballad “Answer Me, My Love.” He stands stock-still, his head slightly tilted as if to recall the emotion that the song triggered the first time he heard it. Later, looking like a young rock upstart in a Memphis roadhouse, he bobs and weaves to kick off a spirited version of Johnny Cash’s old “Folsom Prison Blues.” The band supports Dylan with a frisky, rockabilly-and-blues-accented sound.

At first, the audience simply watches politely. It takes Dylan’s old “All Along the Watchtower” a song that the younger listeners may best recognize from a recent recording by U2, to get them moving. By the end of the set, hundreds have raced to the edge of the stage, moving in time with the music.

Dylan looks down at the crowd briefly, seems pleased and just keeps playing. As usual, he has said little during the entire concert beyond an occasional “thank you.” No introductions, no eye contact, no chitchat. The show ends and there’s a tremendous burst of applause when Dylan returned for a quick two-song encore. Then he bows slightly toward the audience, turns abruptly and heads offstage, directly into the chill of the night and onto the bus – no post-show handshaking or small talk. His only question to his aids: “How was the sound out there?”

When the bus arrives around midnight at the entrance of the Ambassador East, the band members file off, heading for their rooms. But Dylan stands on State Street, shifting his weight back and forth in the cold and staring into the distance. He wants to stop in at a blues club in the neighborhood for a while and then get some dinner.

After an hour of blues, Dylan, his bodyguard and a tour aide end up in a nondescript diner a few blocks from the hotel. Sipping at a bowl of soup, Dylan says he likes the mandolin riff in R.E.M.‘s “Losing My Religion” which is playing on the radio. He listens to a run-through of comments from the new generation that filled the seats the (sic) Northwestern show.

“Older people – my age – don’t come out anymore,” he says. “A lot of the shows over the years was people coming out of curiosity and their curiosity wasn’t fulfilled. They weren’t transported back to the ‘60s. Lightning didn’t strike.”

“The shows didn’t make sense for them, and they didn’t make sense for me. That had to stop, and it took a long time to stop it. A lot of people were coming out to see The Legend, and I was trying to just get on stage and play music.”

He shifts relentlessly in the chair. The brightly lit room is almost empty, and no one recognises him at first. After a few minutes, however, the diner manager and a customer at the other end of the table start huddling and looking his way. Dylan doesn’t notice. He’s still thinking about the comments of the students and their interest in the ‘60s.

“A lot of people say the ‘60s generation didn’t turn out well – that they didn’t live up to their dreams or follow through or whatever – and they may be right. But there was still a lot that no one else has been able to do,” he says firmly.

“People today are still living off the table scraps of the ‘60s. They are still being passed around – the music, the ideas.”

"Look at what's going on today: There used to be a time when the idea of heroes was important. People grew up sharing those myths and legends and ideals. Now they grow up sharing McDonald's and Disneyland."

When Dylan and his party leave the diner half an hour later, the manager approaches the singer at the cash register and asks for a photo or an autograph. "Maybe tomorrow or something, OK," he says, not very convincingly. But he doesn't want to be rude. Just before he walks out, he shakes the manager's hand.

Back at the hotel, Dylan passes at the entrance to the Pump Room and stares down at some of the hundreds of celebrity photos on the wall. He moves slowly down the hallway as his aide and his bodyguard point to faces they recognize – Frank Sinatra, Cary Grant, Marilyn Monroe, even David Bowie and Mick Jagger. Dylan's picture is not on the wall.

He stares briefly at a photo of Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall, but then loses interest. It's 2:30 by now, and the outsider heads towards the elevator.

THE NEXT NIGHT, DYLAN PACES IMPATIENTLY BACKSTAGE AT THE Dane Country Memorial Coliseum in Madison. A snowstorm had snarled traffic, and it has taken Dylan's bus four hours instead of two to get here from Chicago. He seems anxious to get the whole evening over with. Finally he goes back to the bus to wait out the opening act.

On stage, instead of the relaxed mood he brought to the concert at Northwestern, he struggles for inspiration. The audience cheers as much as the fans at Northwestern, but Dylan's vocals – on the very same songs – lack the emotional edge of the previous show. The exception is the ballad "I Believe in You":

They ask me how I feel
And if my love is real
And how I know I'll make it through
They look at me and frown
They live to drive me from this town
They don't want me around
'Cause I believe in you.

It's a nakedly personal song, a reflection on the isolation of an outsider's life, and the tension in Dylan's performance emphasizes in poignancy.

Despite a standing ovation at the end of the concert, Dylan can't seem to wait until he is on his way to the next town. He again walks directly from the stage to the bus. The heater is on but he sits bundled up in a rumpled sweat shirt and jacket at a small table in the front compartment. Across the isle, in the TV-lounge area, the band members are laughing as they listen to a bootleg tape of Buddy Rich. On the tape, the great jazz drummer is delivering a tongue-lashing to his band. Dylan, who plans to produce a movie of the late drummer's life, has heard the tape before and his mind is elsewhere.

"That was a useless gig," he says flatly.

When someone mentions that the audience seemed to enjoy it, he waves his hand. "Naw, it just wasn't. Nothin' wrong with the audience. Sometimes the energy level just doesn't happen the way it should. We didn't invite this weather to follow us around."

He lapses into silence.

The night before, after the Northwestern show, he had been more talkative, and more philosophical about the ups and downs of touring. "You hear sometimes about the glamour of the road," he said then, "but you get over that real fast. There are a lot of times that it's no different from going to work in the morning. Still, you're either a player or you're not a player. It didn't really occur to me until we did those shows with the Grateful Dead [in 1987]. If you just go out every three years or so, like I was doing for a while, that's when you lose touch. If you are going to be a performer, you've got to give it your all."

At the blues club in Chicago, he had let his guard down – briefly – when an old friend, who had heard that Dylan was in town, tracked him down. The tour bodyguard braced as a middle-aged man in a business suit walked up to Dylan and put his arm around him. But the smile on Dylan's face said that it was OK. The man's name was Arnie, and he had gone to high school with Dylan in Hibbing, Minn.

Dylan sat bemused while Arnie regaled the reporter with tales. "Back in English class," Arnie confided, "Bob wrote me a note: 'Arnie, I'm going to make it big. I know it for sure, and when I do, you bring this piece of paper and for two months you can stay with me, no matter where I am. ' I still have it at home."

Dylan laughed easily.

"You know, I took off and joined the Navy and Bob went down to the University of Minnesota and the next thing I know, he's got this record out." Arnie continued. "I've got some of his albums at home and some picture books of his life story. The song I like best is 'Slow Train' – that and 'Lay, Lady, Lay'"

Dylan stepped in only when the reporter asked Arnie his last name. "Naw," he said protectively, "don't drag him into all this."

Tonight on the bus, just out of Madison, Dylan is much less at ease. He looks like a street person – as drained as he appeared on last year's Grammy telecast, as he waits for someone to bring him whisky and coffee, trying to separate himself from the frustrations of the night.

When the band members retire to their bunks in the back of the bus, Dylan begins to loosen up a bit. Still, with no Arnie to make the revelations, Dylan keeps the veil tightly drawn around his personal life. Any talk about his former, 13-year marriage to Sara Lowndes, or their four now-grown children is strictly off-limits. So is his longstanding relationship with Carole Childs, an Elektra Records artists and repertoire executive.

The music, however, is not off-limits. He is intrigued by a comparison between the message of "I Believe in You" and the speech he had delivered at the Grammy Awards. "It's possible to be so defiled in this world that your own mother and father will abandon you," he had said that night. "And if this happens, God will always believe in your ability to mend your own ways."

When the reporter tells him that the song and speech both seemed to be about the need to be true to one's own beliefs, Dylan responds easily. "That song is just about overcoming hardship," he volunteers. "Songs are mostly personal – something happens in your life or flashes through and then it's gone, and sometime it's a song and sometimes it's just lose. Sometimes things works (sic), sometimes they don't."

These days, he says, they don't more often than they do. At one point in the conversation, he pulls out a notebook from his jacket and starts scribbling. "It's a song I'm workin' on," he offers, and than adds: "Part of the secret of being a songwriter is to have an audacious attitude. There was a time when the songs would come three or four at the same time, but those days are long gone."

It's a delicate topic, but Dylan continues.

"Once in a while, the odd song will come to me like a bulldog at the garden gate and demand to be written. But most of them are rejected out of my mind right away. You get caught up in wondering if anyone really needs to hear it. Maybe a person gets to the point where they have written enough songs. Let someone else write them." Still, he writes enough for a new album every couple of years, and some – including 1989's "Oh Mercy" – are widely acclaimed.

He shrugs at the mention of all the "new Dylans" who have been touted over the years - displaying a rare flash of pride.

"That's never been a worry," he says. "There wasn't anybody doing my thing – though I'm not saying it was all that great. It was just mine and no one was going to cover that territory. No one frames language with that same sense of rhyme. It's my thing, just like no one writes a sad song like Hank Williams or no one writes a bitter song like Willie Nelson. My thing is the forming of the lines."

Dylan is loose now. He's not letting the questions go unanswered. He could easily say he is tired and call an end to the discussion. But he is leaning back on the seat, involved in the conversation rather than fencing. Like most songwriters, he doesn't like to dissect his material, but he agrees to give his opinion about some of the reporter's favorite Dylan songs.

He nods when "Every Grain of Sand" is mentioned.

"That's an excellent song, very painless song to write," he says without hesitation. "It took like 12 seconds – or that's how it felt."

He doesn't seem as enthusiastic at the mention of "Tangled Up in Blue" one of his most-performed post-'60s songs. "I always thought it was written too fast, too rushed. Sometime that happens in a song – just too many lines, as if I were racing to get from here to there."

Dylan nods again at the mention of "Just Like a Woman."

"That's a hard song to pin down," he says. "It's another one of those that you can sing a thousand times and still ask what is it about, but you know there's a real feeling there."

Dylan pauses, as if suddenly self-conscious.

"I'm not trying to say any of these are great songs – that they'd be high up on a list of all the songs ever written."

His answers are becoming increasingly short at the mention of other, older songs, but he does commend on the large number of love songs on the critic's list as opposed to the political songs that earned him his greatest fame in the '60s.

"They call a lot of my songs political songs, but they never really were about politicians," Dylan says, lighting a cigarette. "The politicians didn't make a difference. It's the businessmen behind them."

Dylan smiles, then adds: "'All Along the Watchtower' may be my [only] political song," apparently referring to the line in the song: "Businessmen, they drink my wine, plowmen dig my earth / None of them along the line know what any of it is worth."

It's well past 1 o'clock when the driver announces that the bus is approaching Chicago, about a third of the way to South Bend, and the conversation has switched to Hollywood's fascination with rock n' roll. Given his role in the culture of the '60s, it seems probable that some filmmaker would want to use his story to explain America in the '60s.

Would he welcome such a film?

"Absolutely not," he says, almost contemptuously. "No one knows too much about [my life], so it's going to have to all be speculation. Who was it that said it: Fame is a curse. There's a lot of truth in that."

Looking through the side windows at the lights on the outskirts of Chicago, he adds: "Look at Elvis – he's bigger now than when he was living. He lives on in people's mind (sic). But you wonder if people are remembering the right things about his music, rather than all the stuff that people wrote about him."

WHEN THE TOUR BUS stops to let the reporter off at a motel near O'Hare International Airport, Dylan says he wants a cup of fresh coffee. One would assume that somebody would go and get it for him. Instead, Dylan walks into an all-night diner and sits at the counter with a tour aide. He's unnoticed amid a handful of truckers and motorists taking a break from the icy highway. It's a bleak scene, worthy of an Edward Hopper painting, and seeing Dylan as part of it suggests, at least momentarily, a clear image of faded glory.

Not everyone at 50 maintains the pace of the Never-Ending Tour, he'll do about 120 shows this year. "That may not sound like a lot," he says, "Willie [Nelson] and B. B. King do a lot more, but it's a comfortable number for me." He also says that he reserves the right to halt the tour at any time. "Whenever it does start feeling like work, that's when I want to stop," he says. "Get away from it for a while. You don't want to be a prisoner of this [touring] any more than you want to be a prisoner of anything in life if you can avoid it."

But for now, the road is his choice and he seems grateful for the chance, after all these years, to be able to move about the world at his own pace, freed somewhat from the prison of his '60s mantle.

In the last analysis, the reasons for Dylan's cultural impact are as much a puzzle to the enigmatic performer as they are to others.

"There's no one to my knowledge that isn't surprised by their longevity, including myself," Dylan said wearily, wiping the sleep from his eyes as the bus made its way from concert to concert. "But it's very dangerous to plan [far ahead], because you are just dealing with your vanity. Tomorrow is hard enough. It's God who gives you the freedom, and the days you should be most concerned with are today and tomorrow."

"It's one thing to say, 'There's a new record out and people are responding to the new songs,' which is encouraging. But that's not the case. There's no new album, and it's hard for me to know just what that means, why people come out and what they are looking for or listening for... Maybe the same things I was looking for when I wrote them."

13 March 1992
Stuart Coupe telephone interview

Source: Time Off, #560, 27 March 1992;
reprinted in Homer, the slut #7

THE COWBOY ANGEL RIDES AGAIN

At the age of 50 he is arguably the most significant rock musician of the last 30 years. With 21 certified Gold albums, the writer of some of the best known songs of the last century is, by any assessment, phenomenally wealthy and has no need to be on the road.

So why has Bob Dylan spent the last four years subjecting himself to the most punishing touring schedule of his entire career? Why, in most cases, does he insist on playing multiple nights at small venues instead of playing to the same number of people in one night at a large theatre? For the latter we should be thankful, whilst the former raises interesting questions about Dylan's motivations.

Since June 1988 Dylan has played an average 125 concerts per year on what even he is now referring to as The Never-Ending Tour. Along with constant touring throughout North America he's traversed the planet, playing in many countries for the first time in his career. There have been concerts in such diverse locations as Iceland, Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Greece, Turkey, Hungary and Yugoslavia. Finally the Never-Ending Tour has found its way to Australia. It's Dylan's fourth visit to this country. In 1966 he toured at the peak of his encounter with electric rock'n'roll, returning in 1978 with a Las Vegas style cabaret routine notable for little besides its blandness and Dylan's fixation with face make-up. In 1986 he joined forces with Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers for an equally dismal series of concerts.

This time he arrives with a stripped down band, dividing the concert between electric band performances and acoustic renditions. If overseas set lists are any indication it's a Greatest Hits style show featuring as many of his famous songs as any fan could reasonably expect to hear in two hours, plus a smattering of material from recent albums like the critically acclaimed Oh Mercy and the far less enthusiastically received Under The Red Sky.

Yes he'll probably play Like A Rolling Stone, Mr Tambourine Man, Blowin' In The Wind, Lay Lady Lay, I Shall Be Released, All Along The Watchtower and The Times They Are A-Changin'. And if the tapes I've heard (circulating among Dylanopiles) are any indication he's still a hit and miss proposition – but when he's on, the performances are as fiery and passionate as anything he's done onstage in many a year.

"My old songs are always interesting to me," replies a slightly defensive Dylan on the telephone from Los Angeles just prior to his departure for Australia. I'd just suggested to him that playing so many of his older songs might get just a little boring for him.

This is my second encounter with Dylan. In 1986 I 'interviewed' him after a concert in Auckland. The conversation lasted a good seven and a half minutes and it was obvious that Dylan had absolutely no interest in talking to the media. He sidestepped any specific questions in much the same way as he toyed with journalists in the mid 60's. His only straight answer was to a question about the legendary American country singer Hank Williams who Dylan had said in a previous interview he would have liked to meet. Williams died in the early 1950s.

"What would you ask him if he was sitting here now," I asked. Dylan leaned across the table and said, "I'd wanna know where he got his drugs from."

Dylan's aversion to being interviewed is part of rock legend. Before his encounter I'm told not to ask any questions about the old days, not to bring up Joan Baez or ask him what the 14th line of Desolation Row really means. It's better, comes the instruction, if I keep my questions to the last year, and don't come across like a Dylan expert or fan. Dylan likes "straight media".

This time the man's in fine form. He laughs every so often and at least attempts to deal. with each question. Dylan is not a great conversationalist. Every answer is punctuated by mutterings, sniffling, and pauses that seem to go on forever. An interview with Dylan is rarely anything but a series of frustrating attempts to get coherent answers. Dylan is at least relatively expansive on the subject of the Never-Ending Tour which he says wasn't started with the intention that it would continue for so many years. "No, this is just my pattern over the last three or four years, to play at least 100 times a year, maybe a little bit more, maybe a little bit less," Dylan says. "It just works out better for me because it's not necessary to be looking for a band all the time. That's the advantage of just going out to play. If you're only going out once in a while then, you know, you have a problem trying to find a band and trying to find people who aren't playing with somebody else at that time, and it's... in the long run it's better to just go out and do the shows and either it's happening or its not."

It's a reasonable leap of faith to take that on face value – to accept that someone of Dylan's stature has played around 500 shows in the last four years merely because he's worried that his band members might go off and play with someone else. Maybe he's taking the travelling troubadour caper to extremes. Maybe he genuinely does need the adoration. Certainly there's other things he could be doing.

Of all the new countries Dylan has visited during the Never-Ending tour it's Argentina and Brazil that he's the most expansive about.

"Yeah, Argentina, ah, ah, ah, you know, it's really dusty down there, but Brazil was the same two times in a row," he says.

"It's okay. It's a different scene. You never know really... it's kind of like makeshift sound almost. You're never really sure about the facilities you're playing in, and what can be heard because everything looks so funky but, ah... ah... ah... the people were very responsive and it was relaxing being down there."

One of the most significant experiences for Dylan over the past four years of touring was visiting the site of the concentration camp at Dachau.

"No-one had ever taken me to one before, and someone took me to one, yeah, last time we were in Germany someone took me to one of them concentration camps," Dylan says.

"It's a pretty spooky place."

A moving experience?

"Well you can't help but be moved by seeing all the regalia they have in there. It looked pretty much like whatever they were supposed to look like. Monuments you know, monuments of death. That's what they were."

The last year has seen the usual accolades heaped on Dylan. Life Magazine listed him s one of "The 100 Most Important Americans of the 20th Century." The National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences awarded him the Lifetime Achievement Award at the Grammy Awards, and most significantly for Dylan, the French government recognised his contributions with their highest cultural honour, Commandeur de L'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, which has only been awarded to 35 individuals since the Revolution (Chevalier, Chaplin, and very few Americans). The Minister of Culture and Communications decorated Dylan during the course of a five night engagement at Le Grand Rex in Paris. This was obviously one award that Dylan took extremely seriously.

"Oh yeah," he says. "That was a heavy thing, being given an award by a French government, especially in the area of creativity, you know, because of the French influence in my own stuff."

Questioned about why he plays smaller venues in preference to larger auditoriums he's equally offhanded.

"The sound is easier to control, and it's not so much of a circus," he says.

So does Dylan still enjoy the grind of touring? Doesn't there come a point when he'd prefer to get back home for an extended period?

"There comes a point for everything, but... ah, you know... playing music's a full time job you know," he mutters. "It's hard to shut if off and turn it off and on like a faucet."

Possibly that's the (unlikely) key to it all -that it remains in his blood and he feels as though he doesn't have a choice. That doesn't however explain Dylan's extended period away from touring, some breaks, punctuated by occasional performances, lasting as long as seven years.

In his excellent biography of Dylan, Behind The. Shades, Clinton Heylin suggests that! this is one of only three periods in his career when Dylan has combined frequent studio activity with prodigious bouts of touring. All have coincided with periods of turmoil in Dylan's personal life, almost as if the road becomes an easy escape from the issues I he must face head-on in life away from the road.

If that's the case with the Never-Ending Tour Dylan certainly isn't saying anything.

Questions about his personal life are strictly off-limits. A strong air of paranoia surrounds most of his activities. In a 1990 interview he explained his dislike of being photographed: "It rubs me the wrong way, a camera. It doesn't matter who it is, someone in my own family could be pointing a camera around. It's a frightening feeling... Cameras make ghosts out of people."

At recent concerts Dylan has refused to allow photographers in the theatres, and made things even more difficult by shrouding himself in darkness for most of the concert. It has been reported that these days Dylan is rarely seen by members of his band or crew. He travels in his own bus, away from the musicians, and often stays at different hotels. His appearance at soundchecks are rare and he often doesn't turn up for rehearsals. Agreeing to sign an autograph for a fan is extremely unusual.

Dylan also doesn't like his concerts being recorded and tapes circulated. During the Never-Ending Tour he's been known to throw in covers of songs as diverse as Bruce Springsteen's Dancing In The Dark, and Townes Van Zandt's Ponchy And Lefty.

"Where did you hear that if you don't mind me asking?" says a suddenly serious Dylan.

Told that I haven't actually heard the tapes, but have read they're occasional inclusions, he sounds relaxed.

Whilst the Dylan industry rolls on around him with a regular stream of biographies and critical studies appearing on the market, Dylan at least feigns disinterest. "Not really," he replies when asked if he bothers to look at any of the books and find out what people are saying about him and his work.

"No. It seems like they come out pretty regular now (laughs). It's it's... ah... it's ah... they really don't... it doesn't knock me out to read a book about myself, you know."

There's other books to read?

"Yeah, yeah, exactly." So what has Dylan been reading of late? "My, ah, my latest book... it's been out for a long time, but my latest thing of just reading was back into reading the William Blake poems again," Dylan says.

"It seems like when you're young and you read 'em they don't have the effect on you that they do when you get older. It was years ago when it was time just to read all those guys, but lately it's been necessary for me to find some time to go back and re-read someone like Blake or Shelley, Byron, some of those people."

Aside from his reading Dylan spends much of his time on the road painting and drawing. He explains that Random House has a book of his drawings coming out later this year, the majority of it being his output from the last three years.

In keeping with his current workaholic state Dylan is also preparing to record another album. He says that half the songs are written, they're more acoustically based than recent albums, and he expects to record in Chicago soon after the Australian tour.

Does Dylan find that the songs come easier as he gets older or is it more difficult to find new things that he wants to say? Certainly songs like Wiggle Wiggle ("Wiggle, wiggle, wiggle 'til the moon is blue/ wiggle 'til the moon sees you", etc) from his last album weren't exactly highpoints of his songwriting career.

"Well they're coming natural if they come at all," he says, laughing loudly.

"So... um... when it's not coming... ah... ah, there's really no inclination on my part to make it happen."

Dylan's apparent jovial mood suggest that maybe it's time to throw in the inevitable question about Gypsy Fire, the woman who's been consistently in the media over recent years because of her (successful) action against The Truth newspaper over allegations that she was Dylan's sex slave during the 1986 tour.

"Oh yeah, is she still around?" Dylan chuckles.

After being told that Fire is planning to write a book about their time together and the court case, Dylan sighs.

"Ooooh, poor girl, you know," then out of the blue Dylan says, "Hey listen, you can say hi to that guy Brett Whiteley... is he still around there painting? He gave me some drawings the last time there and they still look good to me."

A couple of hours later I call Whiteley to pass on the message.

"He's a weird cat, Bob is," Whiteley says.

Couldn't have put it better myself.

Stuart Coupe

1 April 1992
Peter Wilmoth Interview, Melbourne, Australia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 561-562.

An interview given to Peter Wilmoth during the 1992 Australian Tour. It was conducted in Dylan's dressing room at the Palais Theatre in Melbourne following his show on April 1st. It appeared in the April 3rd edition of The Age.

DYLAN: JOKES, LAUGHTER AND A SERIES OF DREAMS

Bob Dylan is considering the symbolism of the 60's voice of youth turning 50 last year. "Well, Rod's around," he says, "He must be close to me or even above me. (Rod Stewart is 47). A couple of 'em are around. The Stones." What does he think of the Stones 30 years later? Dylan breaks up laughing. "If you like that sort of thing."

Bob Dylan: sit-down-comic? The man who has been called one of this countries most influential – and possibly earnest – figures is not expansive, but he's not walking out of the interview after seven minutes either, as he did to one journalist. This is a kinder, gentler Dylan, cooling off after his first Melbourne show on Wednesday night. Dylan is a small man, almost curled up in his chair. His shoulders are hunched against intrusion. He offers a limp hand and a grunt in greeting. This is Dylan in a good mood. When Dylan has agreed to meet a journalist after refusing 300 requests for interviews when he turned 50 in May last year is unclear. But The Age is the beneficiary of half an hour of sometimes incomprehensible, sometimes lucid thoughts, punctuated by three or four belly laughs. Americas greatest living poet is actually being charming.

Since he became famous in the coffee shops of New York's Greenwich Village in 1961, Dylan has embodied other peoples dreams and ideals of the '60's. "People seem now to have forgotten about it," he says. "People are now more or less interested in the '90s. Sixties memories are fading a little." There seems to be a 60's revival every few months. Dylan smiles. "There were 60's revivals in the 60's."

When journalists are finally allowed to touch the hem, they are usually forewarned not to get personal. "There's nothing that is really very interesting about me," Dylan protests, laughing "Talking about me doesn't make a conversation more interesting. It doesn't interest me to talk about me. It's my least favorite subject (laughs again)."

But Dylan seems happy enough when asked about his children Anna, 25, and Jacob, 21, who with Sara Dylan, were immortalised in the song Sara from his acclaimed 1975 album Desire. "They're just around. I have an extended family, this, that and the other. We get on well, for the most part."

After 30 years of singing Blowin' In The Wind, does he perform the early songs under sufferance? "I do those songs because they feel right to sing," he says. "Even if they weren't my songs, they're my style of song, and they are oriented to what I am doing today."

He is tired of interpreting his early songs too literally. "Some of my records I've been overloaded with, some parts and arrangements," he admits. "Whereas the song itself still has its strength for me. With some of the older songs, the vision is still quite focused."

Strangely he admits to changing the list of songs he performs to keep certain fans happy. "There are a lot of people that come to our shows lots of times, so just for them, it's a good idea to do different things. It's not like they come and see me once."

Dylan has recently been the subject of a biography, Clinton Heylin's Behind The Shades, and there are several retrospectives, including a three-CD boxed set of "bootlegged" versions of his earliest songs. "Well, you know, people bootleg concerts, they might as well be out legally. Nobody would ever have thought that was that big a business. They sell quite a bit."

Was there any music Dylan admires today? "No. Nothing." He believes music lost the plot. "There was a cut-off point sometime." The early 70's? "Maybe. When the machines got into making music, you could turn it off more. It seemed to take a different turn at that point and the purpose got kind of lost."

The audience at Dylan's shows consists largely of people who were in nappies when he released All Along The Watchtower in 1968. "I'm lucky to have any audience," Dylan says, "A lot of my contemporaries really don't have any."

His views on Australia are a little disjointed, but he claims to be fascinated by a country so different from his own. "To me Australia is ancient ground broken off from Africa, and that's why there are different animals here. Someone told me kangaroos are prehistoric. The people who are indigenous are prehistoric, too. Just looking at the ground... it doesn't look this way in America or Europe. This is ancient territory. For that reason alone, it's worth spending time here."

Dylan said recently that he'd written enough songs. "My songs aren't written like they used to be, which was all the time. They come slower now (laughs)." Dylan ties a towel around his head and walks out of the dressing room and disappears into his tour bus. To rejuvenate himself, he sometimes decides to escape from the circus. "Oh, I get away to the boondocks somewhere."

17 April 1992
Michael Wilson interview at Airport Arrival, Auckland Airport, Auckland, New Zealand

Source: Circulating tape

MW: What sort of music can we expect to hear?
BD: Oh… All kinds.
MW: What style? Any particular style? Will it be electric or acoustic?
BD: Yep.

mid-1992
Good As I Been To You press release(?)

Source: TWM #891(2611)

Good As I Been To You

As you probably know, the album was released on 3 November 1992 in the United States, just short after the Tribute on 16 October. Don Ienner, who intoned at the Tribute, said that this was A coincidence, adding that he'd only got confirmation of the album Three months ago when his representative handed me the acoustic album at a sales meeting in Toronto. So if we assume Ienner was given the tapes or something, this would mean it was finished by July/August 1992, since the quote from Columbia's president was published on 7 November 1992.

Ienner also said We never question his creativity. What he give, he gives. No changes are ever made to the records. Dylan's comments were given ass follows: Donnie suggested me making this record years ago. It just took a while to organise getting the songs together.

22 November 1992
Elliot Mintz interview, Los Angeles, California

Source: "The Beatle Years", The Westwood One Radio Network, 18 January 1993

On November 22nd, 1992, I sat down with Bob Dylan to talk about his new album, 'Good As I Been To You.' In the process, we got to chatting about John Lennon.

EM: Twelve years now after John's passing… A long time to examine the body of work and what he left behind musically. What do you think his most significant contribution was to rock n' roll… as an artist?

BD: He was talented as a musician which you don't see… It's just like another one of those things… People don't give him credit for saying something that takes over… It's like personality takes over at a certain point. To me, he could play and he sang great. And he had the attitude of course. You know, it's hard to separate what he did as a Beatle, because the attitude was there that he had. To me it was the same attitude earlier on before he did the primal therapy thing and came out. To me, he was always a musician first. Like, to me, his version of "Stand By Me" is the version regardless of the song's been done so many times, but his was better than the original.

All this stuff was like that. It had an attack to it, you know, that is very rare. Of course, when he put his own thing behind it, it was quite overwhelming. With is "Working Class Hero" –type thing and "Instant Karma" kind of thing… To me, it was all just a… you know, you could hear it all there with "I Wanna Hold Your Hand" but then of course, the harmonies and that stuff had kind of deluded a lot of it. But if you're asking me how he is perceived, to me he is perceived first and foremost as a musician. And he had an amazing sense of melody, and lyrically he was no slouch, either.

EM: He used to say, in he public statements or recorded statements, he used to say that every time the two of you bumped into each other, from his point of view, he was always kind of paranoid and nervous.

BD: (yawns)

EM: Did you get that sensation from him?

BD: No. He never gave me that impression. No kind of way.

EM: He felt that there was always kind of like a healthy rivalry between the two of you.

BD: Yeah, (cut in the recording) it was never like one of those that kind of things where we got Brian Wilson we gotta beat that record, we gotta beat this record, and then they're coming back and they're making another one only to make it a Sgt Pepper, you know, whatever. To me, that kind of thing never really existed. Maybe for those other guys it did, because they were all fighting for chart positions and things. Coming from my world of the folk music world that never really entered into any element of trying to better somebody else. Trying to make this recording better than that recording, this was all records. Those guys went to the recording element of everything and it wasn't my scene, so it never was really a competitive thing.

---(commercial break)---

What lasts for me in that is the songs he left.

EM: Do you have a favorite?

BD: Not really a favorite. There are some that jump out of me more than others; "Nowhere Man". One of my favorites, really, don't ask me why is "Mother", but I don't kind of figure out why. He was doing it all the way, you know.

EM: He had some moments where he took some good-natured kidding with you and your approach. Did it bother you?

BD: No, one of my old drummers, he used to play me a tape where he was like spoofing "Serve Somebody" or something like that. No, it didn't bother me, it intrigued me. Why would it effect him such a way? Like who cares? It was just a song.

EM: I wondered if about that, too, if that really did impact him. I also think he personally loved and tried to imitated your voice. You know, it was just something that he would fall into frequently. He just enjoyed the experience. And over the years, people have sometimes asked me whether or not that ever bothered you of it you took offence at that?

BD: No, not really.

EM: When you think back about him now. Beside the music, was there anything particularly endearing or special that he'd left you with? Some people say it was the humor, some people say it was the cynicism, some people say it was that edge that he…

BD: He was very quick witted, wasn't he?

EM: Yeah.

BD: Like a lot of those English guys were just so sharp for sure.

EM: You never recorded with him, did you?

BD: Ah, yeah, once, but no one never come up with the tape.

EM: I guess there was a great rock n' roll rumor that the two of you actually made a tape together.

BD: No, ah… Those were… That is all pretty shaky in my mind. What happened and what didn't happen, but it seems to me there was a tape running at his house. Where was it again?

EM: Kenwood or Tittenhurst Park?

BD: Yeah, that one. Seems to me he had a tape recorder.

EM: Did you record when you were singing?

BD: Probably some kind of things It might've been Gene Vincent songs or something.

EM: Oh, if anybody knows where the tape is we'd love to hear from them. It'd be a nice thing to have, wouldn't it?

BD: (pause) Yeah.

EM: Anything else come to you about John?

BD: Ah, he was just a wonderful guy, really. Well, you know – cool. Anything from me that I could say is that he was a kind of a wonderful guy, but he was, speaking as a musician, he was someone to look up to.

28 April 1993
Willie Nelson's Big Six-O: An All Star Birthday Celebration, KRLU- TV Studios, Austin, Texas

Source: Circulating tape

Comment #1

He's like a philosopher, you know. He gets to the heart of it in a quick way, gets it out and it's over. And this leaves the listener to think about it.

Comment #2

His guitar playing is really, you know, pretty phenomenal. I don't really see anybody giving him any credit as a musician, but in my book he's up there on top.

Comment #3

He takes whatever thing he's singing and makes it his. There's not many people who can do that. Even something like an Elvis tune. You know, once Elvis done a tune, it's pretty much done. But Willie is the only one in my recollection that has even taken something associated with Elvis and made it his. He just puts his sorta trip on it…

23 June 1993
Gino Castaldo Interview, Athens, Greece

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1101-1102.

June 23-24 1993, Dylan gives interviews to a number of Italian journalists, in advance of his three Italian shows (June 25-27). This one with Gino Castaldo was clearly conducted via telephone after Bob had finished his two shows in Greece (June 22-23). It was published in La Repubblica on June 24th. This version has come from Karl Erik Andersen's web site – translation by Cuccu Alberto.

The phone rings and on the other side I hear the unmistakable nasal voice of Bob Dylan saying: "Hello, I'm Bob Dylan".

This is that kind of situation you would never expect to happen.

I have on the telephone Bob Dylan, calling from Greece, coming for a short tour in Italy in a few days (tomorrow in Naples, Pisa on Saturday, Milan on Sunday). He tells me in Greece it's very hot but everything is going well. It's really amazing, especially considering how few interviews he gave in so many years.

In Italy he granted only one interview, in Verona 1983, when he answered evasively and sarcastically to every question. The reason for this decision, considering that Dylan is followed everywhere by someone asking for an interview, will for ever remain a mystery. Anyway it's happening, he speaks very kindly though, as is his style, his answers are short.

The interview:

GC: Mister Dylan, in your concerts it seems that the songs, even the older ones, are changing all the time. Why are you changing them so often?

BD: Time lets me find new meanings to every song, even in the older ones, and it's important to be always looking for new meanings. Yes, the body of the song remains the same but it wears new clothes.

Dylan speaks slowly and he is even intelligible, much more than he is on stage where he makes even his most famous lyrics unrecognizable.

GC: Why did you choose to make a record of traditional folk songs like Good As I've Been To You?

BD: It happened by chance. I needed a short time to record these songs; these songs are really important to me, followed me during all these years so I've treated them as if they were my songs, not like covers. It took a short time, you know these are folk songs and do not need too many ornaments.

GC: So speaking of acoustic records. Is it true you're going to record an "Unplugged"?

BD: Yes we spoke about it, but I'm not sure I will. Maybe when the moment's right... it could happen.

GC: Which of your albums is your favorite one?

BD: The one I still have to do!

GC: Which is your next dream to make true?

BD: Well my next musical dream is to make a record of classical music. I'm already working with a symphony orchestra... maybe one day...

GC: Don't you feel sometimes like prisoner of a veil that someone else "stuck" on you?

BD: I don't mind it. Following your own way, every day looks different from the others. Yes, there was a time I didn't feel understood, and it's true, it was a problem. Now I don't think about it, you know, people have changed, I'm not seen the way I once was. I feel much more free, not restricted.

GC: What do you think when you see religion used as an instrument of war?

BD: The problem is that there is too much politics inside religion, as there has always been. It can't be any different. Politics is everywhere.

GC: By the way, are you aware of what is happening in Italy?

BD: Yes, I know, politics is overflowing.

GC: And do you think the music can do anything about it?

BD: It depends on which music you are speaking about. Surely music can get over every barrier!

GC: For the first time you have been on a stage for a politician, I'm speaking about Clinton. Why?

BD: It happened when he had already been elected. I didn't help his electoral campaign. Was it the first time? Maybe yes, maybe no, anyway the fact is no-one invited me there before.

Dylan starts speaking about when he was a child, about the difficulty of living in a family where music was frowned upon. He tells us of the first time he heard Elvis Presley. Then we speak about his tour, and a great one he will probably do together with Santana next year, the call ends kindly and we still are wondering was he really Bob Dylan?

August 1993
Greg Kot interview for Chicago Tribune

Source: On The Tracks #2 Fall/Winter 1993, pp. 14-17.

The following interview was conducted by Greg Kot for the Chicago Tribune in August 1993. The entire Chicago Tribune article is reprinted, followed by excerpts from the interview that were never published.

Their days as media-hyped supernovas behind them, Bob Dylan and Carlos Santana say they couldn't be happier. Dylan, who merely changed the course of popular culture in the 20th Century, and Santana, who stretched the boundaries of rock guitar after his explosive coming-out party at Woodstock, will share the stage August 28 at the World Music Theatre.

If such a pairing had occurred in, say, 1970, it would have been an event on par today with a Nirvana/Pearl Jam double bill. But neither Dylan nor Santana is central to the pop Zeitgeist these days, nor do they seem particularly keen to keep up with a new generation of rock icons. (If anything, it's the other way around; at last year's tribute to Dylan at Madison Square Garden, Pearl Jam's Eddie Vedder and Mike McCready performed a particularly moving version of Dylan's "Masters of War.")

Dylan's last release, Good as I Been to You (Columbia), is a stark, solo acoustic album in which he interpreted a variety of traditional folk and blues, throwbacks to his days at Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village. He says a new album, out this year, will take a similar but "more focused" approach to another batch of traditional songs.

Santana's 1992 album, Milagro (Polydor), contains a few cliché-ridden forays into pop but also is laced with adventurous guitar excursions that draw as much on post "Bitches Brew" jazz as they do rock.

In a three-way phone hookup, Dylan and Santana remained as iconoclastic as ever. Santana was typically passionate and effusive, while Dylan spoke with a warmth and directness that belied his reputation as an enigmatic interview. If their past achievements cast a huge shadow, neither is intimidated by it.

"My whole thing has been about disallowing demagoguery." Dylan says. "The songs I recorded in my past, they're almost like demos. I'm still trying to figure out what some of them are about. The more I play them, the better idea I have of how to play them."

Which may explain why Dylan seems perpetually inclined to tamper with his classics, messing with chords and altering his phrasing as he turns "Like a Rolling Stone" into a shuffle or "All Along the Watchtower" into a dissonant rocker.

"My audience has changed over a couple of times now," Dylan says. "A lot of 'em don't even know 'Like a Rolling Stone.' They're not enchanted by the past, and I don't allow the past to encroach on the present."

Santana, who broke ground by mixing rock guitar with Latin percussion on such songs as "Soul Sacrifice," says, "I made a commitment about 1972, with our fourth album, which was almost all instrumental, to go another way. I learned from people like Miles Davis and Weather Report. I wasn't afraid of any comparisons, because I was too concerned about the next note."

If the music of Dylan and Santana takes on a new life on stage, it has struggled to find its identity in the studio over the last 15 years. It's no surprise that Dylan's best record in years—Good as I Been to You—was recorded live in one take, without backing musicians.

"Modern recording technology never endeared itself to me," says Dylan. "My kind of sound is very simple, with a little bit of echo, and that's about all that's required to record it. I'm most disappointed when producers overlook the strength of my music."

"The way most records sound these days, everything is equalized. My kind of music is based on non-equalized parts, where one sound isn't necessarily supposed to be as loud as another. When producers try to equal everything out, it's to dismal effect on my records."

With Milagro, Santana also went for a live-in-the-studio approach.

"Some of my favorite records, like Mary Wells' 'My Guy,' were recorded with the musicians and the singer all gathered around one microphone," he says. "That gave the voice treble tones, chest tones, abdominal tones, depth. With all the technology today, you lose the over-tones, which is what gives people chills when they listen to a record. Producers today know the construction of knobs and wires, but they don't know a damn thing about feeling and sound. They don't know how to capture the soul of someone like Bob."

The antiseptic nature of studio recording is only partly to blame for the erratic albums that Dylan and Santana have released. Bad songs and indifferent or misdirected performances have something to do with it, too. But scintillating moments still occur. The title track of Milagro is prime Santana, his guitar cutting majestic swaths through a battery of percussion. And Dylan's exquisite, if idiosyncratic, guitar playing and vocal phrasing throughout Good as I Been to You is enough to pull any number of disenchanted fans back into the fold.

Clearly, Dylan's career, even at age 52, is still a work in progress. Which is why it seemed a bit odd for a bevy of rock stars, from Neil Young to George Harrison, to be paying tribute to him at Madison Square Garden last year, even if it was the 30th anniversary of his first record.

Dylan says it was "hard not to be overwhelmed," but "it was really about all those songs," speaking as though someone else had written them. "It was fun to hear them performed. I just tried to stay out of it."

As for Sinead O'Connor, Dylan says he wasn't miffed that she had a standoff with the audience and was ultimately booed off the stage.

Although he didn't get a chance to speak with her, he says, "I hold no rancorous feelings," perhaps because he empathized. As Dylan electrified his music, figuratively and literally, in the mid-'60s, he was greeted by boos, most notoriously at the Newport Folk Festival and then on an epochal tour of England with the Hawks, later known as The Band.

"It was weird at Newport, because you could tell these people were trying to follow me, but I was a bit ahead of them," Dylan says. "You just try and dust yourself off and get on with it. With The Band, it (the audience reaction) would be consistent, every town we played in. It seemed a lot of it was a media thing, where they were telling the audience ahead of the show what to expect. It would cause the audience to react a certain way, instead of deciding for themselves. It was one of those things that is... very corrosive."

Santana says he has dealt with isolated boo-birds, "but I don't take it personally. It's usually somebody who's in the wrong place. One time in London, I told a guy to come up and handed him my guitar. He choked on his own emotions. I said, 'You have to make love to it, you don't just jump in.' "

Just as Santana put a pretender in his place, Dylan is equally skeptical of the new wave of rock and rap artists whose records bristle with graphic images of sex and violence. In the '60s, Dylan's approach to such subject matter was deemed revolutionary, with its mix of humor and spite, dream-like imagery and shattering directness.

"I'm not saying they should be censored, but it would be nice if there were some kind of quality control," he says. "A lot of stuff out there is just not meaningful. The record companies shouldn't be involved (in censoring artists), but maybe the artist should be made to sign a contract asking, 'Do you mean it?' "

Below are previously unpublished questions and answers from the Chicago Tribune interview.
Greg Kot (GK) and Bob Dylan (BD)

GK: Is playing in front of an audience, with all its expectations of what a Bob Dylan show should be, still satisfying?

BD: It's very addictive. The emotion of it never wears out.

GK: The songs you recorded for Good As I Been To You were from your days at places like Gerde's Folk City. You recorded them very much like you might have played them back then, and it's fascinating to hear how "Blackjack Davey" might've influenced "Boots of Spanish Leather"; how "Tomorrow Night" suggests "On a Night Like This" and "Diamond Joe" could've been a blueprint for "Maggie's Farm."

BD: Those songs couldn't have been improved with any kind of instrumentation. Those songs worked their way into my own songs, I guess, but never in a conscious way. They're all pretty simple. Just three chords. It's not like doing an album of Paul McCartney songs. It's like nobody really wrote those songs [on Good as I Been to You]. They just get passed down.

GK: One thing about Good as I Been to You that's particularly appealing is the expressiveness of your voice. It seems like without a backing band to have to shout over, your voice sounds almost liberated.

BD: My voice was never really that glamorous. But a big vocal range really isn't necessary for the type of songs I sing. For what I sing, my voice does pretty well.

21 August 1993
Dennis Michael interview for CNN Entertainment, Seattle

Source: On the Tracks #2, Fall/Winter 1993, p. 17.

The following interview was conducted by Dennis Michael for CNN Entertainment News (Seattle, Washington) in August 1993. Jim Moret, Anchor (JM); Dennis Michael (DM); Bob Dylan (BD), and Carlos Santana (CS)

JM: Musical legends Bob Dylan and Carlos Santana are finishing out the summer on the road, touring together in a series of concerts. In a rare and exclusive interview, Bob Dylan, along with Carlos Santana, spoke with CNN's Dennis Michael at a tour stop in Seattle.

BD: (singing in concert) "There must be some way out of here—"

DM: There must be some kind of way out of touring, but if there is, Bob Dylan doesn't seem to be interested in finding it. Dylan performs upwards of 100 shows a year and gets puzzled when people ask him why, in his advanced state of legendhood, he still performs so extensively.

BD: Playing music is addictive. It's nothing you can—you either play it or you don't play it, so it's not like it's a hardship to do it. It's kind of strange for anyone to ask why someone would want to do it anymore than why would somebody want to be a well-digger, really. Work is work—you just become addicted to it.

DM: Neither Dylan, nor his tour partner, Carlos Santana, are touring in support of an album. Santana has two albums in progress right now, but that has little relationship to his live work.

CS: I just tour, period. And I don't support anything except the sound and the vibration. That's it. Even if I don't record an album ever again in my life, I just play because I need to play. I mean, I was born to play and that's what I do.

DM: The next album with Dylan on it has more of his words than his voice — a 2-cd set will showcase the performance of scores of artists at the 30th anniversary tribute concert which was held for Dylan at Madison Square Garden last year.

BD: It was pretty overwhelming—you know, even to a person like myself. It was quite a special thing to hear—songs, you know, like that, being played by so many comparable artists.

DM: There are few artists to compare with Dylan, though—three decades of work has brought him a widely varied audience, but that doesn't worry him.

BD: What goes through my mind is just the right—is this, you know, the right—are these the right songs for this particular crowd, but the crowds always seem the same, so it doesn't really seem to matter at the end of the show, whatever's in my mind at the beginning.

DM: And what is on Bob Dylan's mind these days?

BD: Same thing as before. These days, they don't seem much different than the old days, really.

Mid 1993
Jennifer Bowles interview for New York Post

Source: The Wicked Messenger #910 (2664), in ISIS #51, p.19

Written by Jennifer Bowles, the interview piece says that Dylan "strolls into a small, stuffy room at his management office, wearing jeans and cowboy boots topped off with a black Australian cowboy hat". Sitting down, he takes off the hat, placing it on his knee "where it rests for nearly an hour". Given the duration of the interview, the quotes are relatively short. Santana is also there and there a few quotes from him, too. Dylan speaks of being a working musician:

It's all about a livelihood... it's all about going out and playing, that's what every musician who has ever crossed my path strives for.
To me, it's a dream come true. What could be bad about traveling places, seeing different things, moving? It keeps you alive.

Later, Dylan expounds on his feelings about modern music, the music on the radio nowadays, using the contrast of two German composers to make his point:

My feeling is that the guy who's taken up modern music is what you hear in Wagner. Wagner, to me, is like one of the arch-criminals of all time. Like Beethoven would be the antithesis of Wagner and Beethoven you didn't hear very much. Wagner makes you feel gloomy and depressed, but he's popular too, and he dictates the music of the day, whether you like it or not.

So, Dylan as Beethoven. And, in the liner notes to WORLD GONE WRONG, Dylan hears these older songs as if contemporary, just as Shakespeare continues to astound and illuminate this age. Dylan has referred previously to the French epigram "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose" (by Alphonse Karr in "Les Guepes", January 1849); the more often one says this, the more it seems to be true.

3 October 1993
Gary Hill interview, Dylan's San Diego hotel room, California

Source: ISIS #52, pp. 29-31

Quoting Ian Woodward (TWM #914(2674)), Reuters circulated two Bob Dylan reports, both with extensive quotations from Dylan. One is entitled BOB DYLAN MAKES A PASSIONATE RECORD OF HIS FOLK ROOTS; the other DYLAN TALKS ABOUT RELIGION, HEROISM AND ELVIS. (Both) look like one interview, done by Gary Hill, in Dylan's San Diego hotel, on/around 3 October 1993, but turned into two separate reports – one on the album and other a more general, more "moral" piece.

BOB DYLAN MAKES A PASSIONATE RECORD OF HIS FOLK ROOTS

SAN DIEGO, California – Bob Dylan's new album is a passionate solo performance of 10 superb, little-known songs from rural blues and ballad traditions that birthed his world-changing songwriting career. But the songs on 'World Gone Wrong', already exciting a huge critical buzz, are no mouldy oldies dug out for dry historical reasons. They're current, Dylan says in an interview near the end of well-received U.S. concert tour. All these songs are personal, but they're very universal, or catholic if you will, in encompassing all of the world. That's what makes them deep songs.

On the hotel balcony overlooking palm trees and duck ponds, Dylan, wearing sunglasses, an open shirt and baggy striped pants, chooses the seat facing the sun before launching upon a wide-ranging conversation about his work, his personal "Shakespeares" and the world gone wrong. His sincerity, acuity and depth of feeling are evident throughout, as he searches for ways to speak his beliefs clearly -without betraying them.

It's hard for me to search for these words and try to define music. It goes against my grain trying to define any of this. Definition and explanation of it can kill it, he says. My particular involvement is just getting into the essence of the song, getting underneath the song and to push it up. It doesn't interest me to go at the song and to try to make a current kind of Bob Dylan version of a song.

Still, the record is quintessential Dylan, the singing and guitar-playing as fine as any he has ever recorded. These are just good as it's possible for me to play them, says the 52-year-old Dylan, who hoisted popular music into the realms of social activism and art and whose 30-year career was celebrated in a concert last year by superstars ranging across the eras from George Harrison to Pearl Jam.

The songs on 'World Gone Wrong', richer and more unified than his previous solo folk collection 'Good As I Been To You', take time and attention to appreciate. Lines emerge, haunting and hilarious by turns, as the listener figures out who is speaking, what is going on. You can miss a line and you miss it, Dylan says. But he feels that is is as much a symptom of modern degradation as anything else that it may take time to understand the songs. They aren't immediately understandable because people's minds are so polluted with buying products. they're not understandable because people are tied up making important decisions on whether to buy a Coke or a Pepsi, he says.

The songs from a kind of emotional and emotional arc from the title-tune opener – Sorry, honey, I can't be good, the world's gone wrong, he summarizes with a laugh – to the spiritual serenity of a 'Lone Pilgrim' in the face of death. On an album intensely involved with moral issues, these songs do not romanticize the gamblers, murderers and "rounders" that populate them. 'Stack-A-Lee' is an absurd, jeering tragedy – all this trouble about a silly hat – rather than the glorified "Stagerlee" of popular myth (attention Gangster rappers), while 'Delia' is devastatingly sad mourning of a murdered woman who "loved all them rounders, never did love me". 'Love Henry' is a remarkable tale with an enigmatic final section in which a murderess tries to lure a parrot to her knee. It opens up a door for another song, Dylan says. That's what my best songs do. In the last couple of lines, it might just open a door for another song. William Blake could have written that.

In his liner notes, Dylan uses the songs as jumping-off points to riff on a series of moral confusions in modern life. He says the notes were written in a rush: They were a total stream, like late one night, and the moon was full. In those notes, he quotes from the title tune, Strange things are happening, like never before, adding, Strange things like courage becoming befuddled and nonfundamental.

But despite the apparent focus of the record, he says he had no formula in mind when choosing the songs. It just seemed that these were the ones that kind of fit, he says. There's a wealth of this material around. This is just one record. There could be a hundred. He adds, my next record could be all my songs. But this is where it begins for me. Dylan feels he got sidetracked as a performer when, inspired by Woody Guthrie, he began writing songs – the anthems of change like 'Blowin' In The Wind' and 'Like a Rolling Stone' that energized a generation of social revolt. When my songwriting started, all that was kind of left to one side, the musician part of it was left for a while. But it was necessary for me to get back to the stuff that meant so much to me at one time, he says.

Repeatedly, he lists his personal giants, the Blind Willie McTells and Charlie Pattons and many others. These people who originated this music, they're all Shakespeares, you know They're Thomas Edisons, Louis Pasteurs. they invented this type of thing. In a hundred years, they'll be notable for that. He was privileged to sit at their feet when he was young. The people who played that music were still around then, and so there was a bunch of us, me included, who got to see all these people close up – people like Son House, Reverend Gary Davis or Sleepy John Estes. Just to sit there and be up close and watch them play, you could study what they were doing, plus a bit of their lives rubbed off on you. Those vibes will carry into you forever, really, so it's like those people, they're still here to me. They're not ghosts of the past or anything, they're continually here.

DYLAN TALKS ABOUT RELIGION, HEROISM AND ELVIS

America gives a free license to destroy yourself at an early age, Bob Dylan says. But what my eyes see and what my ears hear is that the young people aren't going for that. Still amoral critic and crusader after all these years, Dylan hopes his new album will nourish those who, like him, hear a lot of bad music and see a lot of bad values nowadays. He believes 'World Gone Wrong' offers the kind of truth-telling roots young people are hungering for. It's underground... there are young people who are fed up with what they hear, he says it's not nostalgia for the 1960's that attracts a young audience to his concerts. People who come to see me play, they don't know nothing about 'Like a Rolling Stone' or Vietnam. They don't know nothing about the British Invasion, he says. Half of them never heard of David Bowie. Yet they find something in seeing me play, night after night. That is very encouraging for me. Because if it weren't for seeing them – man, you would probably find me in some kind of Hard Rock Café, hanging out and greeting people or something.

He says pop radio no longer plays music he cares about. Even in the '60s, to use such a deplorable term really, you could turn on the radio and hear Otis Redding or Wilson Pickett or Percy Sledge or Solomon Burke. These people were making popular records. Well, that's no more. Similarly, he says, country music singers then were close enough to the 'hillbilly' originators to be fresh and vital. They were just one step removed from the early ones and you could hear that. But you can't hear it anymore, it's so polluted and unclean. And there are a lot of young kids that know they don't want that. Even 'World Gone Wrong' is a step or two removed, he says. People should go to those old records and find out what the real thing is because mine is still second generation, my version of 'Broke Down Engine' is maybe third generation from Blind Willie's version of it.

He doesn't buy the idea that popular music should be "from the street". The street – there's taxicabs, gas fumes and buses and bank robberies and what have you, all in a single second on a street corner, with jackhammers going, and that's not my belief. Art to me doesn't mirror society. The very essence of art is subversive to society and, whatever society is putting out, art's got to do something else.

The "seductive meditational values" of rural life are the source of the folk blues and ballads he values most. My belief is that it comes greatly across with land. Just to be in a rural landscape gives you a better understanding of what this kind of music is all about. He also has a workingman's distaste for many current music stars, saying they can't sing or play but get by on personality and electronic gimmickry – when they electrified the guitar, that's as far as it needed to go, he says. But he has a bedrock confidence in his own ability. It's not fun and games for me to play. Everyone has something that they can do well and my particular thing is that.

He emphasizes that some of the originators of that real feeling of rock and roll are still around. Carl Perkins is still around. These people are the real thing. They're here now. They still are on this earth. Somehow, he says, like it or not, rock and roll is linked with sex and drugs, but why? Little Richard didn't take any drugs. Carl Perkins was a happily married man. And they made the greatest rock and roll ever. The idea of the flamboyant Little Richard on drugs cracks him up. I don't think he needed any drugs, he says, chuckling and then laughing long and loud. That's funny, Little Richard on drugs. God forbid.

Dylan has no use for the idea of the romantic outlaw hero. What passes for romance to me is not romance at all but just sentimental garbage, he says, the words coming slowly. Romance to me is built on heroism and identity, where identity is all spelled out and it's not necessary to go back into someone's life to find out who that person is – where identity is spelled out by actions, he says. That, to me, makes for a romantic tale. Anything else just goes into this psychological, mental gymnastics of thinking about the past.

Dylan, who prefers not to pin down his personal brand of religion, is glad God was still in the schools in his youth. It gave a person a belief in something more than oneself. A person who only believes in himself is doomed, he says. A person without faith is like a walking corpse. And now people have to fight to get faith back, especially in schools. He says his religious education gave him a moral base. It was easy to rebel against hypocrisy you saw in other areas because of that footing you had to stand on. If you didn't have that footing, you'd just go for the rest of it – which is kind of happening now. People are lost because they can believe anything.

But dues-paying religions, he says, aren't really the essence of Godly, and he predicts, Elvis is going to be a religion. My first trip to Graceland was about six years ago and it was just awesome and it was very clear that Elvis was going to be a religion in a lot of different ways.

In some classic enigmatic Dylan humour, he explains, First of all, El-vis in Hebrew means God. El is God in Hebrew. And Elvis is just a reiteration of the tribe of Levi. And anybody who wears jeans is a Hebrew. Also, anybody who wears a baseball cap backwards – that's a yarmulke. That's heavy, huh?, he says with laugh, but adds, The world operates on principles that we know nothing of.

January 1994
Message for Van Morrison, Tour rehearsals, Los Angeles, CA

Source: Circulating tape

Van Morrison received a Brit Award for “Outstanding Contribution” at the Brit Award Gala 24 February 1994. Dylan contributed a short film shot during his 1994 world tour rehearsals presumably in January 1994 in LA.

Congratulations, Van, on this very prestigious award. Brit Award… No one is more deserving that than you. For writing all those fine songs and giving us all an inspiration though the years. Thanks a lot. God bless you, Van. Blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah.

Early April 1994
Ellen Futterman Interview, St. Louis

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 965-966.

This interview took place early April 1994 and it appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of April 7th. It was written by Helen Futterman the papers' Entertainment Editor. Her long introduction has not been reproduced.

Times They Are A Changin'... Dylan Speaks

EF: You're known for being unpredictable at your concerts in terms of what you play. What can the audience at your St. Louis concert expect?

BD: Well, I've got a four-piece band. I don't know. Some old Dylan, some new, some of the acoustic stuff. The set list changes from night to night, so it's difficult to pin down what we've planned. Most of the songs will be recognizable to fans.

EF: Are you going to do another rock album or stay with the acoustic, folk sound featured on your last two albums?

BD: I might have to make another one like the last two. A lot of stuff didn't get on those. It'd be folk-oriented, but I'd use additional instruments that would give a little different sound... the banjo, maybe even a mandolin, a dulcimer.

The last two albums were necessary for me to do. I wanted to see if it was possible to play and sing and make a record all by myself with just a fraction of all that instrumentation and get a more full-bodied sound.

Paul McCartney, Peter Gabriel and maybe even Phil Collins have done it where they've played all the instruments. I wanted to get as much out of those songs as possible. Sometimes you can rescue those songs by yourself without a lot of other stuff cluttering them up. The point you try to get across is more resonant

EF: Are you still writing new material or taking a break from that?

BD: Well, yeah, I do have a bunch of papers and notes and things lying around. Only time is going to tell when those things come out.

EF: What's your favorite Dylan song?

BD: That's really hard to say. That would be scandalous. It's very difficult to pinpoint one. Each has its own moment.

EF: What sort of new music do you enjoy?

BD: I usually listen to songs about things. My musical taste ran out in the mid-60's. I listened to all that stuff and I still do, it never gets tiresome for me. But there are a lot of new artists who've got a lot of illustrious things to say. [When pressed to name a few, however, he didn't offer any up]

EF: How do you like the new Judy Collins album, where she does only Dylan songs?

BD: Is that out yet? I know she was working on it. I haven't heard it. I go back a long time with her. We used to work together in coffeehouses.

EF: What kind of touch do you keep with your folk buddies from the 60's.

BD: Joan [Baez] calls me from time to time. We did some shows in Germany a few years back. I was just on a Mike Seeger record.

EF: It seems as if you're always doing new things and reinventing yourself. What keeps you moving and motivated?

BD: Just life itself. There's a certain non-transparency to life that keeps me motivated. I try not to work in a linear way. That's incumbent on what's given to you at any given moment. There might be inconsistencies to that, nevertheless, it does give you a degree of independence you might not get any other way.

EF: Having had 3 decades to adjust, are you more comfortable being a living legend?

BD: I try to be an illuminated person. Nobody should put anyone on a pedestal – it really can damage a person's mentality and lead to ignorance. At that point, a person ceases to be a person.

EF: How do you protect your privacy?

BD: I don't have any privacy, so there's really not much to protect.

EF: While on the road, how do you take care of your health and spirituality? What kinds of things do you do for yourself?

BD: I try not to be a loafer. I don't work out. Maybe I'll ride a motorcycle or go horseback riding.

EF: Your son Jacob has a band called the Wallflowers. What do you think of his band?

BD: His music is very humble. They have an impressible sound.

EF: Have you played any gigs together?

BD: Just in the garage.

EF: What kind of music does he play?

BD: I'm waiting for Neil Young to tell me.

March 1995
Malcolm Jones Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1103-1105.

Sometime during February or early March 1995, Dylan is interviewed by Malcolm Jones for Newsweek. The prime purpose of the interview is to discuss Dylan's new book of sketches, Drawn Blank. The interview is accompanied by a photo taken in Bob's California studio with some of his drawings on view. It was published in Newsweek, 20 March 1995.

A PRIMITIVE'S PORTFOLIO
BY MALCOLM JONES Jr.

Entertainment: Dylan is reinventing himself again, this time as plain old Bob, the guy who draws.

THE ONE SURE THING ABOUT BOB Dylan is that there is no sure thing. In a musical career stretching over more than three decades, he has proven time and again that he owns the most bottomless bag of tricks in the business. With changeling grace, he has embraced folk music, rock and roll, country, and gospel; on his last two albums, pop music's most singular singer-songwriter covered folk songs written and sung before he was born.

It's the same with his public pronouncements. In interviews over the years, he has been baleful, apocalyptic, charming, abrasive, squirrelly and profound, depending on his mood. When he sat down two weeks ago for an exclusive interview with NEWSWEEK to talk about his latest project, a book of his drawings, he wore the guise of plain old Bob, earnest, articulate, self-deprecating and dam near kitten-cuddly.

"My favorite artists are people like Donatello or Caravaggio or Titian, all those overwhelming guys," he says. "I wouldn't even know where to begin to approach that kind of mastery." Of his own work, he is content to say, "The purpose of my drawings is very undefined. They're very personal drawings, I guess like someone would knit a sweater, y'know?" It takes a while to get used to this kind of talk from the man whose music elevated scorn to an art form. But then, this isn't Dylan the musician, this is Dylan the artist promoting Drawn Blank (Random House, $30), a collection of pencil, charcoal, and pen-and-ink drawings. Every Dylan fan has known for years that he dabbled in art. He did the cover paintings for the Band's debut album Music From Big Pink, and his own Self Portrait, and in the '80s, his sketches adorned the album jacket art of Infidels and Empire Burlesque. But with this book he's laid his artistic bid on the line.

Asked where the idea came from, Dylan says it came from his publisher. David Rosenthal, Dylan's editor at Random House, says the idea came from Dylan's people. Dylan denies he had much to do with putting the book together; he submitted drawings and they did the rest. But Rosenthal says Dylan was "deeply, deeply involved." The only thing that's clear is that the man who sang "It's always been my nature to take chances" is walking on untried ground and doing damage control with every step.

He needn't worry so hard. There's nothing in this book to rival Rembrandt, and the selection might have been more rigorously culled (captions would be nice too). But the best of the work displays a becoming spareness of line and a loopy but engaging sense of composition. Hotel rooms, street scenes, big diesel trucks. Dylan doesn't do pretty. He's content to take the world as he finds it, and whatever is, is interesting.

"I don't concoct drawings out of my head. It's all out there somewhere and that's the only way I can work or get any satisfaction out of doing it," he says, sitting in an empty Manhattan recording studio where, well into a Saturday night, he's been rehearsing his band for a European tour. With his black-and-gray checked shirt hanging out over black slacks, black boots and his every-day-is-a-bad-hair-day hair framing a motel tan, the 53-year-old Dylan looks every inch the rock and roll eminence gone a tad long in the tooth. Setting fire to a filtered Camel, he continues, "These drawings, they kind of go with my primitive style of music." Both are based in reality, and in both music making and drawing he aims to lose himself. "It's almost like meditating. I feel like I'm renewed after I make a drawing."

A lot of Dylan's art, his portraits particularly, resemble the drawings high-school kids do for fun on the covers of their notebooks. The difference is that while most people grow up and shy away from art, Dylan persists. Like his music, where professional polish has never been the point, his drawings epitomize the amateur's creed, that homemade, hand-hewn stuff is always the best.

Dylan's fascination with reality does not extend to the virtual variety. Though his life and work recently provided the subject matter for a CD-ROM package entitled Bob Dylan: Highway 61 Interactive, he has not yet seen it. "I'm just rooted back there in the '50s, and what's got me this far keeps me going," he says with a grin. "I know people who've got that online thing and games and things, but I find it too inhibiting to sit in front of a screen. On any level. I don't even like to sit and watch TV too much. I feel I'm being manipulated."

'Greed': Dylan called his latest, Grammy winning album World Gone Wrong, and meant every word of it. Two songs are by the late Georgia bluesman Willie McTell, a musician whose passing he mourned in one of his greatest songs, Blind Willie McTell (Power and greed and corruptible seed/Seem to be all that there is) and whose work, for Dylan, symbolizes a level of craft fast vanishing. "If you're looking for depth," he says, "you gotta go back." McTell's songs, most written in the '20s, '30s and '40s, are touchstones to reality for Dylan. "To be around a long time, a musician has got to learn what he can trust. These songs are based on reality, like these drawings. These were real things that happened."

Dylan's increasing fascination with the legacy of the past extends to his own early work. "I've been working on some songs for 20 years, always moving toward some kind of perfection," even though "I know it's never going to happen." (The latest incarnation of those songs will appear next month in an album of Dylan's much-lauded MTV Unplugged concert.) But art for him has always been about subversive change. As a result, he can't abide those fans who want him to continue performing his old songs exactly the way he recorded them. "I'd rather live in the moment than some kind of nostalgia trip, which I feel is a drug, a real drug that people are mainlining. It's outrageous. People are mainlining nostalgia like it was morphine. I don't want to be a drug dealer." Chuckling at his own joke, the man who has made a career out of reinventing himself stands up to go find more cigarettes and coffee and get back to work.

May 1995
Edna Gundersen Interview

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1107-1108.

The interview took place during the first few days of May 1995, almost certainly by telephone. The emphasis is on the MTV Unplugged session, but it soon drifts onto other topics. Edna Gundersen's article appeared in USA Today, 5-7 May 1995.

DYLAN ON DYLAN, 'UNPLUGGED' AND THE BIRTH OF A SONG

On the eve of his MTV Unplugged album, the usually reclusive Bob Dylan agreed to an exclusive chat about his current activities. After a string of West Coast dates this month, he and his band resume touring in Europe in June, then return for a full US tour this fall. He spent three weeks in January writing new songs but probably won't record them before 1996. What else? Read on.

EG: How did you plan this Unplugged project?

BD: I wasn't quite sure how to do it and what material to use. I would have liked to do old folk songs with acoustic instruments, but there was a lot of input from other sources as to what would be right for the MTV audience. The record company said, "You can't do that, it's too obscure." At one time, I would have argued, but there's no point. OK, so what's not obscure? They said Knockin' on Heaven 's Door.

EG: And Like a Rolling Stone, your signature.

BD: I was hearing a lot about how Eric Clapton did Layla acoustically for Unplugged. That influenced me to do the same for Like a Rolling Stone, but it would never get played that way normally.

EG: Would you consider an Unplugged sequel?

BD: I'd consider doing Unplugged again in a relaxed setting where I didn't feel like I was on the spot. I felt like I had to deliver, and I delivered something that was preconceived for me. That wasn't a problem, but it wasn't necessarily what I wanted to do.

EG: Do you prefer playing acoustic over electric?

BD: They're pretty much equal to me. I try not to deface the song with electricity or non-electricity. I'd rather get something out of the song verbally and phonetically than depend on tonality of instruments.

EG: Was performing before TV cameras difficult?

BD: It's hard to rise above some lukewarm attitude toward TV. I've never catered to that medium. It doesn't really pay off for me.

EG: Was the studio audience a typical Dylan crowd?

BD: I'd never seen them before. (Laughs) As I recall, they were in the polite category.

EG: Did you approve of the finished show?

BD: I can't say. I didn't see it.

EG: You've been touring a lot in recent years. Obviously you enjoy playing live.

BD: There's a certain part of you that becomes addicted to a live audience. I wouldn't keep doing it if I was tired of it. I do about 125 shows a year. It may sound like a lot to people who don't work that much, but it isn't. BB King is working 350 nights a year.

EG: Was playing at Woodstock a special moment?

BD: Nah, it was just another show, really. We just blew in and blew out of there. You do wonder if you're coming across, because you feel so small on a stage like that.

EG: Do any of your songs feel dated or stale to you?

BD: I rarely listen to my old records. Songs to me are alive. They're not based on any con game or racket or humbug. They're real songs and they're right now. They're not songs people can listen to and say, "Oh gee, I remember where I was when I first heard that" or "That speaks for me." My songs aren't like that. They're not disposable. Folk and blues songs aren't either.

EG: But you've discarded some songs along the way.

BD: Let's face it, some of my songs don't hold up live. I can't think of any right now, but I've tried them over the years and now I just don't do them.

EG: Do current events, like the Oklahoma bombing, impact on your songwriting?

BD: Chaos is everywhere: lawlessness, disorganization, misrule. I don't know if it impacts my songwriting like it used to. In the past few years, events have affected me and I've addressed them. But unless a song flows out naturally and doesn't have to be chaperoned, it just dissipates.

EG: Do you write with immortality in mind?

BD: No. It's a here-and-now thing. A lot of songs are just interrogation of yourself. I wouldn't classify myself as any type of songwriter. I try not to force myself anywhere.

EG: Are there many unwritten songs inside your head?

BD: Probably more that have never come out than ones that have. I get thoughts during the day that I just can't get to. I'll write a verse down and never complete it. It's hard to be vigilant over the whole thing.

EG: At 53, do you feel a greater urgency about writing?

BD: Yeah, it's either that or be completely mindless about it- I've written a whole bunch of songs, so I can't say I didn't get to what I wanted to. As you get older, you get smarter and that can hinder you because you try to gain control over the creative impulse. Creativity is not like a freight train going down the tracks. It's something that has to be caressed and treated with a great deal of respect. If your mind is intellectually in the way, it will stop you. You've got to program your brain not to think too much.

EG: And how do you do that?

BD: Go out with the bird dogs.

10 August 1995
Jerry Garcia's Obituary

Source: Jerry Garcia Tribute website.

There's no way to measure his greatness or magnitude as a person or as a player. I don't think eulogizing will do him justice. He was that great – much more than a superb musician with an uncanny ear and dexterity. He is the very spirit personified of whatever is Muddy River Country at its core and screams up into the spheres. He really had no equal. To me he wasn't only a musician and friend, he was more like a big brother who taught and showed me more than he'll ever know. There are a lot of spaces and advances between the Carter Family, Buddy Holly and, say, Ornette Coleman, a lot of universes, but he filled them all without being a member of any school. His playing was moody, awesome, sophisticated, hypnotic and subtle. There's no way to convey the loss. It just digs down really deep.

25or26 September 1995
John Dolen Interview, Fort Lauderdale, Florida

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 967-970.

A telephone interview by John Dolen (Arts & Features Editor) which appeared in the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel on Thursday September 28th 1995. It took place on either the 25th or 26th of September immediately after a rehearsal session at Fort Lauderdale. The Edge show mentioned in the interview took place on the 23rd.

A Midnight Chat with Dylan

When Bob Dylan calls, it's nearly midnight. When he speaks it is with a clear, distinctive voice. Even though he's at the end of his day, having just returned to a Fort Lauderdale hotel after a band rehearsal, he is contemplative, enigmatic, even poetic.

The Southern leg of his current tour cranks into high gear tonight with the first of two concerts at the Sunrise Musical Theatre. The tour, which has been in progress for more than a year, has earned rave reviews from critics in New York, San Francisco, Dublin. In a nearly hour-long interview with Arts & Features Editor John Dolen, the first in-depth interview he has given to a newspaper this year, Dylan talks about his songs, the creative process and the free gig at The Edge in Fort Lauderdale last Saturday.

JD: Like many others, over the years I've spent thousands of hours listening to your albums. Even now, not a month goes by without me reaching for Blonde on Blonde, Highway 61 Revisited, Slow Train Coming, Street Legal, Oh Mercy. Do you sit back and look at all these albums and say, hey, that's pretty good?

BD: You know it's ironic, I never listen to those records. I really don't notice them anymore except to pick songs off of them here and there to play. Maybe I should listen to them. As a body of work, there could always be more. But it depends. Robert Johnson only made one record – His body of work was just one record. Yet there's no praise or esteem high enough for the body of work he represents. He's influenced hundreds of artists. There are people who put out 40 or 50 records and don't do what he did.

JD: What was the record?

BD: He made a record called King of the Delta Blues Singers. In '61 or '62. He was brilliant.

JD: Your performance at the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame concert in Cleveland earlier this month drew a lot of great notices. Is that important to you? What's your feeling about that institution?

BD: I never visited the actual building, I was just over at the concert, which was pretty long. So I have no comment on the interior or any of the exhibits inside.

JD: But how do you feel about the idea of a rock hall of fame itself?

BD: Nothing surprises me anymore. It's a perfect time for anything to happen.

JD: At the Edge show Saturday, you did a lot of covers, including some old stuff, like Confidential. Was that a Johnny Ray song?

BD: It's by Sonny Knight. You won't hear that again.

JD: Oh, was that the reason for your "trying to turn bullshit into gold" comment at the show?

BD: (Laugh). Something like that.

JD: Were these covers just something for folks at the Edge? Does that mean you aren't going to be doing more material like that on your tour, including the Sunrise shows?

BD: It will be the usual show we're used to doing on this tour now, songs most people will have heard already.

JD: In the vein of non-Dylan music, what does Bob Dylan toss on the CD or cassette player these days?

BD: Ever heard of John Trudell? He talks his songs instead of singing them and has a real good band. There's a lot of tradition to what he is doing. I also like Kevin Lynch. And Steve Forbert.

JD: Are there new bands you think are worth bringing to our attention?

BD: I hear people here and there and I think they're all great. In most cases I never hear of them again. I saw some groups in London this summer. I don't know their names.

JD: At this stage of your career, when you've earned every kind of honor and accolade that a person can get, what motivates you?

BD: I've had it both ways. I have had good and bad accolades. If you pay any attention to them at all, it makes you pathological. It makes us pathological, to read about ourselves. You try not to pay attention or you try to discard it as soon as possible.

JD: For some writers the motivation is that burden, that you have to get what's inside of you out and down on paper. How is it with you?

BD: Like that, exactly. But if I can't make it happen when it comes, you know, when other things intrude, I usually don't make it happen. I don't go to a certain place at a certain time every day to build it. In my case, a lot of these songs, they lay around imperfectly...

JD: As a songwriter, what's the creative process? How does a song like All Along The Watchtower come about?

BD: There's three kinds of ways. You write lyrics and try to find a melody. Or, if you come up with a melody, then you have to stuff the lyrics in there some kinda way. And then the third kind of a way is when they both come at the same time. Where it all comes in a blur: The words are the melody and the melody is the words. And that's the ideal way for somebody, like myself to get going with something. All Along The Watchtower was that way. It leaped out in a very short time. I don't like songs that make you feel feeble or indifferent. That lets a whole lot of things out of the picture for me.

JD: How did you feel when you first heard Jimi Hendrix's version of All Along The Watchtower?

BD: It overwhelmed me, really. He had such talent, he could find things inside a song and vigorously develop them. He found things that other people wouldn't think of finding in there. He probably improved upon it by the spaces he was using. I took license with the song from his version, actually, and continue to do it to this day.

JD: Angelina off the Bootleg Series, is such a great song, but no matter how hard I try I can't figure out the words; any clues for me?

BD: I never try to figure out what they're about. If you have to think about it, then it's not there.

JD: A song that always haunted me was Senor from Street Legal. Have you played that at all in last few years?

BD: We play that maybe once every third, fourth or fifth show.

JD: In the '70s after years abroad, I remember the incredible elation I felt coming back to the States and hearing your Christian songs, a validation of experiences I had been through in Spain. I remember the lines, "You talk about Buddha / You talk about Muhammad / But you never said a word about / The one who came to die for us instead..." Those were fearless words. How do you feel about those words and the songs you wrote during that period now?

BD: Just writing a song like that probably emancipated me from other kind of illusions. I've written so many songs and so many records that I can't address them all. I can't say that I would disagree with that line. On its own level it was some kind of turning point for me, writing that.

JD: With the great catalog you have and with the success this year with the MTV Unplugged disc, why does this concert tour have such a heavy guitar and drums thing going?

BD: It's not the kind of music that will put anybody to sleep.

JD: The other night at the Edge you left the harmonicas on the stand without touching them, any reason for that?

BD: They are such a dynamo unto themselves. I pick them up when I feel like it.

JD: You've made several passes through here in the past 10 years. Your thoughts on South Florida?

BD: I like it a lot, who wouldn't. There's a lot to like.

JD: Now there is Bob Dylan on CD-ROM, Bob Dylan on the Internet and all that stuff. Are some people taking you too seriously?

BD: It's not for me to say. People take everything seriously. You can get too altruistic on your own self because of the brain energy of other people.

JD: Across the Atlantic is a fellow named Elvis Costello, who, after you, takes a lot of shelf space by my stereo. Both of you are prolific, turn out distinctive albums each time, have great imagery have a lot to say and so on. Is there any reason that in all the years I've never seen your names or faces together?

BD: It's funny you should mention that. He just played four or five shows with me in London and Paris. He was doing a lot of new songs, playing them by himself. He was doing his thing. You sorta had to be there.

JD: Is America better or worse off than, say, in the days of The Times They Are A-Changin'?

BD: I see pictures of the '50s, the '60s and the '70s and I see there was a difference. But I don't think the human mind can comprehend the past and the future. They are both just illusions that can manipulate you into thinking there's some kind of change. But after you've been around awhile, they both seem unnatural. It seems like we're going in a straight line, but then you start seeing things that you've seen before. Haven't you experienced that? It seems we're going around in circles.

JD: When you look ahead now, do you still see a Slow Train Coming?

BD: When I look ahead now, it's picked up quite a bit of speed. In fact, it's going like a freight train now.

John Dolen revealed one extra snippet of the interview in On The Tracks (Vol.4, No 1) p. 9

JD: There was one quote I didn't use because when I looked at it later I wasn't absolutely positive I had it as he said it. It was near the end of the interview. So with that qualification, I give you this exclusively:

BD: The way I look at it, everybody is a priest. If they know it, they know it, and well, if they don't, they don't.

February 1997
Bob Dylan's dedication for Udo Artists' 30th Anniversary

Source: TWM #1298(3799) in ISIS #75, p. 15

Udo Artist, local promoters of Bob Dylan's Japanese tours, celebrated their thirtieth anniversary this year. To make this event, a book has been produced but it is not on general sale. There were dedications from many of the performers represented by Udo Artists, including Bob Dylan. "Mr S. Udo" is Seijiro Udo, the president of Udo Artists.

to Mr S. UDO ——
Many thanks for Everything
And Happy 30th Aniversary (sic)

Best regards Always

Bob Dylan '97

2 June 1997
Sony Music Press Release Re: Histoplasmosis

Sony Music Press Release
June 2, 1997

Bob Dylan Released From Hospital
Treatment Continues and Full Recovery Expected

Bob Dylan was released from the hospital this weekend where he had been undergoing medical tests and subsequent treatment for pericarditis brought on by histoplasmosis. He was admitted on May 25. Doctors are continuing to treat him and are confident that Mr. Dylan will make a full recovery in four to six weeks.

When asked about his plans for his recovery period, Mr. Dylan said, "I don't know what I'm going to do. I'm just glad to be feeling better. I really thought I'd be seeing Elvis soon."

While it is unknown exactly how Mr. Dylan contracted histoplasmosis, the fungal condition which resulted in his illness, doctors believe that the severity of his condition was due to the length of time between the onset of symptoms and the eventual diagnosis.

Mr. Dylan was forced to cancel a European concert tour that was to begin June 1 in Cork, Ireland. He plans to fulfill his U.S. concert schedule, and has recently completed work on a new album that will be released later this year.

10 July 1997
Columbia Press Release for Time Out of Mind

Source: TWM #1278 (3744), 12 July 1997, in ISIS #74, 8/97, p.16.

COLUMBIA PRESS RELEASE FOR "TIME OUT OF MIND"

On 10 July 1997, Columbia Records issued a press release about Dylan's new album, TIME OUT OF MIND. Although relatively brief, it contained some items of interest.

In the first place, it seems that the track listing is not absolutely final yet. The press release stated, in its opening paragraph, that "the album will contain from 10 to 12 original compositions". Somewhat later, it said that, "At this time, the track list includes..." and went on to state the eleven titles contained in 3732, except that Trying To Get To Heaven is now shown as Tryin' To Get To Heaven and To Make You Feel My Love as Make You Feel My Love. Also, there is no apostrophe at the start of Til I Fell In Love With You.

Secondly, whilst it says that "several legendary musicians" are on the album, it only mentions four in all. All are ones that we've known about: Jim Dickinson ("whom Dylan calls a kindred spirit"), Augie Meyers (said to play the Farfisa organ and accordion), Cindy Cashdollar and Duke Robillard.

Thirdly, there's a quote from Daniel Lanois: The record has the kind of depth of field that hasn't been heard in a long time. Foreground information and background information. It's a most serious work, but not without its landscapes of underlying humor.

Fourthly and more interestingly, there's an even longer quote from Dylan himself: Working with Daniel has always been a pleasure. It's seems like we've always had some kind of understanding. We talked about these songs and how they should sound long before we recorded them. As for listeners, some people, when it comes to me, extrapolate only the lyrics from the music. But, in this case, the music itself has just a far-reaching effect, and it was meant to be that way. It's definitely a performance record instead of a poetic literary type of thing. You can feel it rather than think about it.

Finally, the press release, deliberately one might assume, has no mention whatsoever of Billy Joel. Who he?

22 August 1997
Nick Krewen Interview, Viginia Beach, Virginia

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1109-1111.

This interview was conducted by Nick Krewen on August 22nd 1997 "in a rare phone interview from a tour stop in Virginia Beach, VA." It appeared in the Long Island Voice, September 11-17, 1997.

COUNTRY COUSINS CONNECT
BRAKEMEN ON THE TRACKS: BOB DYLAN AND JIMMIE RODGERS

The times may still be a-changin' but Bob Dylan has taken measures to ensure that the work of one musical icon won't be forgotten anytime soon. The music of Jimmie Rodgers, the railroad brakeman from Meridian, Miss., who is widely hailed as a pioneer in blues and country, is the subject of a star-studded tribute album recently organized by Dylan.

Released August 19, in time to commemorate the 100th anniversary of Rodgers' birth on September 8, 1897, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers – A Tribute offers a wealth of noteworthy participants from the pop and country fields. U2's Bono, Alison Krauss & Union Station, Van Morrison, Steve Earl, Iris DeMent, Mary Chapin Carpenter, John Mellencamp and Dwight Yoakam are just some of the artists offering their own interpretations of such Singing Brakeman classics as Peach Pickin' Time In Georgia, Mule Skinner Blues and Blue Yodel (T for Texas).

"I'm just glad to be able to bring it to the public. Somebody has to do it," said Dylan in a rare phone interview from a tour stop in Virginia Beach, VA. Dylan says he hopes the album will generate more awareness of the man also known as "The Father of Country Music" and "the Blue Yodeller" who is credited as a direct influence on such country music movers and shakers as Gene Autry, Johnny Cash, Lefty Frizzell, Merle Haggard, Ernest Tubb and Bob Wills. "For sure he's forgotten by the younger people," said a healthy-sounding Dylan, 56, still recuperating from histoplasmosis, the potentially fatal heart infection that struck him in May. "But for sure there are people around who remember. As performers we should all know him, because by understanding our past we can measure where we're going in the future."

"I can hear him in certain performers. David Ball, for instance, probably sounds closer to Jimmie than anyone today. There's a certain charm to Jimmie's music I think we kept with the spirit of this album."

Though he never played the Grand Ole Opry or the Louisiana Hayride, Rodgers' ability to mix Southern blues with haunting hillbilly balladry has earned him eternal residences in both the Country Music and Rock and Roll Halls of Fame. Even more impressive is the notion that Rodgers established his legacy within a six-year span, beginning with the million-selling success of his very first recording of Blue Yodel (T for Texas) and Away on the Mountain in 1927 and ending with his death, of tuberculosis, on May 26, 1933, at the age of 35. Dylan says he first became aware of Rodgers' music at an early age through another country superstar.

"When I was growing up, I had a record called Hank Snow Sings Jimmie Rodgers and that's the first clue I had that Jimmie was unique," he said. "The songs were different than the norm. They had more of an individual nature and an elevated conscience, and I could tell that these songs were from a different period of time. I was drawn to their power."

"I like his songs anyway, because on the surface their lyrics seem really funny and bright, but underneath they could be alarmingly dark and dreary." But Dylan says he's unsure if one of Rodgers' most famous monikers, "The Father of Country Music," truly suited him. "I don't know whether I associated Jimmie Rodgers with country music. I always thought that the title he had – "Father of Country Music" – was limiting. The Bate Brothers, Johnnie and Jack, the Carlisles – I saw that as country music."

Dylan's list of candidates for the title includes a group of Depression-era names he believes are more appropriate: Frank Hutchinson, the West Virginia singer and country blues guitarist popular in the mid-1920s; Charlie Poole, the Alamance County-born singer, banjo player and leader of the North Carolina Ramblers; and Riley Pucket, a blind '20s hillbilly singer and guitarist from Alpharetta, Ga., who once was a member of Gid Tanner's Skillet Lickers.

In assembling The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers – A Tribute, Dylan says he didn't want to revisit territory already covered by Merle Haggard's memorable 1969 Rodgers tribute album Same Train, A Different Time – Merle Haggard Sings the Great Songs of Jimmie Rodgers. "I didn't see any point to making a record like Merle Haggard's record," said Dylan, who offers the album as the inaugural release on his own Egyptian Records imprint. "That's probably the definitive Rodgers record. So I had to find another way just to get Jimmie's music out there properly. I just trusted everyone involved and did it in respect to Jimmie. I wanted to feature performances by people who aren't necessarily connected to him."

For his own contribution, Dylan chose a more obscure Rodgers' number, My Blue Eyed Jane. "I didn't want to pick one of the 'Blue Yodels,'" he explained. "I thought that would be very obvious, so I struck the balance between what other people would pick. I assumed that a lot of other people wanted to explore the blues, so I stayed away from that for better and more melodic content."

The album took more than a year to compile, and Dylan said all artists were left to their own devices, with minimal input from him. "Every performer chose what song they wanted to do," he said. "I could really hear the influences in the music in just about all the performers in one way or another on the record, whether first-, second-, or third-hand. Everybody was free to suggest their own choice and participate in this. We're trying to do one now on the Carter Family."

Although Rodgers' tunes such as In the Jailhouse Now and Mule Skinner Blues are considered the backbone of country music and are poplar today, Dylan said he's not sure Rodgers would find a comfortable home in modern music times. "I think he writes a particular kind of song, and I'm not sure if he'd find one," says Dylan, who flirted with country music himself on such earlier releases as John Wesley Harding, Nashville Skyline and New Morning. "All those terms are so over-used, especially 'country music,' that I don't know what it is today. In my mind, it has one or two meanings."

"Country music to me doesn't have piano in it, or drums or electric guitars. It must be some other type of music. I guess there are country singers who sing pop songs who sound more pop-oriented, or kind of like watching rock n' roll. I don't know what kind of outlet country music would be played on. To me it sounds more pop-oriented."

Dylan says Rodgers' universal appeal found both country and blues camps claiming him as a forefather. "Because he's so singular in his guitar-chording, that already implies a contribution as a guitarist," he says. "He plays songs with the kind of sentiments that aren't cosmetic. It's a departure particularly from the other stuff which was going on during his day. He knew exactly where he was heading."

Whether it's Steve Earle and the V-Roys' raucous rendition of In the Jailhouse Now, DeMent's quaint Hobo Bill's Last Ride or Carpenter's Somewhere Down Below the Mason-Dixon Line, Dylan says he's pleased by the efforts contributors made to The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers – A Tribute. "I like everything on it," he says. "I think everybody applied themselves well. As for favorites I think everybody had to do what they had to do in order to maintain the integrity of the music. I consider this album just to be a primer Jimmie Rodgers record. It's as much for performers as their record-buying public. Jimmie Rodgers was dynamic for his time."

As far as his own music is concerned, Dylan fans won't have to wait much longer. Time Out Of Mind, his first album of original tunes since 1990's Under the Red Sky that reunites him with the Canadian producer Daniel Lanois, will be in stores September 28. Dylan's last two studio efforts, 1992's Good As I Been to You and 1993's World Gone Wrong offered traditional folk songs. Why the delay in new material?

"This is the first album I've done in a while where I've protected the songs for a long time," replied Dylan, who is scheduled to perform September 27 before Pope John Paul II at the World Eucharistic Conference in Bologna, Italy. "I really just waited until I couldn't wait any longer."

28 August 1997
Edna Gundersen Interview for USA Today

DYLAN SAYS HE'LL ANSWER POPE'S CALL
By Edna Gundersen
USA TODAY

Bob Dylan was as surprised as his fans were Tuesday to hear he'd be performing for the pope next month.

"The pope, huh? I guess if the Vatican is reporting it, it must be happening," Dylan told USA TODAY in his first interview since contracting a rare heart infection in May. "I'm not sure it's going to happen. I know I was the only American they asked outside of Joni Mitchell."

Dylan is scheduled to perform for Pope John Paul II Sept. 27 at the World Eucharistic Congress in Bologna, the Vatican announced Tuesday.

Once he confirms that appearance, Dylan says he'll also try to reschedule London dates that were cancelled when his health crisis forced him to pull out of a European tour.

Dylan entered a hospital with chest pains May 25 and was diagnosed with pericarditis, a swelling of the heart sac, brought on by a fungal infection call histoplasmosis.

"I'm doing as good as I can under the circumstances," he said via phone from a tour stop in Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio. "I'm still taking medication three times a day. Sometimes it makes me a little light-headed and dizzy. And I need to sleep a lot. I did get the doctor's OK to do this tour. I guess I'll make it through."

He plays tonight in Indianapolis, Thursday in Tinley Park, Ill.; Friday in St. Paul, Minn., and ends the month-long tour Sunday in Kansas City, Mo.

"I wanted to do these shows because I'd committed to it," Dylan said. "I don't have the energy I usually have, so I have to save it all to perform. Outside of that, I'm doing as well as I can."

Fans panicked at the news that Dylan, 56, was suffering from a potentially fatal heart disease. In his only statement to the press, he joked, "I really thought I'd be seeing Elvis soon."

Now he reveals, "I was off my feet for six weeks. I was unable to walk around. When I got out of the hospital, I could hardly walk around my yard. I had to stay in bed and sleep all the time. I guess it's a slow process of recuperation."

The infection might have been less serious had it attacked an organ besides the heart. "If it had affected the stomach, it might have left sooner," he says. "But in the heart, there's no way to flush that out. It leaves on its own."

He was stricken while completing a new album, Time Out of Mind, due Sept. 30.

"Up until I was sick, I was putting songs on, taking songs off," he says. "I didn't know what picture it was forming. When I got sick I had to let it all go. I spent a lot of time making it, but I haven't really heard it in a few months."

September 1997
John Pareles Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1113-1118.

In the week commencing 21st September 1997, Dylan gave three press interviews, to John Pareles, Edna Gundersen and David Gates, essentially in support of Time Out Of Mind. These interviews took place in a Santa Monica hotel suite, facing the Pacific Ocean and booked by his publicist, Elliot Mintz.

The first to appear in print was the one by John Pareles, which was the cover story in the Arts & Leisure section of the New York Times for Sunday, 28 September 1997. As well as a cartoon and three smaller but older photographs, it is accompanied by one contemporary photograph, an exterior shot credited to Jeffrey Meyer/Columbia Records.

As might be suspected, there is some similarity in content between the three but the words used by Dylan are not identical, suggesting that they were indeed three separate interviews.

[taken from Wicked Messenger No. 3816]

A WISER VOICE BLOWIN' IN THE AUTUMN WIND

SANTA MONICA, Calif. – Bob Dylan can barely sit still. He pulls at his curly hair, fidgets with his black T-shirt, constantly shifts position on a comfortable couch.

Sitting in his publicist's oceanside hotel suite for a rare interview, the songwriter who transformed rock is in a jovial mood. He's wearing two-tone patent-leather shoes, there's a twinkle in his blue eyes, and he smiles easily and often.

Dylan is proud of his new album, Time Out of Mind, and rightfully so. The album, to be released on Tuesday, is far and away his best sustained work since the mid-1970s; it reaches the exalted level of Blood on the Tracks.

His new songs – his first set of them since 1990 – are embittered, heartsick and weary: "When you think that you've lost everything, you find out you can always lose a little more," he sings in a rasping voice whose familiar cracks have become potholes.

It's the voice of a 56-year-old man who's not hiding any of his bruises. Yet the character who runs through all the songs on the album seems nothing like the relaxed, buoyant songwriter who's talking about them. Asked who the woman was who broke his heart in song after song, he laughs and asks, "Which one? Which song?"

"That's just the nature of my personality," he says. "I can be jubilant one moment and pensive the next, and a cloud could go by and make that happen. I'm inconsistent, even to myself."

During a recording career that now spans 35 years, Dylan has been a cornucopia of inconsistency. Visionary and crank, innovator and conservator, irritant and stimulant, skeptic and proselytizer, rebel and sellout, pathfinder and lost patrol: Dylan has been all of those things, and many more.

He may well be the most restless figure in rock history, constitutionally incapable of doing the same thing twice. Apparently he meant it when he sang, in 1965, that artists "don't look back". Time Out of Mind is a typical Dylan album only because it eludes expectations.

In the 1960s, Dylan taught folk singers how to transcend the topical, then taught rock songwriters how to think about something more than the next romance. Casually, he created whole genres: folk rock, country rock and what's now called Americana.

Every facet of his 1960s music has been imitated, lately by his son Jakob's band, the Wallflowers. Through the 1970s and 1980s, Dylan followed more wayward, less reliable inspirations. He created the rock and roll caravan called Rolling Thunder. He embraced born-again Christianity and then returned to Judaism.

He toured with the Grateful Dead and Tom Petty's Heartbreakers, and he sold his anthem The Times They Are a-Changin' so it could be used in an accounting firm's commercial.

At first deliberately, and even after he repudiated the role, he became a voice for the baby-boomer generation by singing what was on his mind. Just ahead of many of his listeners, he moved from political fervor and apocalyptic visions to marriage and divorce, from searching for faith to grumbling at the nightly news.

Since his bitter divorce from the former Sara Lowndes in the late 1970s, which left her with custody of her five children, including the four they had had together, he has had a home in Malibu, Calif, and kept his private life private. But his reactions to people, ideas and the world have resounded in his songs.

Year in and year out, almost constantly since 1988, Dylan has hit the road. He has become an itinerant musician like the bluesmen and hillbilly troubadours who were his musical education, although his endless tour includes dates like the 1993 inaugural celebration for Bill Clinton and a scheduled show Saturday in Bologna, Italy, before the Pope. "Night or day, it doesn't matter where I go anymore, I just go," he sings in Can't Wait.

"A lot of people don't like the road," he says, "but it's as natural to me as breathing. I do it because I'm driven to do it, and I either hate it or love it. I'm mortified to be on the stage, but then again, it's the only place where I'm happy. It's the only place you can be who you want to be. You can't be who you want to be in daily life. I don't care who you are, you're going to be disappointed in daily life. But the cure-all for all that is to get on the stage, and that's why performers do it. But in saying that, I don't want to put on the mask of celebrity. I'd rather just do my work and see it as a trade."

During the 1990s, touring with his best group since he was backed by the Band, Dylan has garnered a new audience. His shows a decade ago, often yelled or sung in a monotone, exasperated even longtime fans. But at Dylan concerts lately, collegiate types in the tie-dyed shirts of Deadheads have joined balding baby-boomer loyalists. Audiences respond to the blues and country roots of his band and to Dylan's mercurial, improvisatory side, knowing he sings his songs differently at every show.

"I like those people who come to see me now," Dylan says. "They're not aware of my early days, but I'm glad of that. It lifts that burden of responsibility, of having to play everything exactly like it was on some certain record. I can't do that. Which way the wind is blowing, they're going to come out different every time, but the intent is going to be the same."

Dylan has not lacked for recognition in the 90s. He has collected a lifetime achievement Grammy Award, was named a Commandeur dans l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres in France and will collect a Kennedy Center Honors award in December.

Until the 90s, there was one thing that Dylan had not been: silent. Songs had always poured out of him: great, good, indifferent and awful songs, but in a steady stream. That changed after his mediocre 1990 album, Under the Red Sky. He went on performing older songs while releasing two albums of traditional folk and blues material, Good as I Been to You and World Gone Wrong' played solo like an early-1960s Greenwich Village folkie. Dignity, the one new song he released after Red Sky, was an outtake from the 1989 album Oh Mercy.

What made him quit recording new songs? "Disillusion," he says. "Disillusion with the whole process of it. I started out when you could go in the studio and record your songs and leave. I don't remember when that changed. But I found myself spending more and more time in the studio doing less and less. There wasn't any gratification in it, really. I was writing the songs, because that's what I do anyway. And then I had my stage band, so I figured, well, I'll write them and I'll play them when I play them. It's not like we lack any songs to play on a stage."

Longtime fans fretted that Dylan wasn't introducing new songs in concert. The reason, he says, was simple: "I don't like to bring out new material because of the bootleg situation." Yet backstage and at sound checks, extraordinary new songs were taking shape.

Time Out of Mind (Columbia) is bleak and riveting. Its 11 songs are about the loneliness, anger and desolation of lost love, and about looming mortality. (The album was recorded before Dylan was hospitalized over the summer with a life-threatening heart infection.)

"I've been walking through the middle of nowhere, trying to get to heaven before they close the door" Dylan sings. He has rarely sounded optimistic; spite and self-righteous contempt animate many of his best songs. But fewer comforts than ever.

"Environment affects me a great deal," Dylan says. "A lot of the songs were written after the sun went down. And I like storms, I like to stay up during a storm. I get very meditative sometimes, and this one phrase was going through my head: 'Work while the day lasts, because the night of death cometh when no man can work. ' I don't recall where I heard it. I like preaching, I hear a lot of preaching, and I probably just heard it somewhere. Maybe it's in Psalms, it beats me. But it wouldn't let me go. I was, like, what does that phrase mean? But it was at the forefront of my mind, for a long period of time, and I think a lot of that is instilled into this record."

Many of the songs echo the chord structures of 1960s classics like Ballad of a Thin Man and Just Like a Woman, but with the youthful cockiness of those sessions turned inside out. The producer Daniel Lanois (who has also worked with U2, Peter Gabriel and Emmylou Harris) makes the band sound as if it is coalescing on the spot. Instruments enter one by one, feeling their way into the tunes as if they're sneaking into a speak-easy jam session.

Yet the impromptu, unsettled sound is a very deliberate choice. "I wasn't interested in making a record that took the songs and made them into a contemporary setting," Dylan says. "My music, my songs, they have very little to do with technology. They either work or they don't work. Daniel and I made that record Oh Mercy a while back, and that was pretty good at the time. But these songs, I felt, were more all-encompassing. They were more filled with the dread realities of life."

"Many of my records are more or less blueprints for the songs. This time, I didn't want blueprints, I wanted the real thing. When the songs are done right they're done right, and that's it. They're written in stone when they're done right."

Instead of constructing the music layer by layer, Dylan worked through the songs with his musicians, including the Tex-Mex electric-organ legend Augie Meyers, the guitarist Duke Robillard and the linchpin of Dylan's touring band, Tony Garnier on bass. Nearly everything on the album, including vocals, was recorded live in the studio.

"We all know what the thing should sound like. We're just getting further and further away from it," Dylan says. "I wanted something that goes through the technology and comes out the other end before the technology knows what it's doing."

The purposely unpolished music – clattering rockabilly drums and ricocheting guitars in Cold Irons Bound, loping blues with raw guitar jabs in 'Til I Fell in Love With You, slinky electric piano over a reggae backbeat in Love Sick, tentative gospel in Tryin' to Get to Heaven – has a haunted, precarious tone that connects it to the most harrowing depths of the blues.

The blues has always been a Dylan touchstone, for both words and music. In many ways, his groundbreaking 1960s songs were transmuted blues, from the surreal juxtapositions of the lyrics to the rough-hewn vocals to the blues bands he hired when he plugged in.

Throughout Time Out of Mind, Dylan quotes hoary blues lines like "Going down the road feeling bad." And in his maturity, he is closer than ever to the clear-eyed fatalism of classic blues. In song after song, the singer walks down dark, empty roads, muttering accusations at a woman who left him; he's still wishing she would come back and wondering, in one song, whether he would kiss her or kill her if she did.

When he's not brooding over shattered romance, he's feeling his age and contemplating death. In the 17-minute Highlands, he watches young people drinking and dancing, and his voice grows hollow with sadness: "I'd trade places with any of 'em in a minute if I could."

"I can't help those feelings," he says. "I'm not going to try to make a fake Pollyanna view. Why would I even want to? And I'm not going to deny them just because they might be a little dismal to look at. I try to let it speak for itself, but I'm not emotionally involved in it. I can deliver the message. I learned a while ago not to get personally involved, because if you're personally involved you're going to go over the top."

Watching his son Jakob turn into a multimillion-selling hit maker, Dylan tempers his pride with caution. "He's had an amazing amount of success in a short time," Dylan says. "I just don't want to see his heart get broken in this business, that's all."

For Dylan, the songs he grew up on continue to provide the models, and the yardstick, for his own music; Good as I Been to You and World Gone Wrong only strengthened the connection. "My songs come out of folk music," he says. "I love that whole pantheon. To me there's no difference between Muddy Waters and Bill Monroe."

Going through the tracks on Time Out of Mind, he points out what he borrowed: among other things, a jug-band guitar line in Not Dark Yet, an inverted rockabilly lick in Dirt Road Blues, and a riff and a country-blues lilt from Charley Patton in Highlands.

"There's a lot of clever people around who write songs," Dylan says. "My songs, what makes them different is that there's a foundation to them. That's why they're still around, that's why my songs are still being performed. It's not because they're such great songs. They don't fall into the commercial category. They're not written to be performed by other people. But they're standing on a strong foundation, and subliminally that's what people are hearing."

"Those old songs are my lexicon and my prayer book," he adds. "All my beliefs come out of those old songs, literally, anything from Let Me Rest on That Peaceful Mountain to Keep on the Sunny Side. You can find all my philosophy in those old songs. I believe in a God of time and space, but if people ask me about that, my impulse is to point them back toward those songs. I believe in Hank Williams singing I Saw the Light. I've seen the light, too." Dylan says he now subscribes to no organized religion.

While Dylan idolized the likes of Mississippi John Hurt and Jimmy Rodgers in the 1960s, he has now achieved their kind of gravity himself. If anything, he sounds more woeful. The voice of a generation has become a voice of experience, telling us that experience hasn't taught him anything he needs. Explicitly or not, the blues and folk masters offered their own survival as reassurance.

But on Time Out of Mind, Dylan refuses listeners that solace; he often sounds as if he would welcome death. "It's not dark yet, but it's getting there" he sings, unguarded and matter-of-fact.

"I've written some songs that I look at, and they just give me a sense of awe," Dylan says "Stuff like, It's Alright, Ma, just the alliteration in that blows me away. And I can also look back and know where I was tricky and where I was really saying something that just happened to have a spark of poetry to it."

"But when you get beyond a certain year, after you go on for a certain number of years, you realize, hey, life is kind of short anyway. And you might as well say the way you feel."

September 1997
Edna Gundersen Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1119-1127.

In the week commencing 21st September 1997, Dylan gave three press interviews, to John Pareles, Edna Gundersen and David Gates, essentially in support of Time Out Of Mind. These interviews took place in a Santa Monica hotel suite, facing the Pacific Ocean and booked by his publicist, Elliot Mintz.

The second interview appeared on the front of the "Life" section of USA Today for Monday 29 September 1997. It is by Edna Gundersen, who also wrote two adjacent pieces, one a review of Time Out Of Mind and the other a report on the Bologna appearance, The latter contains a color photograph of that event and more quotes from the interview itself.

As might be suspected, there is some similarity in content between the three but the words used by Dylan are not identical, suggesting that they were indeed three separate interviews.

[taken from Wicked Messenger No. 3816]

It later transpired that there was more to the Gundersen interview than published in USA Today. A far larger version, presumably the whole interview, appeared on the newspaper's web page. This is reproduced below, after the published interview.

AT THE HEART OF DYLAN

Heartache. The word literally and figuratively defines Bob Dylan in 1997. After surviving a life-threatening cardiac infection, he is resuming his storied career with a powerful album about lost love and dwindling hope.

Time Out of Mind, in stores Tuesday, examines mortality and heartbreak in 11 raw and potent tracks. Though finished long before Dylan was hospitalized, the lyrics carry added resonance in light of his illness.

Disciples will ruminate over lines like "When you think you've lost everything, you find you can lose a little more," "It's not dark yet but it's getting there" and "I was on anything but a roll."

At 56, nearly four decades after his first public appearances, Dylan is on a roll. A chorus of praise greets Time Out of Mind: A+ in Entertainment Weekly, * in Rolling Stone, "his best sustained work since the mid-1970s," raves The New York Times. He's Newsweek's cover boy. On Saturday, he played for the Pope. In December, he'll become the first rock star anointed a Kennedy Center honoree.

Dylan, slim and natty in a black shirt, slacks and patent leather loafers, seems anything but morose during a rare interview. His clear blue eyes, ready smile and animated demeanor suggest good health and high spirits. He is quick to discourage analysts who'd dismantle his songs for clues about death and despair.

"I don't think they should or could be interpreted that way, if at all," he says, his back to a hotel window that frames the Pacific sunset. "You can't interpret a Hank Williams song. He's done the interpretation and the performance, and that's it. Now it's for the listener to decide if it moves him or not. That's something you don't even decide. That happens to you unconsciously."

"I let the songs fly, and people respond. Whether they make a valid interpretation or look at it with a false eye, I'm not concerned with that. "

Nor is the ferociously private Dylan willing to expound on Time's tales of shattered romance, except to acknowledge that the songs are drawn from personal experience.

"I can identify with other people and situations, but I tend not to," he says. "I would rather recall things from my own life, and I don't have to force myself... Just being in certain environments triggers a response in my brain, a certain feeling I want to articulate. For some reason, I am attracted to self-destruction. I know that personal sacrifice has a great deal to do with how we live or don't live our lives."

"These songs are not allegorical," Dylan stresses. "I have given that up... Philosophical dogma doesn't interest me."

Pop's most scrutinized yet inscrutable artist doesn't deny his mercurial nature or his disdain for the labels of rebel, poet and prophet. Though he radically transformed folk, rock and the singer/songwriter genre in the '60s, he refuses to clone seminal works and adopts a humble stance.

"I don't consider myself a songwriter in the sense of Townes Van Zandt or Randy Newman," he says. "I'm not Paul Simon. I can't do that. My songs come out of folk music and early rock n' roll, and that's it. I'm not a classical lyricist, I'm not a meticulous lyricist. I don't write melodies that are clever or catchy. It's all very traditionally documented."

The most influential songwriter of modern times recognizes that his mass appeal has waned. "I'm under the impression that people aren't really paying attention to my records," he says. "I'm aware that I don't sell records like I did in the '80s or the '70s, and that's OK as long as I can play, and the right crowd is going to come and see it properly. I don't follow what records are at the top of the charts. I ceased doing that a long, long time ago."

He does, however, take notice of rising son Jakob, whose band the Wallflowers, No. 31 after 64 weeks on Billboard's chart, commercially outranks his dad's '90s output.

"I'm proud of his accomplishments," Dylan says "He's still young, and he's come a long way in a short time. I worried about him when he started out. I just didn't want to see him get roughed up. This business can throw you into deep water."

The murkiest depths? Celebrity. "It mortifies me to even think that I am a celebrity," Dylan says. "I'm not one, and I never want to be one. I lead a very insular existence. It's different on stage, because those people look at me as a performer."

"By being a celebrity, you lose your anonymity. It short-circuits your creative powers when people come up and interrupt your train of thought. They consider you completely approachable. And you can't be rude to people, so basically you shut yourself down. I know I do. I shut myself down when people come up and want to shake my hand or want to talk. That's just dead time."

Dylan avoids the press, loathes photo sessions and steadily releases records with scant promotion.

Time contains his first batch of originals since 1990's Under the Red Sky. Since then, he has released a boxed set of rarities, his third greatest hits album, an MTV Unplugged, and two collections of vintage folk and blues, 1992's Good as I Been to You and 1993's World Gone Wrong.

Making Time was a liberating experience for Dylan, who can feel burdened by the weight of his legend. The classics he performs on stage "are proven to be true and strong, otherwise I couldn't sing them night after night," he says. "It's not like I can eclipse that."

"I'm not looking to do that, but to record new songs, they have to be in that arena, and that's why it took a long time. I was constantly thinking, will these songs stand up to what I'm playing night after night?"

Dylan considers his early records roughly sketched prototypes that later matured onstage. Produced by Daniel Lanois last January in a Miami studio, the new songs were captured live with sidemen schooled in low-tech production.

"This record is not a blueprint," Dylan says. "This is it. This is the way these songs should go, every single last one. This record went through evolutions. What you hear comes through that whole maze, that labyrinth of fire that it takes to perfect the arrangement and structure."

"There is nothing contemporary about it. There is no trickery. We went back to the way a primitive record was made, before the advent of technology. It's almost a revolutionary concept these days."

The man who shocked the folk rank and file by plugging in now worries that high-watt noise is eradicating traditional American music.

"You see all this electricity speaking, all this wizardry," he says. "Pull out the plugs and probably very few of these people could move you, because they can't play. They are dominated by the electricity. Guys like Elmore James played acoustically and used electricity so they could be heard in a crowded room. They weren't depending on electricity to hide talent they didn't have. I don't want a bunch of flaky sounds. It's a dead end."

Dylan was still sequencing Time tracks when he was stricken with chest pains in May. He was declared fit after an initial medical exam.

"I accepted that, but the pain didn't go away," he says. "It was intolerable pain, where it affects your breathing every waking moment."

He entered a hospital May 25 and was diagnosed with pericarditis, a swelling of the sac around the heart, brought on by a fungal infection called histoplasmosis. Dylan spent six weeks off his feet. His brush with death brought delirium and ennui but no spiritual revelations.

"I didn't have any philosophical, profound thoughts," he says. "The pain stopped me in my tracks and fried my mind. I was so sick my mind just blanked out. I'm getting better; that's all I can say right now."

The alignment of events this year – his health scare, broad acclaim for Time Out of Mind, the papal encounter – has magnified Dylan's star power and fed an ongoing deification that he finds perplexing. In 1990, he received France's highest cultural honor. The next year, he got Grammy's lifetime achievement award. And in 1992, an all-star concert, pay-per-view and compilation album toasted his 30th anniversary as a recording artist.

Such honors "are unexpected and unsolicited, and I'm not nonchalant about it, because in some sense it really does matter," he says. "I'm very appreciative."

But he's leery of the hype. Dozens of books are devoted to the enigmatic troubadour. He doesn't read them.

"I'm not going to read a book about myself," he says with a chuckle. "I mean, why? I'm with myself enough. I wake up every day and I'm still me. It would be torture to read about myself. I would rather read about anybody else but me."

And now what appears to be the interview proper from which the above was taken.

EG: How are you feeling?

BD: I'm feeling better. It's a slow process of getting altogether better. I'm not sure if I'm going to get altogether better. Wherever that altogether place is, I'm heading towards it.

EG: How did this medical crisis unfold?

BD: We hit a freak storm on the Ohio River, and I guess I got a really bad taste of it. It went into the wrong area. When a virus goes in your stomach, you can get rid of it easier. Mine went into [my heart], where there is no way to flush it out. It got unbearable.

EG: Were you reluctant to go to a hospital?

BD: No. I had complained that I had pain, and the pain was diagnosed as insufficient to do anything about. I accepted that, but the pain didn't go away. It puts you in a frame of mind that you can't imagine. Pain can do that to you. It was intolerable pain, where it affects your breathing every waking moment. I couldn't sleep. In the early stages when it first came on me, I thought it might be a heart problem and I didn't want to jeopardize my health by taking anything to go to sleep.

EG: People who experience a brush with death often feel transformed in some way. Was that your experience?

BD: No, no. I was so sick, my mind was just blanked out. Once I got rid of the pain, I had to recuperate by just lying low for weeks and weeks and weeks, unable to even step around my yard. I didn't have any philosophical, profound thoughts, really. All those thoughts happened when I was going through the pain. It stopped me in my tracks. It fried my mind. I'm getting better, that's all I can say right now. I don't know what tomorrow's going to bring.

EG: How did being sick impact the making of Time Out of Mind?

BD: The record was recorded in January and the songs were written before then. We didn't really do anymore after that. It was just a question then of what songs were going to be placed on it and left off. When I got sick, I let it go at that point. I didn't have the energy to decide anymore. Up to that point, we were working on it, shuffling some songs around, when this happened to me. I was a little bit confused at that point. I wasn't really sure what the final outcome was going to look like. I decided that whatever it was before I got sick, that was the way it would be.

EG: Are you pleased with the album?

BD: I think so. It says what it needs to say. We did most of the things that we tried to do, in terms of how we needed to put these songs across. They are not the types of songs you hear every day, and they needed some thought going into how they should sound. I think they sound like they were meant to be played.

EG: Is this record a natural extension of the two vintage-folk collections you recorded before it?

BD: No, those records were made in a different time, a different place and with a different purpose. This particular set of songs had more compatible musicians who played everything live. There is no trickery to it. I mean, Dan [Lanois] has his wizardry that he does. But there is nothing contemporary about this record. We went back to the way a primitive record was made, before the advent of technology. It takes a certain amount of bravery to do that. And it takes musicians who understand the process. It's almost a revolutionary concept these days. Usually everyone has his own little space. We disregarded all that, so there is no separate tracking, which is very unorthodox. We'd put two or three instruments through one amplifier. You won't find that being done, but it all adds up to a certain effect. And the whole record is live. That adds a certain ambience to everything. We had open mikes in a very big room. You get an echo of the guitar and it fits in somewhere.

EG: Was Lanois immediately receptive to your approach?

BD: We talked about this last June [1996]. I had the songs for a while, and I was reluctant to record them, because I didn't want to come out with a contemporary-sounding record. I didn't feel that type of sound would be useful for these songs. So we came to an understanding that these should have an identifiable sound and that sound should not be a futuristic type of sound, but more traditional, like a record on a record player as opposed to a CD you hear on a fabulous sound system. Dan makes very stately-sounding records, so he is perfect for serving the song. He's just interested in the song, not the personalities or any fabrications or iconic things. Is the song there? That's all he cares about, and then he can work that magic.

EG: Were these songs written in one unbroken block of time?

BD: No. I write on the road. I write thoughts and things down. Then I'll get somewhere and look at it and see what it seems to be saying. A lot of people can't do that on the road, but I like the movement. I have a band all the time, so we can always play it here and there. If I want to see how something is going to sound, I can hear it right. There was no pressure on me to write these songs. There was no one breathing down my neck to make this record. So like everything else, it happened when I had the time.

EG: How autobiographical are these songs?

BD: I recall these things from my whole life. I can identify with different people and different situations, and if I want to go that way, I can, but I tend not to. I would rather recall something from memory. I don't have to force myself, because just being in certain environments triggers some kind of response in my brain of a certain feeling I want to articulate. These songs are not allegorical. I have given that up. I don't even want to go into that area anymore. Philosophical dogma doesn't interest me.

EG: How did the song Highlands take shape? I understand the musicians didn't hear the lyrics until the song was being recorded.

BD: I don't think we had a full ensemble playing on that, as I remember. There can't be more than four people playing. I can't say that the musicians didn't know the song or the lyrics. I don't know. They all understand this kind of music. Every musician there was compatible with this kind of music. I mean, I can listen to Jimmie Rodgers, and then I can listen to Robert Johnson, and I don't hear any dichotomy. It all comes to the same place.

Highlands was not a melodic song. It's an old country guitar pattern that you don't hear every day. That's what makes it kind of hypnotic. Nobody has extracted a pattern like that and played it with a certain rhythm. It's more country, and it's older, and that's why it mystifies you. It's got that hypnotism that sounds like it would go on forever. And that's the point. It can go on forever.

EG: It shifts from humor to despair to surreal vignettes and yet seems very cohesive in the end. Did you compose the lyrics in one sitting?

BD: No. That particular song, if you want to call it a song, had a lot of lyrics to it. You hear maybe one third of all the lyrics to it. Nobody had gone to this area before, and I thought, let's go there. I didn't think anything like this had ever been captured on tape. I had to scramble around to find the right types of lyrics and basically moved lyrics around and put together the puzzle. It might sound Byzantine in its way, but it seems to make sense, doesn't it?

EG: Themes of heartbreak and mortality seem to thread through every song. Did you intend to convey those issues?

BD: Not really. I'm not responsible for the interpretation. I don't think they should or could be interpreted that way, if at all. You can't interpret a Hank Williams song. He's done the interpretation and the performance, and that's it. Now it's for the listener to decide if it moves him or not. That's something you don't even decide. That happens to you unconsciously.

EG: Do you put much stock into the opinions listeners hold?

BD: I find a lot of people say they like one thing but in reality they like another. Whatever somebody professes on one hand, a lot of times if you penetrate into their inner beings, they are not so enthralled with that. You ask about mortality. The soul has a worth, but we don't know what the intrinsic value of a soul is. Nobody knows and nobody even wants to think about it. But people do think about it in their innermost spirit, whether they say they do or don't. I let the songs fly and people respond. Whether they make a valid interpretation or look at it with a false eye, I'm not concerned with that.

EG: Do these songs lend themselves to the stage, and will you be playing them on tour?

BD: Absolutely. I don't record a record and then go on tour and play it. But eventually the songs find their way into my stage show, one by one. That means something else will have to go. This record is not a blueprint. This is it. This is the way these songs should go, every single last one. This record went through different evolutions. What you hear comes through that whole maze, that labyrinth of fire that it takes to perfect the arrangement and the structure.

EG: Do you worry that new songs don't hold up against such classics as Like a Rolling Stone and Mr. Tambourine Man?

BD: The songs I play night after night are proven to be true and strong. Otherwise I couldn't sing them night after night. They can be performed over and over because there is a truth in them. It's not like I can do anything to eclipse that. It's not going to happen. I'm not looking to do that. But in order to record new songs, they have to be in that arena, but not on any superficial level. So that's why it took a long time. I was constantly thinking, "Am I really going to accomplish something? Will any of these songs stand up with what I'm playing night after night?"

EG: Was there something particular you wanted to say when you were putting these songs together and forming this album?

BD: For some reason, I am attracted to self-destruction. I know that personal sacrifice has a great deal to do with how we live or don't live our lives. Maybe in the back of my mind, I was thinking that.

EG: You have been on the road almost nonstop in recent years. Do you still have a strong commitment to touring?

BD: I'm comfortable out there. In America, that is. I'm not sure I want to continue touring overseas. Being on the road to me is just as natural as breathing. It's rewarding to thrill the crowd. That's all I can tell you about it. I never think about the shows after they're done.

EG: You've been hailed as one of this century's greatest songwriters, yet you tend to accept the praise reluctantly. Why?

BD: I don't consider myself a songwriter in the sense of Townes Van Zandt or Randy Newman. I'm not Paul Simon. I can't do that. My songs come out of folk music and early rock n' roll, and that's it, no more. That's the foundation. I'm not a classical lyricist. I'm not a meticulous lyricist. I don't write melodies that are clever or catchy. It's all very traditionally documented.

EG: What keeps you close to those roots?

BD: I'm constantly listening to [early folk]. I have never strayed from the path of that old traditional music.

EG: Do you agree that the songs on Time Out of Mind are more emotionally raw and direct than anything you've done in the past?

BD: Yeah. I have always had it in me to do it, but I never really gave myself the opportunity. Opportunities don't last forever, but I had to wait for the right time. I always felt I wanted to make a record the way I like to hear a record. All these songs could have been recorded with a different producer and in a different place and time, but they wouldn't jump at you like they do. I was tired of the old [recording] methods. I hadn't recorded for a long time, because I really couldn't find somebody who could work with me in some other role besides patrician.

EG: Are you dissatisfied with some of the records you've made in the past?

BD: Oh, yeah. I can't say that I've made any great-sounding records. A lot of the older songs were just blueprints for what I'd play later on the stage. Jerry Garcia proved that to me. He took a lot of the songs and actually recorded them and sang them a step further than they were on my records. He heard where they should go. I would hear his versions of songs of mine and I'd say, "OK, I understand how it should go." Then I would play that and might even take it a step further. There have been other artists who have recorded my songs and shown me the way the song should go.

EG: Are you surprised by the amount of attention the new album is drawing?

BD: There are plenty of other people out there getting attention. I'm under the impression that people aren't really paying attention to my records. I'm aware that I don't sell records like I did in the '80s or the '70s, and that's OK as long as I can play and the right crowd is going to come and see it properly. I don't follow what records are at the top of the charts. I ceased doing that a long, long time ago.

EG: On your last album, you wrote in the liner notes that technology now exists that can wipe out the truth. Are you worried that high tech is threatening folk tradition?

BD: Very much so. You see all this electricity speaking, all this wizardry, all these pedals on stage. Pull out the plugs and probably very few of these people could move you, because they can't play. They are dominated by the electricity. Guys like Elmore James played acoustically and used electricity so they could be heard in a crowded room. They weren't depending on electricity to hide talent they didn't have. I don't want a bunch of flaky sounds. It's a dead end. It's dead weight.

EG: The last show you did before you were hospitalized was a Jewish benefit. You played in a Buddhist temple a few years back, and now you're performing for the pope. Naturally, fans are speculating again about your religious stance.

BD: I don't know what people are wondering about. I've always felt an unseen presence, all the time, ever since I was small. I'm not a big fan of diversity. Everyone has a heart. We breathe the same air. We have the same organs. That unifies us. I play where I am asked to play. Playing for the pope is just a show. I don't judge who asks me to play. That's not my position. I'm grateful to be asked for whatever reason.

EG: How do you feel about fans who were outraged when you sold rights to The Times They Are A-Changin' to an accounting firm?

BD: It depends on who they are. It depends on who is saying it. Let's check them out, let's see what their values are. Before they start to criticize, let's see how deep their sins run. I don't know how to respond to something like that It really doesn't even enter my mind. I have no feelings against [selling song rights], especially songs that are like 40 years old.

EG: You've been playing guitar a great deal more lately, both on record and on stage. Does this reflect a new passion for the instrument?

BD: Hmm, I play stuff. It's not incidental stuff and it's not inconsequential. I don't play lead guitar, like you have probably heard a lot of people say. I don't see that. What I do is restructure a song and my guitar is more or less like my vocal style. It's really only based on a structure, and I don't vary from that structure, ever. I used to look for someone to do that in my band, and I couldn't get anybody to do it, to just play the structure of the song. It's not lead guitar in any sense of the word. My guitar playing isn't really noteworthy in any way. It only works in my musical setting.

EG: More books have been written about you than any other 20th-century songwriter. Do you check out the biographies about you?

BD: I m not going to read a book about myself. I mean, why? I'm with myself enough. I wake up every day and I'm still me. It would be torture to read about myself. I would rather read about anybody else but me.

EG: Why don't you do more interviews?

BD: I'm not uncomfortable doing interviews, but it would be preferable to me that I just do one interview because you don't want to tell the same thing to every person interviewing you, and I run out of things to say. When I used to do more interviews, I found myself saying the same thing over and over. I was like, enough of this. This is stupid. Besides, there is already so much written about me. We'll be booked in a town, and there's two pages of the newspaper devoted to me. For the amount of space they give to these essays, you'd think I was selling out 12 Madison Square Gardens. They've got me in this celebrity category. Well, I'm not a celebrity, really. I lead a very insular existence. I don't want to be a celebrity. I'm not one, and I don't ever want to be one. It mortifies me to even think I am a celebrity.

EG: Why does it mortify you?

BD: Because basically you lose your anonymity, and it's a dreadful thing to do that. It short-circuits your creative powers when people come up and interrupt your train of thought. They consider you completely approachable. And you can't be rude to come up and want to shake my hand or want to talk. That's just dead time.

EG: For someone with your kind of fame, how have you managed to keep your private life so private?

BD: If we [hadn't had] to cancel those shows [in Europe in June], you would never have known I was sick, because I most likely wouldn't have told anyone. Those shows were like two days away, and I was ready to make those shows that's how sick I was. I was out of my mind. I didn't tell anybody that I was sick, even though I could not function, I could not walk. I just don't talk to make small talk. I really don't feel I have to shield anything. My motivation is to go out and thrill people night after night on the stage. The other side is a side I've never cultivated.

EG: Your son Jakob has been very much in the spotlight this year. Do you worry about him?

BD: I'm proud of his accomplishments. He's still young, and he's come a long way in a short time. I worried about him when he started out. I just didn't want to see him get roughed up. This business can really throw you into deep water. He's had his ups and downs. What he does with the future remains to be seen, but he and his band have done rather well. In [the] contemporary music scene, they have got a voice to be heard.

EG: What about your own future?

BD: When I'm off the road and not playing, I can't say I truly miss it. But once I get out there, I realize that this is what I'm supposed to do. I have an inner exhilaration by doing it. And I can step to it without any down time real quick. We don't have to seclude ourselves and gear up and rehearse for two months and make such a big deal out of touring. It's relatively effortless. But I may wake up saying that I'm never going to do it again, not because there is any kind of harshness to it, but because that's the way I am. I'm different all the time. Talk to me tomorrow and I'll give you different answers to the same questions. I'm not the same person from one hour to the next.

September 1997
David Gates Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1129-1134.

In the week commencing 21st September 1997, Dylan gave three press interviews, to John Pareles, Edna Gundersen and David Gates, essentially in support of Time Out Of Mind. These interviews took place in a Santa Monica hotel suite, facing the Pacific Ocean and booked by his publicist, Elliot Mintz.

The third interview, by David Gates, appeared as the cover story of the 6 October 1997 US edition of Newsweek. The cover photograph was taken by Richard Avedon, in a proper photographic studio by all accounts. Unfortunately, this photograph does not appear on the cover of the 13 October international edition but it does contain the interview itself.

As might be suspected, there is some similarity in content between the three but the words used by Dylan are not identical, suggesting that they were indeed three separate interviews.

[taken from Wicked Messenger No. 3816]

DYLAN REVISITED

Bob Dylan has reinvented himself all his life. Now he's back – from a near-fatal illness and a near-terminal career slump – with his best record in years. How does it feel? We asked him. He told us.

AS YOU SIT ACROSS FROM HTM, HIS FACE KEEPS CHANGING. Sometimes it's that I-see-right-through-you look from the cover of Highway 61 Revisited – you barely notice the white hairs among the curls, the two days' worth of stubble and the 30 years' worth of lines. Now he turns his head: there's the profile from Blood on the Tracks. Now he thrusts his chin up, and he's the funny, defiant kid who used to wear that Bob Dylan cap. Well, he is Bob Dylan. The man who did to popular music what Einstein did to physics. The incarnation of the counterculture. The songwriter of the century. Sitting right there. So what's on his mind?

It turns out that he loves to talk about Merle Haggard and early Elvis. Or Brian Wilson: "That ear – I mean, Jesus, he's got to will that to the Smithsonian." Or Sinatra: "The tone of his voice. It's like a cello. Me and Don Was wanted to record him doing Hank Williams songs. I don't know, for some reason or other it never got off the ground."

And when it comes to musical arcana, he knows the secret handshakes. Somehow you get talking about the old country duo Johnnie and Jack, and how Jack died in a car crash. "Car crash goin' to Patsy Cline's funeral" he chimes in. Bingo.

But you're really here, in an oceanfront hotel in LA, to talk about the record he's releasing this week, Time Out of Mind completed before his widely reported death scare last spring, it's got that album-of-the-year buzz publicists can help along some but not create. But there's stuff he's put off-limits – where he lives, his children – and stuff you just know not to ask. What did those black and white loafers set him back? Is he still in touch with his ex-wife? In fact, he seems near the edge of his comfort zone talking about why he's not talking about one of his most illegible back pages: that conservative, born-again Christian phase that blindsided his liberal, secular fan base some 15 years ago. "It's not tangible to me," he says. "I don't think I'm tangible to myself. I mean, I think one thing today and I think another thing tomorrow. I change during the course of a day. I wake and I'm one person, and when I go to sleep I know for certain I'm somebody else. I don't know who I am most of the time. It doesn't even matter to me." This cracks him up.

Then he says, "Here's the thing with me and the religious thing. This is the flat-out truth: I find the religiosity and philosophy in the music. I don't find it anywhere else. Songs like Let Me Rest on a Peaceful Mountain or I Saw the Light – that's my religion. I don't adhere to rabbis, preachers, evangelists, all of that. I've learned more from the songs than I've learned from any of this kind of entity. The songs are my lexicon. I believe the songs."

Bob Dylan is 56. Last May when he almost died – of a viral infection in the sac around the heart – Columbia Records got 500 calls in a single day. Earlier this year Greil Marcus's much discussed Invisible Republic, a study of Dylan's 1967 Basement Tapes, rightly ranked his music with "the most intense outbreaks of twentieth-century modernism"; the death scare reminded us that Dylan is a major cultural figure – and that we won't always have him with us. But for Dylan himself, deep thoughts about mortality had to take a back seat. "Mostly I was in a lot of pain. Pain that was intolerable. That's the only way I can put it." By August, though, he was back on tour again, lightheaded from his medication but sounding none the worse for wear.

Last weekend Dylan performed before the pope, reportedly at John Paul's own request, at a Eucharistic Conference in Bologna. John Paul listened, eyes closed, to Knockin' on Heaven's Door and the apocalyptic A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall; then Dylan doffed his white Stetson, shook the Pope's hand and sang Forever Young. In December he'll receive a Kennedy Center Honors award, with President Clinton in attendance. Will he have to speak? "No, they say I don't have to do a thing, which is" – he laughs – "perfect for me."

Dylan's been fitfully rebuilding his career for the past decade, after starring in the stillborn 1987 film Hearts of Fire, a knockoff of A Star Is Born, and releasing such disappointing (though underrated) albums as 1988's Down in the Groove. He's had triumphant media moments: his 1988 collaboration with Tom Petty, George Harrison and Roy Orbison as the Traveling Wilburys, his all-star 30th Anniversary Celebration at Madison Square Garden in 1992, winning over critics in 1993 shows at Manhattan's Supper Club, holding his own with Metallica and Nine Inch Nails at Woodstock '94, his tight, audience-friendly 1994 set for MTV Unplugged. But more important are the 100 or so ordinary concerts he plays, year in, year out, on his Never-Ending Tour (which he says ended in 1991) and its successors, to which he's given such names as the Why Do You Look at Me So Strangely Tour.

And he's newly famous as the father of the Wallflowers' Jakob Dylan. "I know they've sold a ton of records," says Dylan, who's "superstitious" about discussing family members. "I keep hearing that they're playing arenas or whatever with the Counting the Crows group." Did he try to interest Jakob in old blues and hillbilly music? "Yeah, he's heard the records. He has different likes because he was born at a different time – but sure, if he wants to hear good old-timey records, they're easily available to him." Do we take it he'd rather not comment on the Wallflowers' music? He laughs, either at your discomfiture or his, and – honest to Pete – the phone rings. (He can't help it if he's lucky.) OK, so has he heard Counting Crows, whose "Mr. Jones" alludes to his Ballad of a Thin Man and has the line "I want to be Bob Dylan"? "I have heard them," he says, "but I get them mixed up with somebody else." The few things he catches on the radio anymore sound "weak and hopeless" – and disposable. "The top stars of today, you won't even know their names two years from now. Four, five years from now, they'll be obliterated. It's all flaky to me."

This is the marketplace to whose vagaries he's committing Time Out of Mind. It's the first collection of his own new songs in six years – some Dylan-watchers feared there might never be another one – and maybe the best since 1975's Blood on the Tracks. His last two records,

Good as I Been to You (1992) and the Grammy-winning World Gone Wrong (1993), were solo acoustic versions of blues and folk songs; Time Out of Mind should appeal to a wider audience. It's far more accessible than such thorny later masterworks as Infidels (1983) – though it may also be his darkest record ever.

Producer Daniel Lanois, who also worked on Dylan's 1989 Oh Mercy, says he "asked Bob to step into the future" with such technological conveniences as tape-looped rhythm tracks. Dylan hoped to push back the clock. He structured one song around a guitar line in the Memphis Jug Band's 1929 KC. Moan, and he wanted his vocals to pack the punch of old recordings. "Bob would say to me, 'Little Richard's voice really cuts'." (In his 1959 Hibbing, Min., high-school yearbook, Robert Zimmerman said his ambition was "to join the band of Little Richard.") Both the forward-looking Lanois and the backward looking Dylan got their way.

Time Out of Mind is a spare, spooky sounding album, its lyrics brutally plainspoken instead of "Dylanesque": "My sense of humanity has gone down the drain," he sings in Not Dark Yet. It's about hopelessly lost love, about endless wandering – its first three songs begin with the singer walking – about an aging man's increasing distance from his world. "I got new eyes/Everything looks far away." The landscape is hot and arid, and though there's no one around, he's "beginning to hear voices" and "listening to every mind-polluting word." Dylan's own voice sounds appropriately murky, ravaged, distorted. "We treated the voice almost like a harmonica" says Lanois, "when you over-drive it through a small guitar amplifier."

Hard-core Dylan freaks can be contrary; they may join the crowd and proclaim Time Out of Mind the long-awaited best since-Blood, or they may find it too accessible. But the last song, the 16½ minute Highlands, should poleax everybody: it's a Thurber daydream with a Beckett narrator ("talking to myself in a monologue"), a Robert Burns refrain and a hypnotic guitar hook from Charlie Patton. In this funny, grim, crepuscular saga, the yearning for human connection gives way, with regret, to a yearning for transcendence. "Nobody knew what to make of it," says Dylan. Lanois, for better or worse, talked him out of a 21 minute version.

"It is a spooky record," says Dylan, "because I feel spooky. I don't feel in tune with anything." Yet he's proud of having registered his ambivalence and alienation so nakedly. "I don't think it eclipses anything from my earlier period. But I think it might be shocking in its bluntness. There isn't any waste. There's no line that has to be there to get to another line. There's no pointless playing with somebody's brain. I think it's going to reach the people it needs to reach, and the ones it doesn't, maybe they'll come along another day."

Some 50 years ago Dylan's work mattered more intensely to more people than anyone's does today. "He not busy being born is busy dying," he sang, and young people yearning for a role model and an imaginary friend hung on every word as he took on and shucked off persona after persona: the new Woody Guthrie, the voice of the Movement, the rock-and-roll Fellini, the poet of the bad trip and the doomed love affair, the minimalist mystic, the back-to-basics country boy. Fans flattered themselves that they were going through the same changes. "I never figured my music to blend into the culture in any kind of way," Dylan says now. But back then it was hard to tell whether he was mirroring '60s youth culture or actually creating it. He offered ready-to-wear attitudes and ready-to-cherish slogans. "Even the President of the United States sometimes must have to stand naked." "Leave your stepping-stones behind." And – paradoxically – "Don't follow leaders."

Dylan's early political songs – The Times They Are a-Changin', Masters of War – belong to their era but the electric music he invented in the mid-'60s is still in our faces. He set modern poetry – confessional, gnomic, comic, denunciatory, prophetic, visionary – to ecstatically danceable rock and roll. John Lennon said Dylan's music transformed the Beatles; today, everyone from

R.E.M. to Beck to sedulously unlistenable art-metal bands shrieking out Tourettean lyrics over chainsaw guitar is doing what he made thinkable.

Dylan insists he's not a poet – "Wordsworth's a poet, Shelley's a poet, Allen Ginsberg's a poet" – and doesn't play rock and roll. Even back when the Beatles and the Rolling Stones were recycling blues and R&B as pop music, he had his doubts about the whole enterprise. "Part of me fell for it, but part of me didn't. The best part of me didn't fall for it at all." These days, he only listens to the old-timers, and he treasures the personal encounters he had. Big Joe Turner "on his last legs," walking with a cane, singing in one more club. Lonnie Johnson – "when he walked into the room, there was an eeriness about him" – showing him guitar fingerings. "I remember all those old guys I saw. They live in my head. I can't get rid of them."

If he's adamant these days about seeing himself as their descendant and not a modernist genius for whom they were samples in the mix, who can blame him? Fans imagine the man who wrote It Ain't Me, Babe and Desolation Row and Gotta Serve Somebody as a demigod – or a Martian. "But I'm not the songs," he says. "It's like somebody expecting Shakespeare to be Hamlet, or Goethe to be Faust. If you're not prepared for fame, there's really no way you can imagine what a crippling thing it can be." The will that got him here in the first place has kept him practicing his art—which he insists is simply a "craft" or a "trade" – but he's often about this close from giving it up. "Some days I get up and it just makes me sick that I'm doing what I'm doing. Because basically – I mean, you're one cut above a pimp. That's what everybody who's a performer is. I have this voice in my head saying, 'Just be done with it'."

But what else would he do? "Oh, man!" he cries, and twists around in his chair to look out the window. There's a beach out there. Blue sky. "What wouldn't I do?"

Ten years ago, Dylan says, "I'd kind of reached the end of the line. Whatever I'd started out to do, it wasn't that. I was going to pack it in." Onstage, he couldn't do his old songs. "You know, like how do I sing this? It just sounds funny." He goes into an all-too-convincing imitation of panic: "I can't remember what it means, does it mean – is it just a bunch of words? Maybe it's like what all these people say, just a bunch of surrealistic nonsense." When the Grateful Dead took him on tour in 1987, Jerry Garcia urged him to try again. "He'd say, 'Come on, man, you know, this is the way it goes, let's play it, it goes like this.' And I'd say, 'Man, he's right, you know? How's he gettin' there and I can't get there? And I had to go through lot of red tape in my mind to get back there."

Then, in October 1987, playing Locarno, Switzerland, with Tom Petty's band and the female singers he now says he used to hide behind, Dylan had his breakthrough. It was an outdoor show – he remembers the fog and the wind – and as he stepped to the mike, a line came into his head. "It's almost like I heard it as a voice. It wasn't like it was even me thinking it. I'm determined to stand whether God will deliver me or not. And all of a sudden everything just exploded. It exploded every which way. And I noticed that all the people out there – I was used to them looking at the girl singers, they were good-looking girls, you know? And like I say, I had them up there so I wouldn't feel so bad. But when that happened, nobody was looking at the girls anymore. They were looking at the main mike. After that is when I sort of knew: I've got to go out and play these songs. That's just what I must do." He's been at it ever since.

On the beastly hot Labor Day weekend of 1997, he ends his post hospital tour with an outdoor show in Kansas City, Mo. It's the usual crowd: '60s geezers, and kids with backwards caps, halter tops or granny dresses, nose studs, faux tattoos, T-shirts advertising a range of loyalties from Beck to Phish. What he sees from up here onstage is a floodlit ocean of faces and bare, swaying arms; he can smell the incense sticks someone in his crew sets burning in buckets of sand. He starts with Absolutely Sweet Marie and moves on to a slinky It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry, to the Stanley Brothers' Stone Walls and Steel Bars, to a stately Like a Rolling Stone, in which his electric guitar tangles up with counter melodies from guitarist Larry Campbell and pedal-steel player Bucky Baxter in a sweetly chiming, wildly raving choir. When he comes off after the last encore, you congratulate him and touch his shoulder. His jacket's soaked.

He knows what they say about his concerts. 'Oh, he's massacring the songs, there's no way of knowing what you're going to get when you go see a Dylan show, blah blah blah.' It's true, to a certain extent. But OK, so that show wasn't any good. Doesn't matter. There's tomorrow. In fact, he's been reworking his songs in concert since he began touring with the Band in 1966, he calls the familiar recorded versions merely "blueprints." He'll distil a verse of Mr. Tambourine Man to just two or three notes, followed up by a couple of choruses on guitar, repeating a single three-note pattern over each of the changing chords. When he's on, there's no place you'd rather be.

True, he's muffed his share of big moments, like his 1985 appearance at Live Aid with Keith Richards, Ron Wood and at least one horribly out-of-tune guitar. He's too self-contained, too inward, to come across on TV or video. But now that every twerp with a stylist wants to be an icon, it's enormously appealing that Dylan doesn't have an act together. Fans affectionately post his curious onstage obiter dicta on the Internet: "On bass guitar tonight, Tony Garnier. I'm not gonna say nothin' about Tony except that he once tried to milk a cow with a monkey-wrench." If there's a hint of condescension here – jeez, what a character – it surely beats being Poet of His Generation. "I don't like to think of myself in the highfalutin area," says Dylan. "I'm in the burlesque area."

Huh? Burlesque? Oh. Old timey lowlife entertainment. Standing naked in front of strangers. He's not a poet? Fine. But that's a hell of a word.

The old songsters Dylan reveres are gone now, but their music lives. He can never again be the sweet-faced young man on the cover of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan (1963), walking on a snowy Manhattan street with a sweet-faced girl clinging to his arm. But he's still the man who said, in the notes to that album, "I don't carry myself yet the way that Big Joe Williams, Woody Guthrie, Lead belly and Lightnin' Hopkins have carried themselves. I hope to be able to someday." Not long ago, he saw a dance performance, to songs he'd cut in the early '60s, and didn't recognize his own voice. "I said, 'What's this? This is incredible.' I thought it was some obscure person. But it wasn't; it was me. I'll have somebody get a copy and send it to you. You'll be amazed." Not at how terrific he was; that's not what he means. He means, That kid was on to something. He means, A lot of water's gone over the dam.

"We try and we try and we try to be who we were," he says. "That's why everybody who went down went down." Is he talking about the dead-rock-star pantheon he's refused to join? "People we all know," he answers. "Who just – went down. Into the ground. Or scattered in the air, wherever they are. Sooner or later you come to the realization that we're not who we were. So then what do we do?" His whole career has been a series of temporary answers. The latest answer's on his new record: you keep putting one foot in front of the other. "I'm walking," the first song begins, "through streets that are dead." It's one of the great Bob Dylan opening lines. How many roads must a man walk down? It's the darkest one yet. But the point is, he's walking.

4 October 1997
London Press Conference, Metropolitan Hotel, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1135-1147.

On the afternoon of October 4th 1997, the day before his concert at Wembley Arena, Dylan gave a press conference for a small and select band of journalists from main-land Europe (Denmark, Germany, Italy, France, Holland, Spain, Norway and Portugal, by all accounts). Like the Times on Saturday interview, this session took place in the Metropolitan Hotel. Individual accounts of the interview have appeared in Der Spiegel and Afton Bladet [translations of these in ISIS 75] as well as Les Inrockuptibles and Zoo magazine [translated in Dignity 13 & 14 respectively]. An English language version subsequently appeared in the February 1998 edition of Mojo and this is the version presented below. Ideally, I would have preferred to use a tape transcript but I've not had access to one.

Here's how Morten Steiniche describes the press conference in his Zoo article.

> I am getting better now. I've been forced to relax for some time, but with every passing day I am getting better.
>
> That's his first words. The rest will come in a moment. But first a little about him: There's no one gasping as the door opens and he enters the sitting room in the luxury suite in the Metropolitan Hotel where I, a German, an Italian, a French, Dutch, Spanish, Norwegian and a Portuguese journalist are sitting and waiting. He is slightly bent, is wearing a blue striped silk shirt, a white T-shirt, black trousers with a white belt and black shoes. He is unshaved. The Dutch journalist, who in the bar was entertaining us with his impressive indifferent encyclopaedia of anything in Dylan's life, had guessed that he would be wearing sunglasses. He is not. Instead he's looking mildly at us, saying hello as he offers each of us his hand. Dylan is 56, and considering his tough life, the strangest thing looking at him at close range, is that he doesn't look older than he is. He doesn't look younger either. Just different from what you are used to from pictures and from concerts. Close up you can see the lines on the face and the grey hairs that have started to pop up here and there in his tousled hair. But first and foremost he just looks quite ordinary. Such a man you probably wouldn't notice if you meet him on the street.
>
> The interview lasts about three quarters of an hour. In the first quarter of an hour he sits bent over and is nervously pressing together the palms of his hands, but then he starts to relax just a little. For a short moment he leans back in the sofa, but most of the time he's surrounded by that restlessness that has characterised most of his career and life.

The Mojo 'exclusive' is the longest and most exhaustive. It is described as "The Mojo Interview" and the introduction states that "...he tells Serge Kaganski". There is no mention of the fact that this is just another re-hash of the Press Conference as has already appeared in various incarnations. Despite this "con", the interview which appears in Mojo is the best of all those so far published. It leaves out nothing that is in the other interviews and adds further comment, although nothing really substantial (with the exception of the extracts below). It is almost identical to the article in Les Inrockuptibles but this is hardly surprising because the latter was also penned by Kaganski.

Anyway, here's what Kaganski had to write in Mojo 51.

AFTER A FEW MINUTES you forget you're with a legend. In those first moments of meeting, of course, you sponge in all the details: from the ground up, cowboy boots, classically tailored black pants, Western-style shirt, greyed hair, and on his once-more lean face all the wrinkles due a man of 56 recently hospitalised after a major heart scare. A very slight man even in his prime, he looks surprisingly strong. His handshake is soft, though not the boneless, dead fish non-grip of repute, and the famous pale-blue stare is undimmed in its intensity: when Bob Dylan fixes you full-beam you know exactly how it feels to be looked all the way through.

Yet, for all the professionally focused attentiveness, Dylan's chuckling affability and downhome insistence he's merely a minstrel plying an old-fashioned trade gradually relax the sense of occasion that both his cultural stature and the rarity value of an interview initially demand. He does not speak in riddles or tongues, nor otherwise does he block, shock, knock or lock one up (to misquote a phrase). To talk to Bob Dylan is not an honour but a pleasure.

SK: How close did you get to Elvis last time you were in the hospital?

BD: I'm getting better now, but I had a severe setback for a while. I seem to be getting better every day.

SK: Would you be admitted to the choir that Elvis has there?

BD: Oh, absolutely.

SK: Why did you choose Daniel Lanois to produce Time Out Of Mind?

BD: Well, we more or less chose each other. We worked together before on Oh Mercy and it worked out pretty well. We both have an understanding of what we wanted to do.

SK: What do you expect from a record producer?

BD: Somebody who can differentiate between what to play and what not to play. What type of song it is, and what the background of the song is. Someone to allow the song to come out in its entire form, rather than short-circuiting the song some place along the line, and then what happens is neither satisfying to me or the producer.

SK: Some people didn't care for the sound on your previous collaboration, Oh Mercy.

BD: Yeah, well Lanois has this sound in him. He doesn't do it all the time, but he has it in him to produce this, and I knew that.

SK: The record sounds more natural, more in the spirit of your live performances.

BD: That's right. Live performances are misreported. It seems like they lean on what my interpretation of my own song is. Sometimes to listen to the reviewers is like listening with an ear that's 20 years old or older. Having to grasp my kind of stage show in a competitive nature isn't really the correct way to do it because there's nothing to compare it to out there. The influences are completely different than whatever the popular music trends are.

SK: So what are those influences?

BD: Real simple – music from the '20s and '30s, and then maybe '50s. A very limited influence. Just American folk music and maybe rockabilly type music from the '50s, but no rock n' roll. I don't really feel like I've even been influenced by rock n' roll in terms of the Larry Williams-type rock n' roll or the pure rock n' roll form.

SK: Do you listen to the radio today?

BD: I do listen to it, but...

SK: When you listen to the radio today, do you get depressed?

BD: No, I do listen to the radio if I can find something to listen to, but personally, I listen to old-time radio shows. The shows that I actually listened to when I was growing up, they seem to be coming back. Like feeder groups, things like that.

SK: For example, you catch a tune by Jon Bon Jovi, would you recognise it?

BD: Not really, no.

SK: Not even contemporary artists like Bruce Springsteen?

BD: Well, Bruce is like a brother to me, so he's defined his music in my mind a little differently than a typical hard rock... I don't much listen to that.

SK: How about today's soul-type artists like Maxell?

BD: Not really. I think that the rap music is in a more pure form connected to blues than the performers who derive their music from Marvin Gaye or Stevie Wonder or somebody like that. You know, Stevie Wonder is still performing, so for that type of music, he's prominent.

SK: Is it true that Stevie taught you how to sing like yourself on We Are The World?

BD: Yeah, I'd forgotten and Stevie reminded me, that's right.

SK: On your album, the song Highlands seems very improvised. How well prepared are you when you go into the studio?

BD: Well, I think that long rambling talking thing... I think I've recorded things like that before, real early on. In that type of form, a person can say whatever they want because the form is simple. I wouldn't say it was improvised, but a lot of different thoughts were connected in a lot of different ways that might necessarily not be what they seem to be on the paper when they were written. This is like thoughts, you know, that could be connected over a two-month period of time.

SK: Do you have a feeling how a song should sound from beginning to end?

BD: Yeah, with that song it was pretty much what you hear. It was basically just a 12-bar song and could have gone this way or that way. It could have been a song that was sung or talked or whatever.

SK: Was it easier when you kept somebody like Sam Shepard as a collaborator?

BD: We'd find ourselves in a room with different people of different types with Sam. I wouldn't say it would be any easier, but it would be probably less... meaningless.

SK: How about more inspirational?

BD: Yeah, well, when you can find somebody to write songs with that's compatible, there's no question that you can do it quicker and probably more efficient than when you're left to your own self.

SK: How come an experience like this seems to be unrepeatable?

BD: I don't know. Sam does his thing. He's a playwright and I'm on the road, so we don't see each other all that much.

SK: You defined rock n' roll as something that's hard and smooth at the same time. What's the definition of the blues?

BD: It seems like such a simple structure, but it's an ideal form to say anything you want to say in its pure form. I don't know what the blues are. I don't know who has them and who doesn't have them, but I'm not sure people can even identify with them in today's rat-race world. To me, the blues are a more rural, agrarian type of thing. And even when they're taken to the big city, they still remain that way only pumped up with electricity. That's the thing: I mean, we're listening to all this music today, it's all electricity. Electric guitars, electric bass, electric synthesizers – it's all electronic. You don't really feel somebody breathing, you don't feel their heart in it. The further away you get into that, the less you're going to be connected to the blues. The blues to me is just a pure form, like old country music.

SK: How did you connect to the blues, out there in Minnesota?

BD: Well, America was tied in with the radio when I grew up. At that time, disc jockeys could play what they wanted to play. They don't do that any more, really.

SK: Were radio stations up there playing the blues?

BD: Radio stations were all over. It was a very large area and the transmitters could transmit thousands of miles. Look at Jimi Hendrix – he grew up in Seattle, but he got the same thing. The radio connected everybody like Orpheus or something. That's not so any more. I don't know when that disappeared, but now it's a homogenised sound everywhere you go. When I grew up, that was what you listened to.

SK: When you first tuned in – a revelation?

BD: Oh, yeah.

SK: Do you remember it?

BD: No, I don't really, because I don't really remember who was around at that time. There was a singer around named Johnnie Ray. He was popular and we knew he was different. He knew he was dynamic and different and really had heart and soul. He was an anomaly. He was stuck in there with Perry Como and Patti Page. I remember thinking he really could make you feel something. After that, I started listening to country music. I don't know how old I was, but there was Hank Williams and we used to get the Grand Ole Opry, too. What connected America was the radio. I can't stress the importance of that enough. In the '50s, especially.

SK: Did you develop your singing style after the radio of the '50s?

BD: Not really. I started listening to rural folk music after I left home or even before that. I think I developed my style through listening to Woody Guthrie. An intentional style.

SK: When did you decide that you would be a singer and a musician?

BD: I don't remember back that far. I don't remember ever doing anything else.

SK: On the new record, your voice sounds very strong.

BD: I always have had a problem making records because my idea of making records is to have the right song and deliver it the right way with the right instrumentation so that it moves me. Technology is not really my friend. It just takes it and trivialises my particular style of music. It squeezes it and shapes it into its own kind of form and would like me to sound like these groups that you mentioned because technology serves all these other kind of people. The technology is part of the group.

SK: But you had the help of a producer who knew technology, Daniel Lanois.

BD: Anyone can make a record that sounds this way, but making a record that sounds this way – that's not going to serve everybody either. It probably won't work for most people because I have a very limited range. I try to understand a song as well as I can before I perform it. I won't want to record a song that I don't feel is a part of me.

SK: Do you get bored easily in the studio?

BD: Yeah.

SK: Do you get bored in general playing the songs you played over 30 years ago?

BD: Well, for me the songs are alive. I don't get bored singing the songs because they have a truth to them. They have a life to them. And it changes from night to night, any old kind of way that I want to play them.

SK: It can pain people who just want to hear Like A Rolling Stone like they remember it on the record.

BD: I know, but like I said before, these songs on my early records, they're more like blueprints. I can't play them all because every one of these records has a different band on them. Every one of these records has a different instrumentation. I'd need a hundred people to play every song exactly like it was on the record.

SK: You're touring.

BD: Well, that's all I do. It's just natural to me.

SK: Can we expect a European tour later?

BD: I hope so. We've toured Europe a lot in the last 10 years. We were always here and there. I don't usually tour with a particular record. My records aren't souvenirs for a particular tour that's out there.

SK: How never-ending is never-ending?

BD: I don't know why people talk about never-ending, because I don't really consider myself on tour. We just go out and play a certain amount of shows every year, so it isn't really a tour. It could stop any time. Part of me doesn't want to do it at all. Part of me would just like to be done with it all.

SK: Do you think Woody would have done it this way if he had a chance to cross oceans?

BD: Well, he lived and performed at a much different time than this. There wasn't any massive occasion of Woody Guthrie music, don't forget.

SK: You're playing more and more lead guitar in a style mixing between Django Reinhardt and Link Wray.

BD: That's a good way of putting it.

SK: Is it because you want to explore the songs further?

BD: No. You can't even call my guitar playing guitar playing. Coming out of the folk school, it has a certain kind of momentum to the rhythm of it, but outside of that, my guitar playing just plays with the drums. In my group, the drummer is the lead guitar player. I play on the structure of where the drum plays, and that's all I do. It's almost like a horn. I don't want to be known as a lead guitar player and I wouldn't assume a position like that, but nobody's going to play that part that I want to hear being played. I've tried years and years to get somebody to play it, but nobody wants to stick to that particular style because it's too simple or something.

SK: Do you practice your guitar playing?

BD: I do practice, every chance I get. But then, we play every night, so that's practice, too.

SK: Of all the '60s stars, you're the one who tours most. What makes you still want to go up there? What gives you the energy?

BD: The songs do. I don't think there is anybody playing the type of songs that we're playing. That's all. The same way with The Rolling Stones, but aren't they touring now?

SK: They tour every six or seven years, but you're like a hobo.

BD: Yeah, you can look at it that way, but it isn't that way at all. It's more like a job, it's a craft, it's a trade.

SK: The hardest working man in show business?

BD: No, not yet

SK: These days there are three generations of people at your shows. Does that amaze you?

BD: I don't know, faces are all faces to me. Human beings are just a whole race of people. I can't tell who's who or how old anybody is. I would never even hazard a guess.

SK: Do you release new records to give new generations some songs of their own?

BD: Yeah, but like I said, to me it's a trade. I do this like you all are journalists. I do the same thing. You go night after night, day after day, onto the next story. Well, I do the same thing, I'm just onto the next town.

SK: Years ago you said that sometimes it feels only one better than being a pimp.

BD: Well, unfortunately there is a nature of that. Yeah, I do feel that way. Performing's all the same. When you're up on-stage and you're looking at a crowd and you see them looking back at you, you can't help but feel like you're in a burlesque show. I don't care who you are. Pavarotti might feel the same way, I don't know. I would think that part of him sincerely does.

SK: But you can still do it with soul even if there is a commercial side to the job.

BD: I don't know. I don't know about doing it with soul. Do it with whatever talent God gave you. I'm not sure if it's got anything to do with being soulful or not.

SK: Did your collaboration with The Grateful Dead change your approach to your career as a performer?

BD: Absolutely. That was a turning point for me, playing with the Dead.

SK: What did it teach you?

BD: Well, it taught me to look inside these songs I was singing that, actually at the time of that tour, I couldn't even sing. There were so many layers and so much water had gone round, that I had a hard time grasping the meaning of them, although the Dead didn't. They found great meaning in them and this really made me extremely curious as to why they could and I couldn't.

SK: How could you not understand your own songs?

BD: Well, on a level of musicianship and a level of concentration, a level of not so much verbally understanding literally what they're about but understanding the spirit of them...

SK: You mean the lyrics?

BD: The spirit of the songs is what had been getting further and further away from me. Probably because I had been playing these songs with a lot of different bands, and they might not have understood them so well, you know what I mean? And it influences you. I know it influenced me until I started playing with the Dead and I realised that they understood these songs better than I did at the time.

SK: Had you also forgotten who you were when you were young?

BD: I had forgotten about that long before that.

SK: The New York Times implied that you are sometimes envious of 17-year-olds who come to your shows.

BD: I don't know about that. Seventeen years old – I don't know how old anybody is. I've got grandkids. Youth is youth. Either you're there or you're not there.

SK: Is it a problem for you to connect with the youth?

BD: No, that's a different culture of people. Like I tell you, I've got grandkids and they have their own performers they follow. I perform for people who understand my sentiment.

SK: On the new album, there's a line, "I wish someone would come and put back the clock for me..."

BD: Don't we all feel that way! Is that something that's just peculiar to me! Does any body else feel that way! I know I do. I'd like to start my life over again.

SK: That's what you're doing with your whole career, always starting over again.

BD: I don't know, you start over again you might be another person... You know, learn another trade, marry a different girl, live in a different place.

SK: Throughout your career, you've reinvented yourself several times. And people like you for it.

BD: Well, that's human nature.

SK: Was that planned or did it just happen?

BD: Everything in life just happens.

SK: But sometimes you sit back and plan.

BD: No, things just happen.

SK: And not necessarily for a purpose?

BD: Yeah, there could be some great divine purpose. I'm sure there is. In fact, I'm pretty positive everything has a divine purpose.

SK: Do you ever feel like the songs that you write are already written and floating around in the universe and you pick them up with the right intent?

BD: Woody Guthrie said that. As for as I know, he is the originator of that thought. And in a certain sense, there's a great deal of veracity to that.

SK: Did he believe there was a divine hand involved in songwriting?

BD: I don't know. I know he was a prolific writer. There are papers that he's written that you can go see now in the library... many many, many songs that were never recorded, bits and pieces of songs that he had no tune or melody for, poetry.

SK: He once wrote around 30 songs in 10 days. That's more like craftsmanship and hard work.

BD: It seems to me that you can definitely call what he did craftsmanship and hard work. I don't think he sat around and pondered what he was writing about.

SK: Are you a fast writer?

BD: Lately, no. I'd say that this latest album, from its incarnation until the finished product, bits and pieces here and there... maybe two years.

SK: Were there more songs recorded which you now wish to release?

BD: There are other songs and they probably will find their way onto some other record.

SK: How do you make sure that new musicians understand your songs? Do you audition them?

BD: I don't really audition anybody. Usually people come to the band and we know who they are.

SK: How was playing before the Pope?

BD: Oh, great show.

SK: You played Forever Young.

BD: I think so.

SK: Today you shake hands with the Pope, yet 25 years ago you were the leader of a counterculture...

BD: Maybe a different Pope.

SK: Do you think the human mind can understand the past and future, or are they both illusions that can be manipulated?

BD: That's a deep, unfathomable question. In a certain sense, everything probably still exists from the days of Dante back to the days of Moses. It's alive, it's just living in an invisible world – to us. We only perceive what we see, but we can't see into an invisible world. And in that world everything that ever was, I wouldn't be surprised if it still exists. People are the same, aren't they? We just live in a different time, a different culture. Feelings don't really change.

SK: On your new album, the lyrics are very plain spoken, a long way from your poetic style of the'60s. Why do you change your style?

BD: My lyric style from those years, that changed a while ago, I think.

SK: The new album's very melancholy.

BD: Well, there's a great disparity between the album and me.

SK: Many listeners have marvelled that the album is so sombre of tone.

BD: I don't think it's somber of tone at all. Look in the newspaper – what's happening in Bosnia is somber of tone. Or South America or the Middle East or something, if you want to see somber tones.

SK: You talk about lost love.

BD: Well, I sang about lost love on my first album. I think this relates more to my first album than the last album.

SK: Do you here any personal favourites on the new album?

BD: No.

SK: What did you think of Billy Joel bashing out Make You Feel My Love?

BD: Billy Joel's a very dynamic artist and he can hear things in a song because he's also a songwriter. He managed to probably convey that song in a different way than me. Nevertheless, he got something out of that song I would have never dreamed of myself. That's what happens when you write a song, somebody can definitely interpret it a different way than the person who wrote it.

SK: How did he come to record it?

BD: Well, all these songs were given to my record company before this particular album was released so they could see what I was recording and decide whether they wanted to release it or not, because we were recording a lot of stuff. At a certain point we stopped recording and said, "Let's give this to the record company and see if they even want to release a record like this." I wasn't sure what was going to be on this record and what was not going to be on this record. Billy had heard this song, and at that time I wasn't really positive one way or another whether it was going to be included, so might as well let Billy do it.

SK: Did he hear a demo?

BD: I don't think there were any demos on these songs. We went in and recorded them exactly the way you're hearing them.

SK: When you write a line like, "My sense of humanity is going down the drain," does it express what you feel about the world today?

BD: It's just like Elvis Presley singing, "You ain't nothin' but a hound dog." Are you going to ask Elvis Presley, "is that the way you feel about somebody!" You change from one minute to the next. The lesson here is to capture what you're feeling at a certain moment. That's what we all have to do. We might change after an hour or a day. But that's the important thing. So whatever's being said on this collection of songs, it's all true.

SK: Does it annoy you that people read into your lyrics so much that isn't there?

BD: No. It wouldn't be as annoying to me as it probably would be for someone else who actually has to take the time and trouble to actually go through it and decide what it is they think the singer is feeling or saying. I seem to be the only one who has this type of particular attitude. I don't think you have these attitudes on some of these other singers you were just mentioning.

SK: You always resist this idea of being an icon of the '60s or a spokesman for whatever generation. It's always meant to be a very big compliment.

BD: I don't consider it a compliment. I think that's just another word for washed-up has-been.

SK: It's better to be a has-been than a never-was.

BD: Well, that's debatable.

SK: Is it a burden sometimes to be Bob Dylan?

BD: Well, it would be easier for me to be me than it would be for me to be you. I don't know how I would deal with being somebody else, that would be more of a hardship than being me. I think that's true for anybody.

SK: You've said that fame can be very crippling.

BD: It can be. It doesn't have to be, but at certain times fame is something you'd like to forget about. At certain times, all of us who are famous just want to be left alone.

SK: John Bauldie, who put together the magazine about you, The Telegraph, died in 1996. Do you think it's right to continue?

BD: (Pause) I don't know. I'm not involved. It's not like they're fan magazines. I don't really have any input into any of these magazines they put out. I've seen a few of them. They usually interview people who know me or think they know me or barely know me, but what can you do? It's like reading about somebody else that never existed.

SK: There's a photograph of you playing in the Lone Star Café with Levon Helm, Rick Danko and a harmonica player where you seem to be having great fun. It that the intimate sort of setting where you'd ideally like to work!

BD: Oh, that's where I started out, yeah. Small clubs. I don't remember playing that particular club. I remember playing with The Band.

SK: Are you connected with what's happening in world affairs and how it bears upon music?

BD: No, I can't say that I am.

SK: Back in the '60s you were.

BD: Maybe, but I don't feel it revolved around anything but my working performance as a musician and a singer. Everything in my world revolves around the particular type of music that I love.

SK: Do you think the popular song is no longer a means to carry messages about the state of the world?

BD: No. I think we read newspapers for that function or watch TV.

SK: That's very passive.

BD: That's the nature of the world, to be passive. We go to football games and somebody else is playing football, we go to see soccer games – and we're not playing.

SK: Back in the '60s, though, people could play politics and change things.

BD: Well, maybe, but I don't know of any music that has. I know of a time when they say it has, but it wasn't in the 1960s. In America.

SK: Did you ever think you could change politics with music?

BD: No. If I wanted to do that I guess I would have gone to school or Harvard or Yale and tried to be a politician or something.

SK: Why write a song like Masters Of War, then?

BD: Er... that's up to me... er, that's a very non-political song. I don't know what politics is, to tell you the truth. I don't know the difference of right-wing or left-wing. I don't know those differences. I can be whatever they call conservative, I can be completely on the right on something which somebody else thinks is right; and I can be completely on the left on something. I go back and forth. I can hold the same view on the same thing from two or three different angles.

SK: Crosby, Stills and Nash are convinced they helped end the war in Vietnam.

BD: They did! I think they did (laughs). They were those kinda performers.

SK: Do you still see your peers from the '60s like Crosby, Stills And Nash, The Beatles or The Rolling Stones?

BD: Yeah. Occasionally. Everyone who's still around, yeah.

SK: Do you look back to the '60s?

BD: No, and I don't really know anybody who does that. I know performers who started out with me – Rolling Stones, Crosby, Stills And Nash, whatever – we don't ever talk about the '60s. Or the '70s. I think it's more important for other people who were around then. But do young people talk about things that happened over 30 years ago?

SK: They do.

BD: They do?

SK: They are fascinated by the '60s because it was a time when people could change something, unlike now when people sit back thinking they can't.

BD: I think it was the idea that you could change something back then that was more important than actually doing it. You felt like something was happening. That idea is missing now. Ideas are very strong. Ideas can't be killed.

SK: You were nominated for the Nobel Prize for Literature.

BD: Yeah. It was too bad I didn't get it, haha. I wished I did. I don't know what it even is. I know it's a high, elevated honor. Nobel – isn't he the man who invented dynamite?

SK: Yes.

BD: OK... The Nobel Peace Prize!

SK: What, for you, is the distinction between a poet and a songwriter!

BD: Ooooh, man (chuckles). Well, songs can have an element of poetry in them. But a poem doesn't have to be defined, whereas a song must be defined. It must have a clear definition. I think a song is much more limiting than a poem. A poem is something open-ended and unlimited in scope. A song can't do that, just by the nature of a song. One important thing about 30 years ago, it was at the tail-end of the folk music scare, or whatever we call it, and it might have been more connected to poems because the advent of television was not so prominent, so people still did news kind of things in a song. Woody Guthrie was an exponent of that, talking about things that happened here, and then he could sing it over there before newspapers and TV got a hold of it. So people gathered information about songs, and if you could look into American folklore you can see that this is true all the way along the line. Everything momentous that happened in history was defined in a song. That's not so any more. People seem to know things and hear about things instantaneously, and a song doesn't have the same relevance. I think poems are the same kind of way. Great poetry can still be written from a particular point of view and still has relevance on top of the news, but a song can't do that any more.

SK: So you think that television and mass communication has destroyed the essence of popular songs?

BD: These type of songs, yeah. I know for a fact that if you go listen to the early part of the century and find 20 songs about the sinking of the Titanic, each one of them gives you a different point of view and each one of them is heartfelt. That's a popular event, the sinking of the Titanic. The murder of James A. Garfield, same way. A coal-mining disaster, same way. You can find songs written about all these subjects, from different angles.

SK: Do you cherish your reputation as the man who brought poetry to rock n' roll?

BD: I don't think about that one way or the other. I think that if I didn't do it, someone else probably would have. What I brought was the knowledge of that simplified music, which at the time I was starting out was not currently popular. People didn't know who Leadbelly was. They never heard Leadbelly, they didn't hear Blind Willie McTell, they never heard Woody Guthrie. Pop music is the same way today as it was when I was coming up: if someone is a serious musician, they don't listen to it, any more than we didn't listen to it when we were growing up; we just knew there was something in it that was false, and we could just leave it alone. That's why we listened to people like Leadbelly, because we knew they were telling the truth. And some way today, if you're a serious musician. I was a musician for years – I don't listen to it like a regular person would buy a record. To me, it's not entertainment.

SK: When did you first hear Harry Smith's folk anthology?

BD: I heard that particular record early on when it was very difficult to find these kind of songs. It was like today, if you go into a record store and you're a young musician and you're starting out and you know music is going to be your trade for the rest of your life, what do you look for? Well, at that time they didn't sell that record. It wasn't in the music stores. I imagine I heard it over at somebody's house, some older kind of person who had this record. That entire record company went over to the Smithsonian Institute, and the man who started that company, he didn't, I guess, sell a lot of records in the music stores, he sold them to libraries. That's where the wealth of folk music was, on that particular record. For me, on hearing it, was all these songs to learn. It was the language, the poetic language – it's all poetry, every single one of those songs, without a doubt, and the language is different than current popular language, and that's what attracted me to it in the first place.

SK: Could it have the same impact 45 years later?

BD: More so, even. Because if you can sing those songs, if you understand those songs and can perform them well, then there's nowhere you can't go. You have to start at the bottom, whatever your trade is. If you can find the bottom.

SK: A murder ballad by Dock Boggs is pretty close.

BD: Yeah, it doesn't get much more at the bottom than that.

SK: You once said you loved Charles Aznavour.

BD: I do. Very much so. I became aware of him in 1962. I actually saw him perform in New York because I'd seen a movie he was in called Shoot The Piano Player. I saw that movie a bunch of times because the snow part of it reminded me of back where I come from.

SK: It was Francois Truffaut's least successful movie, I think

BD: Well, everything about that movie I identified with. Everything. So, Charles Aznavour came to New York to play – and I was the first one in line for a ticket!

SK: The Wallflowers – like them?

BD: Absolutely. They're playing in a different time from me, and people ask me about that, but this is the time they' re playing in.

SK: Are you concerned about your son's career in music?

BD: Yeah. My initial thought was that I just didn't want to see him get roughed up. There's a lot of performers who've got parents who are in the same trade. We all know who they are.

SK: If reviews are really good, does that affect you any more?

BD: I've seen a few of them, but I don't really follow the reviews. I like to see them, but... I don't know. I've got so many records out anyway. I hope they're perceived well, and if they are, then it makes you feel it's all been worth it.

SK: Your song The Times They Are A-Changin' was used in a commercial for a Canadian bank: a problem?

BD: Not for me, haha. None of that is a problem for me. My problems aren't in that particular type of area.

SK: Where, then?

BD: They're on the other side of that... somewhere... but I don't have any problem with that kind of thing.

SK: Is it true you have a golf handicap of 17?

BD: Excuse me?

SK: Are you a golf player?

BD: Golf player? I've swung a club a few times, though I wouldn't know if I was a golf player. I swing it sideways.

SK: Would 17 be accurate?

BD: Pretty close.

SK: Do you still paint?

BD: I try. It's a very demanding thing to do, painting. Very intense, because I paint from real life, so it's very difficult, the preparation to paint.

SK: Why did you decide to call your record label Egyptian Records?

BD: As compared to what? I don't know. It just popped into my head at the time.

SK: What is the label's next project?

BD: We're going to do a Carter Family record, along the same lines as the Jimmie Rodgers record.

SK: What does Jimmie Rodgers mean to you?

BD: I personally identify with Jimmie Rodgers a great deal. Jimmie Rodgers was probably the singer even Woody Guthrie listened to. His voice, to me and probably a great deal of other singers, was a great identifiable voice that rose above the culture of the times.

SK: Everyone can sing a song by him without knowing it's his. Would you like to be remembered in the same way?

BD: I would be, but I don't think it's possible, because people identify me with the songs I write. They don't identify me on what I can do with a song that's already been written. I feel that that's just an area that I've never really been able to expound upon because I don't record that much. People expect me to record songs of mine that I've written. So that's my particular dilemma.

SK: You did two albums of songs written by others (Good As I Been To You and World Gone Wrong).

BD: Those were folk albums. And those songs were all public domain songs, they were not necessarily written songs – nobody knows who wrote them, if anybody did write them. Those particular songs evolved and are classified as folk music.

SK: So you can record songs you have not written.

BD: Yeah, but that's something that I did when I first started out, so I didn't feel I was covering anything new. I was just reminding people that these are the songs where my songs are derived from. In case they forgot.

SK: Did making these albums influence the writing of these new songs?

BD: In a sense, yeah. In a way they did. But I'm not sure what kind of importance... you know...

SK: Did those two albums help buy time to start writing again?

BD: Yeah, in a certain sense that's true also, because I didn't have anything. I had bits and pieces of songs at that particular time, but also I was concerned with how simple it was to make an album just with myself and nobody else. It was a challenge that I felt it was necessary for me to confront.

SK: It must have been liberating.

BD: It is. Very much so.

SK: Tempted to do it again!

BD: Yes. I would like to do that again. I would like to do that again with the sound we now know it's possible to get. We didn't have the sound down on... What we tried to do with this latest record is make a CD or whatever it is now in contemporary terms – which sounds like an old record you put on a record-player. Not necessarily an old record that's reprocessed and made into a CD, because, let's face it, all the stuff from the '20s and '30s and '40s and '50s has been reprocessed so it can fit onto a CD, and you don't get the impact that it had when you first heard it when we had to play it over a record player with a needle on a piece of plastic or whatever it is, and it had impact. Records today don't have impact, and that's a question of the sound of technology. I mean, how many bands have you heard where chainsaw guitars and sounds coming out of a drummer that's playing with 10 different drums and cymbals and you think it must be, like, so loud you can't contain that sound! And then when you hear it on CD it sounds all fuzzy, and it's not a true replica of what anybody sounds like. You go into any bar and hear a blues band and you'll be in some kind of way moved, but then you'll hear it on CD and wonder what you heard in the first place.

SK: So you don't listen to your old records on CD?

BD: I don't listen to my old records at all. Not at all.

SK: Why not?

BD: I don't really want to be influenced by myself. Or reminded by myself. Basically I don't want to be influenced by myself.

SK: You just want to move on?

BD: Yes. Onward. Onward forever.

SK: But you go back to the old music.

BD: Always. I don't think there's anything better than that.

SK: So the times they are a-changin'...

BD: But they're changing back!

I Feel Like Talkin' To Somebody

As published in ISIS #75, pp. 56-58

While in London for his recent UK concerts Bob Dylan agreed to meet with European media. Unlike the three recent US interviews that were conducted on a one-to-one basis, the London episode took the form of a small informal press conference.

The meeting was staged on Saturday October 4, at 3.00pm at the Metropole Hotel, London. The five journalists invited to attend were from Sweden, Norway, France, Germany and Italy, no-one from the UK press was present. The invitees sat around a table – at what has been dubbed a "round sofa" session – asking Dylan questions in turn. The duration of this questions & answers session was approximately 80 minutes.

At the time of going to print only two of the five interviews has been published, one each in Sweden and Germany. It should also be noted that these interviews have been translated from tapes of the original English conversation to either Swedish or German and then back into English. And although I have managed to obtain translations from two independent sources and have cross-checked them, it is almost certain that mistakes in translation will have occurred. We are currently trying to obtain an original tape from journalists present so that a full and accurate transcript can be published in a future ISIS. Interview one is from 'Der Spiegel'.

Q: Mr. Dylan, you nearly died this spring of an inflamed heart. How do you feel today?

BD: I'm getting better, gradually, hut for a long time I was forced to think some pretty serious thoughts.

Q: Did you think that Elvis had enlisted you in his heavenly choir?

BD: Absolutely!

Q: Your new album "Time Out Of Mind" is considered to be your best in more than twenty years. But it sounds bitter, dark and very lonely...

BD: I disagree. What's happening in Bosnia or in South America, that's dark and bitter.

Q: On "TOOM" you sing: 'Walking through streets that are dead' and 'there is less and less to say'; you complain 'My sense of humanity is going down the drain;' and you don't even care much for the women. While you don't care much for love you sing you have to live in 'the same old cage'.

BD: I dealt with unhappy relationships on my first album. People shouldn't take everything so literally. Elvis Presley once sang: 'You ain't nothing but a hound dog'. It would have been really stupid to ask Elvis if he meant that seriously. People change from one minute to the next. A record catches the atmosphere of that moment. An hour later, everything is different. Whatever anyone says about this collection of songs – it somehow turned out right.

Q: Your line to 'Don't follow leaders, watch the parking meters' was back then in the sixties a super trick because after that you were worshipped even more by a lot of your fans. You're considered to be an incorruptible artist who hates commerce, whose work is authentic and truthful.

BD: I sure would like to be spared the burden to muse about what my fans think about me or my songs. It's true, that I do seem to be one of the few artists who attract those kind of people.

Q: Since the middle of the sixties it seems that you have had enough of being the icon of the counterculture or even their mouth-piece.

BD: I don't take those titles as a compliment. Words like 'icon' or 'legend' are just another way to describe someone who is yesterday's news and who no-one wants to hear anymore.

Q: Is it getting to you to be Bob Dylan?

BD: It's easier to be me than someone else. But just like most famous people, I just want to be left alone.

Q: Are you still interested in politics?

BD: No. All I care about is my performance as a musician and a singer. Everything in my life revolves around the music that I love.

Q: Is it still possible nowadays to influence the world by songs? To be political by means of messages?

BD: No, that's what newspapers are for. If people want to have the world explained to them they should watch TV.

Q: That's a very passive approach.

BD: That's what we've come to. People go to the football stadium, but they don't play themselves anymore.

Q: Did you ever think you could be politically active through your songs?

BD: No, no, no. If that's what I had wanted to do, I would have gone to Harvard or Yale, and studied to become a politician.

Q: Your fellow performers Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young are convinced that they stopped the Vietnam war.

BD: I believe it. That's the kind of guys they were.

Q: How was it for you to be playing for the Pope in Bologna a few weeks ago?

BD: It was a wonderful show.

Q: Why?

BD: It just was.

Q: Isn't it strange that a great enemy of the establishment suddenly performs for the Pope?

BD: Why? he's not the same Pope as back then.

Q: So, in your view of the world there is still a past and a future?

BD: Sure, but people really haven't changed since Moses. Feelings don't change.

Q: Before the Pope you played your songs honestly and pure like on the record. Normally the audience should be aware that you might massacre your own songs. Are you bored to play your songs as close to the original as possible? Or do you want to punish your audience?

BD: The real problem is the critics. They come with ears that are still back in 1975 or even further back. But my songs have a life of their own, they have an inner truth and they change from night to night. That's why people don't recognise all of the songs. I have recorded my records at various points of my life, with various musicians using various instruments. If I was to play them all faithfully, I'd have to drag a hundred people up on the stage.

Q: At the end of the eighties you announced the so-called 'Never Ending Tour' and up until now you have performed about 150 times a year. Isn't that becoming just a little bit too much?

BD: It's my job, my craft, my trade. Standing on stage is to me as natural as breathing. Besides, I am the only one to sing these kind of songs anymore. Popular music is in the same state as when I started singing. If somebody is a serious musician, nobody listens to him. In the old days we were strong enough to look for people who told the truth.

Q: Recently you said: 'Sometimes I feel just a little bit above a pimp'.

BD: When you are up there and you look at the people and the people look back at you, like it or not, you have the feeling of being a Burlesque show. I am pretty sure Pavarotti gets the same feeling.

Q: Are the people in the audience in Vienna different from a crowd in San Francisco?

BD: When I'm up there, I just see faces. A face is a face, they are all the same.

Q: Do you envy the 17 year-olds in your audience for their youth?

BD: I'm a grandfather. I have grandchildren who like other singers. That's youth today. I play for people who understand my feelings.

Q: On your new record that sounds a bit darker. There you sing the line: 'I wish somebody would push back the clock for me'.

BD: Doesn't everybody feel that way? I 'd love to start my life over again, to learn a new craft, marry other women, live in other places.

Q: Isn't that just what you did during your career? In the early sixties you were the folk singer of the movement for civil rights. A few years later you took the electric guitar and sang 'Like a Rolling Stone', mocking the counterculture which had you for a hero. People yelled 'Judas' at you and you took to the countryside, got settled with a family and played country rock. In other words: during your career you always reinvented yourself and never stayed the way your fans wanted you to be.

BD: That's just human nature.

Q: But did you do that consciously or did it just happen?

BD: Everything in life just happens. That's the way life is; it happens.

Q: Without meaning or goal?

BD: I am sure that there's a great divine meaning behind it all.

Q: Where do your songs come from? Do they come to you just flying through the universe?

BD: The folksinger Woody Guthrie had that idea first and I think he's right.

Q: Which music is an influence to you these days?

BD: A simple music from the 20s & 30s and a little bit from the 50s. The influences are very limited: American folkmusic, Blues, a bit of Rockabilly. But no Rock n' Roll. I don't think Rock n' Roll ever was of any great importance to my work.

Q: Do you listen to the radio these days? Or are you annoyed by popmusic?

BD: I tune into old radio shows. Sometimes they play the theatre groups I grew up with. I think that's coming back.

Q: Would you recognise a contemporary popsong, for example a song by Bon Jovi?

BD: Not really, no.

Q: On your new record there is a song that lasts for over 16 minutes and is called 'Highlands'. It sounds as if it was improvised. How well do you prepare yourself before you enter the studio?

BD: It's been a long time since I recorded a song like 'Highlands'. I wouldn't say 'Highlands' was really improvised, but a lot of thoughts in it came out differently during the recording than the way they were written on paper. Actually it's just a simple blues that can go in one direction or another.

Q: In these cases, don't you wish sometimes you could work again with writer and musician Sam Shepard, who helped you with writing songs in the eighties?

BD: Well, in the course of life you find yourself with different people in different rooms. Working with Sam was not necessarily easier, but it was certainly less meaningless. In every case writing a song is done faster when you got someone like Sam and are not on your own.

Q: It seems, though, that you and Sam would not be able to work it out these days.

BD: Sam does his thing, I do mine. He is a writer and I am on the road. It's not that we see each other a lot.

Q: What does the blues mean to you?

BD: The blues? An extremely simple and open form in which you can say anything: but it's become rare. I don't even know if people know what to do with it in this world which has become a rat race. The blues stems from the land, from the cotton fields in the South. And it was taken into the big cities and charged with electricity. Today it has become electronic. You don't feel anymore that someone is breathing there or that there is still a heart there. And the farther away it gets, the less connected it is to what I call the blues. As I said, the blues is simple and it comes from the land, just like country music.

Q: You are from The North, from Minnesota, how did you get in touch with the blues?

BD: When I was young, America was connected above all by means of the radio. The radio was most important. You had stations who could play whatever they wanted. And all of this was broadcast over thousands of miles. Take Jimmy Hendrix, he grew up in Seattle. The radio connected us all. I don't know when they started to play all that pop, I only know that radio today is different. Someone like the singer Johnny Ray, who was kind of a leper back then, he wouldn't stand a chance today. Johnny Ray had a whole different kind of dynamics, he had heart and soul and he really wanted us to feel something when he sang.

Q: When did you decide that you – the white, Jewish son of a hardware store owner in a northern state of the USA – that you could also play music that made people feel things?

BD: I can't remember back that far, I cant remember ever doing anything other than sing, for that matter. But if there was someone back who influenced, consciously or not, it was the folksinger Woody Guthrie.

Q: What did strike you especially in Woody Guthrie?

BD: He worked extremely hard and wrote very much and writing was easy for him. He probably didn't have time at all to think about a song very long: being a socialist he wanted to bring the news very quick to the people. In those times, whenever a mine collapsed, songs were written about it instantly. But since we have television people all over the world know what has happened in an instant.

Q: Do you listen to your old songs when your at home?

BD: I never listen to my old stuff. I don't want to be reminded of myself or be an influence on myself. From now on, I'll only listen to...

Q: ...the old music?

BD: There's nothing better.

Q: The times they are a-changin'...

BD: ...but way back.

Q: Last year you sold your protest song The Times They Are A-Changin' to the Bank of Montreal, who used it in a commercial. Do you regret this?
BD: Not at all. I don't have any problem with that. Absolutely none.

Interview 2 by Jens Peterson. pub. 'Afton Bladet'
Q: How do you feel today?
BD: I feel better now, but I came to a serious halt for awhile. It's gets better day by day. I was in constant pain. Unbearable pain. That's all I can say.
Q: You have been called icon and legend and spokesman for a generation. Are these compliments?
BD: No, I don't see it as a compliment. Legend – that's just another word for washed-out has-been.
Q: On the record you sing that you want to turn back the clock.
BD: Don't we all feel like that? Surely it isn't just me, is it... Don't you feel that? I'd love to start my life over again. Learn a new trade. Marry me another girl. Live in a deferent place.

He doesn't listen to current pop music – Instead he goes back to the blues, country and folk music that once started him singing –

BD: When I grew up the radio was important. It was a revelation for me to hear that music on the radio. Like Johnny Ray was different. He had a heart. Then it was Hank Williams. We listened to Grand Ole Opry from Nashville. I cannot emphasise enough the importance of the radio.

He doesn't want to go on stage and sing the songs like they sounded on the records –

BD: My concerts are based on my interpretations of my own songs. The critics are listening with ears that are twenty years old.
Q: You play more and more lead guitar. A cross between Django Reinhardt and Link Wray.
BD: Ha ha, that's a good way of describe it. My guitar playing even be called lead guitar. It fits with my rhythm. In my band the drummer is the lead guitarist. I play off of him, like a wind instrument almost. Nobody else wanted to play those notes. I tried for years to get someone to do it, but it's too simple. So now I do it myself.

BD: The songs are alive to me. I never get tired of them. I never get bored of singing, the interpretations changes from night to night.
Q: When will the Never Ending Tour end?
BD: People keep saying that that, but I don't think we are tour all of the time. I do a certain amount of concerts every year. But it's not a constant never-ending tour. A part of me doesn't wanna do it at all. Just want to quit right away. Playing is a job. My trade. Like you're journalists. You are heading for the next news item, I'm heading for the next town.
Q: Do you like the Wallflowers?
BD: Absolutely. They play in a different era than I do. But I wouldn't mind playing with them.
Q: Do you take part in your sons career?
BD: My only concern in the beginning was that he would get hurt in the music business. Lots of people do get hurt.

BD: I don't know what politics are. I don't understand the difference between right and left. I can be conservative in one question and then to the left in another.

Q: You have been nominated for the Nobel prize BD: Yeah, too bad I didn't get it. Frankly, I'm not really sure what it is.
Q: The Nobel prize for literature.
BD: Yeah, I know it's considered an honor to get it – Nobel? Wasn't he the one that invented dynamite?
Q: Yes.
BD: OK.
Q: I read somewhere that your golf handicap is 17. Do you really play golf?
BD: Oh yeah, I swing a club now and then. [Dylan say laughing.] I don't know if I would call myself a golfer. – He swings his fists in the air as if he had a baseball bat -17? Yeah, that's probably pretty accurate.

We also learned from the article that Bob was in a fine relaxed mood. He laughed a lot and drank lots of espresso. He also said that he hoped to play Europe next year.

4 October 1997
Alan Jackson Interview, Metropolitan Hotel, London, England

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1149-1156.

During Bob's short tour of the UK in late September / early October 1997, he not only gave a mini press-conference, but also gave an exclusive interview to the British journalist Alan Jackson. The interview took place in a tenth-floor room of the Metropolitan Hotel on London's Old Park Lane. For a Dylan interview, the meeting was set up at relatively short notice – just three weeks. The interview was published in the magazine section of the Times On Saturday, dated November 15th 1997. It also appeared elsewhere – in the Australian Weekend Review supplement of December 27-28 1997 for example.

BOB DYLAN REVISITED

He's not political, couldn't care less about the Sixties, and has even taken up golf. In his first British interview of the decade, the voice of a generation tells Alan Jackson why he's stayed true to his real roots.

PERHAPS BECAUSE he is here among us so infrequently, our collective impressions of him are like snapshots, images formed at specific times and places, captured as if with a flashbulb and then frozen in time. In my own mind, three in particular hold sway.

There is the sweet-faced youth seen on the cover of 1960's The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, the one who was just about to capture the whole world's attention, his hands stuffed into jean pockets, body hunkered down into his jacket and braced against the cold, and hurrying through New York City snow with a laughing, long-haired, in-love girl on his arm.

Then there is the colossus of popular culture, the wiry-haired, hook-nosed, multi-million-dollar success story and media ubiquity, revered throughout the second half of the Sixties and into the early Seventies, mixing with the great and the good, and wryly assessing the world from behind dark glasses. He is secure in his genius, this early-to-middle-period Bob Dylan. Undisputed in it. And the iconic face that he presented to us back then is as representative of that part of the century, as much a retrospective summation of it as is Warhol's Marilyn or the two-colour poster of a bearded and eye-patched Che Guevara that once faced out from a million bedsit walls.

And then there is the latter-day picture, that of a grizzled and significantly older man, his legend undimmed his commercial standing diluted and (we fear it) his talent too. This is the Dylan who has released a series of indifferent albums to harsh reviews and similarly indifferent sales: who, and too many times, has made stumbling, bumbling concert appearances; who converted from the Judaism of his birth to born-again Christianity, then, more recently, back to no-one's-quite sure-what-and-he-won't-say. It is man we no longer really know or understand, and who (again, we fear it) looks increasingly to have lost the plot.

Each of these three snapshots is in my head when a door opens in a daylight-flooded tenth floor room at the Metropole (painfully fashionable, determinedly minimalist, this hotel on London's Old Park Lane seems an unlikely setting for our encounter) and in walks the 56-year-old reality. A slight, self-effacing man, he is dapper, even dandyish, in a horizontally striped, black-and-white silk shirt, black jeans, and shiny basketweave loafers. His face (he has only recently recovered from a life-threatening viral illness) is heavily lined, the skin putty-coloured, and framed by hyacinthine curls only lightly flecked with grey. It is like being faced with a Holy Trinity: he is all three of my Polaroid images in one, and yet none of them -something more.

He is also (and I was not anticipating this) a charming man. Bright-eyed. Softly-spoken. Infinitely more approachable than I had dared to hope, and entirely more lucid than his latter-day reputation had led me to expect. The longer hair and sharp clothes apart, he could be any kindly, personable Jewish man of late-middle-age. Someone coming up to retirement, perhaps. Indeed, somebody's grandad. Anything but a rock god.

Wincing at the autumn sunshine meanwhile, Dylan smiles and shakes hands. As aides struggle with the electronic system that controls the window blinds in this expensive fishbowl, we perform a small dance of good manners in front of an L-shaped sofa, each of us encouraging the other to choose a seat and sit first. Acknowledging our mutual awkwardness and seeking to put me at my ease, he laughs, shoulders shaking softly just like Mutley from Wacky Races. "Heh-heh-heh," he goes, settling me at a close right-angle to him. "Nice of you to come by."

As if I had just dropped in: three weeks' worth of protracted telephone conversations with publicists in New York and London have brought me here. Finally confirmed less than 24 hours earlier, this is Dylan's first and only meeting of the Nineties with a British journalist. It is happening because he is in a good mood, feels relaxed, and has been reassured (his American PR has fine-toothcombed my past interviews) that I can be trusted to view him as a working musician, not Mr Superstar. More than anything, he hates to be approached as that. "I'm just a tradesman, plying my trade," he will tell me more than once.

In the week that we meet, Dylan has put out Time Out of Mind, his first complete album of new material since 1989 and one good enough to remind us all how great he once was. It has attracted reviews more positive than any he has seen in 20 years, not only from the broadsheets and the more middle-aged music titles but right across the board to the NME. And the next day it will debut in the Top 10 both here and in America.

"Really" he asks (although he must already have been advised of it by his label, Sony), when I mention the prediction of its first UK chart position. "That would be a big surprise for me. I wouldn't know what to make of it if it happened. It's not like I've suddenly started making pop music... Maybe I'm doing something wrong." And then he laughs again: "Heh-heh-heh."

It would be nice to claim that Time Out Of Mind's unexpected success is down to nothing more than the fact of it being a fine record: dark, richly textured, thought-provoking and atmospheric, it is one of the year's best and most consistent releases in any genre. But the music business doesn't often work like that: frequently, it takes hype, a mega promotional budget, masses of interviews, and appearances on all the right TV shows to assure even media-sexy young acts of similar recognition. But none of these factors can be said to have been working in Dylan's favour. So perhaps it's simply that he has finally come round to the fore again on the wide, wide wheel of fashion. Or that a proportion of the record-buying public is now sated with the lightweight and disposable.

Or, even, that his brush with mortality has tugged at our collective consciousness, reminding us to show we appreciate him while we still can. "Has it been disabling creatively to have people say my best work is behind me?" Dylan repeats my question, examining his hands. "Not really, because for the most part I felt – feel -that way myself. I don't think there's anything among this particular set of songs to overshadow what I've done earlier."

Could this have been why he chose to play just one track from it in Bournemouth earlier in the week, on the opening night of a short British tour?

"Well, this record's only just out and I didn't expect people to know the material yet," he says (in fact, the song Love Sick was greeted with the applause of excited recognition from its opening bars). "It took me by surprise when they responded like they knew it. Again that's something new for me, 'cause we consistently play shows and I'm under the impression that people aren't paying a great deal of attention to any record that's been released. If I'd done that [played something new] here ten years ago, I'd've got, Well, why isn't he giving us the old stuff?"

Dylan and his touring band habitually play between 100 and 150 shows a year, year in and year out, all around the world. This itinerary has somehow attracted a title, the Never-Ending Tour, but he can't understand why. After all, touring is what working musicians did long before just making videos or appearing on chat shows became a promotional option – and it is as a working musician that he defines himself, not a recording artist. "And it's easier that way. When you go and play live, you just do the show and it's over and done with. Then you're gone, onto some place else. The strain is more physical than mental, and that's why I choose to do it. Writing can be harder."

"I don't ever really feel like I'm on or off tour. I simply work a certain amount of days each year, which puts me in the category of someone just making their living by a trade. I don't make a record every three years, then go and tour so that audiences will buy it as a souvenir. I'm not that kind of artist and never wanted to be: I don't approach music so dispassionately. And consistent touring is less of a hardship. You don't have to keep assembling and rehearsing a new team; there's less upheaval and dislocation in your life. The Never-Ending Tour? I don't know where that came from. I didn't name it that. Crosby, Stills & Nash play the same sort of number of dates as I do and they're not on a never-ending tour. Lots of other people too."

Equally, he finds it meaningless to speculate about whether a more authentic music, his own included, is coming back into vogue again. "I just plough my own furrow, regardless. The people I listened to – still listen to – were never fashionable, as far as I'm aware. Woody Guthrie. Was he ever fashionable? I don't think so. Or Leadbelly? Or the great Robert Johnson? How many records did he sell in his lifetime? Very few. Whereas Al Jolson, he was fashionable... And what happens? In every era, fashionable people go out of fashion as soon as the prevailing wind changes."

If we accept that, by dint of his annual touring schedule, he is a tradesman, we must insist on according Dylan the status of master craftsman as a composer and lyricist. His canon of work is almost certainly the best and most significant to have been amassed in the second half of this century by any one non-collaborative songwriter. He himself acknowledges only that it is out of respect for his own back-catalogue that he so assiduously avoids what, in her song Free Man In Paris, his nearest rival Joni Mitchell termed "the star-maker machinery behind the popular song." Turning his head so that, for once, he is looking directly at me, he says: "I cannot do anything that would be demeaning to my songs."

"If I wasn't working live and had no other avenue of expression, maybe there would be some kind of sense to it [the courting of a wider popularity]. But I have no great need to appeal to people who are still in high school. I wouldn't want to seem as if I were going fishing for a younger set. A certain crowd of people come and see me play, and I'm assuming that they're the ones who naturally relate to what I sing about. And that they're there seems to be enough for me."

Although I believe him, I wonder also if that part of his heart which might hope and look forward to still being loved and admired by the whole listening world hasn't just closed itself down, out of self-protection perhaps.

I wonder this particularly when he says that yes, to have critical praise and commercial success again is gratifying, but, "I'm not used to it any more and, having gravitated instead towards bringing my work alive again night after night on stage, I find that to be what's important to me now. I can't say that it's never been my turn commercially, and that I've never known the feeling of having a record top the charts, because it wouldn't be true. But to have it again? I'm not really counting on it, 'cause I don't want to set myself up for a disappointment. I'm used now to just a certain amount of people buying my albums and then them falling out of sight. And I'm aware that the record market belongs to much younger people these days. As it should, as it should."

The most casual listener's definition of him would probably be as angry and anti-establishment Greenwich Village troubadour, the young Bob Dylan of Blowin' in the Wind, A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall and The Times They Are a-Changin'. He himself rejects being so easily stereotyped, insisting: "The reason I can stay so single-minded about my music is because it affected me at an early age in a very, very powerful way and it's all that affected me. It's all that ever remained true for me. Everything else changed."

"And I'm very glad that this particular music [the tradition of folk, or blues] reached me when it did because, frankly, if it hadn't, I don't know what would have become of me. I come from a very isolated part of North America [Northern Minnesota] and grew up in a very innocent time and I'm not affected by the Sixties. I don't care one bit about the Sixties. I don't think I'm standing on that foundation. I know it was a time of great upheaval in the world, but still I don't care about them. What's dear to me are the Fifties, 'cause that's when I grew up. I didn't grow up in the Sixties, so Bob Dylan the Sixties protest singer isn't me at all."

Unprompted, he will begin to describe the small towns of, first, Duluth and then Hibbing in which he and brother David spent their boyhood. Dylan wants it to be understood that his musical personality had been forged long before the Sixties ever dawned. Already, he defined himself as a torch-bearer for the socially aware folk music pioneered by Guthrie and developed by other politically motivated performers in the Thirties, Forties and Fifties. To suggest he merely absorbed the Zeitgeist of young liberal America in the Sixties and thus assumed a convenient identity is, at best, to miss the point.

And perhaps it is because he has returned to his roots on it that Time Out of Mind is so good, and so successful: "When I survey the horizon, I don't see anyone who has the same influences as me and who has stuck to them," he says. "Realistically, my influences have not changed – and any time they have done, the music goes off to a wrong place. That's why I recorded two LPs of old songs [his only other studio releases of the Nineties], so I could personally get back to the music that's true for me..." Robert and David were the only children of father Abe (who left a job with Standard Oil to join the furniture and electrical goods business run by two of his brothers) and wife Beatty, both first-generation Americans whose parents had emigrated from eastern Europe. "Knife sharpeners would come down the street, and the coal man too, and every once in a while a wagon would come through town with a gorilla in a cage or, I remember, a mummy under glass," Dylan says. "People sold food off of carts, and it was a very itinerant place – no interstate highways yet, just country roads everywhere. There was an innocence about it all, and I don't recall anything bad ever happening. That was the Fifties, the last period of time I remember as being idyllic."

This experience of a soon-to-vanish America can only have reinforced the relevance Guthrie's songs had for him and, by the time he arrived in Manhattan in 1961, the now-fledgling performer was a passionate exponent of the master's work, with a repertoire of some 100 of his songs from which to draw when launching his own performing career on the coffee-house circuit. Guthrie, almost 50, had long since fallen victim to Huntington's Chorea, a hereditary and degenerative disease of the nervous system, and was being held in an institution for the mentally ill in New Jersey. His young admirer began to make pilgrimages to visit him there.

"It was towards his last days [Guthrie died in 1967]. I used to go across by bus and I found it a sad thing, because he wasn't mentally ill in any way he was the sanest person there, the only thing being that he had no control over his muscles. But I guess they couldn't think of anywhere else to put him, and it was a very frightening place. He did appreciate me playing his songs for him though. I know he did, 'cause he kept asking me to do more. It was difficult to communicate with him in any way, but I wasn't really looking for that. I had nothing to tell him. I just wanted him to know that I was playing his stuff, and to get some kind of affirmation that I was doing it correctly. And he gave me that affirmation. It was all very overwhelming."

Although Dylan has suffered health scares of his own over the years (a serious motorcycle accident in 1966, for example, and the various addictions, attendant to a high profile music career in that decade), his most arresting experience of illness came earlier this year when he was stricken with severe chest pains. An initial medical examination declared him fit, but the continuous and intolerable pain did not abate. Hospitalised shortly afterwards, he was found to have pericarditis, a swelling of the sac around the heart caused by a rare fungal infection. "I could never have envisaged myself being laid so low," he says now. "It was very scary, and the pain incredibly intense. But I didn't have to have surgery and it has all been contained by medication. For six weeks, though, I was off my feet, without even the energy to get out of bed. Finally I healed up enough to get back out there to work. But though the medication has got to he scaled down eventually, for the time being I'm still on it."

The experience has strengthened what he says has been a long-term ambition to build and endow a hospital: "I've been thinking about it for some time, but now more than ever I see it as a worthwhile endeavor for me to put my time and energy into." But it brought no sudden spiritual or philosophical revelations: "I was too busy concentrating on just keeping breathing." And we shouldn't look upon it as having informed the rather battered, bruised, lovelorn and world-weary lyrics of Time Out Of Mind: "No, the tracks had already been written and recorded" he says with a smile. "We actually had twice as many songs as we needed and had to lose some. Those you hear on the album just naturally hung together, because they share a certain scepticism. They're more concerned with the dread realities of life than the bright and rosy idealism popular today."

Ah yes, idealism. Dylan was one of the artists invited to perform at the inaugural concert marking President Clinton's first term of office. Is he still in contact with that administration, and does he feel cheered by its achievements? "No, and no, not really," is the shrugged response. "Politics and social trends, don't really concern me. Left, right or middle – it's all just the same to me. I'm not sufficiently schooled in politics to have a real view, just as I'm not schooled in medicine or science. And I try to be oblivious to culture, because I'm a singer and musician and I'd rather stay true to that. I haven't been to the finishing schools of the world, and I don't know the things that they teach. All I know is the area that I'm in. That's the language I know."

Dylan is protective in the extreme about his private life and manages to answer even the most respectful enquiry about them in terms so vague as to be inpenetrable. He has four grown-up children – Jesse, Anne, Samuel and Jakob from a ten-year marriage to a former model, Sara Lowndes, which ended in divorce in 1977. The youngest, 28 year-old Jakob, is lead singer of a currently highly successful rock band, the Wallflowers. Their most recent LP, Bringing Down the Horses, has now sold more than three million copies reportedly, more than any album Dylan himself has released. "People ask me how I feel about that, as if I wouldn't be pleased." His father says, genuinely bewildered. "How do they think I feel? My feeling is that it's fantastic. I hope he sells 100 million."

Although the wealth of reference books and fan volumes assembled in his honour have linked his name with various others since the divorce, there is no evidence of a current partner: indeed, several of the songs on Time Out Of Mind paint him as the victim of still-painful heartbreak. Dylan's unwillingness to discuss not only this but also all other, far less personal aspects of his off-duty life serves only to bolster one's sense of a man who exists solely within a spotlight. Someone brought alive again each night on a stage somewhere around the world, but otherwise forever rootless and a willing slave to that never-ending tour.

But, of course, the fact is that he does have a domestic life, and a very comfortable one – a mansion in Malibu, say the pop historians, and a farm outside Minneapolis. He even likes to tread the greens and fairways, just like any other 56-year-old with a little time on his hands and the need for some gentle exercise. "How come everybody is so interested to know my handicap?" he demands, not understanding that we are fascinated by the very fact that Bob Dylan, voice of a generation, plays golf.

Ultimately, all the various polite evasions underline his own original point — that his is a trade like any other, and he is simply a working musician, not a self-promoting celebrity of whom we have the right to demand such details. Meanwhile, he has veered off into an affirmation of how accepting early British audiences were of his music, more so even than American ones, and how he still listens to and loves the music of performers he met here on his earliest visits, particularly that of the folk singer Martin Carthy.

Suddenly, I remember. Having read previously of the mutual admiration between the two and because I hoped he might like it (but also, in truth, in case an ice-breaker were needed), I have brought him a copy of the 1996 Mercury Prize-nominated album Norma Waterson, the first-ever solo recording by Carthy's wife. Dylan looks so pleased to receive it that I am embarrassed. "Heh-heh-heh," he laughs delightedly, holding it out for his now hovering PR to see. "Well, thank you very much."

We are about to be parted, but he draws me back to him for a final observation. "I'm just so glad that you like this particular record," he says of my enthusiasm for Time Out of Mind. "In fact, I'm very overwhelmed. I'm used to my records just being slagged off and my shows misrepresented. That's what I'm used to, You just get used to it. You have to. If you expect to go on, you have to get used to being slagged off and misrepresented in all kinds of ways. I'm no longer used to the acceptance of a record. I think that it would take me a while to get used to it. So, thank you."

And then he is gone, and I am left behind, hardly able to believe that Bob Dylan has just said such a thing to me. That he should have needed to at all, and that he meant it.

December 1997
Robert Hilburn Interview, Santa Monica, California

Source: The Fiddler Now Upspoke, pp. 1157-1161.

This interview was published in the Calendar supplement of the Los Angeles Times of December 14 1997. Robert Hilburn is the Times' pop music critic. It also appeared in Paris Match of February 19, 1998.

REBORN AGAIN

After admittedly losing his way in the '80s, Bob Dylan returns as an artist with something to say – and an album he actually enjoys.

In Time Out of Mind Bob Dylan's most acclaimed album in 20 years, there are moments that sound like the reflections of a man who is nearing the last rites.

"When you think that you've lost everything, you find out that you could always lose a little more," Dylan sings in one song that summarizes the soul of the album, which, in contrast to the youthful optimism of his landmark '60s works, focuses on love and life at a time when options and expectations have been greatly lowered.

So it's surprising to see the classic songwriter in an upbeat, even playful mood as he sits this evening on a couch in a private room just off the lower lobby of a Santa Monica hotel.

Dylan, 56, has disliked interviews for years because he's always asked to reveal something about his personal life or to interpret his lyrics, whether from one of his socially conscious folk anthems like Blowin' in the Wind or a snarling, self-affirming rock anthem such as Like a Rolling Stone.

Even now, he quickly deflects questions about how much his songs, some of which express bitterness over relationships, are from his own experience.

Yet a smile accompanies his rejoinder, rather than the icy defiance that he once might have shown. "They are songs meant to be sung," he says when pressed on the autobiographical aspect. "I don't know if they are meant to be discussed around the coffee table."

It's easy to see why Dylan is in good spirits. Time Out of Mind, his first collection of new songs in seven years, was not only hailed by critics, but the album, which entered the pop charts at No. 10 in October, has also already been declared gold (sales of 500,000). It's his first gold studio collection since 1983's Infidels. The album (his 40th including retrospectives) brings his total U.S. sales to nearly 31 million.

Dylan, whose songwriting in the '60s revolutionized rock by bringing commentary and literary ambition to a musical form that had chiefly relied simply on attitude and energy, also received the prestigious Kennedy Center Honor last Sunday in Washington, DC. About Dylan, President Clinton said, "He probably had more impact on people of my generation than any other artist."

But it becomes clear during the interview that there is a deeper reason for Dylan's sense of satisfaction – one that grows out of what he describes as the rediscovery in recent years of the self-identity as a performer that he lost during the acclaim and hoopla of his '70s and '80s arena and stadium tours.

"I remember playing shows [with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers in the '80s] and looking out [thinking] I didn't have that many fans coming to see me," he says. "They were coming to see Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers."

About that period, he adds, "I was going on my name for a long time, name and reputation; which was about all I had. I had sort of fallen into an amnesia spell... I didn't feel I knew who I was on stage..."

But Dylan says he regained his sense of identity and purpose in the hundreds of concerts he has done in the '90s, an ambitious series of mostly theater dates that has been dubbed by the media the Never Ending Tour. That invigorating experience apparently contributed to the creative outburst in the new album.

On the eve of a sold-out, five-night stand at the El Rey Theatre, Dylan – who says he feels fine after being hospitalized in May for treatment of pericarditis – speaks about the new album, the "missing" years and gingerly, about the success of his son Jakob's band, the Wallflowers.

RH: You seem to be in good spirits. Do you think the word "happy" might even apply?

BD: I think that it's hard to find happiness as a whole in anything. [laughs] The days of tender youth are gone. I think you can be delirious in your youth, but as you get older, things happen. We take our instruction from the media. The media just gloats over tragedy and sin and shame, so why are people supposed to feel any different?

RH: Some of the words used by critics to describe the songs in the album are... brooding, gloomy, misery, wary. Do you see the album that way?

BD: I don't know... It's certainly not an album of felicity... I try to live within that line between despondency and hope. I'm suited to walk that line, right between the fire ... I see [the album] right straight down the middle of the line, really.

RH: Why were your two albums before this one simply acoustic songs by other writers? Did it take this long to write these songs?

BD: I had written these songs, but... I forgot about recording for a while. I didn't feel like I wanted to put forth the effort to record anything. The acoustic albums were easy enough. I was pretty content to let it be that.

RH: What was different about this album?

BD: Part of the – I don't know what you want to call it – maybe the effectiveness of these songs is the fact that they weren't just written and taken into the studio the way so many of my songs have been, where you are stuck with the arrangement, stuck with who's playing on them, stuck with the lyrics. So many of my records were made that way. So many that people elevate on such a high level were in some sense only first drafts of songs... and they have changed over the years. I had lived with these songs long enough to know what I wanted.

RH: The 16-minute Highlands is the highlight of the album. How did that song come about?

BD: I had the guitar run off an old Charley Patton record [in his head] for years and always wanted to do something with that. I was sitting around, maybe in the dark Delta or maybe in some unthinkable trench somewhere, with that sound in my mind and the dichotomy of the highlands with that seemed to be a Path worth pursuing.

RH: What about writing the song? Is it something you do in one sitting or is it something you piece together over time?

BD: It starts off as a stream of consciousness thing and you add things to it. I take things from all parts of life and then I see if there is a connection, and if there's a connection I connect them. The riff was just going repeatedly, hypnotically in my head, then the words eventually come along. Probably every song on the album came that way.

RH: There are a dozen lines in that song alone that it'd be interesting to have you talk about, but how about the one with Neil Young? "I'm listening to Neil Young/I gotta turn up the sound/Someone's always yelling,/'Turn it down. '" Is that a tip of the hat or...?

BD: It's anything you want it to be. [smiles]. I don't give too much thought to individual lines. If I thought about them in any kind of deep way, maybe I wouldn't use them because I'd always be second-guessing myself. I learned a long time ago to trust my intuition.

RH: How do you feel when one album is praised much more than another one? Do you understand why people respond differently to albums or do you think a lot of it seems arbitrary?

BD: I never listen to my albums, once they are completed. I don't want to be reminded. To me, I've done them. I find it like looking into a lifeless mirror. I do, however, listen to this album quite a bit.

RH: If you were so pleased with these songs, why didn't you do them in concert before you recorded them if you had them for so long?

BD: That's the funny thing. People don't think they can respond to a song that they haven't heard on a record. It didn't used to be that way, but I think we are living in an age where we are so bombarded – everything from satellite news to biological weapons – and people want to be familiar with something before they are ready to accept it.

RH: Even your fans? Aren't they a pretty adventurous bunch?

BD: I don't know. I don't think I have the same fans I had earlier. In fact. I know they aren't the same people. Those fans left me years ago. If I was a fan of me back then, I wouldn't [still] be either.

RH: What do you mean?

BD: I wasn't giving anybody anything that they felt comfortable with, and I understood that, but I understood it much later than it was happening. I don't have any one kind of fan or follower of this kind of music, like say, U2, or Bruce [Springsteen] or any of these young groups today who consistently keep their followers because what they are doing is variations of the same things. My situation is peculiar. I didn't come out of the same environment. My tradition is older than all that. I came out of the environment of folk music.

RH: Is there any way to describe your goals when you were starting out?

BD: I knew growing up that I wanted to do something different than anybody else. I wanted to do something that no one else did or could do, and I wanted to do it better than anyone else had. I didn't know where that was going to lead me, but where it did lead me was to folk music at a time when it was totally off the radar screen. Maybe there were 12 people in all of America who even heard of Woody Guthrie, Roscoe Holcomb, the Carter Family, Lead belly – at least 12 people my age. They were free spirits who took chances, and I never wished to annul any of that spirit.

RH: You've never seemed comfortable with your success and acclaim. Is that true?

BD: I'm still not. I still don't consider myself in the same realm as someone like James Taylor or Randy Newman, someone who, in my book, is a "songwriter for the times". I feel my stuff is very hard-edged and not everybody's cup of tea.

RH: You've been touring for more than 30 years now. Do you see a time when you might stop? Or do you think you'll be doing it until your final breath?

BD: I could stop any time... I can see an end to everything really.

RH: You did once stop playing for eight years, during the late 60's. Why were you off the road for so long?

BD: I didn't want to go on the road. I didn't feel it was as important to me as personal matters. I had a family. It wouldn't work for me if I was out on the road. So I stayed off. Then we came to California and I forgot what I did [on stage]... totally... When I got back [on tour in 1974], I was looked upon as a songwriter of a generation or mouthpiece of a generation. That was the slogan put on me at the time. I had to meet that head on.

RH: Was that uncomfortable?

BD: Sure, because when I went back [to touring], nothing was working right for me... I had lost my raison d'être... I didn't know what I was doing out there, people throwing flowers and whatever. I didn't know who they expected me to be. It was a crazy time.

RH: So, what turned it around for you?

BD: At a certain point [on the Petty tour], I had a revelation about a bunch of things, which is hard to explain [briefly]... I realized that it was necessary to go put and turn things around.

RH: How did you do that?

BD: On some night when lightning strikes, this gift was given back to me and I knew it... The essence was back.

RH: So you learned to enjoy yourself again on stage in recent years?

BD: Yes, it took a long time to develop back into what it would have been if I hadn't taken the time off. It's a strange story, I'll admit it.

RH: Speaking of joy, what about Jakob's success with the Wallflowers?

BD: It's sensational what has happened to the Wallflowers. It's like one in a million or something.

RH: When you heard he was going to start a band, did you worry about him? Did you advise him at all?

BD: It was inconsequential what I thought.

RH: As a father, though, were you worried about all he would have to go through, like the pain of being dropped by his label after the first album?

BD: I was concerned after the label dropped him and they still were involved in trying to get another record deal, but he made it on his own. If anything, his name would have held him back. I think that held him back on his first record, to tell you the truth. I think that first record would have been accepted if he wasn't who he was.

RH: What about honors, such as the Kennedy honors? Do you appreciate them?

BD: It's always nice to be appreciated, especially while you are still alive.

23 January 1998
A note from Bob Dylan, Carl Perkins' Funeral Service, R.E. Womack Chapel, Lambuth University, Jackson, Tennessee

Source: TWM #1387(4036) in ISIS#80, 8-9/98, p. 18

Carl Perkins' funeral service took place on Friday, 23 January 1998 in the R. E. Womack Chapel on the campus of Lambuth University in Jackson, TN. Some 650 mourners attended there while many more watched on CCTV. During the service, Wynona Judd read a note pinned to the flower arrangement sent by Dylan (who was on tour with Van Morrison in New England): He really stood for freedom. That whole sound stood for all degrees of freedom. It would just jump off the turntable… we wanted to go where that was happening.

25 February 1998
Bob Dylan Acceptance Speech, 40th Grammy Awards Ceremony, Radio City Music Hall, New York City, New York

Source: Circulating tape

Yeah, all right. Well, I've got to mention them, Columbia Records, Tommy Mottola, Don Ienner — Don Ienner heard these songs way back when and convinced me to put it out — although his favorite songs aren't on it — but he put it out anyway. Larry Jenkins has been down in the trenches all the way from Italy to England and back again... Daniel Lanois, who helped produce this, and Mark Howard — can't forget that. We got a particular sound on this record which you don't get every day. Everybody worked extra-special hard, even the musicians. Augie Meyers from San Antonio... Jim Dickinson, my brother from down in Mississippi... and Cindy Cashdollar, Bucky Baxter, Tony Garnier, Jim Keltner, just every old body, David Kemper... everybody worked really hard on this and we didn't know what we had when we did it but we did it anyway.

And I just want to say that one time when I was about sixteen or seventeen years old, I went to see Buddy Holly play at, I don't know, Duluth National Guard Armory and I was three feet away from him... and he LOOKED at me. And I just have some sort of feeling that he was — I don't know how or why — but I know he was with us all the time we were making this record in some kind of way. In the words of, you know, the immortal Robert Johnson, "the stuff we got'll bust your brains out", and we tried to get that across. And this man right here, he was sort of instrumental in helping that out; I'm going to let him say a few words— Daniel Lanois. [laughter]

[applause]

16 May 1998
Susan Ross story on her relationship with Bob Dylan

Source: Daily Mail Weekend, 16 May 1998

I THOUGHT WE'D BE LIKE JOHN AND YOKO, PAUL AND LINDA. BUT DYLAN DOESN'T NEED A COMPANION — THAT'S THE TRAGEDY
by Mary Greene; Daily Mail Weekend, 16 May 1998

A forthcoming biography of Bob Dylan claims he had two secret marriages and five children he won't acknowledge publicly. Now the author, Susan Ross, has decided to go public on her 12-year affair with the rock legend. It is not, she says, a tawdry kiss-and-tell tale, but a plea for recognition from a man she claims is so self-consumed. he simply doesn't know he's destroying her. MARY GREENE reports

The big brass bed is the only thing in the room betraying a clue that Bob Dylan slept here. It is a bed that is as crumpled as Dylan's own face. It is tarnished, and slightly disheveled, the white, lace-trimmed duvet has been hastily plumped up by someone who rarely rises before noon. It isn't, sadly, Bob Dylan's own brass bed, celebrated in his love song Lay Lady Lay. Rather it belongs to the woman who claims to have been Dylan's lover for the past 12 years — and who recently went public with the intriguing story of his tangled private life and two secret marriages.

Dylan — the voice (some say poet) of Sixties protest — has always shrouded himself mystery, sowing disinformation about his origins, refusing to have his photograph taken. Millions of words have been written about him, without anything much having been said. And that is how he likes it. Long before he became legend, this was a man who had a deep urge not to be understood.

Today his self-proclaimed lover, Susan Ross — owner of the big brass bed — maintains that she is moved to tell her story, not out of vengeance but out of weariness at playing by Dylan's rules. She is hurt that he has never publicly acknowledge their long affair.

In writing her book — which has yet to be published — she has infuriated Dylan who has not spoken to her for two months. But she says it is simply a challenge to his humanity. Her ultimatum is that after 12 years she wants recognition and companionship as well as sex. She paints a revealing picture of a man she says she cares for deeply, even though she claims he is an inconsiderate lover who is emotionally and physically distant.

Tellingly, she calls him Zimmerman, the name he was born with — as if Bob Dylan were too big a concept to carry into a relationship. 'He is very proud of being Bob Dylan,' she says, 'but he's stifled by it.'

The Bob Dylan she describes is a rolling stone who seeks normality behind the closed doors of her $300-a-month, rent-controlled Manhattan bedsit. There, his trademark hood pulled over his head, Dylan is unrecognisable. He was once refused entry by Ross's doorman who mistook him for a vagrant seeking shelter.

If you give credence to Susan Ross's story, it can safely be assumed that the gravel-voiced singer — once graphically described as sounding like a sea lion with emphysema — is the enduring passion of her life. The bigger question is, what, if anything, Susan Ross means to him?

It is a question the 46-year-old legal assistant readily asks herself. 'If he wants to have sex with a woman in another city when he is on tour,' she says, 'that is up to him. He has never been able to get the big picture from one woman. We are not, either of us, conventional people. I always know when he has slept with another woman. What I care about is that when I am with him, I am queen. I want to be accorded respect.

'I thought we'd be like John and Yoko, Paul and Linda. But he doesn't need a companion. That's the tragedy. I said once: "Why don't we live together?" and he said: 'Because I can barely live with myself.'"

It was five years into their affair before Dylan, jealously guarding his privacy, even invited Ross to his Malibu mansion. She flew to Los Angeles, naïvely imagining that this represented one giant leap into a normal relationship. When she got there, he backtracked, unable to handle this invasion of his private space. She drove through the gate and passed an ageing hippie loitering for a glimpse of the living legend. She drove past a motorbike abandoned in long grass behind the barn, past the horses in a small corral and a coop of chickens and roosters, then along the drive bordered by metal sculptures to the domed house, guarded by a pack of mastiffs.

Ross describes it as a whimsical cross between the Taj Mahal, a ski chalet and an American summer camp. She arrived there and then, says Ross, Dylan showed her to the guest bedroom. He made the excuse that he couldn't sleep in his own bed. Ross was not to be allowed to sleep in the legend's bedroom.

Dylan, she quickly discovered, would not be pushed into commitment. On her 40th birthday, he stood her up; she spent the evening in tears and alone. She says she had wanted to marry him and had cut out a Tiffany's advert from the Sunday papers; Dylan conceded, grudgingly, that she could go to the store, alone, to select a diamond. She was fully aware, she says, that this was not to be an engagement ring, just a gift for a milestone birthday. She picked out a modest $2,000 stone then other rings at $5,000, $10,000 and $19,000. 'I figured I'd give him options. I didn't want him to feel obligated.' The diamond didn't materialise nor, on the night of her birthday, did Dylan.

She wrote to him, asking him not to call her again. She has kept his reply, a typed, unsigned postcard postmarked Stamford, Connecticut, 1992. He reproached her with having hurt his feelings. 'Everybody has them. Mine sometime may be a bit penurious, but they're there. Anyway, if there's a change lemme know.'

It was on November 13, 1985, that Susan Ross met Bob Dylan. There is a photograph to prove it — the only photograph — but Dylan is so famously camera-shy, that in itself may not be so surprising. She is wearing an off-the-shoulder pale blue, Fifties lace cocktail dress — a $10 charity shop bargain because, as ever, she was broke. Bob, with his tangled curls, is wearing dark glasses and an oversized white jacket. Susan gives the camera a sidelong glance, reminiscent of the young Princess Diana. She is out of her depth at this record company party at New York's Whitney Museum, where the glittering cast includes Billy Joel and Christie Brinkley, Davie Bowie and Robert DeNiro.

At the time of her meeting Dylan, Susan was 33, and had just pulled herself out of morass of degradation and self-abuse. She had been clean of drugs for six months — but Ross readily confesses more than a passing acquaintance with the seamiest strata of, New York life.

She was born into a wealthy, if dysfunctional, upper middle-class Jewish family. Her father was a vice president of the Revlon corporation. Woody Allen, she says, is a second cousin twice removed. Susan learned piano at three and at ten became pupil at the prestigious Juilliard music school in New York. She dropped out of three schools worked on an underground magazine, then spent the Seventies in a snowstorm of cheap and readily available cocaine.

She was one of the first female roadies in rock n' roll, travelling with bands like the Moody Blues, Yes, ELO and Jackson Browne. On the day in 1985 when she admitted she had hit rock bottom, she cut herself off from her friends, her dealer-boyfriend, her way of life and took waitressing job to start her life over again.

Three days after their first meeting, Bob Dylan turned up at the rundown hotel where Susan lived. She asked the manager if she could borrow his room for the occasion. Dylan carried Susan's television upstairs; she was worried they might be stuck for conversation. She played him a tape of her own music, which he dismissed as 'just another bar band'. She realised he couldn't remember her name. When he kissed her, she says, he had 'all the finesse of a tenth grader, struggling with his zipper in the back of a car'. She had determined, anyway, not to let things go too far. He didn't press her. 'That's too bad,' he said, casually, 'we'll probably never sleep together then.'

It was six months before they did sleep together. Dylan still couldn't remember her name. 'I got rip-snorting drunk out of nervousness. He was ready to dismiss me when he'd finished,' she said. That first night together, Susan Ross claims she became pregnant and later had an abortion. 'That's the greatest regret of my life. Bob was horrified. He loves children. But it seemed too soon. I didn't want him to think I was trying to trap him.'

Susan Ross would unhesitatingly admit that these are the tawdry confessions of any rock star groupie. Yet from this unpromising beginning, she says that a relationship developed. Dylan would phone every day for three weeks, then disappear without explanation for a month; they saw each other as the relentless demands of his Never Ending tour allowed. Her status, if she had any in Dylan's eyes, was never publicly acknowledged. Even when he bought her a present of a cashmere scarf it was to hide her face when the walked together along the streets of Manhattan.

His life, she soon learned, was rigidly compartmentalised, and he was a control freak, who kept each compartment hermetically sealed. In truth, the only woman who has ever been accorded public standing in Bob Dylan's life is his ex-wife Sara, a former bunny girl. Dylan adopted Sara's daughter from a previous marriage, and they had four children of their own: Jesse, who works in films, Anna, Samuel and Jakob, now lead singer with his own successful band The Wallflowers.

Dylan and Sara divorced, vituperatively, in 1977. One morning she is said to have found him at the family breakfast table with her children — and another woman. Perversely, Dylan went on to have an affair with the children's therapist. Susan Ross offers a tellingly poignant detail recalled from her visits to his Malibu home. On the wall is framed painting by his daughter Anna: 'I'm so glad,' she has written, 'you finally became good father.'

As Ross became more infatuated with her famous lover, her life became a self-flagellating mission to piece together the facts of his life. If she asked him questions, he would blank her. 'He'll just look through you. He is so used to cutting out fans who come up and ask silly questions.'

She now believes that he has been married secretly at different times to two of his backing singers — Clydie King and Carol Woods — by whom he has a total of three children, the youngest a 12-year-old daughter, Narette. Dylan is said still to be on friendly terms with Woods, and misses her. Ross also calculates that he had two children by Broadway star and gospel singer Carolyn Dennis. Certainly, it is documented that he was with the effusive, maternal Clydie King through most of the early Eighties. Rolling Stone Ron Wood recalled them once as 'chalk and cheese... her a black, outrageous, hamburger-eating soul singer and Bob all quiet and white, nibbling off the side of her hamburger. I always remember him trying to share her hamburger, and she was bossing him around and stuff. He needed it at the time'.

For Ross and Dylan, a kind of intimacy developed — and maybe she is right when she says she is as close to him as anyone. If there is any single reason why you feel inclined to believe her story, it is for the small humiliations she divulges against herself. 'Bob is not an abuser, he is a torturer,' she says. 'He does not mean to hurt you or to hurt your feelings. It's just that he's so self-consumed, he doesn't realise he's destroying you on the way. You're just in the line of fire.'

She wrote him long letters: In one, written five years after they met, she reproached him: 'Did you forget you had just gotten married when we first slept together? Or did you just forget to tell me?'

Curiously, what binds her to him, she claims, is not sexual energy. 'He is not a considerate lover. He doesn't think about you. He is the warmest, the wittiest, the closest... but physically? Forget it!' Indeed, she claims that during the most intense phase of their relationship, Dylan — a heavy drinker who gave up drinking five years ago — was impotent. In the aftermath of her 40th birthday, she told him she felt unable to carry on without his commitment. 'He was still drinking then. It was real bad,' she recalls. 'He got really sad and said: "I know." He was impotent because of the drink. It was like, "How can I marry this woman?"'

Susan Ross still, against 12 years of evidence, nurtures hopes that Dylan will make the commitment that will say to the world at large that she means more to him than an available big brass bed when he touches base in New York. She could even be justified in believing that he is as close to her as he is to anybody.

Yet she concedes that their relationship hit its lowest ebb last year when Dylan lay in hospital with a potentially fatal heart inflammation. His daughters were at his bedside; Ross did not aspire to join them. What she cannot forgive is that, desperately anxious, she had to learn of his recovery from the media.

At that point she decided she might as well break Dylan's rules and recount her story. She wrote him another letter: 'It is my way of becoming visible, instead of being another secret in your life. I am tired of having people think I am delusional when I remark casually that I've been with Bob Dylan for ten years.'

Who is to know whether Dylan now rues the day he put his name to a reference, in support of Susan Ross's application for a university writing course: 'Susan is an excellent writer,' he wrote. 'Her work has always impressed me. She doesn't waste words. Thank you, sincerely, Bob Dylan.'

20 May 1998
A Note from Bob Dylan, Frank Sinatra's Funeral Service, Good Shepherd Catholic Church, Beverly Hills, California

Source: TWM 1368 (3988) in ISIS 79 6-7/98, p. 13

Frank Sinatra's funeral mass took place at the Good Shepherd Catholic Church in Beverley Hills (505 North Bedford Drive) on Wednesday, 20 May 1998, starting at 12 noon, local time. His coffin had been carried into the church the previous evening for a vigil service.

Several newspapers listed Dylan among the mourners at the funeral mass, a few indicating that some of the same people had attended the vigil service, the night before. One report indicated that Dylan had also attended the vigil service.

Approached by the press, Dylan's publicist offered the following statement from Dylan:

Right from the beginning, he was there with the truth of things in his voice. His music had an influence on me, whether I knew it or not. He was one of the very few singers who sang without a mask. It's a sad day.

Sometime 1998?
Murray Engleheart Interview (for Beat)

This version comes from "Beat" magazine, Melbourne, 19 August 1998

BOB DYLAN
by Murray Engleheart

Getting a solid grasp on just how influential Bob Dylan has been over the last near 40 years is a mind boggling task. Bruce Springsteen came close when he said that without Dylan the Beatles wouldn't have made Sgt Pepper, The Beach Boys' Pet Sounds wouldn't exist, the Sex Pistols' God Save The Queen wouldn't have set England alight and U2 wouldn't have stirred hearts and souls with Pride. It's not an exhaustive list. But it's a damn good start. When I raise Springsteen's remarks Dylan is momentarily lost for words. Not so much because of the enormity of what was said but because Springsteen is like a brother to him.

"Well," Dylan sighs then chuckles, "I mean we can influence all kinds of people but sometimes it gets in the way. Especially if you're influencing somebody, if somebody is accusing you of influencing somebody that you had no intention of influencing at all."

"I've never given it any mind at all really. I don't really care to really influence anybody at this time and if I have influenced anybody what can I say?"

It was the strangest thing. It was 1986 and Bob Dylan had just wrapped up a Sydney press conference at the start of his Australian tour with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers. He stood up after the final question and applauded the assembled media.

For the last year or so Dylan, who is in the country for his fifth tour of Australia, has himself been on the receiving end of yet another round of applause for his stunning, triple Grammy Award winning album, Time Out Of Mind. It's a rebirth recording that has masterfully redefined Dylan. With it has come some amazing professional scenarios for the man, such as playing for the Pope in September reportedly at the request of his Holiness and receiving a Kennedy Center Honors Award in December with Bill Clinton, Gregory Peck and Charlton Heston looking on.

Time Out Of Mind however is the real prize. The album was recorded just before Dylan fell ill with an infection around his heart in May last year. But for all it's excellence the man didn't feel it would have been a suitable closing chapter.

"No, I don't think so. I think we were just starting with getting my identifiable sound onto the disc. I think we just started. I think there's plenty more to do. We just opened up that door at that particular time and in the passage of time we'll go back in and extend that. But I didn't feel like it was an ending to anything. I thought it was more the beginning."

Famed American writer and critic, Greil Marcus, once observed that it always seems to be night when the recordings of bluesman, Skip James, are playing. The exact same case I tell Dylan could be made for Time Out Of Mind. He is entranced at the notion.

"It sounds like Skip James?" he quizzes enthusiastically. In a sense. Marcus was saying his records sound best at night and...

"Oh, yeah, yeah. That would be a tremendous compliment to me to hear that, that I would have any kind of appeal like Skip James would have. I'd never seen that before. But if anything it would probably radiate the same kind of intensity that Skip James would do. I would hope that it would be in that kind of a realm anyway."

Apart from Skip James the album is almost intangibly accented by other blues icons like Charlie Patton and Robert Johnson as well as the sort of primal rock n' roll sounds that were created in Sun Studios in Memphis circa the late 50s. Those elements seem more obvious than usual.

"Well, it's always there," explains Dylan, "it always has been there. But in the past when my records were made, which disillusioned me actually from making the records, producers or whoever's in charge of my sessions, they felt it's enough just to have me singing an original song. So the orchestration of those songs really never got fully developed."

"Time Out Of Mind is more illuminated in something which is completely articulate rather than just a song and just the singing of that song. Arrangements or structures can be really thought about and entangled into it."

Maybe it's just the overall ambience of the recording but Time Out Of Mind seems to have a multitude of ghosts running through it. Even Dylan's voice has an other worldly quality to it at times.

"I'm not versed in the psychological part of it. I don't know. The ghosts you're probably talking about are probably just instruments that are more in the background as opposed to being in the front and in the side. And just different echoes which emanate from just the complete sound of the record, something which will protrude but in any case make themselves noticed."

Getting noticed is not something that Dylan strives for. He doesn't have to. His work quietly takes the podium for him, just as Time Out Of Mind has done. It bears the same hallmark of certain and undeniable greatness as his other classic recordings like Highway 61 Revisited, Blonde On Blonde, Blood On The Tracks and Infidels. Is the man himself able to sense his own magic in those recordings?

"Well, those records were made a long time ago and you know truthfully records that were made in that day and age all were good. They all had some magic to them because the technology didn't go past what the artist was doing. So it was a lot easier to get excellence back in those days on a record than it is now."

"So, as far as the records I made back then, I made records back then just like a lot of other people who were my age and we all made good records. Those records seem to cast a long shadow. But how much of it is the technology and how much of it is the talent and influence, I really don't know. I know you can't make records that sound that way any more. The high priority is technology now. It's not the artist or the art. It's the technology which is coming through."

Dylan would be the first to tell you that he's not a Messiah. He's not even a naughty boy. Any notion then that he might be creating too great an expectation is treated accordingly.

"My concerts are populated by people who wouldn't be there if they were just there looking at a figurehead. They just wouldn't be there. They'd come once and they wouldn't come back."

Bob Dylan plays the Mercury Lounge tonight (but that sold out in minutes). He also plays Melbourne Park this Friday 21st and Saturday 22nd August with special guest Patti Smith.

Sometime 1998?
Murray Engleheart Interview (for Guitar World)

This version comes from "Guitar World" magazine (US/EU) – March 1999 issue

MAXIMUM BOB
Profile: Bob Dylan
Guitar World, March 1999 Murray Engleheart

In little over a year, he's won a Grammy, survived a dangerous illness, hobnobbed with religious royalty and toured endlessly. He's Bob Dylan, forever young prince of rock and roll.
by Murray Engleheart

"WE SEEM TO BE ATTRACTING A NEW AUDIENCE. NOT JUST THOSE WHO KNOW ME AS SOME KIND OF FiGuReHeaD FROM ANOTHER AGE."

Bob Dylan, who for much of his fabled career has been the hippest, has now spent more than a year being the hottest as well. He's the man on everyone's A-list, from Eddie Vedder, an avowed fan, to Pope John Paul II, for whom Dylan performed three songs in Bologna, Italy. Dylan even impressed the online retailer amazon.com, which recently voted Bob Dylan Live l966: The "Royal Albert Hall" Concert the best album of 1998. As remarkable as it seems, one of the most vital post-grunge artists in rock is 58-year-old Bob Dylan. After a rather lean decade, the Sixties folk-rock icon has, against all odds, revitalized his career by polishing off the Nineties with two albums that rank among his very best.

Along with the highly acclaimed "Albert Hall" reissue, Dylan's 1997 Grammy-winning release, Time Out of Mind, produced by Daniel Lanois, has put the singer back in rock's vanguard.

Perhaps even more remarkable than Dylan's albums have been his brilliant live shows, showcasing his feisty lead guitar playing and a crack band. After bouncing back from a life-threatening heart infection in mid-'97, Dylan has played well over 200 shows, performing fierce, jam-oriented reinterpretations of his best songs, at times recalling the tightly wound, three-guitar army of Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Free Bird." It's been a far cry from the disappointingly ramshackle shows that became his stock-in-trade in the Eighties and early Nineties.

When Bob Dylan talks—which is rarely—people listen. Especially these days. We recently had the opportunity for a brief chat with the enigmatic legend, who finally took a break from what has come to be known as his "Never Ending Tour." The relaxed Dylan was kind enough to reflect on the turbulent events of his recent career, and to speculate on his future.

ME: Bruce Springsteen once said that without you there'd be no Beatles' Sgt. Pepper's, no Beach Boys' Pet Sounds, no Sex Pistols "God Save the Queen."

BD: Well... you know, you can influence all kinds of people, but sometimes it gets in the way—especially if somebody is accusing you of influencing somebody that you had no interest in influencing in the first place. I've never given it any mind at all, really. I don't really care to influence anybody at this time, and if I have influenced anybody, what can I say?

ME: Certain albums of yours—Blood on the Tracks, Infidels, Highway 61 Revisited—inspired great critical plaudits in their day, and have stood the test of time. In your view, do those records live up to their reputation?

BD: Well, those records were made a long time ago, and you know, truthfully, records that were made in that day and age all were good. They all had some magic to them because the technology didn't go beyond what the artist was doing. It was a lot easier to get excellence back in those days on a record than it is now. I made records back then just like a lot of other people who were my age, and we all made good records. Those records seem to cast a long shadow. But how much of it is the technology and how much of it is the talent and influence, I really don't know.

I know you can't make records that sound that way any more. The high priority is technology now. It's not the artist or the art. It's the technology that is coming through. That's what makes Time Out of Mind... it doesn't take itself seriously, but then again, the sound is very significant to that record. If that record was made more haphazardly, it wouldn't have sounded that way. It wouldn't have had the impact that it did. The guys that helped me make it went out of their way to make a record that sounds like a record played on a record player. There wasn't any wasted effort on Time Out of Mind, and I don't think there will be on any more of my records.

ME: A writer once noted that Delta bluesman Skip James' records always sound best at night. The same could be said about Time Out of Mind.

BD: You think it sounds like Skip James?

ME: In a sense. Time Out of Mind sounds best late at night.

BD: That would be a tremendous compliment to me, to hear that it was even in any kind of... that it would be in the same realm as Skip James.

ME: In terms of mood and ambience, it's almost like there's ghosts running through it. Are those ghosts of, or for, anybody in particular?

BD: Er, no. I'm not versed in tile psychological part of it. I don't know. The ghosts you're probably talking about are just probably where the instruments are placed in the mix. Some are more in the background as opposed to being in the foreground. Or maybe you're just hearing different echoes that emanate from the complete sound of the record.

ME: Jim Dickinson, who played keyboards on Time Out of Mind, said something years ago that I thought was fascinating. He said that a lot of people don't realize that the recording process is about freeze-framing the soul.

BD: Yeah. The recording process is very difficult for me. I lose my inspiration in the studio real easy, and it's very difficult for me to think that I'm going to eclipse anything that I've done before. I get bored easily, and my mission, which starts out wide, becomes very dim after a few failed takes and this and that.

ME: There are elements of country blues and Sun Records production quality on the album.

BD: Well, it's always been there. But in the past, when my records were made, the producer, or whoever was in charge of my sessions, felt it was just enough to have me sing an original song. There was never enough work put into developing the orchestration, and that always made me feel very disillusioned about recording. Time Out of Mind is more illuminated, rather than just a song and the singing of that song. The arrangements or structures are really an integral part of the whole.

ME: Time Out of Mind was recorded just before you fell ill.

BD: That's right.

ME: Would you have regarded it as a satisfactory final chapter for you?

BD: No, I don't think so. I think we are just starting to get my sound on disc, and I think there's plenty more to do. We just opened up that door at that particular time, and in the passage of time we'll go back in and extend that. But I didn't feel like it was an ending to anything. I thought it was more the beginning.

ME: You've mentioned Buddy Holly in connection with the album. What did his spirit bring to the record?

BD: Buddy Holly. You know, I don't really recall exactly what I said about Buddy Holly, but while we were recording, every place I turned there was Buddy Holly. You know what I mean? It was one of those things. Every place you turned. You walked down a hallway and you heard Buddy Holly records, like "That'll Be the Day." Then you'd get in the car to go over to the studio and "Rave On" would be playing. Then you'd walk into this studio and someone's playing a cassette of "It's so Easy." And this would happen day after day after day. Phrases of Buddy Holly songs would just come out of nowhere. It was spooky. [laughs] But after we recorded and left, you know, it stayed in our minds. Well, Buddy Holly's spirit must have been someplace, hastening this record.

ME: There seems to be a renewed interest in your music, particularly among young people. Have you noticed a shift in your audience?

BD: Ah, no, I haven't found any shift, but I've found a different audience. I'm not good at reading how old people are, but my audience seems to be livelier than they were 10 years ago. They react immediately to what I do, and they don't come with a lot of preconceived ideas about who they would like me to be, or who they think I am. Whereas a few years ago they couldn't react quickly. They had to get through too much... er...

ME: Baggage?

BD: Mental, yeah, mental psychic stuff; so [sighs] I was still kind of bogged down with a certain crowd of people. It has taken a long time to bust through that crowd. Even the last time I toured with Tom Petty, we were kind of facing that same old crowd.

But that's changed. We seem to be attracting a new audience. Not just those who know me as some kind of figurehead from another age or a symbol or a generational thing. I don't really have to deal with that anymore, if I ever did.

ME: Do you find that choosing songs for your live performances gets harder or easier as the years go on?

BD: I have so many songs that finding them is the least of my problems. I've got songs that I've never even sung live. I've got 500, 600, 700 songs. I don't have a problem with the backlog of songs. Some fade away and diminish in time, but others take their place.

ME: While there seems there is plenty of room to improvise, your current live sound appears to be more tightly arranged than in previous years.

BD: If you're going to ask me what's the difference between now and when I used to play in the Seventies, Eighties and even back in the Sixties, the songs weren't arranged. The arrangement is the architecture of the song. And that's why our performances are so effective these days, because, measure for measure, we don't stray from the actual structure of the song. And once the architecture is in place, a song can be done in an endless amount of ways. That's what keeps my current live shows unadulterate it. Because they're not diluted, or they're not jumbled up. They're not scrambled, they're not just a bunch of screaming... a conglomerated sound mix.

It's like Skip James, who you mentioned earlier, once said: "I don't want to entertain. What I want to do is impress with skill and deaden the minds of my listeners." If you listen to his records—his old records–you know he can do that. But if you listen to the records he made in the Sixties, when they rediscovered him, you find that there's something missing. And what's missing is that interconnecting thread of the structure of the songs.

ME: What was the nature of your heart infection?

BD: It was something called histoplasmosis that came from just accidentally inhaling a bunch of stuff that was out on one of the rivers by where I live. Maybe one month, or one or two days out of the year; the banks around the river get all mucky, and then the wind blows and a bunch of swirling mess is in the air. I happened to inhale a bunch of that. That's what made me sick. It went into the heart area. But it wasn't anything really attacking my heart.

ME: You were pretty seriously ill, though?

BD: Oh, I was real seriously ill, yeah.

ME: Did that make you pause and rethink things?

BD: I really didn't, you know, because it wasn't something that I brought on myself. It's not like I even needed the time to slow down and re-examine my life. It was just one of those things. I was down for about six weeks, but I don't remember particularly having any kind of great illuminations at that time.

ME: The performance for the Pope at the World Eucharistic Congress in Bologna must have been tremendously moving for you.

BD: Well, it's all surreal, you know? But yeah, it was moving. I mean, he's the Pope. [laughs] You know what I mean? There's only one lope, right?

ME: Did the irony of playing "Knocking on Heaven's Door" in that situation strike you at the time?

BD: No, because that's the song they wanted to hear. It seemed to be a good correspondence to the situation.

November(?) 1998
Unknown Location, PBS Muddy Waters tribute comments

Source: Circulating tape

Comment #1

He heard there dark woods. He brought 'em up with him. He was able to keep that in the city.

Comment #2

I was fiddling with my radio. Out of nowhere just late at night just came "Gypsy woman told my mother – ta-da-da-pom-pom" and I said, "Wow!"

April 1999
Edna Gundersen interview for USA Today

Source: On the Tracks Vol 7, No 2 (OTT 17), Dec 15, 1999, pp. 8-9.

Two titans on tour
DYLAN & SIMON
by Edna Gundersen

Mr. Tambourine Man meets Mrs. Robinson. You can call them allies. Pop icons Bob Dylan and Paul Simon are teaming up for a U.S. tour destined to be summer's most celebrated double-header. The news is expected to thrill fans of both camps, but nobody is as delighted as the players themselves, whose fabled careers never intersected on a shared bill until now.

"I was right away excited about doing this," says Dylan, a fixture on the tour circuit.

Ditto for Simon, who hasn't toured since 1992. "It appealed to me immediately," he says...

"I think it's going to be a very successful tour," says Pollstar editor Gary Bongiovanni, who predicts the priciest tickets will sell out first. "It's an intelligent pairing, a formidable package that audiences are going to go for. With the market so crowded in the summer, these pairings are now a requirement."

Dylan and Simon, both 57, should draw older fans in droves, despite stiff competition for boomer bucks from reunions by Crosby, Stills, Hash & Young and Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band.

Aside from the pair's hits, what hooks beckon fans?

"Paul Simon hasn't toured in a real long time, and Dylan is in a major career resurgence, coming off the biggest year he's had in terms of gross sales," Bongiovanni says.

The two will swap headliner slots, with each performing a 75-minute set before uniting for a half-hour of duets.

Dylan may be considered the bigger draw, Bongiovanni says, "though the advantage Paul has over Dylan is that his fans haven't seen him in years, whereas Dylan's been touring pretty consistently.

In exclusive interviews, Dylan and Simon spoke by phone Friday from Dew York, where they're sketching ideas for a dual encore. While each could pack houses touring solo, they welcomed the partnership proposed by promoters at SFX.

"Lots of things about this appeal to me," Simon says. "I like Bob, I like his music, I've known him for a long time, and it's a nice chance to play. I like the idea of where we came from and what we evolved into. We came out of the same early rock n' roll context and took similar routes, though mine's more urban."

Dylan, who toured to great acclaim a year ago with Van Morrison and Joni Mitchell, says of Simon: "I mean, he's written extraordinary songs, hasn't he? I consider him one of the pre-eminent songwriters of the times. Every song he does has got a vitality you don't find everywhere."

Their paths have crossed over the years, most recently at a televised Willie Nelson birthday concert in Austin, Texas. Simon's wife, singer Edie Brickell, struck up a friendship with Dylan when they toured on the same bill. But for the most part, Dylan and Simon have toiled on parallel tracks.

"I had no preconceived notions," Simon says of the budding collaboration. "I find him easy to be around and easy to work with. When we were playing together earlier today, I was surprised at how much repertoire we had in common. He has a vast repertoire. He's really a great collector and studier of songs."

"We played a lot of things. I know lots of his songs, and he knew a bunch of mine. We're looking to do some things acoustically together. I like 'To Ramona.' He likes 'Homeward Bound.' We went through quite a menu, from deep folk stuff to the Everly Brothers to Johnny Cash to country to blues. The blend of the guitars and our voices is interesting, particularly on the ballads."

Though he tends to radically alter his set list nightly, Dylan says he and Simon won't join on tunes that aren't "somewhat rehearsed. There's a whole lot to pick from. I don't know what we'll do, but I'm pretty flexible. I've always liked 'Only Living Boy From New York' and other songs from *Bridge Over Troubled Water (Simon & Garfunkel's chart-topping 1970 album). When I played with the Grateful Dead, we were doing 'Boy in the Bubble' (from Graceland)."

Aside from their closing harmonies, Dylan and Simon are plotting distinct and personal shows.

"What I do isn't going to change," Dylan says. "I do what I like regardless of what bill I'm on. That's where my fixation is, in performing, not in making records, although I will make them..."

"Touring is more important to me than getting locked down in a record right now. I have a tough time in the studio. It's very frustrating for me."

Nonetheless, Dylan has been penning songs for a follow-up to 1997's Grammy-winning Time out of Mind, a critical and commercial triumph that arrived after a near-fatal bout of histoplasmosis (swelling of the sac around the heart caused by a fungal infection). Last year's long-awaited release of Live 1966: The "Royal Albert Hall" Concert, previously circulated as a treasured bootleg, also sent Dylan's creative stock soaring.

Dylan tries to ignore both praise and criticism but was pleased by Time's reception.

"I wasn't surprised so much, because most of those songs stand up pretty well against all my old songs, and I can't really say that about a lot of my records from the '80s or early '90s," he says. "I kept the songs for a while and wrote and rewrote them. I didn't want to get them out in a swift way. I tried to take my time so the care I put into them could be heard on the finished record. I'm taking that approach again."

A few new compositions echo the personal, spare tunes on Time. "They're in that same tradition, pretty point-blank. The instrumentation will be decided later."

Simon, resurfacing after his failed Broadway musical, The Capeman, also has an album in the works that should be 60% complete by the time he starts tour rehearsals in May. He'll return to the studio in September with hopes of releasing the album, his first batch of new pop tunes since 1990's The Rhythm of the Saints, by early 2000. He doubts he'll introduce new material onstage this summer.

"There are so many other songs I feel I should do," he says. "I haven't performed in six, seven years, and I feel I should do songs that I think people want to hear again. I'd like to sing something from The Capeman, which wasn't heard much, and I'd like to investigate tunes from The Rhythm of the Saints."

The Capeman's aborted run in 1998 did not sour Simon on the Great White Way.

"I just go wherever the best idea is," he says. "If I have an idea in theater that intrigues me, I wouldn't hesitate to go back. I feel the same about films. I'll go wherever it's interesting and the collaboration is stimulating."

Credited for popularizing exotic forms of music from Africa and South America, Simon says he was merely excavating his back yard.

"In 'Graceland' or 'Mother and Child Reunion,' I was investigating sources that American music had already incorporated," he says. "American music is inherently from all over the world. I have African and French musicians in my band who understand how the whole world is connected in music."

His music "comes from Africa, Europe, the Caribbean, but there's no need to break it down except to more deeply understand the sources we absorbed into our culture."

After delivering his first record in 1957 and chalking up 12 platinum albums plus best-album Grammys in three decades, Simon remains devoted to making music. Retirement, he says, is not a goal.

"The purpose is to be enthralled for the duration. That's what you hope and live for, to stay inspired."

Simon's long absence from the stage hasn't left him nervous or rusty.

"I didn't miss it, but I'm anxious to come back," he says. "I'm really looking forward to this."

Dylan laments the physical hardships of touring but cherishes his time in the spotlight.

"Touring is something you either love or hate doing. I've experienced both. I try to keep an open mind about it. Right now, I'm enjoying it. The crowds make the show. Going onstage, seeing different people every night in a combustible way, that's a thrill. There's nothing in ordinary life that even comes close to that."

May 1999
Sony/Columbia Publicity Statement on Dylan/Simon Touring

Source: Dignity issue 17, June/July 1999, pp. 10-11.

North America Tour with Paul Simon – Summer 1999

The following publicity statement was issued by Sony/Columbia to promote the US Tour – Bob Dylan and Paul Simon:

Together for the First Time

Singer Songwriters To Kick Off Historic Tour on June 6th

Bob Dylan and Paul Simon – two of the most influential and prolific songwriters of the last half century – will hit the road together for the first time for a historic tour beginning June 6th in Colorado Springs, CO at World Arena. Performing some the most memorable and revered songs of our time, Dylan and Simon -supported by their respective bands – will play amphitheatres and arenas across the country. Ironically, though long time admirers of each other's work, Dylan and Simon have never performed together in public, and may sing together during this epic outing.

The Bob Dylan/Paul Simon bill promises to be a highlight of the summer tour season and yet another remarkable milestone in the storied careers of these artists. Tickets go on sale throughout the country the weekend of April 10th, (times and dates vary).

Bob Dylan is enjoying one of the most remarkable periods of creative achievement and success of his career. His most recent album, the Platinum "Time Out of Mind" garnered three Grammy Awards, including Best Album, and became the artist's biggest selling release in 20 years. He continues to draw fans of all ages to his concerts, headlining arenas and other large venues on his consistent series of concert tours.

Multiple Grammy winner and distinguished singer songwriter Paul Simon has been a musical innovator throughout his career. Along with Dylan, Simon was one of the first musicians to fuse folk, pop, and rock in the early sixties, bringing this hybrid to national audiences through his early work. Following unparalleled success in the 70s and early 80s with hits like "Loves Me Like Rock" "Kodachrome" "Me and Julio Down by the Schoolyard," "Slip Slidin' Away" and "50 Ways to Leave your Lover" Simon virtually single-handedly introduced world and indigenous music to the masses through his groundbreaking late 80s and early 90s releases, "Graceland" and "Rhythm of the Saints."

"We have been great fans of each other for years and are really looking forward to touring together," say Dylan and Simon. "This tour will give us the opportunity to honor each other's work while playing for our fans."

To date, Simon is still the only artist to receive a Grammy for "Album of the Year" in three different decades, and yet his accolades do not end on the charts. In 1987, Simon co-founded the Children's Health Fund – a non for profit dedicated to providing free medical care to the nation's homeless and disadvantaged children – an endowment that earned Simon the United Negro College Fund's highest honor – the Frederick D. Patterson Award in recognition of his charitable work.

28 September 1999
Dharma & Greg shooting, Show no. 3ABD04, 'Play Lady Play' (s03e04) ABC TV Studios, New York City, New York

Source: Circulating tape

Broadcast on 12 October 1999 The band is: Dharma Freedom Finkelstein Montgomery (Jenna Elfman), Bob (Bob Dylan), T-Bone Burnett, John Field, Tony Gilkyson, and Joe Henry.

Jenna Elfman = JE
Bob Dylan = BD

JE: One, two, three, four… [Dharma drums] All right, fine, you count it in.
BD: I count it in… One, two, one, two, three… [Dylan & band play instrumental#1] Yeah!
JE: Cool!… [pause] OK, Bob, d'ya want to see anything else?
BD: Umm… marengo… [Dharma sighs helplessly] umm, polka?
JE: Mmm, okay, let me see you play polka, I'll see if I… [Dylan & band play a polka, Dharma joins in drumming] That's kind of too funky for your style, right?
BD: Not at all! [Dylan & band play People Get Ready instrumental] Umgh… [Dharma drums solo]
JE: So, can I play with you, guys? Do I get the job?
BD: Well… we don't know yet.
JE: Do you want me to play some more so you can decide?
BD: Ah, no.
JE: Oh… I got a van.
BD: You got a van?
JE: Yeah, actually can you guys help me load up my stuff?
BD: Huh… [Dylan laughs] ah, sure.
JE: Cool! OK…

23 February 2000
42nd Grammy Awards Ceremony,
The Staples Center, Los Angeles, California

Source: Circulating tape

Bob Dylan (BD) reads out the Album of the Year nominee list with Lauryn Hill (LH) of The Fugees fame. The celebration was hosted by Rosie O'Donnell (RO).

RO: For our last award we've got two amazing presenters. Two previous Album of the Year winners themselves. The amazing Lauryn Hill and Bob Dylan!

BD: So, this is the final Album of the Evening for the Grammy for the Album of the Year.
LH: [laughs] This year's nominees include some very diverse genres of music including country, pop, R&B, jazz, and rock.
BD: For the Album of the Year the nominations are: Millennium – Backstreet Boys… Fly – Dixie Chicks… When I Look in Your Eyes – Diana Krall… Supernatural – Santana… heh! [points his finger at Santana] Fanmail* – TLC… all right.
LH: And… the Grammy goes to… wait a minute… oh!... Supernatural – Santana.

14 May 2000
Bob Dylan's comments on Eurovision song contest, Stockholm, Sweden source: Internet & official Brainstorm website

BRAINSTORM BIOGRAPHY

It was May 2000. Bob Dylan was touring Sweden and being bored between shows watched telly in his hotel. "Eurovision" song contest's (held previous day at Stockholm) review was on. God only knows what his Bobness was thinking seeing all this. But then came a moment, when Bob got really excited. "Yeah, this guy definitely has it!" he growled. "What the hell he is doing in a place like that?" The guy was Reynard Cowper, spaghetti legged singer of Latvian group "BrainStorm", christened as 'the best (and most un-typical) "Eurovision" band ever by late "Select" magazine. And honestly, Dylan was just more or less repeating what Mike Stipe of R.E.M. have said after hearing their album "Among The Suns": "Their songwriting is really strong". After all – Dylan and Stipe are two men who know...

December 2000
Bob Dylan on Dion

Source: TWM 1620(4651), ISIS #95, Feb-Mar 2001, p.11.

Bob Dylan contributed the following piece to the Dion album, King of the New York Streets.

BOB DYLAN ON DION DIMUCCI

The voice of Dion came exploding out of what Allen Ginsberg called "hydrogen jukebox" in the fifties — the hush hush age. Torn right from the start, he had it magically together in the mythic sense — level-headed trustworthy, rhythmically there's no mayhem — just a sense of wonder, in his voice he tells the untold story in the seemingly secret language. How else do you explain the soulfulness of "Teenager In Love"? An unknowing ear would say it's a song about youthful claptrap but it's not, not any more than Tampa Red's "Let me play with your Poodle" is not about dogs. You can hear it in his haunted voice — street corner hokum sure but also barrelhouse blues, the honky-tonk world — even the most sophisticated crooner in the most articulate way — it's all there to put a spell on you. I saw Dion way back there when he followed Ritchie Valens and preceded Link Wray and the Ray Men. Richie could pitch you over the fence and Link made you feel like you wanted to take a grotesque despotic world and hang it with barbed wire, but Dion was no less brilliant — his level was cool-headed, made you feel longing, excited and entranced. "Ruby Baby" is severe, round the clock — listen you'll see. Satire, cunning, fidelity, it's all there in spades. Great singers pass us by like a parade of nobility. There's just something about them that rises above superficial culture. Dion comes from a time when so-so singers couldn't cut it — they either never got heard or got exposed quick and got out of the way. To have it you really had to have it, no smoke and mirrors then — not a minute to spare — rough and ready — glorious and grand — grieving with heartache and feeling too much but still with the always "better not try it" attitude. If you want to hear a great singer, listen to Dion. His voice takes its color from all palettes — he's never lost it — his genius has never deserted him.

January 2001
Bob Dylan on Don Ienner

Source: Los Angeles Times quoted in TWM 1635(4692) 28 Feb 2001

BOB DYLAN ON DON IENNER

On 29 January 2001, the Los Angeles Times ran an article entitled "Passion for music drives Columbia chief to make plenty of industry noise". It was written by Chuck Philips and concerned Don Ienner, the Chairman of Columbia Records, described as "the No. 1 label in the music business". The main part of the article was an interview with Ienner himself, who "over the last decade... has transformed Sony's Columbia division from a washed-up pop monolith into a muscular hit-making machine".

Early on, the article says, Dylan calls Ienner an "unstoppable force" and goes on as follows: "As far as music goes, his love for it is unquestionably genuine. The true-to-life music, whether it's the kind that's bloody and unprocessed or even highbrow, the height of sophistication," Dylan said last week. "Donny gets it all. He gets the whole picture."

It isn't clear how Philips got the Dylan quote but, although the timing seems right, I have been assured that it wasn't at the Golden Globes award ceremony. The quote is presented almost as a single entity, apart from those first two words, isolated from the rest of their sentence. This suggests that there may have been a longer quote, from which Philips selected the extract which was printed. If anyone can shed light on this or, indeed, provide the full thing, I'd be pleased to hear from you.

In the interview with Ienner, there is a passing reference to Dylan. Ienner says, "It used to be a cultural event when a great artist like Bob Dylan put out a new record. Not anymore. No matter how fantastic the music is, what you have to do now is create an aura around the record so it seems like an event. Take Billy Joel, for example. Even if he had a full-blown smash, you'd have to tie it to a movie in some way. You have no choice."

Certainly, Dylan's Things Have Changed has benefited from its tie-in with Wonder Boys.

21 January 2001
Golden Globe Ceremony, Beverly Hilton Hotel, Los Angeles, CA

Source: Circulating tape.

Monica Bellucci (MB) and Phil Collins present the Golden Globe Award to Bob Dylan (BD).

MB: And the winner is… Things Have Changed Wonder Boys!

BD: Wow, umm… This is quite something really. Thanks, Curtis! Thanks Hollywood Foreign Press, and I thank my band, thank the record company and everybody in my family and… umm… that's about it, really! [laughter followed by a round of applause]

February 2001
Bob Dylan on his appearance at the Oscar Gala

Source: USA Today quoted in TWM 1638(4701) 11 March 2001

OSCAR BECKONS

Details of this year's Oscar nominations were given in 4676. As far as I can gather, it is common that several, if not all, of the songs nominated are performed in the course of the Oscar ceremony, which takes place on 25 March, this year. The Academy (in the shape of the Oscars' producer, Gil Gates) has invited Dylan to perform Things Have Changed but Dylan will be in Sydney, Australia. Someone even suggested that Dylan might rearrange some of the Australian tour dates to accommodate the Oscars ceremony, though I suspect that was nothing more than speculation.

USA Today reported that, a week ago today, Dylan had said that he hopes to participate by way of a telecast. However, Dylan's words took the form of a statement:

It's quite an honor to be nominated and, if circumstances permitted, I'd no doubt be there. We'll be touring in Australia at that time, however, and it would mean canceling shows that had been planned some time ago. So, while it's impossible for me to appear on the Academy Awards in person, I'd be thrilled to perform live via satellite, if that could be arranged. That way, I wouldn't be disappointing my fans in Australia and I'd still be able to accept the Academy's gracious offer. I really hope it all works out.

Whatever else, those do not sound like Dylan's own words. Indeed, a phrase like "gracious offer" has a Japanese ring to it. USA Today makes reference to the 18-hour time difference between Sydney and Los Angeles. On this basis, I calculate that an evening event in Los Angeles on 25 March would take place around the middle of the day on 26 March in Sydney. Given that there is a three-day gap between the Sydney show on 25 March and the Cairns show on 28 March, perhaps Dylan will leave his equipment set up, have a good night's sleep, do the Oscars' insert live by satellite and still get to the next show. We shall see.

19 March 2001
Bob Dylan’s comments on the Australian tour, Adelaide Airport source: reported on r.m.d.

Some interesting comments to the waiting press as well...

Q: What have you been doing in Australia?
BD: Playing shows.
Q: What are you looking forward to doing in Australia?
BD: Play.
Q: What are your plans for Adelaide?
BD: Play and leave.

In a further response to a question that many of his fans were disappointed in 1998 on his previous visit to Adelaide, because he didn’t play enough ‘hits’, he responded:

BD: Casual fans might not know what to expect from the show, but hard fans won’t get any surprises. They know what I’m going to be playing.

25 March 2001
Amanda Meade interview, Channel 9 Studios, Sydney, Australia

source: The Australian newspaper, Tuesday, 27 March 2001 & r.m.d.

IN THE WRONG TOWN, SHOULD BE IN HOLLYWOOD

Bob Dylan sang his Oscar award-winning song 'Things Have Changed', tucked away in Channel Nine studios in Sydney.

His minders, armed with mobile phones and security guards, tried their best to stop him talking to Sydney journalists, fresh from hearing his song had taken out the top honour.

Behind the scenes, acclaimed Nine television producer Peter Faiman mustered the biggest set of musical equipment he had seen, all flown in for Dylan's live cross to Hollywood.

Insiders say Dylan made last-minute changes to his set, always the artist.

Fleeting between his Nine dressing-room and his especially fitted out trailer, Dylan told 'The Australian' he was thrilled to win the award.

"It is extremely surreal and I would have liked to have been there, but there was no way I could make that happen," he said.

When asked about winning an Academy Award, Dylan said: "It's quite something, isn't it? There's not a whole lot of people who have them."

- Amanda Meade

25 March 2001
73rd Academy Awards Ceremony, Channel 9 Studios, Sydney, Australia via satellite to Shrine Auditorium, LA, CA

Source: Circulating tape

Interestingly Bob Dylan decides NOT to sing the Hollywood stanza! Here's the version Dylan sang that night:

I'm a worried man, got a worried mind
Nothing in front of me, no one behind
There's a woman on my lap and she's drinking champagne
Got white skin, got assassin's eyes
I'm staring up into the sapphire-tinted skies
I'm well dressed, waiting on the last train

Standing on the gallows with my head in a noose
Any minute now I'm expecting all hell to break loose

People are crazy and times are strange
I'm locked in tight, I'm out of range
I used to care, but things have changed

[This place ain't doing me any good
I'M IN THE WRONG TOWN, I SHOULD BE IN HOLLYWOOD
Just for a second there I thought I saw something move
Gonna take dancing lessons do the jitterbug rag
Ain't no shortcuts, gonna dress in drag
Only a fool in here would think he's got anything to prove

Lot of water under the bridge, Lot of other stuff too
Don't get up gentlemen, I'm only passing through]

I've been walking forty miles of bad road
If the bible is right, the world will explode
I'm trying to get as far away from myself as I can
Some things are too hot to touch
The human mind can only stand so much
You can't win with a losing hand

Feel like falling in love with the first woman I meet
Putting her in a wheelbarrow, wheeling her down the street

People are crazy and times are strange
I'm locked in tight, I'm out of range
I used to care, but things have changed

I hurt easy, I just don't show it
You can hurt someone and not even know it
Next sixty seconds could be like an eternity
Gonna get low down, gonna fly high
All the truth in the world add up to one big lie
I'm in love with a woman that don't even appeal to me

Mr. Jinx and Miss Lucy, they jumped in the lake
I'm not that eager to make a mistake

People are crazy and times are strange
I'm locked in tight, I'm out of range
I used to care, but things have changed

Bob Dylan's acceptance speech:

Oh, good God, this is amazing. I've got to thank Curtis Hanson for encouraging me to do this song and everybody at Paramount, Sherry Lansing and Jonathan Dolgen. But especially Curtis, who just kept at it. And he said this song was right and just encouraged me to do it so much and I'm so glad I did. Everybody at Columbia Records, my record company, who supports me all through these years, Tommy Mottola, Donny Ienner, Larry Jenkins, Will Botwin, John Igracias, everybody like that up here. I want to say hello to all of my family and friends out there watching.

And I want to thank the members of the Academy who were bold enough to give me this award for this song, which obviously… a song that doesn't pussyfoot around nor turn a blind eye to human nature. And God bless you all with peace, tranquility, and good will.

Thanks.

23 May 2001
World Wildlife Fund press release re: Shelter from the Storm

Source: Internet

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE MAY 23, 2001 8:01 PM
CONTACT: World Wildlife Fund
Jo Lynn Dorrance 202-778-9672
jolynn.dorrance@wwfus.org

BOB DYLAN CELEBRATES BIRTHDAY WITH GIFT TO ANIMALS

WASHINGTON – May 23 – As he turns 60, Bob Dylan is paying back a 30-year-old debt he says he owes to his first fans — animals.

Dylan, who is 60 on Thursday, has given one of his classic songs, "Shelter from the Storm," to World Wildlife Fund for use in a new public service announcement. It is the first time, in his long and distinguished career as one of America's most influential singer-songwriters, that Dylan has allowed his words and music to be used for charitable purposes.

"Its nice to know something I did a long time ago can help save animals today," the singer said. "WWF is a good cause, I support them, and am proud to lend my music to this effort. Early on, animals were the only ones who liked my music. Now it's pay back time."

"Shelter from the Storm" is being used as the soundtrack for two WWF public service ads that make the point that wild animals and their habitats need shelter from man-made environmental storms. The TV spots are narrated by actor Donald Sutherland.

"All of us at WWF are extremely grateful to Bob Dylan for his support," said Ginette Hemley, WWF's vice president for species conservation. "As human-induced pressures on natural habitats increase, the challenge of saving endangered species becomes more difficult by the day. Mr. Dylan's gift of song will help us meet that challenge by making more Americans aware of the issues and what they can do to help."

The 60 and 30-second spots, produced by the PlowShare Group of Stamford, Ct., are being released this week to networks and TV stations across the country.

"If a song can help save an animal, I'm glad it's my song," Dylan said. "If I can give something back and it can do some good to speak for those animals who can't speak for themselves, Amen."

PlowShare Group works exclusively with non-profit organizations to harness the power of communications for social good.

June 2001
"Love And Theft" Press Release

Love And Theft

Love And Theft is the first studio album from BOB DYLAN since 1997's Grammy Award-winning Album Of The Year Time Out Of Mind. The album features 12 brand-new BOB DYLAN compositions recorded this Spring with BOB DYLAN's touring band, augmented with other musicians including legendary Texas keyboard player Augie Myers.

Edna Gundersen of USA Today writes "Dylan's 43rd album exudes the breezy confidence of a veteran and the adventurous energy of a budding prodigy... Love And Theft finds pop's inscrutable iconoclast breaking new ground while simultaneously mining gloried traditions in American song".

Los Angeles Times pop music critic Robert Hilburn describes the album as "filled with an energy and imagination of its own: almost as if he wanted to revisit some of the classic pop, folk and rock musical textures he heard on the radio as a youngster in Minnesota".

Dylan himself has said of Love And Theft "All the songs are variations on the 12-bar theme and blues-based melodies. The music here is an electronic grid, the lyrics being the sub-structure that holds it all together. The songs themselves don't have any genetic history. Is it like Time Out Of Mind, or Oh Mercy, or Blood On The Tracks, or whatever? Probably not. I think of it more as a greatest hits album, Volume 1 or Volume 2. Without the hits; not yet, anyway".

The release of Love and Theft marks another milestone in the career of one of the world's most extraordinary artists, and comes amidst one of BOB DYLAN's most creative and prolific periods. In only four years since the release of the platinum Time Out Of Mind, BOB DYLAN has performed nearly 450 concerts around the world. He also wrote and recorded "Things Have Changed", featured in the film Wonder Boys, for which he received both the Academy Award and Golden Globe earlier this year.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (British coverage – The Times Magazine)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
United Kingdom, The Times Magazine, 8 Sept 2001
Interviewer: ALAN JACKSON

DYLAN ON SONG

As Bob Dylan releases another classic, the connoisseurs are poised to deconstruct every syllable — and that, says the disgruntled singer, is just sad.

He skirts the Spanish Steps in the company of bodyguards, two gentlemen of brick-outhouse proportions. The narrow streets here are choked with young and pretty tourists, girls and boys made drowsy by travel and the midday sun. They pay little heed to the slight figure who is now being steered through and around them. But the realisation does come, five or so seconds after he and his protectors have passed the crowd by. Over one after another tanned, collegiate faces realisation washes like a wave: 'Man, isn't that – wasn't that – Bob Dylan?' Too late. The icon in a cowboy hat has gone.

It is almost four years now since I last met him. Then, aged 56 he was on medication and in slow recovery from pericarditis. Swelling of the sac around the heart caused by a rare fungal infection. Though well enough to tour again by that point, it was clear that the experience had rocked and marked him. How could it not have done? At times, he had been so weak and wracked with pain that he felt sure he must be dying. Now, fully restored to health and welcoming me into this fussy, old-fashioned hotel suite, he looks younger, brighter, a different man. He is talking like a different man, too.

The Dylan of that previous encounter seemed genuinely bowled over by my enthusiasm for an about-to-be-released album. "I'm so glad you like it," he insisted. "In fact, I'm very overwhelmed. I'm used to my records being slagged off and my shows misrepresented... and you do get used to it.

"You have to. The acceptance of a record? I think it would take a while to get used to that again. So, thank you." Coming from arguably the greatest noncollabortive songwriter of the 20th century, this low level of expectation for his output seemed extraordinary. Depressing, actually. And unjust. But happily, my enthusiasm for Time Out of Mind was to be shared by many others.

Just over a week later, the LP debuted in the top ten of both the British and US charts. Best Of... and Greatest Hits collections aside, it would become his best-selling release in two decades (1.8 million units to date), and certainly his most award-garlanded: three Grammies at the 1998 ceremony, including that for Album of the Year. Yet, "not especially gratifying", he shrugs off the latter now, "because, let's face it, you can win 'em in so many different categories". Yes, perhaps (Best Bluegrass, Best Polka even), but Album of the Year... surely you have to take pleasure when your creative peers judge a piece of work to be that? "It's nice, I suppose," he allows, grudgingly. "But, once you've finished a record, the fact that someone wants to call it this or that is neither here nor there to my way of thinking."

Curmudgeonly? Newly ungracious? Afflicted with a short and selective memory?

Just as I was about to tick a disappointing trio of boxes on some mental checklist, Dylan's face is lit up by a grin and he volunteers the fact mat winning an Oscar last year for Things Have Changed, theme to the Curtis Hanson-directed Wonder Boys, really did strike him as special. "A lot of performers have won Grammies. Thousands. But very few have won Academy Awards, so that puts me on a different plateau." He shrugs, and searches for the name of another such victor: "I can only think of Springsteen [for Streets of Philadelphia, from the film Philadelphia]." Too quickly, and more brightly than intended, I supply the name of Carly Simon (for Let the River Run, from Working Girl). A tightening of the mouth, followed by, "I didn't know that. Yes. Well, anyway, there have been very, very few. The fact is that they're simply not that generous with them. And if I hadn't won [an ironic roll of the eyes now] part of me would probably have been just devastated!" He wants me to believe that he is joking, but I find myself reluctant to do so. Because we had all thought Bob Dylan's glory days to be long gone, and then he went and proved us wrong.

Somewhere inside he has got to be delighted, possibly even a little surprised. Back on me eve of this unanticipated critical and commercial renaissance, I had broached that very issue. Rather than take offence, he had merely repeated my question ("Has it been disabling creatively to have people say my best work is behind me?") before answering flatly: "Not really, because for the most part I felt — feel – that way myself."

Not so. Love and Theft, a brand-new album and the 43rd of his career, is released on Monday. And the happy news is that, although very different, it is better yet man Time Out of Mind. Moreover, in terms of invention and consistency, it bears comparison with anything he wrote and recorded 30 or more years ago. But before we turn to any discussion of this latest work, there is another important event to remind ourselves of. On May 24 this year, Dylan turned 60.

Across the world, and as a result of his usual reclusiveness and non-availability, the grown-up media leapt into profiling mode. Obituary mode, almost. His role as voice of a generation; his significance within the pantheon of our popular culture... "I know! What was all of that about?" Respect and affection, generally, I'd wager. And as such, was it gratifying for him? There is no response. Amusing, then? "I can't remember. It feels like several years ago." At least, I suggest, it must have reassured him as to what the consensual assessment of his contribution will be on that day, hopefully far off into the future, when he does depart this world. Dylan smiles and says nothing, so I try again. Is he confident of what his place in history will be judged to be? "Oh, absolutely, absolutely," he says. "There's no doubt in my mind." So how did he celebrate his birthday? "I blew out the candles, ate some cake, and went to bed." Please? "I had a bunch of family around and that was about it. I'm not that big on birthdays. It's kind of a pagan holiday, after all."

This blocking of all non-musical discussion is very much a feature of the man. We know, because it is recorded fact, that Dylan has four now-adult children – Jesse, Anna, Samuel and Jakob, lead singer with the acclaimed rock band the Wallflowers – from a 12-year marriage, dissolved in 1977, to Sara Lowndes. We are not allowed to know if he has a current partner or, if so, who that might be. And even the gentlest inquiry about what are believed to be his recreational pursuits – golf, gym work-outs and, it is whispered, a little light boxing – is treated as an impertinence, if not an actual intrusion. This leaves us with his music, consideration of which has become the life's work of a legion of critics, biographers and professional fans.

In his cheerful but decidedly combative mood of today, they are not spared: "These so-called connoisseurs of Bob Dylan music... I don't feel they know a thing, or have any inkling of who I am and what I'm about. I know they think they do, and yet it's ludicrous, it's humorous, and sad. That such people have spent so much of their time thinking about who? Me? Get a life, please. It's not something any one person should do about another. You're not serving your own life well. You're wasting your life."

In the light of this statement, it becomes easier to understand why external validation should mean so little to him. Basically, he reckons that we all get it wrong. For example, where the so-lauded Time Out of Mind is concerned. "My recollection of that record is that it was a struggle. A struggle every inch of the way. Ask Daniel Lanois, who was trying to produce the songs. Ask anyone involved in it. They all would say the same. I didn't trust the touring band I had at the time to do a good job in the studio, and so I hired these outside guys. But with me not knowing them, and them not knowing the music, things kept on taking unexpected turns.

Repeatedly, I'd find myself compromising on this to get to mat. As a result, though it held together as a collection of songs, that album sounds to me a little off.

"There's a sense of some wheels going this way, some wheels going that, but hey, we're just about getting there." This of the album which restored him to multimillion-selling status, and which won him those three Grammies.

"But that's my truthful memory of it, and that memory overshadows any gratification about its acceptance."

So let's not even begin to imagine he will be anything other than irritated that its downbeat, world-weary lyrics were interpreted as being inspired by an increased awareness of his own impermanence (this despite the fact mat they were completed before ever he became sick).

"Where?" he demands. "Show me? I don't see it like mat. But again, that's the story of my life.

"From The Times They are a-Changin' onwards, people have misconstrued my words. They've attached the wrong meanings to mem. That's the status quo. That's what happens, and there's nothing to be done about it."

Again, not so. Because, if he chose to, he could put the Dylanophiles right.

"Our function is not to explain. If it's not too bold, I consider myself to be an innovator, one of very few around. And as such, it's certainly not for me to account for what I'm doing. I leave that to others. Hopefully, there are one or two out there who have the knowledge and the insight to make fair comment. Beyond that, what can I say?"

Well, for instance, he could tell us if the experience of illness and subsequent recovery of full health actually has had any effect on his belief system at all. "I don't know," is the reply. "As you're aware, I was on medication for a good long while afterwards. But I was able to cut down gradually and, one day, stop taking it. And at some point during that process – it's hard to say exactly when or where – the sickness faded away. I drew no profound conclusions from it at all."

Love and Theft is what he wants to talk about. This time, no outside producer was involved. "Because I didn't feel any additional help was necessary. Not that I want to take credit or draw attention to myself. I don't want to get flooded with calls from other people, asking me to pilot their records. Heh-heh-heh! It's not like I'm in need of the work!"

Playing it through is like turning the dials on some ancient crystal wireless set. Though the sound is crisp and new, the musical inspiration feels to be as old as time. And most striking of all in this era of composition-by-numbers, of hooks and choruses and samples, is the fact mat all 12 tracks are narrative in structure and essence. They are a reminder of what songwriting used to be for and about – the simple telling of a story.

Dylan nods, looking pleased at this suggestion: "Exactly so!"

In this, the album will be an anomaly within the current marketplace. For another reason, it is unusual even within the context of his own back catalogue. Among its tracks is Mississippi, written and recorded for the Time Out of Mind project, but not included in the final line-up (Sheryl Crow later covered it on her 1998 release, The Globe Sessions). Subsequently Dylan has cut a new, definitive version — the first time he has ever re-recorded one of his own unreleased songs. Or has been of a mind to. "With all of my records, there's an abundance of material left over – stuff that, for a variety of reasons, doesn't make the final cut. And other people seem to think they have some kind of right to it. That it's their property, even, which is baffling to me. I mean, you don't drive a car out of the showroom without paying for it, do you? You don't leave the supermarket without passing through the check-out with your goods. It's called stealing. Why the principle should be thought to be any different when it comes to music, I really don't know."

He is referring to the hosts of bootleg recordings that have found their way into the public domain across the years. "And have been bought up by so-called hardcore fans of mine [a sneering tone here], whoever they might be — those folks out there who are obsessed with finding every scrap of paper I've ever written on, every single outtake. All right, that's the world we live in. I accept it's just the way things are. But the fact is that I can no longer be interested in it [material 'released' without his consent in this way]. It's already been contaminated for me. I turn my back, move on to something else. This time though [and as a result of the stricter controls he is now exerting over his own recordings], my original wasn't floating around out there, and I felt able to go back and revisit it. I'm glad for once to have had the opportunity to do so."

It is hard to believe that Love and Theft will do anything other than continue this process of Dylan's critical and commercial rehabilitation.

Meanwhile, and independent of this, his work diary remains fully booked for the remainder of 2001, and there seems no prospect of a let-up in the number of live dates — habitually between 100 and 150 – to which he and his band commit themselves each year. "Come January, we'll just look at a map of the world and decide where it is we want to go and what it is we want to do there."

With this in mind, I mention a recent comment to me by the blues guitarist Buddy Guy: "Musicians don't retire, son. They just drop." A brief smile is the response. "Well, I've no plans myself right now to draw any line within the sand. What's more likely is some day I'll just wake up and decide that I have had enough. And if and when that happens, I won't have any problem with walking away. I've fulfilled every single thing I wanted to do. I feel like there is nothing left for me to prove."

He has no plans, he tells me shortly, for writing his autobiography. Because all he wants the world to know about his life is contained within the songs, perhaps? This remark provokes a narrowing of the eyes, and then the following statement: "I don't even consider this work as part of my life. Not even close. My life doesn't revolve around my work. Not even a little bit. I mean, I've got millions of fans and I know that and I'm more than happy to go out there and play for them... But that's not my life. My life is private and personal and completely filled up." With which Bob Dylan stands, pats my shoulder and gives a conspiratorial wink. Seconds later, he is gone.

Love and Theft is released by Columbia on Monday.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Irish coverage – The Irish Times Magazine)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source: The Irish Times Magazine, Saturday, September 29, 2001, pp. 25-29.

BOB DYLAN COMES CLEAN
in an interview with Dave Fanning

On a glorious summer's afternoon in a small room in the Hotel de la Ville, on the Via Sistina just off the Spanish Steps in Rome, Bob Dylan breezes in almost excitedly, less a bundle nerves, tics and mannerisms than a man slightly uneasy about this whole interview lark. Like most stars, he's smaller in the flesh than in your mind. His dress, black, is casual, sloppy even; grey hair tumbles from beneath a black cowboy hat, This close, he seems much healthier than the embalmed Vincent Price look he projects from the concert stage. For over an hour he sits upright in an occasionally twitchy kind of way at the edge of his seat.

One of the reasons why Bob Dylan doesn't talk to the press is probably because an awful lot of people think that he's got an awful lot to say. He'd be the first to admit that he doesn't, despite the fact that he's lumbered with that "spokesman for a generation" tag which for millions of people means that his music can singlehandedly sum up growing up in the 1960s. Despite 20 or 30 unauthorised biographies, the truth is still out there and Dylan does have plans to tell it, however oblique the end result may be. Up until now he'd have preferred that you gathered together some recent quotes and leave it at that. Here's a few:

"I think words like 'icon' and 'legend' are just other terms for the guys of the day before yesterday, who nobody wants to know these days. You can influence all kinds of people but sometimes it gets in the way..."

"[Today's audiences] react immediately to what I do and they don't come with a lot of preconceived ideas of what they'd like me to do or who they think I am. Indeed, we seem to be attracting a new audience, not just those who know me as some kind of figurehead from a different age. I don't really have to deal with that anymore..."

"The stage is the only place where I'm happy. It's the only place you can be what you want to be. When you're up there and you look at the audience and they look back then you have the feeling of being in a burlesque. But there's a certain part of you that becomes addicted to a live audience. I do about 25 shows a year, which may sound a lot to people who don't work that much, but it isn't. Someone like BB King is working 350 nights a year."

You get the impression that, in his own way, Dylan is as relaxed and buoyant as he is on his new and 43rd album, Love and Theft — good qualities for a conversation but not necessarily for an album. With a bluesy take on a bunch of songs not hugely dissimilar in sound and construction to those on his 30-year-old Nashville Skyline, he's now having a good time with country blues-type ballads. We got some hints of this at that glorious, intimate gig in Dublin's Vicar St last winter. But if you're a fan of Dylan's piano and harmonica workouts, there's little for you here. In amongst the rootsy 12-bar-blues and Appalachian croons you'll find a hymn (Sugar Baby), western swing (Summer Days), and hard rock (Honest with Me). The standout is Highwater, an acoustic country blues number driven by dobro, banjo and acoustic guitar.

Dylan describes Love and Theft as "a greatest hits album without the hits". "Well, we're gonna have to wait and see about this particular album," he states, confidently. "It just might be a landmark album. I mean, we never know these things until much later than the event itself, even though it might be an invisible event we're talking about. You're gonna have to listen a whole lot more." He adds, wryly, "Like you do those early albums."

Ah, yes, the early albums. Firstly, there's the folk collection, whose significance we often unfairly judge only in terms of how it shaped his mid-1960s rock output. Secondly, there is that output which, in a 14-month period, yielded Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde. Boasting multiple styles and moods, flowering wordplay, vitriol, humour and themes which range from the intimate to the political, these are records which fulfil you intellectually, musically and politically.

On stage, these songs change beyond recognition. "My records are underdeveloped from day one," Dylan says. "Basically I sing a song. I strum around on the guitar. In recorded technology, that's called making demos. It's no accident that other singers have had better hits with my songs than I have. That's no accident, because they've sensed there's a structure to them, and there is. I've never been allowed to develop that, working with slipshod producers or fakes or a bunch of nonentities.

"And so be it! I was still willing to allow that to happen and I could go onstage and rectify it. So what I'm saying is that songs need structure, stratagems, codes and stability. And then you hang lyrics on them. I'm speaking here as someone who sings a song that's written. And when we transfer all that to the stage, that's where all that comes into play. They don't come into play on a record 'cos my cohorts at the time never really sought to develop any of that stuff and I can't do it at the time of recording 'cos the song at the time is new to me."

Warming to the theme, he adds: "I don't listen to them [producers] and I never feel the songs have been perfected. I used to have a problem — I don't anymore — with working on some album where a song might have been recorded, but I didn't think it had been recorded very well or the right way or the way I hear it in my mind. Then the song as it exists gets out by people you trust. I've been asked: 'So how come your such a bad judge of your material? You don't put the best stuff on your record?' Well. I don't know who judges what the best stuff is or not but, basically, I'm not judging my material. I just don't think some of my stuff was recorded right.

"And then once it gets out I'm not that keen on going in and re-recording it, except on this record." Here, Dylan is referring to the song Mississippi. "We had that on the Time Out of Mind album. It wasn't recorded very well but, thank God, it never got out, so we recorded it again. But something like that would never have happened 10 years ago. You'd have probably all heard the trashy version of it and I'd have never re-recorded it."

So does that mean you take more care? "Well, yeah," he shrugs. "But really it's that I don't trust anybody. It's that simple."

Most Dylan fans have a favourite Dylan album which failed to reach the audience it deserved. Let's take mid-period Dylan and Street Legal as an example. "Well, I don't know about Street Legal. There were probably other artists who were being featured in the media. The cultural landscape was a little different back then, probably. I wouldn't know. I know that I've always been with the same record company. They probably tried everything to sell it. It probably wasn't what people wanted to hear at that time."

Bob Dylan, the private, guarded, reluctant icon is positively dismissive about his legions of religious devotees. "What kind of religion are they?", he snaps, albeit good-humouredly. "I mean, what sacrifices do they make? And to whom do they sacrifice, these hardcore religious fans? And I'd like to know when and where they make their sacrifices 'cos I'd like to be there. I don't really feel I've any hardcore fans. There are some people that do. I really just don't. We have a few people who see an abundance of my shows but we don't think of them as hardcore fans." Probably not a great time to mention the hundreds of Dylan websites, one of which chronologically details every song he has ever played at every gig, with each set-list updated every day.

He claims to have read just one of the many biographies. "I haven't read any really since that Bob Shelton one came out and I knew him and I don't know these other people. It's difficult reading about oneself 'cos in your own mind things don't appear that way. They didn't happen that way. It seems like you're reading about other people. It's fictitious. So, if it's gonna be fictitious, where's all the good stuff?"

Dylan is now writing about himself — "It'll be published in an article form, but as a book, a book of articles, because they're ongoing. That's about as much as it is at the moment." He doesn't look too kindly on his previous literary effort, his mid-1960s "book" Tarantula, which, in the past, he has admitted was just a collection of thoughts and lyrics, gathered together to satisfy the public's insatiable appetite and to make money.

"That's a particular incident. Things were running wild at that point. It never was my intention to write a book. Y'see, I had a manager who said, 'Well, y'know, he writes all these songs... what else does he write?' And he might've said, 'Well, what else he got?' 'Well, does he write books?' And he might've said, 'Of course he does!' And they said, 'Well, we'd like to publish one'. I think it was one of those kind of things where he arranged the whole thing and it was up to me to write the book. It was never anything that I consciously set out to do.

"He did that on different occasions. He had me on a television show being an actor. I didn't know anything about it. Until the day I appeared, I thought I was gonna sing. These things would happen back in the early part of the... last century!"

And does it all seem a long time ago? "Ages."

Regarding Dylan's memoirs, a haphazard "why not?" seems like the best response to the "why now?" question. "Oh, I think that with this type of writing, I was just trying to find the right way to get into it, rather than making it some kind of self-serving story of my particular past. If it seems to happen that way, it's actually dissimilar in a lot of ways. I can do it because I'm a famous person so I use that fame because a lot of the things I might write about, other people know about anyway. So with a person like myself, the process of doing it this way works.

"I mean, I'm not really making a real attempt to do this. I just do it in my spare time."

Throughout the decades, Dylan has successfully managed to avoid talking too much about himself. Reflecting on the difficult phases, he takes a long pause and eventually offers: "There've been a lot of tricky parts where you have to assume another character in order to... em, survive. Basically you have to surrender your ambitions at a certain point in order to get where you need to be." But what kinds of ambition did you ever surrender? "That's what you're going to have to find out."

Dylan tours constantly, to the point where you feel he's probably happier in the tour bus than in any one of his 17 homes. "Well, the tour buses are becoming pretty luxurious," he half deadpans. "As far as 'happy' goes, as far as 'happy in a home' goes, I can't say I don't feel at home livin' most anywhere. I mean, I feel at home at home and when I'm not there, it's not like I'm longing for anything that's not presently where I'm at." And is it easier to be Bob Dylan today than it used to be? "I'm not the one to ask. That's a philosophical question."

If, as he maintains, his approach to his autobiographical musings is to use his songs as springboards, has this forced him to revisit the old albums for — if legend is to be believed — the first time since they were released? And does he allow himself a "God, I was good"-type reaction? "Well, I'm only looking at it from an angle that maybe it has never occurred to me before to look at it. A lot of the things that happen to us, we just seem to go through without ever wondering if there's a purpose to go from this to that. It's often a case of one of those questions: 'Could this have happened if that didn't happen and if this maybe felt so bad at the time, why did it maybe lead to something very beneficial in the long run?' It's written from a variety of angles, really, and it interests me to write it but I'm not painstakingly doing it."

One of the more recent unauthorised Dylan biographies points to the fact that, unlike so many of the other big names of the 20th century, Bob Dylan's best work is not limited to a single period. He's a guru to millions who hear their deepest thoughts and feelings expressed in his songs, an artist who is perceived to be an original thinker, whose work encapsulates wisdom. Dylan's lyrics have become figures of speech. His quips, and there are many, are included in compendiums of modern quotations. This makes Dylan an unusual entertainer. However great Elvis was, few would consider him a source of wit and wisdom. In his youth as a folksinger, Dylan was closely associated with movements for social change, an icon of the early Sixties alongside John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King. In the mid-Sixties he rebelled against categorisation by setting his poetic lyrics to the sound of amplified rock 'n' roll. In his maturity he has written eloquently of love, faith, marriage, parenthood and ageing. In the summer of 1966, Dylan was injured when he fell off his motorbike. Allegedly, that is. Maybe it was just the most convenient way to avoid the treadmill for a few years.

"It's difficult for me to pinpoint anytime where I made any conscious decision to do this or that," he says, "but obviously with that particular time, I just didn't feel like going out to play. I didn't feel like I was part of that culture." Ironically, while Dylan was completely absent from the Summer of Love and the hippie "culture" in general, his silence caused his mystique to grow, thus allowing Dylanologists of varying degrees of credulity and sanity to flourish.

Although he reads Shakespeare and the Bible, he doesn't study poetry anymore and he's not turned on by new writers. "I just don't really think there are any," he asserts, "because we live in a different time. The media is all-pervasive. What can a writer think of to write that you don't see every day in a newspaper or on television?" Well, there are emotions to be expressed. "The media is moving people's emotions anyway. When Rimbaud was writing, William Blake or Shelley or Byron or any of those people, there probably wasn't any media, just somewhere where you could feel free to put down anything that came into your mind."

But don't you feel free when you're writing? "Well, like I say, I don't particularly sit down and write. My lines go into songs and they have a certain structure, they have to conform to a certain idiom. They're not free-form and there's no point trying to throw in some ideological idea. You can't do it in a song." But you've done it. "I've done it? If I did, I did it de facto but I've never intentionally started out with that in mind. I mean I never have. Maybe some others have, but I haven't."

So it's safe to make the assumption that TV and the media in general have killed poetry and literature. "Absolutely. Absolutely. Even literature is written for an audience. It's not just written, it doesn't sit down. Everybody's not Kafka, sitting down and writing something that should never be seen by... that you don't want some analyst to see. Most people who sit down, they want people to see it. They want people to read it. They want a person's reaction. They want some type of acceptance. But the media is doing that for everybody now. And movies and TV. I mean, you can't see more horrific things than you see in the media, especially in the news. I'm just talking about the news department, which is showing people absolutely everything they'd ever even dreamed about. Even thoughts they might think and suppress forever, they'd see them in the media. So you can't express them anymore.

"What's a writer to do if every idea is exposed in the media before he can get to it or let it evolve? What's a writer gonna write about?"

Firing on all cylinders, Dylan adds: "It's a science-fiction world. We're living in a science-fiction world. We're living in a world that Disney has conquered. Disney's science fiction. Theme parks, trendy streets, it's all science fiction. So I'd say that if a writer has something to say, he'll have to do it within that science-fiction world. Whether we realise it or not, science fiction has become the real world."

Despite the feeling that Bob Dylan is not so much a man out of time as a man a little out of step, his new album, Love and Theft, has been rapturously received. Even Columbia, his record company, appears willing to give it the big push. Recently, over Malibu's various beaches, I watched a light plane circling the sunbathers and surfboarders with a giant streamer flapping in its wake. It read: BOB DYLAN: LOVE AND THEFT. They'd never have done that for Street Legal. There's even a first-time-ever TV commercial! The result? It's gone 'top three' in the album charts.

I suppose the fact is that, great and all as his last album, Time Out of Mind (1997) most certainly is, it was a haunting meditation on mortality and sounded like a postcard from the cemetery. And Dylan himself underwent serious heart surgery around that time. Time Out of Mind nonetheless managed to win three Grammys, including Album of the Year. It's obvious that his health scare did little to hamper his momentum and left no lasting physical or psychological scars.

Today, Dylan looks as fit as a fiddle even if on record he sounds as though his favourite breakfast is ashtrays-on-toast. But he's cracking jokes and reflecting on love, and not always in a rueful way. As often with Bob Dylan, the overall effect is loose as various tunes are tangled up in blues, country and rockabilly. The lyrics are playful and unstudied. What he's doing here is straddling the future (no, I'm not talking about techno, hip-hop, garage or trance) and the past in a radical reinvention of prewar US song styles. You get the impression that Dylan likes this album and feels that others are going to like it also. In among the rave reviews, Rolling Stone magazine bestowed on Love and Theft a perfect score of five stars, the first time in nine years it has done that for a new album (the last was REM's Automatic for the People).

Tackle Dylan on his lyrics and he's got little to say. Especially anything related to his private life. Dylan's mother died last year, and on the song Lonesome Day Blues, he sings, "I wish my mother was still alive." He's been quoted as saying that "even to talk about my mother just breaks me up". Best leave it at that.

Bob Dylan, at 60, is a working musician, a troubadour, a song-and-dance man. The latest leg of his Never-Ending Tour kicks off in Spokane, Washington on October 5th. Dylan would be the first to admit that the only thing he knows how to do is to keep on keepin' on.

The inaugural volume of Chronicles, about 100 pages of recollections of Bob Dylan's early folk days in New York City, will be published by Simon and Schuster next year

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Irish coverage – Hot Press)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source: The Hot Press Annual issue for 2002

DF – Dave Fanning

HIGHWAY '01 REVISITED
The Fanning/Dylan outtakes

Previously unpublished extracts from Dave Fanning's recent interview with Bob Dylan in Rome during which Zimmy tried to recall a night with Bono, expresses his fear of the Internet and answers the ultimate question: Ever meet Elvis?

DF: The media celebrated your sixtieth birthday. Did you?
BD: Just in the usual way. Blew out some candles, that's about it.
DF: Did you invite friends?
BD: Yeah, mostly just family.
DF: Are you younger than that now?
BD: Sure hope so (laughs).
DF: Does the level of celebration around such an event bother you or please you?
BD: No.
DF: Lately you've won a bunch of awards including Grammys and, this year, an Oscar. Feel good?
BD: Yeah, I know, I'm winnin' a lot of stuff. Kinda funny, isn't it?
DF: Are they catching up on wasted time?
BD: I think there's an element of that in it. I wouldn't know.
DF: I've heard rumours about a Nobel Prize nomination... ?
BD: Yeah, I hear about that. Who would that put me in the company of? I'm not sure.
DF: Hemingway, Faulkner, Steinbeck...
BD: Oh Hemingway. I think all the guys who write like Hemingway write for Time magazine, don't they?
DF: Isn't Steinbeck an old favourite of yours?
BD: Hmmm, I'm not sure if I really belong in that category of people.
DF: Is that a question of higher or lower?
BD: It's difficult to say. It's all really pretty relative.
DF: How does the Dylan legend affect what you do?
BD: Ninety-five percent of the time, that doesn't affect my life whatsoever. The other part?... Well, we who are involved in fame, we just have to learn to deal with it any kind of way we can.
DF: Any strategy?
BD: I don't have any strategy for it. I try to be as polite as possible.
DF: Ever wonder 'why me'?
BD: Not at this point. I know what it is I've done to be famous, so...
DF: In one of your last conversations with Allen Ginsberg you said that fame had no redeeming qualities whatsoever. What would you substitute fame for?
BD: I really don't travel in the world of the rich and famous. I don't really feel I'm part of that culture in any way.
DF: Do you find it hard to find places where you're not recognised?
BD: Well, at this point I'm recognised just about everywhere. Everywhere. I don't even remember the last time I wasn't recognised.

DF: Looking back, when you first made an impact, was it a good time to be doing what you were doing?

BD: I didn't really choose to do what it is you see me doing. It chose me. If I had anything to do with it, it'd be something different... a scientist, an engineer, a doctor. Those are the people I look up to. I don't really look up to entertainers at all. They don't have any meaning for me one way or another.

DF: Do you miss much from the past? Are times good now?

BD: Oh, there must be something. I think I miss plenty but I'm not really a very nostalgic person so I don't really yearn for things like that from the past.

DF: Would you have any chance in the business now if you were a newcomer?

BD: I think so, 'cos if you have the ability and the knowledge and the strength to do it, y'know?, that's all you really need and I think I know more about what I'm doing now than I ever... I know I could find a place if that's what I wanted to do but I don't think I'd want to do it if I came on the scene now. Like I said, I'd want to do something else.

DF: Do you feel you're part of a band now?

BD: Well, I always try to have a current band, a current bunch of performers to play the music. You never know how long you can keep a band together or how a band will change from one individual to another; I mean, those things aren't foreseen but this particular group are very competent and can go a lot of different ways musically.

DF: How long do you see yourself doing this?

BD: I don't really know. I suppose until one day I might have had it. I don't know. I can't say until the crowds dwindle down but I may just one day have had enough.

DF: Ever go on the Internet?

BD: I'm afraid to go on the internet. I'm afraid some pervert's gonna lure me somewhere.

DF: Do you listen to a lot of music nowadays?

BD: Some. Not any more than I used to.

DF: New music?

BD: I don't know. Like, who's new?

DF: Eminem?

BD: I wouldn't know anything about that.

DF: On the storytelling level, could you take anything from hip hop?

BD: Beats me. Never really occurred to me to pay attention to what's going on.

DF: You championed Bono pretty early on in U2's career. Didn't you spend a long evening with him once telling him that he should examine the writers, songs and stories from his own Irish past for inspiration? Y'know, look back further than the rock and pop decades?

BD: I could have. I don't remember verbatim or a time and place but if I'm being held responsible for telling him that, I don't really know that I could deny it.

DF: Did Elvis have a strong influence on you?

BD: He did. Growing up he did.

DF: How did you feel when he recorded your song 'Tomorrow Is A Long Time'?

BD: What can you say? When someone like that records your song, I'm sure any songwriter would feel intensely gratified.

DF: Did you ever meet Elvis?

BD: Emm... (long pause)... I never did meet him. (Pause). Well, that's what I'm supposed to say. (grins).

23 July 2001
Press Conference (French coverage)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source: ISIS #99, Oct-Nov 2001, pp. 46-50.

Newspapermen Eating Candy
The Rome Press Conference

While on tour in Europe during June and July 2001, Bob Dylan gave a "mini press conference." The interview/press conference was along the lines of the interview session given around the time of the release of "Time Out Of Mind." This latest session, which took place on July 23, 2001, featured many of the same journalists.

There were thirteen journalists present representing twelve countries. It appears that on the day of the "mini press conference" Dylan also gave two separate one-on-one interviews. The first of these was with Christoph Daliach of the Germany paper Der Spiegel (Daliach was also present at the "mini press conference.") The other interview was with UK journalist, Alan Jackson for The Times Magazine.

The interviews took place on a glorious sunny summer's afternoon in a small room in the Hotel de la Ville, on the Via Sistina just off the Spanish Steps in Rome.

Suddenly Bob Dylan is there – he's a quarter of an hour late -he comes into the room dressed in black and white and looking like a gentleman from the Old West. The journalists are seated on a sofa; Dylan sits opposite them behind a wall of microphones and tape recorders. He sits upright on the edge of his seat and is occasionally twitchy. He has a courteous expression, but looks a little nervous; puzzled by something that's not familiar to him even after all these years in the music business. Every line on his face tells the story of a decade, but in the centre of that face, shadowed by untidy slightly greying curls that fall from beneath a white Stetson hat, there are two pale-blue eyes, frighteningly large and attentive, darting like the windows of a great mind that works unceasingly.

Here are thirteen journalists, tense, full of adrenaline and armed to their teeth with questions. To begin with, however, the anticipation becomes an anticlimax. The uneasy interviewee, answers most of the questions with – "er, hmm, I don't know" and he gives only the briefest of answers. However, as the session progresses Dylan begins to open up, he wants to talk about his new album and he even gets round to smiling.

Four hours before the interview, all of the invited journalists were gathered in the same luxurious hotel to listen to the new album, eat fancy sandwiches and drink sparkling wine.

The interview session itself was split into two parts. The first part, which lasted just over half an hour, was mostly nonproductive. After a fifteen-minute break, however, Dylan opened up and talked more freely for a further 50-minutes.

No tapes from this interview are in circulation and as each of the journalists wrote their own accounts, we have had to piece together the interview as presented here from various sources. The sources used here are Rock & Folk (France); Der Spiegel (Germany); La Repubblica (Italy); Dagens Nytheters (Sweden) and The Irish Times Magazine (Ireland). The bulk of the text is taken from Rock & Folk (France) with other quotes (hopefully) inserted in the appropriate places.

Many thanks for help with the sourcing of these interviews goes to Ian Woodward, and for their translation in to English, Jeff Stevens, Jens Winter, Marco Masimo and whoever translated from Swedish. Sorry I can't find your details at the moment!!!

Q: The album is based on the music of your childhood, western swing, rockabilly, blues, country, musical forms that you have never really explored before. Was it a desire to reconnect with your youth?

BD: No. Most songs have traditional roots, but not all of them.

Q: It's a very joyful album. The words are quite dark but the music is tinged with a kind of joy.

BD: Yes, you know, producers have often pushed the sound on the records in one direction or another, without worrying too much about my wishes. Lots of my albums have suffered from that.

Q: So, are you the producer of this album?

BD: Oh, no, no, no, I wouldn't particularly want to pin the label of producer on myself. But when you have an absolutely clear view of the arrangements you want, there is really nothing to produce.

Q: Have you recorded these songs at a particular moment in their existence in order to be able to change them when you play them live?

BD: Not entirely. The tracks were not yet complete when we went into the studio. I had a general idea in mind but not their finished form.

Q: You are singing in surprising registers. On "Po' Boy" particularly you reach some high notes using some amazing jazz reflections.

BD: On that particular song it was the only possible approach. It is a melody that doesn't require instruments or words. The ones I have written simply follow the melody and don't impose too much emotional rhetoric on it.

Q: (The German journalist interjects) Your voice sounds darker than ever before on this album.

BD: I don't think it's ever been recorded in a more accurate way. I don't think I was singing better than in the past.

Q: Do you think there are preconceived ideas about certain voices like yours and Leonard Cohen's and Lou Reed's?

BD: I think Leonard's voice is easily understood because his vocal range is low and straightforward (linear). Lou has his own way of singing and speaking at the same time. Recording them shouldn't be a problem.

The fact is that my voice goes up and down, low and high. It's irregular, and it subverts the classical recording systems. But I really think the right way is the most simple way. All you need is an analogic recording. On my last record, they put on all kinds of effects and overdubs afterwards, to make me sound like the way I do anyway. But on this record, we had a young engineer who knew exactly what to do. He got the point.

Q: Do you listen to your old records?

BD: I don't listen to them because I feel that some of them weren't finished properly. They're not recorded in the right way, or the way I had in mind. I've been asked: 'So how come your such a bad judge of your material?' I've been criticised for not putting my best songs on certain albums but it is because I consider that the song isn't ready yet. It's not been recorded right.

With all of my records, there's an abundance of material left off – stuff that, for a variety of reasons, doesn't make the final cut. And other people seem to think they have some kind of right to it. That it's their property even, which is baffling to me. I mean, you don't drive a car out of the showroom without paying for it, do you? You don't leave the supermarket without passing through the check-out with your goods. It's called stealing. Why the principle should be thought to be any different when it comes to music, I really don't know.

He is referring to the hosts of bootleg recordings that have found their way into the public domain across the years.

BD: They get bought up by so-called hardcore fans of mine [a sneering tone here], whoever they might be – those folks out there who are obsessed with finding every scrap of paper I've ever written on, every single outtake. All right, that's the world we live in. I accept it's just the way things are. But the fact is that I can no longer be interested in it [material 'released' without his consent].

Once it gets out, or is recorded by someone else, I'm not keen on going in and re-recording it. It's already been contaminated for me. I turn my back and move on to something else. Except on this album, for which we re-cut the song 'Mississippi.' We had that on the "Time Out Of Mind" album. It wasn't recorded very well but thank God, it never got out, so we recorded it again. But something like that would never have happen ten years ago. You'd have probably all heard the lousy version of it and I'd have never re-recorded it. I'm glad for once to have had the opportunity to do so.

Q: So does that mean you take more care?

BD: Well, yeah, he shrugs. But really it's that I don't trust anybody. It's that simple.

Q: Most Dylan fans have a favourite Dylan album, which failed to reach the audience it deserved. Let's take mid-period Dylan and "Street Legal" as an example.

BD: Well, I don't know about "Street Legal." There were probably other artists who were being featured in the media. The cultural landscape was a little different back then, probably. I wouldn't know. I know that I've always been with the same record company (sic). They probably tried everything to sell it. It probably wasn't what people wanted to hear at that time.

My records are the bare essentials. Basically, I sing my song and strum my guitar. In recording technology that is called making demos (he is getting a bit edgy.) It is no accident that other singers have had more success with my songs than I have. That's no accident, because they've sensed there's a proper structure to them, and there is. I've never been allowed the opportunity to develop that, because working with slipshod producers or fakes or a bunch of nonentities. I have always allowed that kind of thing to happen because I could get up on stage and rectify it. So, what I'm saying is that songs need a structure, stratagems, codes and stability. And then you hang lyrics on them. I'm speaking here as someone who sings a song that's written. When we transfer all that to the stage, that's where all those elements come into play. They don't come into play on a record 'cos my cohorts at the time never really sort to develop any of that stuff and I can't do it at the time of recording 'cos the song at the time is new to me.

I have often been let down. All those people who thought they knew how to record me hadn't the slightest idea about what needed to be done.

Q: So do you pay more attention than before?

BD: I have always taken care with my records but now I no longer trust anyone. (laughs)

Q: You have said about this new album that it is a "greatest hits without the hits."

BD: Humm, yes. (laughter) You are going to have to work out yourselves whether this album is the peak of my career. It may very well be. But then again maybe not. (laughter) But you people here, you have a responsibility to tell the people about this record, knowing that in ten years time, people will write even more. Everything you write others will comment on. Listen to it again! (laughter)

Q: Is "Love And Theft" an album intended to conquer a new audience?

BD: Absolutely. It is not an album I've recorded to please myself. If I really wanted to do that, I would record some Charley Patton songs.

Q: Is this your vision of the blues?

BD: No, I'm using existing musical structures, 12 bar blues or Elizabethan ballads that I change or dismantle from the inside. I use them as a blueprint, as departure points.

Q: (The German cuts in) On 'Mississippi' you sing: 'I've been in trouble since I've set my suitcase down.' Is that the case for you: as soon as you put down your bag problems catch up with you?

BD: Is that the only line you can remember? (laughter) Do you want to know what was in the suitcase? (laughter) Or perhaps where I left it?

(The Dane fires a question) Is "Love And Theft" your best album?

BD: It's the most recent at any rate. (laughter)

Q: Why do you perform so many concerts?

BD: I don't feel that I do as many as that. More perhaps than some performers who only tour when they have a new record to promote. But I am sure there are musicians in Europe or in the States who play a lot more than I do.

Q: Don't you think there's a sort of religious feeling amongst your hardcore fans?

BD: And then what religion are they? [he snaps, albeit good-humouredly] I mean what sacrifices do they make...

Q: A lot of money, among others things.

BD: ...And to whom do they sacrifice, these hardcore fans? If they do sacrifice then okay, we've got hardcore religious fans. And I'd like to know when and where they make their sacrifices because I'd like to be there.

I really don't think I've got any hardcore fans. There are some people that do. I really just don't... I mean there are a few people that see an lot of my shows, but we don't think of them as hardcore fans.

Q: It seems like your audience is growing. Are there many young people at your concerts along with your old fans?

BD: I don't think there are many old fans. The fact is that people of my age die, or change their lives. At a certain point in your life, new problems arise. Family, children. Priorities change, entertainment becomes less important.

Q: Do you consider yourself to be an entertainer?

BD: No, but I have to face up to the world of entertainment.

Q: Do you think you'll be going to visit George Harrison?

BD: I'm in contact with him, but at the moment I haven't got the time. If I have the possibility then I will.

Q: Do you think The Traveling Wilburys could come back?

BD: Who can say? It's difficult to know.

(The Norwegian interrupts) Has your approach to concerts changed over the last few years? When you're on stage, do you have in your mind any idea of who you're relating to?

BD: Yeah, I'm playing for the people who are furthest away. I don't look at the people near me because it's usually the people who you see at every concert. They'll enjoy the concert in any case.

Q: Do the fans in the front irritate you?

BD: No, they are there. That's fine.

Q: After many years you're still on tour. Some people call it The Never Ending Tour. You wrote in the sleevenotes to "World Gone Wrong" that we shouldn't be fooled by the label 'Never Ending Tour.'

BD: Yes, that's right I think that labels trivialise things. I don't like my work to be referred to in those terms. Of course, everything has an end (a deliberate pause). Why talk of a neverending tour? It is bound to end. The thing that links us all, the one thing we have in common, is our mortality.

Q: Do you think about death often?

BD: I wouldn't say often, but it certainly happens when people who are close to me die.

Q: On the new album there are at least two songs in which the narrator refers to the death of his Mother: "I wish my Mother were still alive" on 'Lonesome Day Blues' and "My Mother died" on 'Po' Boy.' Were they inspired by the death of your Mother last year?

BD: Probably, [he says slowly] I can't understand how it couldn't be like that. Many of these songs were written in some kind of 'stream of consciousness' kind of mood, and I don't sit and linger, meditate on every line afterwards. My approach is just to let it happen and then reject the things that don't work.

Q: And about your own mortality?

BD: Well, I can see myself in other people, that's the way you can think about it. I don't think about it any more than everybody else. As soon as you enter this world you're old enough to leave it.

Q: Do you feel more at home in your tour bus than in any of your seventeen houses?

BD: Ah, those Pullman buses are becoming pretty luxurious, you know. As far as 'happy' goes; as far as 'happy in a home' goes, I'm quite an adaptable person. And I feel at home anywhere, everywhere. I mean, I feel at home at home and when I'm not there, it's not like I'm longing for anything that's not presently where I am at.

Q: How does it feel to be Dylan today? Easier than in the past?

BD: I'm not the right person to ask. It's a philosophical question.

Q: How much longer do you see yourself carrying on?

BD: I don't really know. I can't tell you that it will be the day when there is no longer an audience because the crowds are still coming. Perhaps one day I'll get sick of it.

Q: How do you maintain your energy levels?

BD: Energy? Hum. That's all imaginary, that stuff. Just like someone who has learned how to do a job, there are strategies, stratagems, codes and techniques that can be used. Once those are in place, they can help you find energy or emotion or whatever you want to call it. But all it is, is a combination of elements that appear in some sort of combustible way.

Q: Thirty years earlier and you might have been relatively unknown but the times allowed you to be exposed to the world and to achieve a degree of notoriety and a considerable fortune. Is it a blessing for you to have reached a moment where your talent is flourishing at this present time in History?

BD: I didn't really choose to do what you see me doing. I was chosen for it. If someone had consulted me, I would have preferred to be a scientist, a doctor, or an engineer. They are the people I really admire. I don't admire people in the entertainment field.

Q: Can you explain what you mean by "I was chosen."

BD: Humm, it's like I just said. I didn't have any choice about it.

Q: Is there a link between Bob Dylan in the sixties and the same person in the seventies, eighties and nineties?

BD: In a biological way only.

Q: Do you regret certain things from the past?

BD: There must be some but I'm not really a nostalgic person. I don't look back at the past.

Q: When was the last time you went somewhere without being recognised?

BD: I can't really remember. It's got to the point where I'm recognised everywhere I go. Every place.

(The Irish journalist makes himself heard) Do you have fun?

BD: DO I HAVE FUN? What does it mean to have fun? What do you want to talk about? (In an instant it is the Dylan of 'Don't Look Back' who reappears, same tilt of the head, same voice, same ruthless sense of a rhetorical assassin). What's fun? To kick a ball around?

Q: Do you enjoy life?

BD: Is there a choice? What else can you do?

Q: Some people have chosen death.

BD: But not of their own free will.

Q: Do you feel at any stage that you have been a reflection of your times?

BD: I think that I always have been and still am. I don't feel it is possible for me to reflect any other era but my own.

Q: Do you reflect the times or react to them?

BD: Humm. A bit of both. I react to them more probably.

Q: Are your older songs like revisiting an old playing field?

BD: You know, my songs are always singable. They remain contemporary. Something didn't have to fall out of the sky yesterday for it to be of these times.

Q: You have written that the modern world is a sort of new Dark Ages.

BD: The Stone Age, let's put it like that. We speak about the Golden Age, which I believe would be that of Homer. You can still feel that era when you walk around Rome; you can feel the presence of those people. Today we are incapable of building what people constructed two thousand years ago. You come to realise how people from those times were vastly superior to us. We are not aware of those kind of things in the States.
Then we had the Age of Silver and then the Bronze Age and there was a Heroic Age somewhere in there. Then we have what we call the Iron Age, but it could be the Stone Age.

Q: Maybe the Silicon Age?

BD: Oh, yeah, (laughs) that's right.
(The German asks) Do you surf the Net?

BD: I'm frightened of the net. I fear that some depraved person may take me somewhere I don't want to go.

Q: How do you go about writing?

BD: I have so many ways that I can't talk about any one in particular. I take notes, I retrieve them, I pull ideas together. There are lots of ways.

Q: Do you look for inspiration in poetry? Either poets who have inspired you in the past or contemporary poetry?

BD: Humm. You know, I never studied poetry. I would like to find new writers but I haven't come across any. We are living in a time when the media has taken over everything. What can a writer think or write about that you don't see everyday in a newspaper or on television?

Q: There are still feelings that can be written about and expressed.

BD: Yes, but the media manipulates peoples emotions anyway. When Rimbaud was writing, William Blake, Shelley or Byron or any of these people, there probably wasn't any media. They were free to explore their minds.
(The Swede cuts into the conversation) And you don't feel free to write?

BD: I don't really do any writing. I don't sit down to write. My lines go into songs and they have a certain structure. They have to conform to an idiom that has an established form. They're not free-form and there's no point trying to throw in some ideological idea. It doesn't interest me at all. It can't be done in a song.

Q: But you've done it!

BD: I've done it? If I have done it, it was 'de facto,' but I've never intentionally started out with that in mind. I mean, I never have. Maybe some others have, but I haven't.

Q: Do you feel that television and the media killed off poetry and literature?

BD: Absolutely. Absolutely. Because literature is written for an audience. There's nobody like Kafka who just sits down and writes something without wanting somebody to read it.

Q: Every writer?

BD: Yeah, sure, the media does this for everybody. You can't see things that are more horrific than you see in the media. The news shows people things that they couldn't even dream about and even ideas that people thought they could repress, but they see them and they can't even repress them anymore. So what can a writer do when every idea is already exposed in the media before he can even grasp it and develop it?

Q: How do you react to all this?

BD: We live in a world of fantasy where Disney has conquered. It's all fantasy, them parks, trendy streets; it's all just science fiction. That's why I think that if a writer has something to say he'll have to say it within the science fiction world. Fantasy has become the real world. Whether we realise it or not, science fiction has become the real world.

Q: Do you listen to lots of music? Any new people?

BD: I don't know, who is new, in you opinion?

Q: Do you recognise a folk influence in hip-hop? Chuck D used to say about rap that it was the CNN of music, a narrative form of reflecting its time and its social environment.

BD: A folk influence. I don't know anything about that. I don't see things in that way. I've never had a chance to listen to rap and to what is supposed to be current music.

(The Dane manages to put a question) Springsteen once said that Elvis liberated people's bodies and Dylan liberated their minds.

BD: He said that? Liberate the mind? It's good to be liberated from everything... We should all think like that.

Q: Had you already met Elvis?

BD: Ahh, Hum. (long pause) No. I never met him. (another pause) That's what I'm supposed to say about it. (pause, then burst out laughing).

Q: Do you look for comfort in religion?

BD: I try, who would I be if I didn't try?

Q: 'Tarantula' has been translated again into French. Was that an attempt to become a poet in the traditional sense, or something experimental and unique?

BD: When the book first came out... at that time in my life, things were really taking off all over the place. Leonard (Cohen) had put a book out about the same time but I really had no intention of writing one. My manager at that time (Albert Grossman) had had some offers and he was the one that kind of pushed me into it. I think someone must have asked him 'does Bob Dylan write books?' And he must have replied 'obviously, sure he writes books, in fact we're just about to publish one.' I think it was on that occasion that he made the deal and then I had to write the book. He arranged everything, fixed the publication date and then told me that I had to write it. I managed to do it very quickly. He did that two or three times. Once he set me up as an actor in a TV show and I knew nothing about it till the day it happened. I thought I was going to sing. (Laughs) These things happened in the early part of... last century." (Laughs)

Q: There have been many books published about you. Have you read them?

BD: I haven't read any since the Bob Shelton one came out. I knew him and I don't know these other people. It's difficult to read about yourself because in your own mind things don't appear that way. It's like you're reading about other people. It all seems like fiction. So, if it's gonna be fiction, where's all the good stuff?

Q: Have you ever been tempted to tell your own story?

BD: Yeah, and to tell the truth I'm doing it right now. It'll be published shortly in article form, but as a book, a book of articles, because they are ongoing. What is interesting is that most of these memories are linked to songs. Some of them trigger recollections of others.

Q: Why are you doing this now? Is it a personal need to delve into your past?

BD: Oh, I think what I'm writing, has been trying to find its way out for some time now. Rather than making it some kind of self-serving story of my particular past. If it seems to happen that way, it's actually dissimilar in a lot of ways. I can do it because I'm a famous person so I use that fame because a lot of the things I might write about, other people know anyway. So with a person like myself, the process of doing it this way works. I just do it in my spare time.

Q: Is this a new kind of writing for you as opposed to songwriting?

BD: Not really. I can't compare the two.

Q: You've said you don't like listening to things from the past doesn't this autobiography force you to do just that?

BD: I'm just looking at everything from a new point of view. Many things go from one point to another without there being a reason. Why did they happen, could they have happened if something else hadn't happened? And if they seemed so bad at the time why did they bring long term benefits? I like to write. But I'm certainly not meticulous.

Q: What has been the most difficult time in your life to revisit?

BD: The toughest? Humm. (pause) There have been some complicated moments where I had to tell the story as if it was about somebody else rather than myself. Basically you have to suppress certain ambitions in order to be who you need to be.

Q: What ambitions?

BD: Aha! You'll have to read the book.

Q: In the songs on "Love and Theft" there are phrases that could seem autobiographical.

BD: Probably, I don't see how it could be any other way. But there's nothing premeditated. Many of these lyrics were written in sort of stream of consciousness sessions. I never sit down at a table and meditate about every single verse.

Q: Do you worry about how other people will analyse them?

BD: No, I've got no idea what other people might discover in the things I produce. Or do you mean analysis like Freudian or Idealist or Marxist? I really have no idea.

Q: You wrote 'For me the future is a thing of the past.'

BD: I said it for everybody. Aren't I the spokesman for a generation? I speak for all of us.

Q: When you play live you often sing old songs, like 'Song To Woody.' Is it more than just an abstract relationship with the past?

BD: It's because I'm happy to have written that song. Leaving everything aside, Woody Guthrie was a phenomenal performer. He's like Charlie Parker, Hank Williams or others of that stature.

Q: There have been important changes in your career. One of these happened in the middle of the sixties after "Blonde On Blonde," when you had the motorcycle accident. After some time "John Wesley Harding" came out and many people thought it was a different Dylan. It was the time of Love and Peace and the record was completely different from everything else. Was it the accident that changed things?

BD: It's difficult for me to know whether I made a conscious decision or not. But obviously, at that time I had no great desire to go out and play music. I never felt that I was part of that culture.

Q: Has your son Jacob heard the new record?

BD: I think he got it from one of his brothers or sisters. But I'm not sure, I've been traveling around for a long time.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Dutch coverage)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
VARA TV MAGAZINE nr 36, 8 Sept. 2001, pp. 12-16, "Dylan spreekt"
HOLLAND
Interviewer: JAN VOLLAARD; Translation: Nelien

The interviewer starts to tell that he, among 11 others is asked for a press conference. Before the interview, they listened to "Love And Theft" a few times. The author complains that the others asked too much detailed questions (there is a small fight over one word from Visions Of Johanna; Jan Vollaard, the Dutch interviewer isn't that much an insider that he can worry about all those tiny details). The total interview takes two hours and one question follows the other quickly, so Dylan has hardly any time to answer and that doesn't do any good to the depth of the interview. He often answers vaguely or just with 'Exactly!' Dylan was in very good humor and proud of Love And Theft.

The interview:

JV: Can you explain the title?
BD: Explain? Love and theft fits each other like fingers in a glove.
JV: Can one describe the music as dance music? We listened all morning...
BD: ...and you danced all morning? Sorry, but it wasn't my intention to write just a funny dance record.
JV: You go back to the music of the 40's and the 50's, western swing and rockabilly. Is it correct that this wasn't the case with your earlier work?
BD: Maybe you noticed that most of my songs are traditionally rooted. I don't do that on purpose. Charley Patton's 30's blues has made a deep impression on me and High Water (for Charley Patton) is, in my opinion, the best song of this record.
JV: Do the pioneers of the blues music, like Charley Patton and Robert Johnson deserve more respect in the American music history then they get?
BD: This was the case maybe 30 years ago, but these days their music is pretty well documented. John Hammond, who discovered me for Columbia, gave me in 1961 a record by Robert Johnson that was due to be released. Nobody had ever heard from him and the rerelease of his work made him available for a larger audience, then at the time small labels released his work.
(some more over Johnson)
JV: You are still singing your first composition 'Song to Woody', is it still relevant?
BD: I am glad I wrote that song. Woody Guthrie is unique and still deserves some credit. All my old songs can be sung. A song does not have to be young to be up-to-date. I always tried to avoid modern topics and I try to write lyrics with an universal tradition
JV: Your voice has more depth on this album.
BD: My voice is never recorded the correct way. Producers have there own idea how a Bob Dylan record must sound. That idea does not always tallies with mine, that is why I worked without a producer this time. Producers used all kind of effects on my voice, so that it did not sound the way I actually sang it.

I found a young sound technician, who succeeded to record my voice purely. I always like the simple way, with the old-fashioned analogue equipment and antique microphones.

JV: Did the success of Time Out Of Mind enlarge your self-confidence when you started this album?

BD: I hardly ever listen to my own records and I have not listened to Time Out Of Mind for a long time. I am glad if there is an audience, but success does not influence my way of working. A song like Po' Boy wrights itself, and the melody and the lyrics develop from the successive chords.

I use blues…, 12 bars, or ballads that always has existed in their basics. The variation is brought by the arrangements, and the fearless way my musicians and I start on a new song.

JV: Are you aware that a lot of younger people come to your concerts, on the hand of their parents or grandparents?

BD: Thank God they do, I earn a living with live entertainment. People of my age die, or have other priorities and they don't come any more. Except for that bunch of people that are in the front rows and they are always the same. I play for the people in the back of the venue, because the ones in the front row come anyway, they like it whatever I do. I have a good perception of the audience I play for. It has different ages, and the new album is for all of them. If I made records for my own pleasure, I would record Charley Patton songs only.

JV: Do you think of your own mortality?

BD: Not so often, only when someone I know is buried. There are no doubts that my Never Ending Tour once has to end. The fact that we all die one day, connects people.

JV: In the song 'Lonesome Day Blues' the lyrical I sings: 'I wish that my mother was still alive'. Is that inspired by the death of your own mother in January last year?

BD: Probably. I don't see another motive (inducement). My lyrics develop in a stream of consciousness. I don't linger long on every word that comes to my mind.

JV: But your lyrics are analyzed by everybody, for example when you sing: 'The future for me is already a thing of the past'.

BD: I have the right to sing that, because I am the voice of a generation, haha! All the generations. I sing for everyone.

JV: Is 'Bob Dylan now' the same person as the 'Bob Dylan of the 60's'?

BD: Only in biological meaning!

After, the almost-fight with the Portuguese Dylanogist, who with a help of others realizes that he used a wrong quote from Visions of Johanna (He says 'history goes up…' instead of 'Infinity goes up on trial' and he asks if this sentence has a special meaning in Rome), Dylan takes a break for cappuccino.

Second round.

JV: How did you celebrate your 60th birthday?

BD: As usual. I lit some candles and invited some friends and family.

JV: Do you follow the discussion about the question whether you have deserved the Literary Nobel Prize?

BD: I heard something about that. That should place me in the same category as Hemmingway and Steinbeck… I am not sure if I belong there.

JV: In a conversation with Allen Ginsberg you once said that fame does not have lasting value. How do you handle your 'living legend' status?

BD: 95% of the time it does not matter to me. I have learned to live with it. I never searched for it, fame chose me.

JV: Do you read poetry and do you consider yourself a poet?

BD: At this moment there are not so many interesting new poets, because the media absorb all the attention. Everything a poet can imagine is already shown on TV or in the newspapers. Emotions of people are beaten to death by the media. In William Blake's time, there was no TV. Poets had more freedom of expression possibilities. I am not someone that writes words on a piece of paper. There are certain criteria for a pop song and it is not useful to attribute an ideological value to the content. With my music, I've never had any ideological intention. I know people has projected their ideology on them, but that always happens beyond my influence.

JV: Do you read the Bible?

BD: Of course. Who does not?

JV: What is your opinion on the almost religious feeling that some hard-core fans have?

BD: I don't think that the people that attend a lot of my shows are 'par definition' hardcore fans. If there is a religion, what sacrifices do they bring? Themselves? In case of that I would like to attend such a meeting.

JV: Your admirers think that the value of your work has the same value as the Bible, because all important life issues are in it.

BD: Exactly. Great argument. Hahaha.

JV: Do you read books about yourself?

BD: The only one I've ever read is Robert Shelton's book. It is not easy to read about yourself, because things in reality happened in a very different way. There is always some fiction in it. While the really thrilling things are not in it. I am busy writing my own story of my live. It will be published in articles. I take the songs as the starting point, they are the key to many colorful memories.

JV: Is it true that you are happier in your tour bus then in any of your 17 houses?

BD: Yeah! The bus is pretty luxurious. But I have to say that I can feel at home at almost any place in the world.

JV: Are you proud of the music you've recorded throughout the 40 years?

BD: Like I've said, I hardly listen to my records, because during the recording of the songs they were not perfect yet. Through the years there has been a lot of my music released that in my opinion was not finished yet. That could happen because I don't have the patience to stay long in a recording studio. Most of the time I played the rough version of a song and played some guitar with it, like a demo version. It is not a coincidence that other groups, performers had bigger hits with my compositions then me, because they had more attention for the arrangements and structure.

Songs need structure: musical stability. This stability I have never been able to find, because my own songs always were new for me in the studio. I worried more about the lyrics, if a sentence did not fit well, or about the tempo than over the overall structure of a song. The producers hardly had any ideas about it, so I used my live performances to find the right structure of songs that were already released. Now I have the feeling that I made an album that harmonized with the music as I heard it in my head.

After this something happened, that had never happened to the interviewer before [and he has been around for a long time – N], the journalists applause! Bob smiles, has his photo taken with a journalist from Austria and when he leaves the room he mutters: 'so, and now it is time to visit the Coliseum'.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (German coverage Der Spiegel, ver. a)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source: ISIS #99, Oct-Nov 2001, pp. 54-56.

Der Spiegel Interview
Interviewer: CHRISTOPH GALLACH

What follows are the parts that are different to the interviews published in the UK, Sweden and Italy.

Q: You once said that all producers you worked with were prisoners of the Bob-Dylan-myth. Is it correct you did the producers-job yourself on "Love And Theft"?

BD: Yes, that's right. Whoever controlled the recordings of my albums so far said to himself: Okay, that's a Bob-Dylan-record, and these are Bob Dylan-songs. They never reacted how my voice at this particular period really sounded, or the songs – they only fulfilled their own ideas how Bob Dylan's voice has to sound. That's why many of my albums ended as compromises.

Q: Which?

BD: Most. The studio versions actually never came up to my own expectations. That's something I always realize when we play a song live on stage, and it sounds completely different than on the album.

Q: This interview takes place in Rome. Is it frightening you that during a demonstration against globalization in Genoa a young man was shot by police?

BD: Shot? Here in Italy? Wow, probably I was busy working then. I have no idea. Sounds for me like a crime thriller by Raymond Chandler.

Q: In the Sixties you were worshipped as a political protest-singer. If there were already globalization-opponents, do you think you would've been with them on the streets?

BD: There was no consciousness for something like globalization then. But when you believe the reports in the media today, you must fear that the whole planet will be destroyed pretty soon. I think that's nonsense. The reality isn't that hopeless and dark as the modern media wants us to believe.

Q: Which purpose should these media-reports about catastrophes have?

BD: That's obvious. Somewhere somebody gains a profit in marketing violence and brutality. There's nothing presented in the media without somebody earning money out of it.

Q: How do you use the media?

BD: Not at all. I try to avoid them as much as possible.

Q: How do you get your information?

BD: Information is a question of your way of life... I'm a traveler, always on the road, there you have so many sources and get so many impressions you can make up your own picture very well.

Q: Not all people can always travel around the world.

BD: Don't get me wrong. I'm not completely against media. But they defeat their purpose, which should be to educate their audience. They present show, spectacle, and brutality instead.

Q: Wouldn't it be censorship not to show the brutality from Genoa?

BD: You're right. The freedom of speech is a precious fundamental right, in the USA it's even written in the constitution. But when speech becomes an industry, it's no free speech anymore, but a business.

Q: You want more idealism in the media world?

BD: I believe in idealism and idealists. But I haven't met some for a long time. Have you?

Q: It happens.

BD: Well, next time let me know and introduce me. That would be nice.

Q: re you interested in new, modern literature?

BD: Sure. But I can't find anything interesting.

Q: Does your refusal of poetry mean you refuse to go along with contemporary culture at all?

BD: Well, you won't believe it, but I love the ballet. I attend at least three or four performances a year. I love the ballet since my childhood. I like the mood, the lithe movements of the dancers and the absolutely staggering sound of an orchestra.

Q: But with literature, you're through?

BD: Literature is past. Movies are the new literature. Who has something to say today, makes a movie.

Q: What movies do you consider great literature?

BD: That's exactly the problem, because movies can't be great literature.

Q: Why?

BD: Because they're only a second-rate art-form. Literature leads you into the mind and into the heart of a fictive character. That's something no script or director can achieve. Movie-characters always remain distant, far away and flat on the screen. I've never seen a movie which would be better than the worst book I ever read.

Q: You exaggerate.

BD: I swear I'm serious.

Q: When was the last time you liked a movie?

BD: I prefer the times and I also like the music of, the 20's, 30's and 40's. And I'd rather watch a movie from 1948 than from this summer.

Q: What was better then?

BD: There wasn't so much noise about nothing, not so much nonsense talked... That's why I can identify more with characters from then. And I prefer black & white. I consider colors ugly.

Q: You don't like colors?

BD: Sometimes colors are okay. But when I have the choice, I prefer black & white. For my eyes that harmonizes better.

Q: So there was no remarkable movies in the last 50 years?

BD: Let me think. No, I can only think of off-putting examples.

Q: For instance?

BD: Let's take 'Godfather,' a movie about the scum of the earth. Human dirt like mafia to glorify horrifies me very much. Those criminals are no heroes – they're dirt.

Q: But the script was a novel.

BD: Sure, but in the movie you soon realize that the characters are scum. The film can present them as heroes because he never reaches beyond the surface. Only a book can show both the negatives and maybe also positive aspects of such characters.

Q: But there are also movies like O Brother, Where Are Thou? by the Coen-brothers – a work which made popular your beloved traditional American country – and blues-music again. The soundtrack was a great success in the USA.

BD: I was enthusiastic about the album and even watched the movie.

Q: But it's a modern film, and even in color?

BD: I like George Clooney. A very likeable guy. The scenes where he appears as a singer are unbelievably good.

Q: So it's a modern movie you like?

BD: Wrong, I only like the George Clooney scenes. Without him, it would have been rubbish. But I would watch any movie with George Clooney, this boy has heart. And he succeeded in getting a big audience for a music, which usually is considered as un-commercial by the media – so he proved how much the media cheats us. Should I tell you what is the best promotion?

Q: Please.

BD: Mouth-to-mouth-propaganda. That's why sometimes something slips through the net and proves that you can also have uccess with quality. Luckily there're still people who are enthusiastic about something because they know it's good, and not because it was forced by the media.

Q: s there any contemporary pop-music you like?

BD: You're asking the wrong person. I don't know anything about it. That I'm part of the entertainment industry doesn't mean I'm busy with it more than necessary. I don't listen to music to get entertained. I'm looking for substance. And if you want to know if I've discovered something remarkable recently, I'm sorry to answer 'No'.

Q: What do you think of Hip Hop singers?

BD: I don't know any, name me some.

Q: Eminem? Dr. Dre?

BD: I have no idea. I have never heard of them.

Q: But a long time ago, you worked with the Rap-pioneer Kurtis Blow. How could this happen?

BD: You know what? I have no idea. Was I good? I cant remember it any more.

Q: do the fanatics who come to every one of your concerts irritate you?

BD: They just happen to be there. I only play for the people standing further away. The people in the front rows come back anyway. The part of the audience in the back rows, who come for one night only, they are the people I want to reach.

Q: What strategy do you use to handle your fame?

BD: No strategy. Politeness works wonders.

Q: Do you think the older you get the better you are?

BD: I could if I'd concentrate on it.

Q: Is it true you practice boxing to remain fit?

BD: Who says that?

Q: The actress Gina Gershon says, you once hit her while practicing.

BD: Well, if she continues to talk like that, she'll get another punch.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (German coverage Der Spiegel, ver. 1)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
GERMAN VERSION from Der Spiegel, no. 37/2001, 10 September 2001, pp. 246-250
Interviewer: Christoph Dallach; translation: Stephanie D.

[Spiegel interviewer, Christoph Dallach, initially asked the questions with the group, where Dylan gave information for example on his attitude to the Internet […]. Afterwards Dylan granted a rare favour: Dallach was allowed to question the Master in a one-to-one conversation.]

"I think colors are horrible."
Bob Dylan about his fondness of black and white, the fateful power of the media and his new album "Love and Theft"

CD: Mr Dylan, four years after your last studio album you now present your new work "Love and Theft" – is that a contrast for you?
BD: No. I think these two things suit each other like fingers in a glove.
CD: Musically, the new record is a rousing tribute to historical styles of music such as Country-Swing, Blues and Rockabilly: Do you feel fine in the present or do you long for the bygone times again?
BD: I'm not a nostalgic person. OK, you're right, most of the songs have traditional roots, although I wrote all of them myself. However, I don't miss anything from the past. I enjoy living in the present.
CD: On the album, you really sound as if you are in a good mood that you haven't been for a long time. Do you have any fun in your life these days?
BD: Fun? What do you mean? Shall I kick a football? No, I am just there. And I think, I don't have other choice.
CD: You once said that all the producers you've ever worked with were prisoners of the Bob Dylan myth. Is it true that you took on the producer's job yourself for "Love and Theft"?
BD: Yes, I did. Whoever has controlled the recording of my records so far, repeated himself: "OK, this is a Bob Dylan record, and these are Bob Dylan songs." That means, they never reacted to what my voice or the songs really sounded like at that point in time – but they only realized their own idea of how Bob Dylan's voice had to sound like. Therefore, many of my records ended up in compromises.
CD: Which ones?
BD: Most of them. The studio versions have actually never corresponded to my original ideas. I always notice that when a song we play live on stage sounds completely different than on the record.
CD: Is it maybe because of your voice that almost all of the producers felt a drive to improve it later?
BD: No idea. I think that when you use old equipment, the more simply the better, then it's OK with my voice. But up to this record nobody has ever understood to record me decently yet.
CD: This conversation is taking place in Rome. Did it frighten you that at a demonstration during the G-8 Summit meeting in Geneva a young opponent of globalisation was shot dead by a policeman?

BD: Shot dead? Here in Italy? Wow, I must have worked at that time. No idea. Sounds like a crime thriller by Raymond Chandler.

CD: In the sixties you were admired as a political protest singer. If there had already been opponents of globalisation at that time, would you have gone out into the streets with them then?

BD: At that time there wasn't any consciousness for something like globalisation. But if you trust the media reports today, you have to fear that the whole planet will explode any minute. I think that this is nonsense. Reality is not nearly so hopeless and gloomy as the modern media industry tries to get us to believe.

CD: What purpose should any publicity of a catastrophe by the media have?

BD: That's really obvious. Somewhere someone profits from marketing violence and brutality. In the media nothing is presented without someone making money out of it behind the scenes.

CD: How do you use the media?

BD: I don't use them at all. I avoid them whenever I can.

CD: And how do you inform yourself?

BD: Information is a matter of the change of lifestyle. There are people who live in a house with a garden and a front door. In front of the door there arrives a daily newspaper every morning, and when those people come back home from work in the evening, they let themselves plunge into their armchair and, first of all, switch on their TV in order to see what's going on in the world. I am unfamiliar with all of this. I am a traveler, still on the road, there you have so many sources and you collect so many impressions that you can form own impression very easily.

CD: Not everyone can incessantly travel around the world.

BD: Don't get me wrong, I am not against the media on principle. But they miss their duty, which should be made up of the education of their audience. Instead they only present show, kick up a rumpus and brutality.

CD: Wouldn't it be censorship not to show that brutality of Geneva.

BD: There you're right. The basic right of the freedom of speech is valuable, in the US it is even legally established in the constitution. But when free speech becomes an industry, it isn't free speech any more but a business.

CD: You demand more idealism in the world of media?

BD: I believe in idealism and idealists. But I haven't met any for a long time. And you?

CD: It happens.

BD: Let me know and introduce me next time. That would be nice.

CD: A clever exegete once said: Elvis freed your body, Bob Dylan freed your mind. What do you say to this?

BD: It is a wonderful feeling to be freed. From whatever. I can nothing but recommend that to all.

CD: When you turned 60 in May there was a world-wide media circus. What did your party look like?

BD: Oh, nothing special. I bought some candles and invited the family.

CD: Recently you were awarded an Oscar and were heaped with honors. What do you think about the fact that you've been considered for the Nobel Prize for Literature for years?

BD: I've heard about that. But to what company does that bring me? In the one of people like Hemingway and Steinbeck? I don't know if I fit in this category.

CD: Are you interested in more contemporary, younger literature?

BD: Absolutely. But I can't discover anything interesting there. Times have changed. What should an author today write about anyway, what doesn't happen on TV or in the newspaper every day?

CD: What about emotions?

BD: But no author can work with emotions as strongly as the media do. Compared with today's situation literary figures such as Shelley, Rimbaud or Byron enjoyed almost luxurious freedom.

CD: You think that the media ruined literature and poetry?

BD: Oh, absolutely. Every writer, if he's not a Kafka, writes for a public – and today this is monopolized by the media. Especially the news broadcasts offer the public more than the wildest poets could dream of. What remains for belletrists and poets then? We live in a world in which science fiction has become reality long time ago. It is ruled by Disney. Everywhere there are artificial shopping-paradises and theme parks.

CD: Does your refusal of poetry mean that you refuse all contemporary culture completely?

BD: OK, you won't believe it, but I love ballet. Every year I go to at least three or four performances. I've loved ballet since my childhood. I like the atmosphere, the dancer's smooth motions and the staggering sound of an orchestra.

CD: But you're through with literature?

BD: Literature is outdated. Movies are the new literature. Whoever has to say something today makes a movie.

CD: Which movie is great literature for you?

BD: That's exactly where the problem lies, 'cause movies can't be great literature.

CD: Why?

BD: Because they are only a second-rate art form. Literature leads you into the head and the heart of a fictitious character. No screenplay and no director can achieve that. Film characters always keep their distance, always far away and flat on the screen. I've never seen a movie that would be better than the worst book I've read.

CD: You're exaggerating.

BD: I swear that I'm serious.

CD: When was the last time you liked a movie?

BD: I prefer the time of which I liked the music, the twenties, thirties and forties. And I prefer watching a movie from 1948 to one from this summer.

CD: What was better in those days?

BD: They didn't make such a great big fuss about nothing and they didn't drivel so many meaningless things; they just came to the point faster then. That's why, as far as movies are concerned, I can rather identify with the thoughts and characters from that time. And in addition to that I prefer black and white. I think colors are horrible.

CD: You don't like any colors?

BD: Sometimes colors are OK. But when I have a choice, I prefer black and white. As I see it, it harmonizes better.

CD: And in the last 50 years there hasn't been any remarkable movie?

BD: Let me think about it. No, I can only think of deterrent examples.

CD: For example?

BD: Let's consider "The Godfather", a movie about the scum of the earth. To glorify human dirt like the Mafia appeals me very much. Such criminals are not heroes – they are the filth.

CD: The model was a novel.

BD: Sure, but in the novel you'll recognize quickly that these characters are scum. The movie succeeds in portraying them as heroes, 'cause it never reaches below the surface. Only a book can level the negative and possibly also the positive sides of such characters.

CD: After all, there are also movies such as "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" by the Coen brothers – a work that has just made the traditional American Country and Blues music, which you love so much, popular again; the soundtrack with old and new recordings was an unexpected multimillion success in the US.

BD: I was delighted with this album and even watched the movie.

CD: Wait a second – but it's modern and moreover in color.

BD: I love George Clooney. A very pleasant guy. The scenes in which he appears as a singer are just incredibly good.

CD: So there is a modern movie you like after all?

BD: That's wrong, I only like the George Clooney moments. Without him it would have been just crap as well. But I'd watch every movie with George Clooney, the boy has a heart. And he succeeded in conquering an huge audience for a music which is commonly labeled as non-commercial by the media – and therefore, he proved how much the media deceive us. Shall I divulge to you what's the best advertising?

CD: Please.

BD: Mouth-to-mouth propaganda. Only through that sometimes something slips out off the net and proves that one can be successful with quality as well. Fortunately there are still people who get enthusiastic about something, 'cause they understand that it's good without its having been forced on them by the media.

CD: Once you have revolutionized the music world with your grasp at an electric guitar. Do you consider the excessive use of modern technology in the contemporary music world to be good?

BD: Today there's too much music that wouldn't be anything without technology. Actually everything that's popular at the moment. But that's no reproach, 'cause this generation grew up like that and hasn't experienced anything else.

CD: Is there contemporary pop music that appeals to you?

BD: You are asking the wrong person. I don't know anything about that. Just because I am part of the amusement industry it doesn't nearly mean that I occupy myself with it more than necessary. I don't listen to music in order to get entertained. I search for substance. And when you now want to know whether I've recognized anything there recently, I unfortunately have to answer no.

CD: What about hip hop?

BD: I only hear machines there.

CD: Are hip hoppers who tell stories to music not the folk singers of today?

BD: I don't know any names, name me some.

CD: Eminem? Dr. Dre?

BD: No idea. I've never heard of them.

CD: But a long time ago you once worked together with rap-pioneer Kurtis Blow. How could that happen?

BD: You know what? I absolutely don't have a clue. Was I good? I don't remember.

CD: You have been on a so-called "Never Ending Tour" since the late eighties and just in the past four years you gave about 450 concerts. What drives you?

BD: All of that "Never Ending Tour" talk is nonsense. If there's anything for sure in our world, then it's the knowledge that everything comes to an end one day. Our mortality is the one thing that connects us all, and nothing but the knowledge about that creates a greater proximity between people. I don't even think that I give a lot of concerts. In your world it might be a lot, in mine it is normal.

CD: What's your world?

BD: Perhaps that's the difference between Europe and America: between settled citizens and a tramp like me. Where I come from, the provincial towns are full of people who present their music somewhere else every day.

CD: Earlier you said that little you know about the current cinema and more contemporary literature: Do you at least read the books that are written about you?

BD: I only read a biography by Robert Shelton, and that only because I knew the author. It's strange to read books about your own life. In your own memory things always present themselves differently to what others experienced. To me these books are pure fiction.

CD: Have you ever thought of writing your autobiography?

BD: I have, and at the moment I am working on it. My memoirs are going to be rather a series of articles that will appear in a book. I can't say more about it at the moment.

CD: Does the fanatical zeal with which your fans analyse your songs and your statements bother you?

BD: It's strange what people discover in my works. What kind of analyses are these anyway? Freudian? Or perhaps Marxist-Freudian ones? I don't have a clue about all of that.

CD: Do the fanatics who come to all of your concerts irritate you?

BD: They are just there. I only play for the people standing at the back. Those in the first rows are coming back anyway. The back part of the audience who just come for one night, that's the one you have to reach.

CD: But the hard-core fans are the ones that admire you with almost religious zeal.

BD: Hard-core fans is an unpleasant term. These are people who buy all my records and come to many of my concerts, and that's wonderful, isn't it? But what religion do you mean? And what do they sacrifice to their God, these religious hard-core-super-fans?

CD: Among other things, a lot of money.

BD: Very good, then I'd like to know when and where they'll go sacrificing the next time. Then I'll go there, too.

CD: How much does the Dylan-myth affect your private life?

BD: To 95 per cent not at all. Everyone who is confronted with fame has to learn to deal with the remaining 5 per cent. (actual Dylan words: "Well, 95 per cent of the time it doesn't affect my life")

CD: What strategy do you use in order to deal with your fame?

BD: No strategy. Politeness works wonders.

CD: Do you sometimes ask yourself: Why m?

BD: So far not yet. I know what it is I've done to be so famous.

CD: Are you thankful to your fate that you became a famous artist?

BD: I didn't choose music (actual Dylan words "what it is you see me doing"). It chose me. If I'd had a free choice I would've rather become (actual Dylan words "I'd been something different") a doctor, a scientist or an engineer. These are the professions (actual Dylan words "people") I look up to and whom I respect. Entertainers are nothing special. They mean nothing to me. (actual Dylan words "I don't really look up to entertainers")

CD: A few years ago you were seriously ill. How long are you going to continue?

BD: That's hard to say. There might come the day when I'll decide that I've had enough. If the audience withdrew, that would very certainly be a reason, but you don't notice anything like that.

CD: Do you have a feeling that you are constantly getting better with the years?

BD: I could, if I concentrated on it.

CD: Is it true that you do boxing in order to keep fit?

BD: Me? Who claims that?

CD: The actress Gina Gershon says that you landed her once during the training.

BD: If she keeps on blabbing like that she'll get another punch round the ears.

CD: Mr Dylan, we thank you for the conversation.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Austrian coverage NEWS)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
AUSTRIA, News 36/01, "Dylan spricht" 6 September 2001, pp. 182-184
Interviewer: Thomas Zeidler, translation: Stephanie D.

"Dylan speaks"

TZ: You define "Love and Theft" as a greatest-hits album without the hits…

BD: Exactly! This album is possibly the greatest one of my milestones. You see, one never knows such things at the release, but only many, many years later. And I think that they will still write about it positively even in ten years.

TZ: That is probably your very first record one could even dance to.

BD: I am sorry! Or is that possibly even a compliment (laughs)? This is the first of my records that I am completely contented with, 'cause, earlier my voice had always been recorded the wrong way. My producers were probably in too much awe of me and let themselves be overwhelmed by my myth. None of my old songs sounds on a record as I wish it would.

TZ: Is "Love and Theft" the best Dylan-record?

BD: It is just the newest!

TZ: For whom do you actually make your records?

BD: Not for myself! If I made music for myself, I would only cover old Charly (sic!) Patton songs.

TZ: And your concerts?

BD: I entirely play for my audience in the back rows. I don't pay any attention to the people in front of the stage, for these are mostly faces I know, who approve of what I do anyway. But at the very back, these are the people you have to conquer.

TZ: Do these hardcore-fans get on your nerves?

BD: No, I don't care.

TZ: Do you consider yourself to be a good singer?

BD: No idea!

TZ: In 1997, you stated that through the years you have already been used to swallowing devastating reviews of records as well as of concerts.

BD: I don't remember any more what I said at that time. But I would not pay too much attention to it anyway. What for? Should people today still pay attention to what you wrote years ago?

TZ: What is your motivation?

BD: My audience. I don't know if I would still do all that if the audience would stay away one day. However, I am lucky that they still listen to me, and although many of my former fans are dead long since or devote themselves to other priorities than insipid entertainment.

TZ: Is Bob Dylan insipid entertainment?

BD: I don't think so, but the genre I am in is generally called like that.

TZ: At your concerts, one hardly recognizes your old songs…

BD: The songs should actually have always sounded as they do today live. Because all of my records have always been underdeveloped. All of them are actually only demos, ideas not thought through to the end. Therefore, it is no wonder that all the others were much more successful with my songs than I myself. For a while I let myself be overrun by incompetent producers in my efforts to unite lyrics, tempo and tune, they could have these songs matured. Yet, one reason why I let all this happen was my knowledge that I could compensate for all on stage later.

TZ: Do your old songs appear to you still current anyway?

BD: Sure. I am proud that I recorded them and that I can still sing them today. My songs are up-to-date as ever, 'cause nothing has to appear from completely out of the blue just now in order to be of current interest.

TZ: Which of your hitherto 43 albums do you consider to be the one of the most artistic merit?

BD: I don't listen to my records, but I think that every single one of them is as much of an artistic merit as it bristling of mistakes.

TZ: Why do you disregard your own records?

BD: I don't listen to them because no song is perfect.

TZ: Do the songs have a common origin?

BD: Possibly. However, the only thing that really counts is the fact: $a^2 + b^2 = c^2$.

TZ: Do you sometimes catch yourself composing new songs which you have already recorded years ago?

BD: Never!

TZ: Do you recognize a line between the Bob Dylan of the 60s and the Bob Dylan of today?

BD: At the most, in the biological sense.

TZ: It seems as if today you would feel finer you are happier in the tour bus than in one of your 17 houses.

BD: These buses have become more and more luxurious as time goes by (laughs). No, I just feel at home everywhere I am staying and fortunately I don't know any form of homesickness.

TZ: For years you have been on the "Never Ending Tour".

BD: There is no "Never Ending Tour", 'cause in life everything has to come to an end. Death is the only thing we, human beings, have in common, you know.

TZ: Do you reflect on death?

BD: Hardly ever, but of course losing people that are close to you hurts?

TZ: Does your own death occupy you?

BD: I recognize myself in others. I don't think more about it, for as soon as a person enters this planet, he or she is already old enough to leave it again.

TZ: You enjoy almost religious worship.

BD: That really is nonsense, for what kind of religion or faith is it about? And what sacrifices does one have to make for it? And, above all, where? Since, actually I would like to be there once!

TZ: Nevertheless, your complete works have been considered for a long time to be the New Testament.

BD: It has been written like this and that is how it is, too!

TZ: Is Eminem a poet?

BD: Unfortunately, I have no idea who this Eminem is. The present-day music scene has never been of my personal concern.

TZ: Do you think the media kills the poetry?

BD: Absolutely! There are no more dreadful things than those you get served in the news every day. This surely does not leave any open space for imagination. So what shall an author still write about, when even the worst nightmares have been transported through the media long since?

TZ: How can one take action against it?

BD: We live in a science-fiction world, a world that Disney has conquered. A world with its amusement parks and trend-shopping streets. That is all science-fiction. As an author, you have to look over the edge.

TZ: An edge [outside] of reality?

BD: Science-fiction has become reality long since, whether we accept it or not.

TZ: There are dozens of Dylan-biographies. Have you read all of them?

BD: You must be joking! The last Dylan-book I read was Robert Shelton's biography (ed. from the year 1988). And this only because I knew the author. It is very hard to read about yourself, because everything seems so strange, so incredibly fictitious. And when all this is fictitious, where are all the nice things then (laughs)?

TZ: Perhaps in your own memoirs?

BD: I am working on them at the moment! These are my experiences of life in form of articles (ed. planned for 2002). Why I do that? Since I am a famous person, people have already known these things for ages anyway and someone may want to read my version of it as well.

TZ: Is it easier to write music or books?

BD: You cannot compare that at all. I consider my book to be more like a leisure-time activity than a job.

TZ: With "Tarantula" you already tried to establish yourself an author in the 70's.

BD: Writing was extremely mind-expanding. I think, John Lennon had his book published just at that time, and therefore my manager was approached by a publisher: "Dylan writes all these nice songs, what else does he write?" And that is how it came to the book. I had never planned it, just like a number of my appearances as an actor. I had always thought that I would only go into a TV-studio in order to sing. But things like that happen – in the early days of the last century.

TZ: Are you are more careful today?

BD: Not more careful. I just don't trust anyone any longer!

TZ: Is there a period in your life which you consider extremely complicated?

BD: I am sure there were lots of them. Sometimes you just have to fail miserably in order to get on.

TZ: What is it that you failed?

BD: (laughs) You have to find that out by yourself.

TZ: In March you were awarded an Oscar.

BD: And although I haven't even been there live. So you see how important awards are to me (laughs).

TZ: Do you surf on the Internet?

BD: No, because I am afraid of it. I fear that some perverts would lead me to extremely bad pages.

TZ: What is it like to be Bob Dylan?

BD: Here I am the last one who could answer this. That is a purely philosophical question for philosophical concerns.

TZ: I guess no one has been analysed as often as Bob Dylan.

BD: I don't know what people see in me or my songs, either. Why does it have to be analysed? And, above all, how? Is it going to be a Freudian analysis or German idealism or even Freudian Marxism?

TZ: Have you ever tried to be anyone else?

BD: Sure! But don't all of us try to do this since the moment of our birth?

TZ: Anything to sum up [the interview]?

BD: All the people who think they know me and my music so completely don't have the faintest idea!

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Austrian coverage Kurier)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
AUSTRIA, Kurier / Interviewer: Thomas Zeidler / Translation: Stephanie D.

Only the parts not covered in the NEWS coverage.

"ENGINEER OR DOCTOR"

[…]

TZ: When was the last time you remained unknown?
BD: I can't remember that any more. I think they know me every time and everywhere.
TZ: Do you sometimes ask yourself: Why me?
BD: Not any more! 'cause I know what it is I've done to be so famous.
TZ: But wasn't there a lot of luck involved either?
BD: A bit. […]
TZ: Would you have a chance at all as a newcomer today?
BD: I think so. […] And today I know much more about what I actually do than at my beginnings. I'd always find a niche. But I wouldn't want that any more. As I already said, I'd take up other jobs, more important ones.

[…]

TZ: Your 60th birthday in May was celebrated with adulation world-wide. Did you find that a nuisance?
BD: No. I don't care.

[…]

TZ: You were heaped with prizes lately.
BD: That's true, suddenly I win incredibly much. That's funny, isn't it? But perhaps they only/just give that to me as a compensation, 'cause they think that they forgot about me sometime.

[…]

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Swiss coverage Sonntagszeitung)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

SWISS VERSION from SonntagsZeitung, 9 September 2001
Interviewer: Rudolf Amstutz; Translation: Vessie

"I don't know what people can see and find in my whole stuff."

RA: Bob Dylan, you release your new album, "Love and Theft" on 10 September. Do you think that it is your first album people could dance to? We were listening to it all morning and...

BD: ... and were you dancing all the morning? So I'm sorry for that.

RA: Was it your intention to make a dancing, happy album?

BD: Ah... no.

RA: You said that "Love and Theft" was something like your greatest hits album without greatest hits.

BD: Yes. I meant, it could be possible, perhaps in the future, that "Love And Theft" would be revealed as a milestone. Many of my earliest songs got their real value some years later. The same may happen with this album. It is not to me, however, to verify their place in ten years.

RA: Do you think that the success of Time Out Of Mind accounts for the lively sound of "Love And Theft"? Does this success give you any kind of self confidence?

BD: No, I always make what I want. I have the chance to have a public.

RA: And your audience continues to age. Are you surprised that your public is younger than ever?

BD: Now, people of my age or die or go into eclipse or...

RA: There are undoubtedly fans of your age.

BD: Some, yes, but not many. Their life has changed during last years. They have founded families and have other priorities than light entertainment.

RA: Do you see your music as light entertainment?

BD: Perhaps less for me, but in commerce of culture I am qualified as light entertainment.

RA: Is there a linking idea between the 60-year-old Dylan and the Dylan of 17, 18 or 19?

BD: Biologically already seen (smiling).

RA: Has your process of writing changed during these years?

BD: I always had different manners of writing my songs. It's the reason why I can't say I have found a new way. Sometimes I find only a pair of notes, then I find the text later, and the melody complies with it. There are so many ways to write a song. Process of writing is the shortest part of the whole performance.

RA: Live performance is for you the most important part. Has anything changed? Do you know what you'll do before coming on stage?

BD: I don't think it has changed. I am almost certain of what will happen on stage. I always play for the back part of the audience, never for those who are stuck to the stage. These ones come to my concerts anyway. I always play for people who, perhaps, come for the first time hear me.

RA: In recent concerts, you pose in a way that resembles Elvis...

BD: Is this a critic or a compliment?

RA: A compliment!

BD: That's right.

RA: Bruce Springsteen said of you: Elvis freed your body and Dylan freed your mind.

BD: I always found it's good to be free, from anything (laugh)

RA: You are in an almost Never Ending Tour. Why do you give so many concerts?

BD: I don't think I give too much concerts. Perhaps more than other bands, who make tours after a new album and then make a pause. But I am sure that in Europe, there are many bands who give a lot of concerts. In the USA there are many anyway.

RA: But you named your tour the Never Ending Tour

BD: This is only the title, and one should not think too much about it. This irritates me how people interpret it. It is clear that all things must end, at any time. Unavoidable. Even if we distinguish between humans, what we have in common is our mortality.

RA: Do you often think about it?

BD: Not so often. Except when close people die.

RA: And about your own mortality?

BD: Only in the death of others can I recognise my own death.

RA: In 2 new songs, Lonesome Day Blues and Po' Boy, the narrator wants his mother to be still alive or remembers how she died. Were you influenced by your own feelings?

BD: Possibly.

RA: You placed this not deliberately?

BD: I never place myself in the direction of anything, I meditate only on single text lines.

RA: Do you fear for the analysis of your texts by others?

BD: No. I don't know what people can see and find in my whole stuff.

RA: When you play your earliest songs, like Song To Woody, do you remember knowingly of this specific moment or is it in an absent manner?

BD: Today, I am still glad to have written this song. Woody Guthrie was a phenomenal performer and belongs to the greatest, like Charlie Parker or Hank Williams and all the others, who are sitting above.

RA: I meant, these songs are so far away that they are becoming like a sort of a game.

BD: Now, all my songs can be sung. They are up to date. What is up to date doesn't obligatory fall in one minute from the sky. We live now – I think so – in Iron Age. Is it right ? Anyway, there was Bronze Age before. We live still in the era, during which I wrote all my songs. You walk in this city and contemplate all these edifices. Now people are not able to realize such things. There were people here before and foremost with higher spiritual level that we can ever have. Things don't have to be from now and can however be up to date.

RA: Newspapers all around the world celebrated your 60th anniversary in May. Did you do it as well?

BD: As anybody else. Family and some candles and so on.

RA: Recently you have won some illustrious prizes like Grammy for Time Out Of Mind and an Oscar for Things Have Changed.

BD: Oh yes, I have collected a lot of stuff, these years. Somehow comic, uh?

RA: You are also a candidate for the Literary Nobel Prize.

BD: Yes, I heard of it. In what company will this place me? I don't know exactly...

RA: Hemingway, Steinbeck...

BD: ...Oh Hemingway. I'm not sure, he wrote articles for the Time Magazine. I don't know if I belong to this category.

RA: Do you see yourself on a high or a low plain?

BD: I don't think about it, all this is rather relative.

RA: Do you feel during the day that you are tightened to the fact that you are celebrated as a legend?

BD: This has no influence on me for 95 per cent of the time. I don't feel that I belong to the world prominence, the so-called "famous people".

RA: Your 40-years-long career, your work and all the details have been pursued and commented. Would you have appreciated to be isolated from this, to make more music?

BD: Partially, but I have never chosen what I have done or what I do. Music has chosen me.

RA: Even if you don't like to talk about the past, do you regret anything of any period?

BD: Perhaps I should, but no, I don't feel any nostalgia for any period or fashion.
RA: Do you savor your life now?
BD: Now yes, I'm there. Do I have another choice? (laughs)
RA: Would you have any chance now as a newcomer in music business?
BD: Oh yes, I would have capacity, knowledge and endurance. It is what is necessary. I'm now more aware than before, of what I can and what I make. I think that, as a newcomer, I would find a place. However, if I would make it again is another question.
RA: When will you leave the stage?
BD: No idea. I would say, as soon as the public reduces. But it doesn't seem to be the case. I don't know, perhaps one day, I'll have enough and stop.
RA: Where do you take this energy to continue the tour?
BD: This energy that you quote, I don't need it. Energy is for me a fictitious concept. You learn during years to live of your work. Actions, experience, strategies are developed during years. You also learn to play economically. These are all little things which lighten up the daily life of the tour and preserve energy and emotion.
RA: Do you think – like many observers – that you are becoming better and better these days?
BD: (thinking) I know that I could be better, but if I became better?? (shrugs his shoulders)
RA: Love and Theft is perhaps the best Dylan that we have ever heard...
BD: Perhaps. I don't sing better than on earliest albums, but my voice was better recorded.
RA: Do you follow today's culture? Do you observe what the youngest generation makes?
BD: Clearly I do. But I think, there are only just some young authors, because we live in a constantly changing world. The media are overrepresented. What can a writer write about, which hasn't already been seen on the TV or read in the newspapers?
RA: But there are feelings here that could be formulated.
BD: Yes, but the media govern also people feelings. When we talk about the past, about poets like William Blake or Lord Byron – then, there were no media. They could bring onto paper, whatever came to their mind.
RA: Do you think that Media – specially TV – have killed poetry?
BD: Oh, absolutely. Not anyone is a Kafka and writes things which are in fact not thought by a large public. Every author wants his writings to be read. He needs people's reaction and looks for a certain acceptation of his performance. Now people are fed persistently by the media. Whatever can increase horror is seen on TV-News. News editorial staff serve anything to people, even what doesn't appear in dreams.
RA: How do you react to this?
BD: Outside, there is a science-fiction world. We live in a world conquered by Disney: Theme parks, trendy streets – all science-fiction. I react with my possibilities. We have already discussed we are in the Iron Age. Perhaps we return to the Stone Age.
RA: Silicon Age...
BD: Exactly (laughs and hits his thighs).
RA: Do you take a part of this science-fiction world? Do you go on the Internet?
BD: I'm afraid to go to the Internet. It could be possible, you are importuned by perverse people.
RA: What do you say to your hardcore fans, who follow you with a fervour quite religious?
BD: Oh, I don't think I have any hardcore fans.
RA: But, this admiration, nearly religious...
BD: Do the fans sacrifice themselves for me? If they do, I'll admit I have hardcore fans. Tell me where and when they sacrifice, I will be there.
RA: People say, your overall work is like the Bible
BD: This would explain why I keep on singing (laughs).
RA: Have you ever thought to write down your own life?
BD: I am actually writing my memories.
RA: When will you publish them?

BD: Soon. They will appear in a book-form, but the buildup is a sequence of articles. I decided myself because the series was broadening consecutively.

RA: You have already published a prose book, Tarantula.

BD: About it, I have to say, that, then, everything was quite woozy. I didn't have the intention to write a book. Leonard Cohen's manager said once to him: "What, you also write books?". And Leonard said: "Yes, I do." Then the manager: "So, let's publish it." With my book, it was similar. My manager arranged all, and the only work I had to do was writing. He also inscribed me as actor in a TV-Show and I was completely unknowing and thought I had to sing. Such things have passed. So was it then, somewhere in the middle of last century. (nodded fatherly).

RA: Is it now easier to be Bob Dylan than before?

BD: God, you should not ask me that. It is a philosophic question.

RA: Have you ever wanted to be somebody else?

BD: Who hasn't? We all try to be somebody else.

RA: Which of your albums is in your opinion the most successful?

BD: (meditates and winding) Anyway, they are all successful and failed so to speak. The problem is that, each time, copies are circulating before official release. This happened in my case too often. Above all, you could hear most of songs, which finally do not appear on discs. Many people reproach me I am unable to estimate my own things, because the best songs are missing on my discs. The fact is: I have never missed out songs, because I would have falsely estimate them, but because I really thought they would be badly perceived. This is not the case with Love and Theft, because there are no more songs as authentic as in the album. A demo recording from all material exists namely, but fortunately it doesn't hold out. It wouldn't be possible ten years ago; then, the trashy version was already for a long time on the black market.

RA: You proceed now more carefully?

BD: No, I don't trust anybody any more, simply as that.

RA: Year after year, day after day, you play your own songs on stage. How have you changed these songs during this time?

BD: The answer is in what I have already said. My discs are like undeveloped. From the first day on. There is no hazard if other singers have more success than me with my songs. They recognize that my songs have structure. But for me personally the structure is definitive and I don't feel myself allowed to develop it or cultivate. However, I have to admit I haven't tried to defend myself against this. I knew that I have the possibility to correct all this on stage.

RA: So, all what a song needs is a structure?

BD: A structure and stability. Thereafter, you can contribute any text. I say that a singer who goes on stage has everything to bear. On discs this doesn't appear because at the exact time of recording, the song is also new for me. There I try to pass my lyrics in a framework or to change a key, a tempo or the dynamic. And Love and Theft sounds exactly as if it was intended. Exactly so.

RA: So it is then your best album?

BD: (laughs) It is quite surely the more recent.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Norwegian coverage Dagbladet)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

NORWEGIAN VERSION from Dagbladet, 7 Sept 2001
Interviewer: Frederik Wandrup; Translation: Dag B

Dylan writes book on his life

ROME (Dagbladet): Bob Dylan (60) is well into a script on his life. The book will be published in the near future.

Dagbladet recently met Dylan in Rome and asked if he's considered writing his life story, which has been exposed in one biography after another.

Yes, said Dylan, As a matter of fact, I'm well into a script that will be published in book form.

FW: Is it some sort of memoirs?
BD: Yes, it is. It's a series of articles, that will be published as a book. That's all I can say FW: Will it be out soon?
BD: Yes.

Writes at home

FW: Does the fact that you're writing your memoirs have any influence on the songs you sing on stage?
BD: It's interesting you should say that. Because some of the chapters use certain songs as starting point. I think it's a good way to get into the past. It brings back some memories.
FW: Do you write while you're on the road?
BD: Some of the ideas develops while I'm on the road, but I write when I get home.
FW: Why did you feel that this was the right time to write your memoirs?
BD: For me it was about finding the right way to get into the subject. I don't want to make some sort of serve-yourself version of the story of my special past. It won't come out that way. I see the story from angles it didn't occur to me to use earlier. A lot of the things that happen to us, happens without any particular purpose. We go from here to there, but don't know why. Why did this happen, but not this? Could this have happened, if not this had happened first? Things that were painful when they happened might have done some good in the long run.

"Tarantula"

FW: Is it hard to go back into the past?
BD: I'm interested in the writing, but I don't struggle with it. It comes out of me, but from different starting points. The book is written from several different angles. I can write the way I do because I'm a famous person. People are already familiar with a lot of the stuff I write about. I can take things for granted. With a person like myself this is an efficient process.
FW: Do you write fiction?
BD: No, I don't write fiction.
FW: So you won't write a follow-up to "Tarantula", from 1966?
BD: That book has a story of its own. Things got a little out of hand at that time. I had no intention of writing a book. Didn't Leonard (Cohen, ed.) write a book? I had a manager (Albert Grossman ed.), and someone asked him: "He writes all these songs. What else does he write?" He probably replied "What do you need?" "Does he write books?" And he answers: "Of course, he does." "We would like to publish one." I think that's probably the way it happened. My manager set everything up, then it was up to me to write the book. It wasn't something that I set out to do. But he did stuff like that from time to time. He sent me to a TV-show where I was going to be an actor. I didn't have a clue. But all this happened....in the last century. A very long time ago, says Bob Dylan.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Swedish coverage Dagens Nyheter)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
DN (Dagens Nyheter), Sweden
Taken from expectingrain.com
Interviewer: Nils Hansson; Translation: Tobias Levander

A ROCK LEGEND FULL OF SURPRISES

ROME. He's a rock icon with a thousand different disguises – from reclusive family man to fervent preacher, from weird painter to golf player. DN's Nils Hansson has, as the only Swedish journalist, met Bob Dylan during a day-off on his "never ending tour".

He's 15 minutes late. He sits in a sofa behind a wall of microphones and tape recorders, he's growing a thin, old-fashioned moustache and he's wearing a white cowboy hat. He looks strikingly thin and small. In front of him there are thirteen journalists, tense, full of adrenaline and with a thousand questions to ask.

The anticlimax is immediate. Bob Dylan seems to be uncomfortable and nervous, saying "eh, hmm, I don't know" and he only gives the briefest of answers. Someone says that the new record Love And Theft is the first Dylan album you can dance to.

Oh, I'm sorry, says Bob Dylan and it's hard to tell if he's serious or not.

It's an off-day on Dylan's European tour. The next day he's supposed to play in Anzio, a resort town just south of Rome, yet another of the 100+ concerts he performs every year, on what his fans call the Never Ending Tour, a phrase that Dylan hates.

Four hours before the interview, all the invited journalists – thirteen journalists from twelve European countries, gather in a luxurious hotel to listen to the new album, "Love and Theft", and eat delightful sandwiches and drink wine.

After just a few seconds everyone realises that this is no straight follow-up to 1997's "Time Out Of Mind", an album characterized by bitterness and gallows humor. "Love and Theft" is old-timey, happy and extremely varied. You can hear blues, rockabilly, old-timey jazz and songs that could have been ballads from, say, 1948.

The expectations on Love and Theft are high, much higher than when Dylan released one lacklustre album every year during the 80's. The predecessor, Time Out Of Mind, got more rave reviews than anything he's done in two decades, and it's one of his greatest commercial successes. Since then he's picked up three (American) Grammies, an Oscars statuette and a Polar Music Prize.

When I ask him how these successes affect his career he answers that he never listens to his old albums. When I remind him that he in an interview declared that he had no idea how to handle all these praises – after being dismissed so many times – he interrupts:

I have no idea what I said back then. Don't you worry about it. It's like something you wrote five years ago, who cares about that now?

Everyone's laughing. I feel embarrassed. Bob Dylan, every journalist's nightmare, is as mean as he's ever been.

But he's not unfriendly. He's slippery and vague, but he's surprisingly funny. He seems to enjoy this mental wrestling with journalists.

That Bob Dylan gives an interview is news in itself. He is known as one of the more unwilling interview victims in rock music. Few musicians have as Bob Dylan punctured a question, bounced it back to the journalist, or just answered with a one-syllable non-answer or just been better in avoiding to specify anything.

Of course, Bob Dylan doesn't have to kiss anyone's ass. He's perhaps the most important artist of the 20th century, in any category. At least he's one of the few who can compete for that title. He could have withdrawn completely in 1966, and still be known as the person who raised the IQ of rock music more than anyone else, before or after.

Instead he's spent the last 35 years doing what no one expected of him. He's been a reclusive family father, he's been a fundamentalist preacher, he's sung evergreens and old standards, he's collaborated with Johnny Cash and Michael Bolton, he's been painting quite strangely an he's done a few weird films, he's rearranged his old songs so no one can recognize them and he's started to play golf.

All this can be seen as attempts to deconstruct the Bob Dylan myth, or to tempt the fans' patience so that just a manageable number will remain.

It's also possible to view all this as simple confusion. Confused or not, Dylan has been able to deliver at least one masterpiece every decade, "Blood on the Tracks" in 1975, "Oh Mercy" in 1989 and "Time out of Mind" in 1997.

There is one thing Dylan loves to talk about. "Love and Theft" is recorded without any heavy-handed producer – which is paradoxical, since Love And Theft sounds more produced than any Dylan recording in recent memory – and it's all because all producers are jack-asses and clumpsy lots, to put it simply.

Producers can take you wherever they want, Dylan says. It happens as soon as you're not sure if a song should be in a certain way or not. Most of my records turned out to be compromises because of insistent producers. But if you have your own vision, there's really not much a producer can contribute. I don't know much about sound quality, but the arrangements are exactly like I wanted them this time.

The same applies to his voice, that this sounds deeper and more varied than on any previous record.

I've never been recorded in a good way, he says. It seems like my special vocal range disturbs the entire system, both the low and the high register disappears. On my last record they tried all kinds of effects and overdubs to make my voice sound like it does in real life. But on this record we had a young guy who knew exactly how to do.

Bob Dylan's sitting here in front of me and he's basically dismissing everything he's ever done, except the latest record. Every album is a blueprint and a compromise. Except the new one, of course.

It's no coincidence that other singers have had bigger hits with my songs than I've had, he says. I'm basically just singing a song with a guitar. It's called making a demo.

It's this attitude that's behind this famous habit to drastically reinterpret his classics onstage, he says. That they never turned out out the way they should on record. But since he's always able to get up onstage the next night and correct what went wrong the night before these things don't matter too much anymore.

He's also often dismissed songs for a while, hoping to do them full justice at some later point. But before he's had any chance to return to them, they have turned up on some bootleg. And by then it's not too much fun to get back to the studio and record them again.

A song like that is included on the new album, and that's because Bob Dylan is guarding the outtakes harder than ever before. "Mississippi" was recorded for "Time Out Of Mind", but it was not included on the album. Now it's on "Love and Theft", but only because the original version never leaked out.

It would never have happened ten years ago, he says. All you would have heard was the original, lousy version.

Bob Dylan has just finished his 31st studio album and he's for once happy. With good conscience he can keep playing that same unexpected mix of old and new songs, sometimes his own, sometimes other's, he's played for all these years.

He's not just discontent with his records, he's also discontent with his line of work:

I didn't really choose to do what you are seeing me do right now. It choose me. If I had any choice I would have been a scientist, an engineer or a doctor. That's the kind of people I look up to. But I'm an entertainer. I'm in light entertainment.

He's singing his songs for an audience that isn't what it used to be.

Some fans remain, but not many. You know, at a certain age people starts to get families and give priority to other things.

Someone asks him about his most devoted fans, the people who just get too close, but Bob Dylan seems unwilling to even admit that there are fans like that.

I don't think I have any hardcore fans, he says. Some people attend many concerts, but I don't think of them as hardcore..

New attempt: But these people who see you as a religious object....

Yeah, that's right, what kind of religion is that? Dylan asks. What are they sacrificing? And to whom? I would like to know where they are making their sacrifices. I would like to be there.

We (the present journalists) try to ask Dylan more about the supposed conflict between himself and the public image of him. He doesn't like when people he's working with are too adoring, but he says that the Bob Dylan myth is of no importance during 95% of a 24-hour period. The rest of the time he just has to be nice.

But he also says that there's no place where he won't be recognized, and that he can't remember when he last visited such a place.

Someone asks what it's like being Bob Dylan today, if it's more simple than before. He answers that he's the wrong person to ask. I ask him if he's having much fun and he answers:

What's funny? To kick a ball around?

Maybe to enjoy life, I say.

I'm here. What more can I say? Is there a choice?

I say that some people have committed suicide.

Yeah. But not voluntarily.

It's typical. He never looks happier than when he's disarmed a tense situation with a witty remark. Someone asks him: Did you ever meet Elvis Presley?

No, I never met him. That's what I'm supposed to say.

He isn't dismissing all questions, however. On his new record he sings repeatedly about the sorrow after his mother's death. Someone asks him if these lines have anything to do with his own mother's death.

Probably, he says slowly. I can't understand how it couldn't be like that. Many of these lyrics are written in a "stream of consciousness" kind of mood, and I don't meditate on them afterwards. My way to get to grips with something is often just to go right ahead.

Otherwise, Bob Dylan is reluctant to comment on his lyrics, even though many journalists want him to explain them.

It's very rare that Bob looks back and tries to explain and adjust things of the past. Everyone looks up when Bob says that he's writing an autobiography.

It will be published in the form of articles. But in a book. The point of departure will be the different songs, I've noticed that it's a good way of remembering things from the past. That's how I got started, I found this way of working.

Currently, I'm studying the songs, but I look at them in a way I never thought of before. Much of what is happening is just passing through, but now I'm trying to find some kind of purpose. Various bad things lead to something good. Could this have happened if this didn't happen? It's an enormous project, and I'm doing it all in my spare time. My impressions are from a great number of songs, and I'm trying to see things from many points of view, and it's so much fun to write.

The most surprising statement of the interview comes late. Someone asks him about the line: "the future for me is already a thing of the past".

In his answer he's using a cliché he's spent decades trying to get away from:

I'm speaking for all of us. I'm the spokesman for a generation.

-Nils Hansson

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Italian coverage La repubblica, ver. a)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

ITALY, La repubblica, 7 September 2001
Interviewer: Gino Castaldo; Translation: Michele Ulisse L.

"I'll write down my story for this unreal time"

ROME – Sometimes it happens to meet History. Outside the museums too. Bob Dylan is there, he comes in the room dressed up like a gentleman of the old West. Black and grey. He's aged, obviously, but time softened the face, that today is more ironic, asymmetric, wise than it was time ago. He sits in front of us on the suite's sofa with a kind expression, but he is frightened, perplexed to the idea of something that is not usual to him, in spite of all these years of music: to talk about himself. Every wrinkle tell a decade, but in the middle of that face shaded by untidy curls there are two blue eyes incredibly big and attentive, flashing like the windows of a big mind that works tirelessly. Dylan open himself, he succeeds even to smile. Perhaps his it's a true and real rebirth.

GC: There are many books about you. Did you read them?
BD: I stop reading after Shelton's biography was published. It's difficult to read about ourselves because in your own mind things never happen that way. Everything looks fictitious.
GC: Weren't you tempted to write about yourself?
BD: Yes… I'm doing it really.
GC: Do you think now it's the right moment to reflect on your past, or were you preparing this book since many years?
BD: I think that what I'm writing was lookin' for the way to come out for a long time, it's not a past history for my wear and tear.
GC: In "Love & Theft" songs there are lines that could seem autobiographical…
BD: Probably, I can't see how it could be otherwise… But there's nothing premeditated. Many of these lyrics have been written in a sort of stream of consciousness. It doesn't happen to me to sit down at a table and meditate about every single line.
GC: Do you fear someone else's analysis?
BD: No, I don't know what people can find in what I do. Or else you mean Freudian kind analysis, or idealistic or Marxist? I have absolutely no idea.
GC: Once you wrote: "The future for me is already a thing of the past".
BD: I told it for everyone. Am I not the voice of a generation? I tell it for every of us.
GC: Live on stage you often sing old songs like Song to Woody. Is this something more than an abstract relationship with the past?
BD: It's because I'm happy to have written that song. Beyond everything, Woody Guthrie remains a phenomenal performer. He's like Charlie Parker, Hank Williams or others of the same prestige.
GC: Beh, not even your songs can be considered a simple background sound.
BD: No, all my songs are singable. They are current. This is iron age, but there was something else once and we can still perceive it. If you walk in the streets of a city like Rome, you realize that there was people here before you and perhaps they were on highest level than the one we can be.
GC: Do you feel the influence of some poets?
BD: I don't study really much the poetry.
GC: But are you in search of new writers/authors?

BD: Yes; but I don't believe there are, because we live in another age. Media are very much intrusive. What can you think to write that is not seen every day on newspapers or on TV?

GC: But there are emotions that must be expressed.

BD: Yes, but media move people's emotion anyway. When there were people like William Blake, Shelley or Baron, probably there wasn't any kind of media, just bulletins. You could feel yourself free to put down everything you had in your mind.

GC: Don't you feel free when you write?

BD: As I said, I'm not used to sit down and write. My lines go in the songs and those have a fixed structure and they must adapt to a precise idiom. They aren't free forms, there's no way to throw inside ideological stuff. You can't do it in a song.

GC: Nevertheless you did.

BD: If it happened, it did de facto but I never started with this intention. Perhaps someone else do it, not me.

GC: Do you think that TV and media killed poetry?

BD: Oh, absolutely. Because literature is written for readers. Nobody is like Kafka, and he sits writing something without wishing that someone read it.

GC: Every of the writers?

BD: Yes, certain, but media do this for everyone. You can't see things more horrible than the ones media propose. The news show to the people all the things that they could not even dream and the thoughts that they think to can suppress. So what can a writer do if every idea is already exposed by media before he can pick and evolve it?

GC: How do you react to all this?

BD: We live in science fiction in which Disney won, Disney science fiction. Everything is science fiction. For this reason I say that if a writer has something to tell, he absolutely got to. This a real world. Science fiction become the real world. We realize it or not.

GC: In a written of your, you talked of contemporary world as a new darkness age.

BD: Stone age, put down in this way. We talk of the gold age, that I believe is Homer's one, then we have had a silver age, and then a bronze age, and there's an heroic age somewhere. Then we have that we call iron age, but it could be stone age.

GC: Perhaps the silicon age?

BD: Oh yes (laughs) that's right.

GC: There are changes in your career. One of these happened in the middle of sixties, after Blonde on Blonde, when you had the motorbike crash. Later John Wesley Harding came out, and many people that was a different Dylan. It was "love and peace" time, and the album was completely different from the rest. Was the accident to make you change?

BD: It's difficult to me know when I took a decision consciously or not. But obviously in that period I had no much desire to go out and play. I didn't feel myself part of that culture.

GC: Springsteen told once that Elvis had freed the body and Dylan the mind.

BD: Did he tell so? It's good to be freed from anything… All of us should think so.

GC: Don't you believe there's a sort of religious feeling among your hardcore fans?

BD: I don't think there are hardcore fans. There are few people that we see at many concerts… and which kind of religion should be theirs? Which kind of sacrifices do they make and toward who? If they do so it's true that we have religious hardcore fans and then I'd like to know where and when they make sacrifices, because I'd like to be there too.

GC: You wrote a novel, Tarantula once. Didn't you feel a contrast with the music?

BD: Things in that period ran wildly: I never had intention to write a book. I had a manager and someone asked him: he writes all that songs, what else does he write? Books perhaps? And probably he answered: of course, sure that he writes books, or better, we're going to publish one. I think this was one of those circumstances in which he arranged everything and so I got to write the book. He often did. Once he proposed me as an actor in a show, and I had no information at all 'til the day it happened. I thought I got to sing. These things happened in the old times of last century.

GC: There have been phases in your life that you consider difficult?

BD: There have been many for sure. There are strange moments, when you got to assume a different character to survive.

GC: In which moment, in which years?

BD: Fundamentally it is necessary to subdue your own ambitions depended upon what you need to be.

GC: Which kind of ambitions?

BD: It's exactly someone needs to discover.

GC: Someone says that you're happier on your bus that you use to go on tour, rather than in one of your 17 houses. Is it so?

BD: Beh, the bus is fairly sumptuous now. Considering how I feel when I'm at home, I can't say not to feel at home everywhere. I don't wish something that isn't what I have at the present moment in front of me.

GC: Did your son Jacob listened to the new album?

BD: I believe he has had from one of his brother. But I'm not sure, I've been traveling since a long time.

GC: How is to be Dylan today? Easier than in the past?

BD: I'm not the right person to ask to. It's a philosophical question for matters of philosophical order.

GC: You declared that you don't love to relisten the past things. But doesn't this autobiographical forces you to do it?

BD: I'm just watching everything from a new point of view. Many things go from a point to another without there's a reason. Why did they happen, could they happen the same if something else hadn't happened? And if they seemed so bad at the moment, why took they to a benefit on the long-term?
I like to write it. But I'm not scrupulous at all.

GC: Thinkin' about yours 43 albums, which is the one you feel has had more success from your personal point of view?

BD: Success? I never listen to them really! I'm sure all them have had success in their own way and in their own way they failed too.

GC: Nevertheless there must be some album that you consider better than others.

BD: I don't listen to them because I don't think that the songs have been perfected. I often thought hadn't been well recorded, or not in the way I listened to in my head at least. Six or seven months later the song was released as it was, by people that I trusted in. Someone asked me, how can you be so a bad judge of your material, you don't choose the best things. I don't know who can judge what is better, I don't judge material, I like to insert some things rather. It happened with the album Time out of mind. It wasn't recorded particularly well, but luckily it wasn't released immediately, and I had the chance to record it again. But it couldn't been happen some years ago.

GC: There's no producer for this album. Why?

BD: When you work with a producer, you know that he can lead you in this or in that direction if you aren't especially resolute. Many of my albums have been altered. Producer and technicians are often captured by the myth. They don't think how my things should really have to play. When I play live people say: but the songs don't play as in the album. Obviously not, just because they weren't recorded in the right way.

GC: In the new album your voice seems more dark than usual.

BD: I think that it's never been recorded in a more accurate way. I don't think to have sung better than in the past.

GC: Do you think it's difficult to record your voice?

BD: No I don't. Even if it seems to me that nobody never understood it. For the new album I found a young technician that understood (how to do it). I don't need effects or tricks.

The matter is that my voice goes up and down, it's irregular, and it subverts classic systems of recording. But I actually think that the right way is the easiest one. Just an analogical recording, realistic.

GC: Do you think that there are prejudices about some voices as yours and Lou Reed or Cohen's?

BD: I believe that Leonard's voice is easily intelligible because his vocal radium is bass and linear. Lou has his own way to sing and talk in the meantime. Recording shouldn't have to be a problem.

GC: It seems your public is growin' up. There are many young people that listen to your concerts, more than old fans?

BD: I don't think there many old fans. The matter is that my age people die, or change life. A certain point of life new problems start, family, children, other priorities in comparison with entertainment.

GC: Do you consider yourself as an entertainer?

BD: No, but I got to compare with entertainment world.

GC: Do you think to go to meet George Harrison?

BD: I'm in touch with him, but I have no time now. I'll do if I have the chance.

GC: Do you believe that the Traveling Wilburys band will have a reunion?

BD: Who can guess? It's difficult to say.

GC: When you go on stage have you in mind to whom are directing?

BD: Yes, I play for the people who is farthest in the stalls. I don't look to the people who is in front of me, because they're usually the people that I find in every concert. They like the concert anyway.

GC: After many years you still go around on stage. Someone defined this Never ending tour.

BD: It irritates me to hear talk about Never ending tour. Naturally every thing must end. Mortality is what joins every of us and makes us identical. Things must have an end.

GC: Do you often think about death?

BD: I wouldn't say often, but for sure it happens when people who are close to me die.

GC: And about your mortality?

BD: Beh, I can see myself in other people, this the way I can think about it. I don't think about it more than everyone does. As soon as a person comes in the world he's old enough to leave it.

23 July 2001
Press Conference (Italian coverage La repubblica, ver. 1)
De la Ville Inter-Continental Roma Hotel, Rome, Italy

Source:
ITALY, La repubblica, 7 September 2001
Interviewer: Gino Castaldo; Translation: David Flynn

Sometimes it happens that you meet history. Also outside the museum. Bob Dylan is there, he comes into the room dressed like a gentleman from the Old West. Black and Grey. He's got older, obviously, but time has softened his face. These days it's more ironic, asymmetrical, wiser than it was. He sits down opposite us on a sofa in the hotel suite with a courteous expression but he's frightened, puzzled, faced with something that's not familiar to him even after all these years of music: talking about himself. Every line on his face tells the story of a decade but in the centre of that face shadowed by untidy curls there are two pale-blue eyes, frighteningly large and attentive, flashing like the windows of a great mind that works unceasingly. Dylan opens up, he wants to talk, he even gets round to smiling. Maybe his is a true rebirth.

GC: There have been many books published about you. Have you read them?

BD: I stopped reading them after the Shelton biography. It's difficult to read about yourself because in your own mind things never happen in that way. It all seems like fiction.

GC: Have you ever been tempted to write about yourself?

BD: Yeah…to tell the truth I'm doing it.

GC: Do you think this is the right moment to reflect on your past, or have you been preparing this book for years?

BD: I think that what I'm writing has been trying to find its way out for some time now. It's not a story about the past for my own use.

GC: In the songs on Love and Theft there are phrases that could seem autobiographical.

BD: Probably, I don't see how it could be any other way…But there's nothing premeditated. Many of these lyrics were written in a sort of stream of consciousness. I never sit down at a table and meditate about every single verse.

GC: Do you worry about how other people will analyse them?

BD: No, I've got no idea what other people might discover in the things I produce. Or do you mean analysis like Freudian or Idealist or Marxist? I really have no idea.

GC: Once you wrote ' For me the future is a thing of the past '.

BD: I said it for everybody. Aren't I the spokesman for a generation? I speak for all of us.

GC: When you play live you often sing old songs, like Song to Woody. Is it more than just an abstract relationship with the past?

BD: It's because I'm happy to have written that song. Leaving everything aside, Woody Guthrie is a phenomenal performer. He's like Charlie Parker, Hank Williams or others of that stature.

GC: Your songs are hardly just background music...

BD: No, my songs are all singable. They're relevant. This is the Iron Age, but before there was something else and we can't conceive of it yet. If you walk around the streets of a city like Rome you realise that there were people before you and maybe they were on a higher level than we can ever reach.

GC: Are you influenced by some poets?

BD: To tell the truth I don't study poetry much.

GC: But you look out for new writers?

BD: Yeah, but I don't believe there are any, because we live in another age. The media is very invasive. What could you possibly write that you haven't seen every day in the newspapers or on television.

GC: But there are emotions that have to be expressed.

BD: Yeah, but the media control people's emotions, anyway. When there were people around like William Blake, Shelley or Byron there probably wasn't any form of media. Just gazzettes. You could feel free to put down whatever you had in your mind.

GC: Don't you feel free when you write?

BD: Like I said I'm not used to sitting down and writing. My words go into the songs and they've got a precise structure and they have to conform to a certain idiom. They're not free forms. There's no way you can put ideology inside. You can't do it with a song.

GC: Even though you've done it.

BD: If it happened it happened but I never set out with that intention. Maybe others do that but not me.

GC: Do you think the TV and the media have killed poetry?

BD: Oh, absolutely. Because literature is written for a public. There's nobody like Kafka who just sits down and writes something without wanting somebody to read it.

GC: Every writer?

BD: Yeah, sure, but the media does this for everybody. You can't see things that are more horrible than what the media give you. The news shows people things that they couldn't even dream about and even ideas that people thought they could repress, but they see them and they can't even repress them anymore. So what can a writer do when every idea is already exposed in the media before he can even grasp it and develop it.

GC: How do you react to all this?

BD: We live in a world of fantasy where Disney has won, the fantasy of Disney. It's all fantasy. That's why I think that if a writer has something to say he should say it at all costs. The world is real. Fantasy has become the real world. Whether we realise it or not.

GC: You have written that the modern world is a sort of new Dark Ages.

BD: The Stone Age, let's put it like that. We speak about the Golden Age which I believe would be that of Homer, then we had the Age of Silver and then the Bronze Age and there was a Heroic Age somewhere in there. Then we have what we call the Iron Age, but it could be the Stone Age.

GC: Maybe the Silicon Age?

BD: Oh, yeah (laughs), that's right.

GC: There have been important changes in your career. One of these happened in the middle of the sixties after Blonde on Blonde, when you had the motorcycle accident. After some time John Wesley Harding came out and many people thought it was a different Dylan. It was the time of Love and Peace and the record was completely different from everything else. Was it the accident that changed things?

BD: It's difficult for me to know whether I made a conscious decision or not. But obviously at that time I had no great desire to go out and play music. I never felt that I was part of that culture.

GC: Springsteen once said that Elvis freed your body and Dylan freed your mind.

BD: He said that? To free mind? It's good to be freed from everything…We should all think like that.

GC: Don't you think there's a sort of religious feeling amongst your hard core fans?

BD: I don't think I've got a group of hard core fans. There are a few people that we see at many concerts…And then what religion would they have? What sacrifices do they make, and for who? If they do then okay we've got a hard core religious group and I'd like to know when and where they make those sacrifices because I'd like to be there, too.

GC: You once wrote a novel, Tarantula. Did you feel that was a contrast to the music?

BD: Things were happening wildly in that period. I never had any intention of writing a book. I had a manager who was asked: he writes all those songs, what else does he write? Maybe he writes books. And he must have replied: obviously, sure he writes books, in fact we're just about to publish one. I think it was on that occasion that he made the deal and then I had to write the book. He often did things like that. Once he set me up as an actor in a show and I knew nothing about it till the day it happened. I thought I was going to sing. These things happened in the old days…last century.

GC: Have there been what you would consider difficult phases in your life?

BD: Sure, there have been many. There are strange moments when you have to take on a new personality to survive.

GC: Which moment, which years?

BD: Basically you have to surpass your own ambitions in order to be who you need to be.

GC: What type of ambitions?

BD: That's exactly what you have to discover.

GC: Some people say you're happier on your bus when you're on tour than in any one of your 17 homes. Is that true?

BD: Well, the bus has become more or less luxurious now. If I think about how I feel at home I'd have to say that I feel at home wherever I am. I never want anything that isn't what I've got right in front of me at any given moment.

GC: Has your son Jacob heard the new record?

BD: I think he got it from one of his brothers or sisters. But I'm not sure, I've been traveling around for a long time.

GC: How does it feel to be Dylan today. Easier than in the past?

BD: I'm not the right person to ask. It's a philosophical question.

GC: You've said you don't like listening to things from the past doesn't this autobiography force you to do just that?

BD: I'm just looking at everything from a new point of view. Many things go from one point to another without there being a reason. Why did they happen, could they have happened if something else hadn't happened? And if they seemed so bad at the time why did they bring long term benefits? I like to write. But I'm certainly not meticulous.

GC: Thinking about your 43 records, which one do you think was the most successful from your point of view?

BD: Successful? To tell the truth I never listen to them! I'm sure they were all successful in their own way and I'm sure in their own way they were all failures.

GC: There must be records that you consider better than others, though.

BD: I don't listen to them because I don't think the songs were ever done perfectly. I often think a song wasn't recorded perfectly or at least not in the way I heard the song in my head. Six or seven months later the song would be released in the way it was. By people I had trusted. It happened too many times. I'm often asked how I can be such a bad judge of my own material, that I don't put the best things on the records. I don't know how anyone can judge which song is better than another. I don't judge the material, more or less I like to put anything on the record. It happened with Time Out of Mind. It wasn't recorded particularly well but luckily it wasn't released immediately so I was able to record it again from the start. But years ago that could never have happened.

GC: On the new album there's no producer. Why's that?

BD: When you work with a producer you know that he can take you in this direction or that direction if you're not particularly determined. Many of my records have been altered. Often the producer or the engineers are prisoners of the legend. They don't think about how my things should really sound. When I sing live people say: but the songs don't sound like they do on the record. Obviously not, also because they weren't recorded in the right way.

GC: On the new album your voice sounds darker than usual.

BD: I don't think it's ever been recorded in a more accurate way. I don't think I was singing better than in the past.

GC: Do you think it's difficult to record your voice?

BD: I don't think so. Even though it seems like nobody has ever understood. For the new record I found a young engineer who understood. I don't need special effects or tricks. The fact is that my voice goes up and down. It's irregular, and it subverts the classical recording systems. But I really think the right way is the most simple way. All you need is an analogue recording, realistic.

GC: Do you think there are preconceived ideas about certain voices like yours and Leonard Cohen's and Lou Reed's?

BD: I think Leonard's voice is easily understood because his vocal range is low and straightforward (lineare). Lou has his own way of singing and speaking at the same time. Recording them shouldn't be a problem.

GC: It seems like your audience is growing. Are there many young people at your concerts along with your old fans?

BD: I don't think there are many old fans. The fact is that people of my age die, or change their lives. At a certain point in your life new problems arise. Family, children. priorities change, entertainment becomes less important.

GC: Do you consider yourself to be an entertainer?

BD: No, but I have to face up to the world of entertainment.

GC: Do you think you'll be going to visit George Harrison?

BD: I'm in contact with him, but at the moment I haven't got the time. If I have the possibility then I will.

GC: Do you think The Traveling Wilburys where you were together with Harrison could come back?

BD: Who can say? It's difficult to know.

GC: When you're on stage do you have in your mind any idea of who you're relating to?

BD: Yeah, I'm playing for the people who are furthest away. I don't look at the people near me because it's usually the people who you see at every concert. They'll enjoy the concert in any case.

GC: After many years you're still on tour. Some people call it The Never Ending Tour.

BD: It annoys me when I hear people talking about The Never Ending Tour. Obviously everything must finish. That which ties everyone together and which makes everyone equal is our mortality. Everything must come to an end.

GC: Do you think about death often?

BD: I wouldn't say often but it certainly happens when people who are close to me die.

GC: And about your own mortality?

BD: Well, I can see myself in other people, that's the way you can think about it. I don't think about it any more than everybody else. As soon as you enter this world you're old enough to leave it.

10 September 2001
Edna Gundersen Interview for USA Today

DYLAN IS POSITIVELY ON TOP OF HIS GAME
By Edna Gundersen, USA TODAY

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — It's been a hard reign for music's unruly ruler, who's weathered mutinous waves from disco to techno, Muzak to metal and sock hops to hip-hop. Enthroned in myth for nearly 40 years, Bob Dylan remains firmly empowered by his own rebel nature and artistic drive. "From the start, I had an extreme sense of destiny," he says. Its newest manifestation is Love and Theft, due Tuesday. His 43rd album follows 1997's Time Out of Mind, a haunting meditation on mortality that won three Grammys, including album of the year.

Confounding expectations, Love and Theft straddles future and past in a radical reinvention of pre-war American song styles that's garnering raves unrivaled since his early classics. Rolling Stone bestowed five stars, the first perfect score for a new album since 1992's touting of R.E.M.'s Automatic for the People.

Dylanologists won't need decoder rings to decipher the bard's candid expressions about heartbreak and human foibles on accessible tunes aimed squarely at the hoi polloi. The unsavory duo on Tweedle Dee and Tweedle Dum, heard in Dylan's first-ever television ad (airing on networks this week), conveys the nature of wickedness in modern times.

"That evil might not be coming your way as a monstrous brute or the gun-toting devilish ghetto gangster," Dylan says. "It's the bookish-looking guy in wire-rimmed glasses who might not be entirely harmless."

"I've never recorded an album with more autobiographical songs," he says. "This is the way I really feel about things. It's not me dragging around a bottle of absinthe and coming up with Baudelairian poems. It's me using everything I know to be true."

A notorious sphinx, Dylan is positively forthcoming during a 90-minute interview in his beachside hotel suite. Animated and assertive, he laughs easily. He's rock-star slim and sports a Vincent Price moustache, black cowboy boots and that familiar wiry mop, now shot with gray.

Fresh off a summer tour, he's sipping coffee and waxing philosophic about his place in the polar extremes of music and business.

"To me, music either expresses ideas of liberty, or it's made under the oppression of dictatorship," he says. "The only stuff I've heard that has that freedom is traditional Anglo-American music. That's all I know. That's all I've ever known. I was fortunate to come up at a time when the last of it existed. It doesn't exist anymore."

Dismayed by the "rootless" nature of current pop music, Dylan listens primarily to archaic recordings and ignores even the Dylan-esque clones that litter his wake.

"People who came after me, I don't feel, were ever my peers or contemporaries, because they didn't really have any standing in traditional music," he says. "They didn't play folk songs. They heard me and thought, 'Oh, this guy writes his own songs, I can do that.' They can, of course, but those songs don't have any resonance."

While Dylan resonates in countless musical movements, his presence in pop culture waned midcareer and didn't rebound until the lauded Time Out of Mind unleashed innumerable hosannas and awards. While he shrugs off most accolades and the press hoopla surrounding his 60th birthday in May ("I stopped counting at 40"), he confesses to a giddy thrill in winning the Oscar for Wonder Boys theme Things Have Changed.

"In all honesty, if I hadn't won, it probably would have devastated me a little bit," he says. "That's like the Pulitzer Prize of the entertainment world."

And yet Dylan is grateful the publicity machines stopped stalking him a decade ago.

"In the early '90s, the media lost track of me, and that was the best thing that could happen," he says. "It was crucial, because you can't achieve greatness under media scrutiny. You're never allowed to be less than your legend. When the media picked up on me again five or six years later, I'd fully developed into the performer I needed to be and was in a position to go any which way I wanted. The media will never catch up again. Once they let you go, they cannot get you back. It's metaphysical. And it's not good enough to retreat. You have to be considered irrelevant."

Dylan's creative resurgence and a near-fatal heart infection in 1997 renewed interest in his well-shrouded private life, prompting publication this year of two biographies airing personal and sometimes unflattering details of his past. Dylan is less irritated by the books than their shady sources seeking money or glory.

"People tend to ingratiate themselves with other people by passing along information," he says. "I have the same feeling about them that Sherman and Lee had about people hanging around their tents. They're spies. All informers should be shot. A person should not rat on anybody. It's a principle I adhere to."

Regarding one author's disclosure of Dylan's marriage to background singer Carolyn Dennis from 1986 to 1990, Dylan chuckles and blurts, "I've been married a bunch of times! I mean, I've never tried to hide that. I just don't advertise my life. I write songs, I play on stage, and I make records. That's it. The rest is not anybody's business."

Fans will have an opportunity to read Dylan's "take on people who've had takes on me" in Chronicles, a series of memoirs to be published by Simon & Schuster. So far, he's penned about 100 pages of recollections about his folk launch in New York for the inaugural volume, due next year.

Though loath in the past to correct the record, Dylan is less reticent about addressing specific misconceptions. Family matters remain off limits. Asked about the Lonesome Day Blues line "I wish my mother was still alive," he declines to discuss her death last year, except to say, "Even to talk about my mother just breaks me up."

He's more willing to explain his artistic motives, particularly the overly scrutinized lyrics that beguile scholars.

"Unfortunately, people have been led down the wrong path by quasi-intellectuals who never really get the cultural spirit in the air when these songs are performed," he says.

Masters of War, for instance, "is supposed to be a pacifistic song against war. It's not an anti-war song. It's speaking against what Eisenhower was calling a military industrial complex as he was making his exit from the presidency. That spirit was in the air, and I picked it up. People focus on the senators and congressmen in The Times They Are A-Changin' but never the Nietzschean aspects. The spirit of 'God is dead' was in the air, but Nietzsche was the son of a bourgeois pastor. That turns the rationale on its head. And Desolation Row? That's a minstrel song through and through. I saw some ragtag minstrel show in blackface at the carnivals when I was growing up, and it had an effect on me, just as much as seeing the lady with four legs."

While his disciples continue to scour early prose for hidden meanings, Dylan remains focused on his current agenda. He recently authorized producers to construct a stage production around selected Dylan compositions. An arena tour kicks off Oct. 5 in Spokane, Wash. A live set may be recorded and released by next year. A handful of partially sketched songs could yield a new album within two years. He's unsure about the status of further reissues but says plenty of previously unreleased material remains in vaults.

He's not slowing down or eyeing retirement. Aside from disrupting a tour, the health scare in 1997 did little to hamper Dylan's momentum and left no lasting physical or psychological scars.

"That's gone. It happens, and you wonder why. It's not like I needed to get off my feet or take refuge to think about my life. It was just a painful experience. If it had been diagnosed correctly right away, you would have never heard about it. But I was in a lot of pain and couldn't get any correct readings on what was the matter with me until it was nearly too late."

Dylan was stricken while on tour. He contracted pericarditis during a springtime motorcycle ride along the muddy banks of the Ohio River after a week of heavy rain. As the air grew thick with brown dust, he stopped to tie a bandana over his mouth.

"People who live there are immune and go indoors when it happens," he says. "I thought, this heavy pollution is strange. You couldn't see five feet ahead of you. We played that night and moved on."

Play and move on. That mantra continues to sustain Dylan as he enters his fifth decade as an icon, enigma, influence and, most important, working musician.

"How do I see my future?" he muses. "I don't."

16 September 2001
Robert Hilburn interview for Los Angeles Times, Santa Monica

Source: Los Angeles Times online

Sunday, September 16, 2001
HOW DOES IT FEEL? DON'T ASK

A creatively rejuvenated Bob Dylan won't discuss his life or his lyrics. The state of pop music is another matter.

By ROBERT HILBURN

"Five stars!"

Those are Bob Dylan's first words as I step into his Santa Monica hotel suite to talk about his new album, "Love and Theft."

"That's what Rolling Stone gave the new album. How many artists have you interviewed in the last 15 years that have gotten a five-star review?"

Thinking he's putting me on, I reply, "Well, you're not getting five stars in The Times."

Silence.

I quickly explain that we have a four-star rating system.

Could the most acclaimed songwriter of the modern pop era really care about a single review? I can't even imagine him being excited about winning a Grammy, or an Oscar, as he did earlier this year for "Things Have Changed" from "Wonder Boys."

"Wouldn't you be excited if you won a Pulitzer Prize?" he replies.

It's a quintessential Dylan moment. Every time you think you have him figured out, he taunts you with his elusiveness.

For 40 years, he has been a man of constant change who weaves conviction and contradictions into his work with artful sleight-of-hand.

On "Love and Theft," which received a four-star review last Sunday in The Times and was released Tuesday, there are still moments of struggle and confusion. But those sentiments are accompanied—often in the same song—by moments of disarming wit (including a goofy knock-knock joke) and jubilant optimism, when the gods seem lined up on his side.

The message of "Love and Theft," however, is as much in the arrangements as the lyrics. Dylan's musical compass has always been tied to the country, blues and folk sounds that thrilled him as a youngster in Minnesota, and he and his dazzling road band play with the defiance of true believers who feel pop music has been taken over by charlatans.

In the alternating gentle and wailing instrumentation, Dylan pulls us back to the start of rock n' roll, reminds us of the innocence and energy of the times and, in the process, challenges those who feel that rock is exhausted as an art form.

You won't get Dylan to admit that in an interview, but he hints at it. As always, he resists questions about his personal life and the meaning of particular lines or songs, but he speaks passionately about his legacy and his musical roots. Ever the extremist, Dylan is guilty of underestimating some of today's rock and hip-hop acts, but his views are as provocative as his lyrics in "Love and Theft."

Dylan, 60, is working on his autobiography, but you wonder if he'll really step from behind the veil even there. He's already hinting the events in the book may be a bit fuzzy. "My retrievable memory isn't as good as it should be," he says with only the barest trace of a smile.

RH: The music on the new album seems transported from a different era. Do you find much inspiration in today's music scene?

BD: I know there are groups at the top of the charts that are hailed as the saviors of rock n' roll and all that, but they are amateurs. They don't know where the music comes from... I was lucky. I came up in a different era. There were these great blues and country and folk artists around, and the impulse to play [those sounds] came to me at a very early age.

I wouldn't even think about playing music if I was born in these times. I wouldn't even listen to the radio. I'm an extreme person. I'm not a party boy. I don't care about rave dances and a lot of the stuff going on.

RH: What do you think would have interested you today if music weren't an option?

BD: I'd probably turn to something like mathematics. That would interest me. Architecture would interest me. Something like that.

RH: Are you surprised by the return of so much placid pop—which was one of the original targets of rock 'n' roll?

BD: I don't think what we call pop music today is any worse than it was. We never liked pop music. It never occurred to me [in the '50s] that Bing Crosby was on the cutting edge 20 years before I was listening to him. I never heard that Bing Crosby. The Louis Armstrong I heard was the guy who sang "Hello, Dolly!" I never heard him do "West End Blues."

RH: "Time Out of Mind" seemed to spark a creative resurgence for you. Did you know right away it was something special?

BD: It was a little sketchy to me. I knew after that record that when and if I ever committed myself to making another record, I didn't want to get caught short without up-tempo songs. A lot of my songs are slow ballads. I can gut-wrench a lot out of them. But if you put a lot of them on a record, they'll fade into one another, and there was some of that in "Time Out of Mind." I sort of blueprinted it this time to make sure I didn't get caught without up-tempo songs.

If you hear any difference on this record—why it might flow better—it's because as soon as an up-tempo song comes over, then it's slowed down, then back up again. There's more pacing.

RH: What about the creative process for you? Do you write constantly?

BD: I overwrite. If I know I am going in to record a song, I write more than I need. In the past that's been a problem because I failed to use discretion at times. I have to guard against that. On this album, "Lonesome Day Blues" was twice as long at one point. "Highlands" [a 17-minute song on "Time Out of Mind"] was twice as long originally.

RH: Why is there so much humor on the album this time? Does it have to do with your state of mind these days?

BD: I try to make the songs as three-dimensional as possible. A one- or two-dimensional song doesn't last very long. It's important to have humor where you can. Even the most severe rapper uses some humor.

RH: When do you tend to do the most writing? When you're on tour or when you're home for a few weeks?

BD: I don't know. Some things just come to me in dreams. But I can write a bunch of stuff down after you leave... about, say, the way you are dressed. I look at people as ideas. I don't look at them as people. I'm talking about general observation. Whoever I see, I look at them as an idea... what this person represents. That's the way I see life. I see life as a utilitarian thing. Then you strip things away until you get to the core of what's important.

RH: Did you have much interest in the 2000 Bush-Gore campaign?

BD: Did I follow the election? Yeah, I followed to see who would win. But in the larger scheme of things, the government is irrelevant. Everybody, everything can be bought and sold.

RH: Isn't that pretty pessimistic for someone who everyone thought was so optimistic and inspiring in the '60s?

BD: I'm not sure people understood a lot of what I was writing about. I don't even know if I would understand them if I believed everything that has been written about them by imbeciles who wouldn't know the first thing about writing songs. I've always said the organized media propagated me as something I never pretended to be... all this spokesman of conscience thing. A lot of my songs were definitely misinterpreted by people who didn't know any better, and it goes on today.

RH: Give me an example of a song that has been widely misinterpreted.

BD: Take "Masters of War." Every time I sing it, someone writes that it's an antiwar song. But there's no antiwar sentiment in that song. I'm not a pacifist. I don't think I've ever been one. If you look closely at the song, it's about what Eisenhower was saying about the dangers of the military-industrial complex in this country. I believe strongly in everyone's right to defend themselves by every means necessary.

RH: But there surely was a lot of idealism in the country and in your songs in the '60s.

BD: Well, you are affected as a writer and a person by the culture and spirit of the times. I was tuned into it then, I'm tuned into it now. None of us are immune to the spirit of the age. It affects us whether we know it or whether we like it or not. There's some of today's cultural spirit on this record.

I think something changed in the country around 1966 or so. You'll have to look at the history books to really sort it out, but there are people who manipulated the Vietnam War. They were traitors to America, whoever they were. It was the beginning of the corporate takeover of America.

RH: How would you describe the spirit of the '50s and the '60s?

BD: I knew it was an unsettled, rebellious spirit.

RH: How about today?

BD: I don't really know. I am not a forecaster of the times. But if we're not careful, we'll wake up in a multinational, multiethnic police state—not that America can't reverse itself. Whoever invented America were the greatest minds we've ever seen, and [people] who understand what the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights are all about will come to the forefront sooner or later.

RH: What was it like to be adored at times and booed at others—like on the "Slow Train Coming" tour in the 70s?

BD: I was booed at Newport before that, remember. You can't worry about things like that. Miles Davis has been booed. Hank Williams was booed. Stravinsky was booed. You're nobody if you don't get booed sometime.

RH: Does that affect you as an artist? Does it make you either ease up or dig in?

BD: It depends on what kind of artist you are. There are superficial artists, natural artists and supernatural artists.

RH: How do you define them?

BD: A natural artist is someone who just takes what talent they have and displays it night after night on stage, doing the best they can within [accepted] limits. A superficial artist is someone who shouldn't be up there in the first place because they've really got nothing to tell you.

RH: And the supernatural?

BD: That's someone who goes deep, and the deeper they go, the more buried gods they'll find.

RH: How would you describe yourself?

BD: [Laughs.] I really should apply this to other people rather than myself. I'm not sure where I fit. You can call me any one of those. But I always felt that if I'm going to do anything in life, I want to go as deep as I can.

RH: Have you always lived up to that goal? Have you ever felt you were just a superficial artist?

BD: Sure, I think the tour I did with the Band in 1974 was superficial. I had forgotten how to sing and play. I had been devoting my time to raising a family, and it took me a long time to recapture my purpose as a performer. You'd find it at times, then it would disappear again for a while.

RH: You're on a creative roll now. Where do you see the beginning of it?

BD: In the early '90s when I escaped the organized media. They let me be. They considered me irrelevant, which was the best thing that could have happened to me. I was waiting for that. No artist can develop for any length of time in the light of the media, no matter who it is. If the media was commenting on every article you wrote, imagine what it would do to you.

RH: Do you worry that the latest rash of awards and acclaim will make the media start focusing on you again?

BD: No, that time has passed. Once they move away and lose track of you, they'll never catch up with you again. They're off searching for someone new to put a label on.

RH: Do you see yourself touring indefinitely?

BD: I don't see myself doing anything indefinitely. I see myself fulfilling the commitments at the moment. Anything beyond that, time will have to tell.

RH: So, how do you feel personally? There's a lot of spirit in the new album. Do you feel pretty good about things?

BD: Any day above the ground is a good day.

Robert Hilburn, The Times' pop music critic, can be reached at robert.hilburn@latimes.com.

17 September 2001
Christopher John Farley Interview for Time Magazine

The grand old man of rock's latest album adds a rockingly good chapter to the LEGEND OF DYLAN
By CHRISTOPHER JOHN FARLEY

Bob Dylan is flipping through his own back pages. He has finally started writing an autobiography. It began as liner notes for rereleases of his back-catalog albums; he has finished about 200 pages, or perhaps 150—he's not exactly certain. "My retrievable memory, it goes blank on incidents and things that have happened," says Dylan. He has trouble, sometimes, remembering events from decades past, when he was conjuring up albums like Highway 61 Revisited and unleashing songs like Maggie's Farm. So he is collecting anecdotes about himself that other people have told and weaving them into his narrative. Here's the touch that's pure Dylan: even if he knows a tale isn't factual, if it sounds good, he'll use it anyway. "I'll take some of the stuff that people think is true," he says, "and I'll build a story around that."

Here's one story that is true: Dylan is back. Not sort of back, making music that starstruck critics feel compelled to applaud just because Dylan's the guy who plugged in at Newport, or because he's the visionary who wrote Like a Rolling Stone, or even because he's the man who first declared that The Times They Are A-Changin'. He's all the way back—so far back he's up front—once again making music that's worth talking about, not because of what he did 10,000 yesterdays ago but because of what he's doing today. His new album, Love and Theft (Columbia), his 43rd release, is charged with rollickingly good music and enlivened with some of the best lyrics Dylan has spun out in decades.

The story goes like this: a '60s icon, a touring firebrand in the '70s, slows to a grind in the late '80s and, amid reports of his drinking too much and caring too little, loses all touch with his muse in the early '90s. Then comes the acclaimed album Time Out of Mind in 1997, a Grammy in 1998 (his first for best album), an Oscar for best song (another first) in 2001 and worldwide celebration and plaudits on the occasion of his 60th birthday, which took place on May 24 of this year. "Well, you know, I stopped counting after 40," says Dylan. "I'm sure you would too." He says he has got past the heart ailment he had in 1997, and is feeling fit. He adds, smiling, "A day above the ground is a good day."

But that's just part of the story. The tale could have ended like this: it was 1987 and Dylan was about to embark on a tour with the Grateful Dead when he decided to quit the music business. At that point, he had been mailing in his performances for years; he had even hired backup singers to distract audiences from the tired ruin of his voice: He couldn't even remember the lyrics to his best, most challenging songs, like Desolatian Row and Queen Jane Approximately; what's more, he didn't want to remember them. "I'd become a different person since I'd written them," Dylan recalls, "and, frankly, they mystified me." The members of the Grateful Dead, however, loved the old songs and wanted to play some of them with Dylan. The realization that he had grown so estranged from his art drove Dylan to despair. "At that point, I was just going to get out of it and everything that entails," he says.

Then came an epiphany. He was in California with the Dead, practicing for the tour, when he saw a group of younger performers in a club. They were playing middle-of-the-road jazz standards, but they had a youthful energy. Says Dylan: "I suddenly realized, you know, years ago when I was young, whenever it was that I started out, I knew these kind of guys." He resolved to reconnect to his music. A few not-so-great albums followed, such as World Gone Wrong; but eventually Dylan found his path and released Time Out of Mind, and now Love and Theft. The end.

If this sounds a little apocryphal, that's part of the story too since Dylan—born Robert Allen Zimmerman in Duluth, Minn.—has revised and reinvented his past from the very start of his career. On Summer Days, a track from Love and Theft, he sings, "She says, 'you can't repeat the past.' I say, 'you can't? What do you mean, you can't? Of course you can!'" Dylan talks like he sings, in that ancient lilting rasp, stressing unexpected syllables, mesmerizing with folky cadences, loping along somewhere between conversation and caterwauling. All the compositions on Love and Theft are autobiographical, he says. "Yeah, all of 'em. Every single one, every line. It's completely autobiographical, as most of my stuff usually is on one level or another."

Indeed, Love and Theft is an album of memories, of old genres and antique grooves. The songs have a sense of history and a sense of discovery; hearing them is like finding a stack of vintage records in an old uncle's attic. The opening track, Tweedle Dee & Tweedle Dum, churns to a boogie-woogie-ish beat; the radiant Moonlight evokes Tin Pan Alley crooning and Western swing; and on the song High Water, Dylan pays tribute to blues pioneer Charley Patton. "All my songs, the styles I work in, were all developed before I was born," says Dylan. "When I came into the world, that spirit of things was still very strong. Billie Holiday was still alive. Duke Ellington. All those old blues singers were still alive. And I met and played with many of them. I learned a whole bunch of stuff from them. And that was the music that was dear to me. I was never really interested in pop music."

While the lyrics on Time Out of Mind are stark and dreary (the first line on the album is "I'm walking through streets that are dead"), the lyrics on Love and Theft are vibrant and visionary, loose-limbed and jokey. On Cry a While, Dylan actually uses the phrase "booty call"; on Po' Boy, he tells a knock-knock joke. On Mississippi, he summons up his old outsider spirit, singing, "I was raised in the country, I been workin' in the town / I been in trouble ever since I set my suitcase down." But on Summer Days, he acknowledges that things have changed for the old rebel icon: "Well I'm drivin' in the flats in a cadillac car/ the girls all say, 'you're a worn-out a star.'" Says Dylan: "I heard somebody say that to me."

Dylan's relationships with women have often been the subject of scrutiny, a both in his lyrics and in the media. "There ain't no limit to the amount of trouble women bring," he sings on Sugar Baby, the last track on Love and Theft. In 1977 he went through a messy divorce from his first wife, Sara Lowndes. (One of their five children, Jakob, has gone on to become a rock star with his band the Wallflowers.) A book that came out this year, Down the Highway: The Life of Bob Dylan by Howard Sounes, revealed that in 1986, Dylan had a child with one of his backup singers, Carolyn Dennis, and later married her. Although they are divorced, Dylan says he never tried to conceal the relationship. "It's not private to me," he says. "I've never tried to hide anything. I mean, not that I know of. I don't have any skeletons that I don't want anybody to see." Speaking about Dennis publicly for the first time, he says she is "a fantastic singer. She's a gospel singer mainly. One of her uncles was Blind Willie Johnson. What more do you need to know about somebody?" Dylan's daughter with Dennis is in her teens and apparently doesn't share her father's musical tastes. Says Dylan: "I get in fights with her if I talk about music."

Dylan, in fact, hates most modern music. "The radio makes hideous sounds," he says. He thinks Beck, the folk/rock/hip-hop singer-songwriter who is often compared with him, should focus: "you just can't be that good at everything you touch." He hasn't really listened to Eminem's work-when it comes to rap, he prefers the Roots—but he says, "I almost feel like if anything is controversial, the guy's gotta be doing something right." Among the few contemporary acts that excite him is jazz singer Cassandra Wilson. "She is one of my favorite singers today," says Dylan. "I heard her version of Death Letter Blues—gave me the chills. I love everything she does." He says he would like to see her cover some of his songs.

Meanwhile, the old man is doing just fine performing his own work. He plays about 120 dates a year, and in recent years his shows have become stronger than they have been in decades. His set lists change as constantly as the weather, and his live song interpretations often differ radically from their recorded versions. Dylan is wandering around his history, making changes as he sees fit. The veteran folk-rocker says his inspiration comes directly from God. "I've had a God-given sense of destiny," says Dylan. "This is what I was put on earth to do. Just like Shakespeare was gonna write his plays, the Wright Brothers were gonna invent an airplane, like Edison was gonna invent a telephone, I was put here to do this. I knew I was gonna do it better than anybody ever did it." Well, actually, Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone. But who says you can't remake the past?

27 September 2001
David Fricke interview for Rolling Stone

Source: Rolling Stone as reprinted in ISIS #99, Oct/Nov 2001, p. 34.

The Making of Dylan's "Love and Theft"
By David Fricke

At about 3:30 p.m. every day for two weeks Dylan arrived at a recording studio in midtown Manhattan and went straight to work. Dylan was making "Love and Theft," his first studio album in four years. "And it was work," says organist and accordion player Augie Meyers. "Bob would walk in, have all his papers there and go, 'Let's try this in [the key of] C.'

"There was none of this 'Hi, what's happening?' and a bit of BS," says the Texas-born Meyers, 61, who played in the Sir Douglas Quintet and has known Dylan since the 1960s. "It was, 'OK, let's go to work.' After we were through, at ten o'clock at night, it seemed like we'd only been there a couple of hours, because it was so much fun. Every day was a special day, because every day was a new song."

"Love and Theft" is vastly different in tone and atmosphere from "Time Out of Mind," even though both records feature Dylan's group. The latter was produced by Daniel Lanois with an emphasis on shadows and foreboding. Dylan, in turn, produced "Love and Theft" (under an alias, Jack Frost) with a focus on vocal melodies and the interplay of Campbell and Sexton's guitars. Combining incisive reflection and complex narrative with sprawling, guitar-enriched Americana – jump blues, rockabilly, mountain balladry and saloon croon – Dylan has made one of the most jubilant and compelling records of his career. Asked why he recut "Mississippi" for "Love and Theft" and produced the album himself, Dylan replies–

"If you had heard the original recording, you'd see in a second. The song was pretty much laid out intact melodically, lyrically and structurally, but Lanois didn't see it. Thought it was pedestrian. Took it down the Afro-polyrhythm route-multirhythm drumming, that sort of thing. Polyrhythm has its place, but it doesn't work for knifelike lyrics trying to convey majesty and heroism.

"Maybe we had worked too hard on other things, I can't remember." Dylan continues, "but Lanois can get passionate about what he feels to be true. He's not above smashing guitars. I never cared about that unless it was one of mine. Things got contentious once in the parking lot. He tried to convince me that the song had to be 'sexy, sexy and more sexy.' I know about sexy, too. He reminded me of Sam Phillips, who had once said the same thing to John Prine about a song, but the circumstances were not similar. I tried to explain that the song had more to do with the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and the Bill of Rights than witch doctors, and just couldn't be thought of as some kind of ideological voodoo thing. But he had his own way of looking at things, and in the end I had to reject this because I thought too highly of the expressive meaning behind the lyrics to bury them in some steamy cauldron of drum theory. On the performance you're hearing, the bass is playing a triplet beat, and that adds up to all the multirhythm you need, even in a slow-tempo song. I think Lanois is an excellent producer, though."

Amazingly, Dylan did much of his writing for "Love and Theft" on the spot, at the sessions. Dylan, says Meyers, would "fool around for a while with a song, then we'd cut it. And he'd say, 'I think I'm gonna write a couple more verses,' sit down and write five more verses. Each verse had six or eight lines. It's complicated stuff, and he was doing it right there."

The songs, Meyers adds, were mostly recorded live, including Dylan's vocals. "Bob don't like to overdub much," Meyers notes. "He would overdub some acoustic guitars, put some mandolin and fiddle on there. Sometimes he'd overdub his voice. If he messed up [a vocal], he'd overdub a word or two."

The band that recorded "Love and Theft" has known one another for decades. "We're all family at this point," Meyers notes. Sexton and Clay (?) were childhood friends; Campbell played with Meyers and Sir Douglas Quintet leader Doug Sahm back in the 1970s. And Dylan was a frequent visitor to Meyers' Texas farm. Dylan will be playing U.S. arenas in October and November to promote the album. "They are a fantastic band," Meyers says of the touring group. "Larry and Tony, they got the chords – they know those from way back, because they've been playing with Bob so long. And Charlie" – who joined Dylan in 1999 – "knows the guitar from what's going on now. It all blends so well.

"I think Bob has got the perfect thing," Meyers adds. "Lord help him, if he can go for another ten or twelve years, I think that band will be there with him."

26 October 2001
The Staple Singers interview, Ambassador East Hotel, Chicago, IL

Source: TWM 4901,4931,4953

In 4869 and 4901, there was some information about Dylan being interviewed in Chicago last October in connection with a WTTW-TV programme about Mavis Staples of the Staples Singers. Last Friday, there was an article about the programme in the Chicago Sun-Times.

For this half-hour programme, WTTW gathered approximately 20 hours of interview material from a wide range of people, including Harry Belafonte, Jerry Butler, Jesse Jackson, Natalie Merchant and Albertina Walker. However, even Dylan's own people were surprised that he agreed to a 15-minute one-on-one camera interview. The producers had to submit a list of questions in advance but, as Dylan was doing it as a favour to the Staples family, it was no time to insist on journalistic integrity.

WTTW rented a suite in the same Chicago hotel in which Dylan was staying during last year's tour. They invited Mavis and her sister, Yvonne, to watch the interview. Mavis had not seen Dylan since she sang background vocals on Like A Rolling Stone on the 10th anniversary David Letterman show in January 1992. Dylan arrived on time, alone, and tiptoed into the room in his black boots, cowboy hat and gambler's get-up, carrying a single red rose for Mavis. Dylan and Mavis embraced. She, in turn, gave Dylan a Beanie Baby bear, saying, This is called "Hope". Dylan, cradling the bear, smiled, Of course.

Dylan said that, while he had first met the Staples at the 1963 Newport Folk Festival, he'd been listening to them since he was 12. We'd listen to the radio, usually late in the evening. Dragnet and FBI, Peace and War, Inner Sanctum and Jack Benny. And then, after the radio shows would come on, we used to pick up the station out of Shreveport [Louisiana] and they used to play rhythm and blues. Bobby 'Blue' Bland, Junior Parker and Muddy [Waters] and [Howlin'] Wolf and all that. But then, at midnight, the gospel stuff would start. I got acquainted with the Swan Silvertones and the Dixie Hummingbirds, the Highway QCs and all that. But the Staple Singers came on... and they were so different.

The initial proposal for the programme had been to base it around the Staples Singers and the civil rights movement. Dylan, however, was reluctant to talk about social issues in the 1960s. In contrast, they couldn't get him to stop talking about the musical influence of the Staples. In particular, he referred to Mavis' voice and Pop's tremolo guitar. Without going into detail, I have heard exactly the same from other people in similar circumstances; guarded in discussing his own life, Dylan opens up when talking about other musicians and artists.

Pervis Staples recalled an incident at the Newport Folk Festival. He jumped off the [diving] board [at the motel] and his shorts came off. I went in and got 'em. I thought something happened to him because he had his boots on, too. We got to be friends. We bought some wine and he wrote A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Rain on the back of a shirt board. Asked about this, Dylan said it pretty much sounded right and that he wrote many songs on many different objects. We know, of course, that he might have written out the lyrics to that song there but he certainly didn't compose it then.

The programme was due to air on Channel 11 in Chicago, last night.

Further to 4931 and its predecessors, the Chicago Stories programme was about the Staples Singers not just Mavis. Apart from a 1964 colour photograph of Dylan, Mavis, Bob Neuwirth and a fourth person, Dylan's contribution came in four interview snippets.

Mavis was singing stuff like, "Yonder comes li'l David with his rock and his sling / I don't want to meet him / He's a dangerous man" and, oh my goodness, when... when I... that made my hair stand up listening to that. That just seemed like that's the way the world is.

He [Pops] would sing and he had, kind of, a sweet, gentle kind of approach to... but, even back then when I was 12, he sounded more to me like a blues singer singing gospel with a... He didn't have a very high voice, like Skip James or something, but it was definitely higher than Bukka White. It was just an easy, kind of flowing, gentle voice.

Pops' tremelo sound not only was... made the listener tremble and shake, while other peoples' tremelo sounds didn't quite achieve that. Pops made you feel the trembling that was inside yourself.

There was no telling which way they were going to go. They were completely unpredictable. Every song was different.

You will note that none of the above coincides with Dylan's words reported in the Chicago Sun-Times' article, as summarised in 4931.

25 September 2001
Mikal Gilmore interview for Rolling Stone, Santa Monica, CA

Source: Rolling Stone, issues 882,883/4 November 22, and December 6-13, 2001; pp. 56-69 & 116 resp.

BOB DYLAN by Mikal Gilmore

"That night in Switzerland," says Bob Dylan, "it all just came to me. All of a sudden I could sing anything. There might've been a time when I was going to quit or retire, but the next day it was like, 'I can't really retire now because I really haven't done anything yet,' you know ? I want to see where this will lead me, because now I can control it all. Before, I wasn't controlling it. I was just being swept by the wind, this way or that way."

As Dylan speaks, we are seated at a small table in a comfortable hotel suite, located on the beach at Santa Monica. Dylan is dressed in the sort of country-gentleman finery he has tended to favor in recent years – a nicely stitched white Western shirt and sharp-looking black slacks with arrows embroidered at the edges of the pocket seams. Dylan has been talking about a crucial turning point in his life and art, during the time since ROLLING STONE last published a lengthy interview with him in 1992. In several of those years, Dylan produced erratic and mixed-up work – and he is the first to admit it. But increasingly, those years also featured some of the most resourceful and remarkable creativity in Dylan's forty-year recording and performing career – and that progress, it is only fair to say, was sometimes less noted than it should have been. All that changed in 1997. In that year, Dylan fell sick with a rare fungal infection that caused severe swelling around his heart. It was a painful condition that temporarily debilitated him, and it could have proved fatal. Around the same time as his illness, Dylan finished and soon released his first album of original material in seven years, Time Out of Mind. It was a work unlike any other that Dylan had created – a trek through the unmapped frontier that lies beyond loss and disillusion – and it was heralded as a startling work of renewal. Time Out of Mind went on to win the Grammy for Best Album of the Year -Dylan's first such honor in that category.

In September, Dylan released another collection of new songs, Love and Theft – his forty-third album. Love and Theft sounds at moments like Dylan is unearthing new revelations with an acerbic wit and impulsive language – in much the same way he did on his early hallmark, Highway 61 Revisited – though Love and Theft also seems to derive from ancient well-springs of American vision and concealment, much like John Wesley Harding or his legendary 1967 Basement Tapes sessions with the Band. Dylan, however, bristles at such comparisons. Love and Theft, as he puts it, plays by its own rules.

The 1980s saw Dylan lose his focus. He mounted widely publicized and well-attended tours with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers and the Grateful Dead – but these were tours in which Dylan seemed to be casting about for a sense of connection and intent. To many observers, Dylan gave the impression that he was adrift. In recent years, he has told the story of an event – a moment of awareness – that came to him onstage in Locarno, Switzerland. He said that a phrase struck him – "I'm determined to stand whether God will deliver me or not" – and in that moment, he realized that it was his vocation to rededicate himself to his music and its performance. Dylan didn't make any public pronouncements about this realization and how it had changed his purpose as a singer, musician and songwriter. In a low-key yet determined way, Dylan invested himself in his music's sustaining power perhaps more than ever before. As good as Time Out of Mind and Love and Theft may be, the live shows that Dylan has been playing for years with an evolving, carefully selected band (which presently consists of bassist Tony Garnier, drummer David Kemper, and guitarists Larry Campbell and Charlie Sexton), make the case that his essential art can be found onstage even more than on record. Indeed, Dylan – who turned sixty this last May – seems to have adopted a viewpoint similar to the one favored by jazz trumpeter and bandleader Miles Davis for most of his career: namely, that the truest vital experience of music resides in the moment of its performance, in the living act of its formation and the spontaneous yet hard-earned discoveries that those acts of creation yield. The next time the musicians play the same song, it is not really the same song. It is a new moment and creation, a new possibility, a newfound place on the map, soon to be left behind for the next place. These live shows are the quintessence of Bob Dylan and how he has moved into the new century, bringing with him what he values most from the music of the last century, even as night after night he takes us to unfamiliar and transfixing understandings of what we once thought we knew so well.

It was a Tuesday in September when Dylan and I sat down to discuss his recent art – two weeks to the day after the shocking attacks that destroyed New York's World Trade Center buildings. (The tragedy's date, September 11th, was also the release date for Love and Theft.) As we talked, Dylan and I were near the room's open balcony doors and windows, overlooking the Pacific Ocean. The Los Angeles airport is just down the highway, and every few minutes you could see an airplane in its ascent as it embarked on its journey. Once or twice, we just watched without comment, but there was a sense that nobody will ever look at the commonplace sight of a plane moving across the sky in quite the same way again. It would be unfair to Dylan to make the claim that anything in his music anticipated the horrific turn of recent events. And yet clearly he has been writing about dread realities and dangerous likelihoods for four decades now, from the end-times vision of 1963's "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" to his current remorseful statement about personal and national spirit in Love and Theft's "Mississippi." Bob Dylan may no longer be the young firebrand who tore through the world with such energy and disdain in the 1960s, but he is still a songwriter, singer and literary artist of continuing power and depth. If there was any principal meaning to Dylan's early music, perhaps it was that it is hardly trouble-free for a smart, conscientious person to live in times that witness the betrayal or inversion of our best values and dreams. To live through such times with scruples and intellect intact, Dylan has declared in his music, one has to hold an honest and fearless mirror up to the face of cultural and moral disorder.

Dylan was convivial and confident as we talked on this day, but in his speech, just as in his songs and vocals, one senses that he carries a dignified knowledge of enduring mysteries that probably unsettle him every bit as much as his awareness of them distinguishes him. And in conversation, just as in his music, Bob Dylan lets go of his insights in constantly surprising and singular turns of phrase and temperament.

In 1998, when you received the Grammy Award for Album of the Year, you said something that surprised me – maybe surprised other people as well. You said, "We didn't know what we had when we did it, but we did it anyway." That was interesting because "Time Out of Mind" plays as an album made with purpose and vision, with a consistent mood and set of themes. Was it, in fact, an album you approached with forethought, or was its seeming cohesiveness incidental?

What happened was, I'd been writing down couplets and verses and things, and then putting them together at later times. I had a lot of that – it was starting to pile up – so I thought, "Well, I got all this – maybe, I'll try to record it." I'd had good luck with Daniel Lanois [producer of the 1989 album Oh Mercy], so I called him and showed him a lot of the songs. I also familiarized him with the way I wanted the songs to sound. I think I played him some Slim Harpo recordings – early stuff like that. He seemed pretty agreeable to it, and we set aside a certain time and place. But I had a schedule – I only had so much time – and we made that record, Time Out of Mind, that way. It was a little rougher... I wouldn't say rougher... It was... I feel we were lucky to get that record.

Really?

Well, I didn't go into it with the idea that this was going to be a finished album. It got off the tracks more than a few times, and people got frustrated. I know I did. I know Lanois did. There were myriad musicians down there. At that point in time, I didn't have the same band I have now. I was kind of just auditioning players here and there for a band, but I didn't feel like I could trust them man-to-man in the studio with unrecorded songs. So we started to use some musicians that Lanois would choose and a couple that I had in mind: [keyboardist] Jim Dickinson; [drummer] Jim Keltner; [guitarist] Duke Robillard. I started just assembling people that I knew could play. They had the right soulful kind of attitude for these songs. But we just couldn't... I felt extremely frustrated, because I couldn't get any of the uptempo songs that I wanted.

Don't you think a song like "Cold Irons Bound" certainly has a drive to it?

Yeah, there's a real drive to it, but it isn't even close to the way I had it envisioned. I mean, I'm satisfied with what we did. But there were things I had to throw out because this assortment of people just couldn't lock in on riffs and rhythms all together. I got so frustrated in the studio that I didn't really dimensionalize the songs. I could've if I'd had the willpower. I just didn't at that time, and so you got to steer it where the event itself wants to go. I feel there was a sameness to the rhythms. It was more like that swampy, voodoo thing that Lanois is so good at. I just wish I'd been able to get more of a legitimate rhythm-oriented sense into it. I didn't feel there was any mathematical thing about that record at all. The one beat could've been anywhere, when instead, the singer should have been defining where the drum should be. It was tricky trying to steer that ship.

I think that's why people say Time Out of Mind is sort of dark and foreboding: because we locked into that one dimension in the sound. People say the record deals with mortality – my mortality for some reason! [Laughs] Well, it doesn't deal with my mortality. It maybe just deals with mortality in general. It's one thing that we all have in common, isn't it? But I didn't see any one critic say: "It deals with my mortality" – you know, his own. As if he's immune in some kind of way – like whoever's writing about the record has got eternal life and the singer doesn't. I found this condescending attitude toward that record revealed in the press quite frequently, but, you know, nothing you can do about that.

The language in "Time Out of Mind" seems very stripped down, as if the songs don't have the patience or room to bear any unessential imagery.

I just come down the line too far to make any superfluous song. I mean, I'm sure I've made enough of them, or that I've got enough superfluous lines in a lot of songs. But I've kind of passed that point. I have to impress myself first, and unless I'm speaking in a certain language to my own self, I don't feel anything less than that will do for the public, really.

"Highlands" strikes me as the album's most singular song. It begins in a place of isolation; it tells a story but rambles. It's poignant as hell, but it's also very funny – especially the conversation it portrays between the narrator and the waitress in the café. And by the time we get to the end of it, we don't know if we're in a place of desolation or release.

That particular song, we worked with a track that I had done at a sound check once in some hall. The assembled group of musicians we had down at the studio just couldn't get it, so I said, "Just use that original track, and I'll sing over it." It was just some old blues song I always wanted to use, and I felt that once I was able to control it, I could've written about anything with it. But you're right – I forgot that was on that record. You know, I'm not really quite sure why it seems to people that Time Out of Mind is a darker picture. In my mind, there's nothing dark about it. It's not like, you know, Dante's Inferno or something. It doesn't paint a picture of goblins and goons and grotesque-looking creatures or anything like that. I really don't understand why it is looked at as such a dark album, really. It does have that song "Highlands" at the end.

In the end, are you happy with "Time Out of Mind"? After all, it was seen as not merely a return to form for you but also as a real extension of your gifts – and as your most powerful work since 1975's "Blood on the Tracks."

Well, you know, I never listen to my records. Once they're turned in, I'm done with them. I don't want to hear them anymore. I know the songs. I'll play them, but I don't want to hear them on a record. It sounds superficial to me to hear a record – I don't feel like it tells me anything in particular. I'm not going to learn anything from it.

It was during the final stages of the album that you were hit with a serious swelling around your heart and were laid up in the hospital. You've said that that infection was truly painful and debilitating. Did it alter your view of life in any way?

No. No, because it didn't! You can't even say something like, "Well, you were in the wrong place at the wrong time." Even that excuse didn't work. It was like I learned nothing. I wish I could say I put the time to good use or, you know, got highly educated in something or had some revelations about anything. But I can't say that any of that happened. I just laid around and then had to wait for my strength to come back.

Do you think that the proximity of your illness to the album's release helped account for why reviewers saw so many themes of mortality in "Time Out of Mind"?

When I recorded that album, the media weren't paying any attention to me. I was totally outside of it.

True, but the album came out not long after you'd gone through the illness.

It did?

Yes. You were in the hospital in the spring of 1997, and "Time Out of Mind" was released in autumn that same year.

OK, well, then it could've been perceived that way in the organized media. But that would just be characterizing the album, really.

I want to step back a hit, to those years preceding "Time Out of Mind." First, I'd like to ask you about an occasion at an earlier Grammy Awards, in 1991, when you received a Lifetime Achievement Award. At that point, America was deep into its involvement in the Gulf War. You came out onstage that night with a small band and played a severe version of "Masters of War" – a performance that remains controversial even today. Some critics found it rushed and embarrassing, others thought it was brilliant. Then, after Jack Nicholson presented you the award, you made the following comment: "My daddy [once said], 'Son, it's possible to become so defiled in this world that your own mother and father will abandon you. And if that happens, God will always believe in your own ability to mend your ways.' " I've always thought that was one of the more remarkable things I've heard you say. What was going through your mind at that time?

I don't remember the time and place my father said that to me, and maybe he didn't say it to me in that exact way. I was probably paraphrasing the whole idea, really – I'm not even sure I paraphrased in the proper context. It might've been something that just sort of popped in my head at that time. The only thing I remember about that whole episode, as long as you bring it up, was that I had a fever – like 104. I was extremely sick that night. Not only that, but I was disillusioned with the entire musical community and environment. If I remember correctly, the Grammy people called me months before then and said that they wanted to give me this Lifetime Achievement honor. Well, we all know that they give those things out when you're old – when you're nothing, a has-been. Everybody knows that, right? So I wasn't sure whether it was a compliment or an insult. I wasn't really sure about it. And then they said, "Here's what we want to do..." I don't want to name these performers because you know them, but one performer was going to sing "Like a Rolling Stone." Another performer was going to sing "The Times Are A-Changin'." Another was going to sing "All Along the Watchtower," and another was going to sing "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue." They were going to sing bits of all these songs, and then they were going to have somebody introduce me, and I would just collect this Lifetime Achievement Award, say a few words and go on my merry way. The performers, they told me, had all agreed to it, so there really wasn't anything for me to do except show up.

Then the Gulf War broke out. The Grammy people called and said, "Listen, we're in a tight fix. So-and-so, who was going to sing 'Times Are A-Changin',' is afraid to get on an airplane. So-and-so, who was going to sing 'Like a Rolling Stone,' doesn't want to travel because he just had another baby and he doesn't want to leave his family." That's understandable. But then so-and-so, who was going to sing "It's All Over, Baby Blue," was in Africa and didn't want to take a chance flying to New York, and so-and-so, who was going to sing "All Along the Watchtower," wasn't sure he wanted to be at any high-visibility place right then, because it may be a little dangerous. So, they said, "Could you come and sing? Could you fill the time?" And I said, "What about the guy who's going to introduce me [Jack Nicholson]?" They said, "He's OK. He's coming." Anyway, I got disillusioned with all the characters at that time – with their inner character and their ability to be able to keep their word and their idealism and their insecurity. All the ones that have the gall to thrust their tortured inner psyches on an outer world but can't at least be true to their word. From that point on, that's what the music business and all the people in it represented to me. I just lost all respect for them. There's a few that are decent and God-fearing and will stand up in a righteous way. But I wouldn't want to count on most of them. And maybe me singing "Masters of War"... I've said before that song's got nothing to do with being anti-war. It has more to do with the military industrial complex that Eisenhower was talking about. Anyway, I went up and did that, but I was sick, and I felt they put me through a whole lot of trouble over nothing. I just tried to disguise myself the best I could. That was more along the line of... you know, the press was finding me irrelevant then, and it couldn't have happened at a better time, really, because I wouldn't have wanted to have been relevant. I wouldn't have wanted to be someone that the press was examining – every move. I wouldn't have ever been able to develop again in any kind of artistic way.

But certainly you knew by playing "Masters of War" at the height of the Gulf War, it would be received a certain way.

Yeah, but I wasn't looking at it that way. I knew the lyrics of the song were holding up, and I brought maybe two or three ferocious guitar players, you know? And I always had a song for any occasion.

Truthfully, I was just disgusted in having to be there after they told me what they intended to do and then backed out. I probably shouldn't have even gone myself, and I wouldn't have gone, except the other guy [Nicholson] was true to his word. [Taps his fingers rapidly on the tabletop]

What about that statement you made, about the wisdom your father had shared with you? It could almost be read as a personal statement – you talking about your own life. Or was it about the world around you?

I was thinking more in terms of, like, we're living in a Machiavellian world, whether we like it or we don't. Any act that's immoral, as long as it succeeds, it's all right. To apply that type of meaning to the way I was feeling that night probably has more to do with it than any kind of conscious effort to bring out some religiosity, or any kind of biblical saying about God, one way or another. You hear a lot about God these days: God, the beneficent; God, the all-great; God, the Almighty; God, the most powerful; God, the giver of life; God, the creator of death. I mean, we're hearing about God all the time, so we better learn how to deal with it. But if we know anything about God, God is arbitrary. So people better be able to deal with that, too.

That's interesting, because so many people think that God is constant, you know, and unchanging.

Oh, absolutely.

But "arbitrary" would seem to imply a rather different view. Is there something about the word "arbitrary" that you would like to clarify or perhaps that I'm not understanding?

No. I mean, you can look it up in the dictionary. I don't consider myself a sophist or a cynic or a stoic or some kind of bourgeois industrialist, or whatever titles people put on people. Basically, I'm just a regular person. I don't walk around all the time out of my mind with inspiration. So what can I tell you about that? Anyway, I wasn't in a good state of mind that night. I was frustrated. It's difficult to attach yourself to the past or be paralyzed by the past in any kind of way, so I just said it and moved on. I was glad to have gotten out of there, really.

You said a moment ago that this happened during a time when you weren't being seen as relevant and didn't want to be seen as relevant. Though you would continue to tour through most of the 1990s, more than seven years would pass between albums of new songs. Some biographers have more or less referred to this as a time when you seemed adrift and confused - a time in which you seemed unhappy and disconnected from your music. What was going on during this period?

I really thought I was through making records. I didn't want to make any more. I thought, "I'll make a couple more records and just have them be folk songs, in a really simplified way -no big production or anything." Beyond that, I didn't want to record anymore. I was more concerned with what I do in personal appearances. It was clear to me I had more than enough songs to play. Forever.

See, I'd made that record with Lanois in 1988 [Oh Mercy]. I was already playing over a hundred shows a year at that point. I decided I would just go back to live performing, which I hadn't really thought I'd done since maybe 1966. Some performers make a lot of sacrifices to make a record – they forfeit an abundance of time and energy. I did that with Lanois back then, and it worked out rather well. But then around that same time I was making a Traveling Wilburys record, and then I started this record with Don Was, Under the Red Sky. All of this was happening in the same period. Looking back on it now, it seems kind of unthinkable. I would leave the Wilburys and go down to Sunset Sound and record Under the Red Sky simultaneously, all within a set schedule because I needed to be in Prague or someplace on a certain date. And then both records – the Wilburys record and Under the Red Sky – I'd just leave them hanging and see the finished product later. All those things happened at the same time, and that was when I found I'd really had it. My rational mind didn't know what to make of that. I'd really had my fill. I was going to stick to my declaration and definitely not make any records. I didn't feel the need to announce that, but I had come to that conclusion. I didn't care to record no more. I'd rather play on the road. Recording was too mental. Also, I didn't feel I was writing any of the songs that I really wanted to write. I wasn't getting the help I needed to record right, I didn't like the sound of the records... I don't really remember. It was just... one thing leads to another, you know? I reckoned I was done with it. But then you go out and play live shows, and you do get thoughts, and you do get an inspiration here and there. So I just reluctantly started writing things down, in the way I described that led to the making of Time Out of Mind.

Did you ever consider just flat-out retiring?

Well, I really don't have any defined retirement plan! More than a few times I probably felt I had retired. I felt I'd had retired in 1966 and 1967. I was fulfilling my recording contracts, but outside of that I think I felt like I had retired from the cultural scene at the time.

Did you have comparable feelings at any point in the 1980s or 1990s?

Something would always come up that put the idea off. But sure, at times I felt like, "I don't want to do this anymore." Then something would always lead me to something else, which would keep me at it.

According to a couple of recent biographies, the late 1980s and early 1990s were troubling for you in other ways. Some people have claimed that these were years when you were drinking too frequently – and that your drinking was interfering with your music or was a reflection of a deeper unhappiness for you. According to these biographers, it wasn't until you quit drinking – some time in the early 1990s – that your performances and writing really rebounded.

That's completely inaccurate. [Laughs] I can drink or not drink. I don't know why people would associate drinking or not drinking with anything that I do, really. I've never thought about it one way or another. For some reason there's a certain crowd – if you want to call it a crowd – that would assume certain things about me or anybody which simply aren't true. They perceive it by appearances. They might hear rumors. They might start rumors, but it's their own minds going to work. Therefore, if they believe a certain thing about that person, then any act that person does they would apply it to that. "Oh, he fell down – he must be drinking." Or, "He smashed his car into a tree. I guess he was hopped-up on something."

But those are people who are celebrity-minded. They live in their own universe, and they try to project it outwardly, and it doesn't work. Usually, those people have a touch of insanity, and they have to be knocked down to earth. It's like you got to choose. Either there's order or there's chaos, and you got to choose. People of that nature don't seem to understand either one. And they apply it to, well, in this country, to celebrities. But I don't think any of us who could fit the description of that can pay any mind to what people think or how many books are written or any of that if we want to exist and have a certain amount of free will about what we do. I mean, these kind of people are the ones who would make laws against free will, that are contrary to free will. They're just not serious people. Unfortunately, I guess, all performers have a bunch of them hanging on. Anybody and everybody can get typecast, you know, in a second, by just doing great work. But the truth is, it's my job to drive my own car, if you know what I mean. It's not somebody else's job.

But something did seem to turn around for you in the early 1990s. You've said as much yourself. You've spoken about some epiphany that changed your purpose and commitment – some recognition that came to you onstage. You've described it as a moment when you realized that what was important was not your legend or how that weighed you down. What was important, you seemed to say, was for you to stand by your work – and that meant playing music on a regular basis, no matter who you were playing it for.

It happened – or had its beginning, anyway – when I was playing some shows with the Grateful Dead [in 1987]. They wanted to play some of my songs that I hadn't played in years and years. I had already been on a long string of dates with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, and night after night I was only playing maybe fifteen to twenty of the songs I had written, and I couldn't really grasp the older ones. But when I began to play with the Grateful Dead, those are the only songs they wanted to play: the ones that I wasn't playing with Petty. I really had some sort of epiphany then on how to do those songs again, using certain techniques that I had never thought about. When I went back and played with Petty again, I was using those techniques, and I found I could play anything. But then there was a show in Switzerland when the techniques failed me, and I had to come up with another one really quick. I was kind of standing on a different foundation at that point and realized, "I could do this." I found out I could do it effortlessly – that I could sing night after night after night and never get tired. I could project it out differently.

Not only that, but Lonnie Johnson, the blues-jazz player, showed me a technique on the guitar in maybe 1964. I hadn't really understood it when he first showed it to me. It had to do with the mathematical order of the scale on a guitar, and how to make things happen, where it gets under somebody's skin and there's really nothing they can do about it, because it's mathematical. He didn't even play that way himself. He played mostly jazz – a kind of guitar I can't play at all, though when I think of a guitar player, I think of somebody like Eddie Lang or Charlie Christian or Freddie Green. I don't listen to many people in the rock & roll area. Anyway, he just told me, "I want to show you something. You might be able to use this some day." It's more kind of an ancient way of playing. I always wanted to use this technique, but I never was really able to do it with my own songs.

One of the things I've noticed about your shows is that starting in the 1990s they grew more and more musical. You've opened the songs up to more instrumental exploration and new textures and rhythmic shifts – like you're trying to stretch or reinvent them – and you seem very much at the heart of that. You're your own hand director at this point.

Well, I don't think you've seen me play too many mindless jams. What I do is all done with technique and certain stratagems. But they're not intellectual ones; they're designed to make people feel something. And I understand that it's not necessarily the same for everyone who hears me play and sing. Everyone is feeling a different thing. I would like to be a performer who maybe could read and write music and play the violin. Then I could design a bigger band with more comprehensive parts of harmony in different arrangements, and still have the songs evolve within that. But if anything, I do know my limitations, and so I don't try to transcend those limitations. Or if I do transcend the limitations, it's all done with the technique I was talking about. Which is to say, you can do it whether you feel good or you don't feel good, or no matter how you're feeling. It really doesn't matter. It has nothing to do with personality. It's difficult even to find the words to talk about it.

It seems that some of your most impassioned and affecting performances, from night to night, are your covers of traditional folk songs.

Folk music is where it all starts and in many ways ends. If you don't have that foundation, or if you're not knowledgeable about it and you don't know how to control that, and you don't feel historically tied to it, then what you're doing is not going to be as strong as it could be. Of course, it helps to have been born in a certain era because it would've been closer to you, or it helps to be a part of the culture when it was happening. It's not the same thing, relating to something second- or third-hand off of a record.

I think one of the best records that I've ever been even a part of was the record I made with Big Joe Williams and Victoria Spivey. Now that's a record that I hear from time to time and I don't mind listening to it. It amazes me that I was there and had done that.

In "Invisible Republic" – Greil Marcus' book about you, the Band, the Basement Tapes sessions and the place of all that in American culture [now retitled "The Old, Weird America: The World of Bob Dylan's Basement Tapes"] – Marcus wrote about the importance of Harry Smith's legendary "Anthology of American Folk Music" and its influence on all of your work, from your earliest to most-recent recordings.

Well, he makes way too much of that.

Why do you say that?

Because those records were around – that Harry Smith anthology – but that's not what everybody was listening to. Sure, there were all those songs. You could hear them at people's houses. I know in my case, I think Dave Van Ronk had that record. But in those days we really didn't have places to live, or places to have a lot of records. We were sort of living from this place to that – kind of a transient existence. I know I was living that way. You heard records where you could, but mostly you heard other performers. All those people [Marcus is] talking about, you could hear the actual people singing those ballads. You could hear Clarence Ashley, Doc Watson, Dock Boggs, the Memphis Jug Band, Furry Lewis. You could see those people live and in person. They were around. He intellectualizes it too much. Performers did know of that record, but it wasn't, in retrospect, the monumental iconic recordings at the time that he makes them out to be.

It wasn't like someone discovered this pot of gold somewhere. There were other records out that were on rural labels. Yazoo had records out. They weren't all compiled like they are now. In New York City, there was a place called the Folklore Center that had all the folk-music records. It was like a library, and you could listen to them there. And they had folk-music books there. Certain other towns had it, too. There was a place in Chicago called the Old Town School of Folk Music. You could find the stuff there. It wasn't the only thing that people had – that Anthology of American Folk Music. And the Folkways label itself had many other folk recordings of all kinds of people. They just were highly secretive. And they weren't really secretive because they were trying to be secretive. The people I knew – the people who were like-minded as myself – were trying to be folk musicians. That's all they wanted to be, that's all the aspirations they had. There wasn't anything monetary about it. There was no money in folk music. It was a way of life. And it was an identity which the three-buttoned-suit postwar generation of America really wasn't offering to kids my age: an identity. This music was impossible to get anywhere really, except in a nucleus of a major city, and a record shop might have a few recordings of the hard-core folklore music. There were other folk-music records, commercial folk-music records, like those by the Kingston Trio. I never really was an elitist. Personally, I liked the Kingston Trio. I could see the picture. But for a lot of people it was a little hard to take. Like the left-wing puritans that seemed to have a hold on the folk-music community, they disparaged these records. I didn't particularly want to sing any of those songs that way, but the Kingston Trio were probably the best commercial group going, and they seemed to know what they were doing.

What I was most interested in twenty-four hours a day was the rural music. But you could only hear it, like, in isolated caves [laughs], like, on a few bohemian streets in America at that time. The idea was to be able to master these songs. It wasn't about writing your own songs. That didn't even enter anybody's mind.

In a way, this line of talk brings us to your newest album, "Love and Theft." On one hand, parts of this record sound like work that might have heralded from the early forms of twentieth-century folk music we've been discussing. Its sense of timelessness and caprices reminds me of some of the songs we hear on "The Basement Tapes" and "John Wesley Harding" – records that emanated from your strong folk background. But "Love and Theft" also seems to recall "Highway 61 Revisited" and that album's delight in discovering new world-changing methods of language and sharp wit, and the way in which the music digs down deep into ancient blues structures to yield something wholly unexpected. Just as important, "Love and Theft," like your other albums I just mentioned, feels like a work made specifically from inside an American temperament – the America we live in now, but also the America we have left behind. Or am I reading too much into this record?

For starters, no one should really be curious or too excited about comparing this album to any of my other albums. Compare this album to the other albums that are out there. Compare this album to other artists who make albums. You know, comparing me to myself [laughs] is really like... I mean, you're talking to a person that feels like he's walking around in the ruins of Pompeii all the time. It's always been that way, for one reason or another. I deal with all the old stereotypes. The language and the identity I use is the one that I know only so well, and I'm not about to go on and keep doing this – comparing my new work to my old work. It creates a kind of Achilles' heel for myself. It isn't going to happen.

Maybe a better way to put it is to ask: Do you see this as an album that emanates from your experience of America at this time?

Every one of the records I've made has emanated from the entire panorama of what America is to me. America, to me, is a rising tide that lifts all ships, and I've never really sought inspiration from other types of music. My problem in writing songs has always been how to tone down the rhetoric in using the language. I don't really give it a whole lot of soulful thought. A song is a reflection of what I see all around me all the time. I'm only speaking about... [Pauses] See, I'm still back on your other question. I really don't think it's fair to compare this album to any of my past albums. I mean, I'm still the same person. You know, like Hank Williams would say, my hair's still curly, my eyes are still blue. And that's all I know.

What is your own description of what the songs on "Love and Theft" are about?

You're putting me in a difficult position. A question like that can't be answered in the terms that you're asking. A song is just a mood that an artist is attempting to convey. To be truthful, I haven't listened to this record since it was made – since probably last spring. Actually, I don't need to hear it. I just need to look at the lyrics, and we can start from there. But I really don't know what the summation of all these songs would really represent. [Pauses again, drumming his fingers on the table]

The whole album deals with power. If life teaches us anything, it's that there's nothing that men and women won't do to get power. The album deals with power, wealth, knowledge and salvation – the way I look at it. If it's a great album – which I hope it is – it's a great album because it deals with great themes. It speaks in a noble language. It speaks of the issues or the ideals of an age in some nation, and hopefully, it would also speak across the ages. It'd be as good tomorrow as it is today and would've been as good yesterday. That's what I was trying to make happen, because just to make another record at this point in my career... career, by the way, isn't how I look at what I do. Career is a French word. It means "carrier." It's something that takes you from one place to the other. I don't feel like what I do qualifies to be called a career. It's more of a calling.

This album holds ruminations every bit as dark as those found in "Time Out of Mind," but this time you put them across without the previous album's spooky musical ambience. Since you produced this album yourself, you must have wanted a different sound.

The way the record is presented is just as important as what it's presenting. Therefore, anybody – even if they'd been a great producer – would only have gotten in the way on this, and there really wasn't a lot of time. I would've loved to have somebody help me make this record, but I couldn't think of anybody on short notice. And besides, what could they do? For this particular record it wouldn't have mattered.

There's also a good deal of humor on this record – maybe more than on any record of yours since the 1960s.

Well...

C'mon, there are some pretty funny lines on this album – like the exchange between Romeo and Juliet in "Floater (Too Much to Ask)," and that knock-knock joke in "Po' Boy."

Yeah, funny... and dark. But still, in my own mind, not really poking fun at the principles that would guide a person's life or anything. Basically, the songs deal with what many of my songs deal with – which is business, politics and war, and maybe love interest on the side. That would be the first level you would have to appreciate them on.

In a recent interview you said that you saw this album as autobiographical.

Oh, absolutely. It would be autobiographical on every front. It obviously plays by its own set of rules, but a listener wouldn't really have to be aware of those rules when hearing it. But absolutely. It's not like the songs were written by some kind of Socrates, you know, some kind of buffoon, the man about town pretending to be happy [laughs]. There wouldn't be any of that in this record.

Both "Time Out of Mind" and "Love and Theft" have been received as some of the best work you've ever done. Does songwriting now feel more accessible to you than it did before?

Well, I follow the dictates of my conscience to write a song, and I don't really have a time or place I set aside. I don't really preconceive it. I couldn't tell you when I could come up with something. It just happens at odd times, here and there. It's amazing to me that I'm still able to do it, really. And I do them as well as I seem able to handle it. When you're young, you're probably writing stronger and a lot quicker, but in my case, I just try to use the traditional values of logic and reason no matter what age I've ever written any of my songs.

This record was released on September 11th – the same date as the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. I've talked with several people in the time since then who have turned to "Love and Theft" because they find something in it that matches the spirit of dread and uncertainty of our present conditions. For my part, I've kept circling around a line from "Mississippi": "Sky full of fire, pain pourin' down." Is there anything you would like to say about your reaction to the events of that day?

One of those Rudyard Kipling poems, "Gentlemen-Rankers," comes to my mind: "We have done with Hope and Honour, we are lost to Love and Truth/We are dropping down the ladder rung by rung/And the measure of our torment is the measure of our youth/God help us, for we knew the worst too young!" If anything, my mind would go to young people at a time like this. That's really the only way to put it.

You mean because of what's at stake for them right now, as we apparently go to war?

Exactly. I mean, art imposes order on life, but how much more art will there be? We don't really know. There's a secret sanctity of nature. How much more of that will there be? At the moment, the rational mind's way of thinking wouldn't really explain what's happened. You need something else, with a capital E, to explain it. It's going to have to be dealt with sooner or later, of course.

Do you see any hope for the situation we find ourselves in?

I don't really know what I could tell you. I don't consider myself an educator or an explainer. You see what it is that I do, and that's what I've always done. But it is time now for great men to come forward. With small men, no great thing can be accomplished at the moment. Those people in charge, I'm sure they've read Sun-Tzu, who wrote The Art of War in the sixth century. In there he says, "If you know the enemy and know yourself, you need not fear the result of a hundred battles. If you know yourself and not your enemy, for every victory gained you will suffer a defeat." And he goes on to say, "If you know neither the enemy nor yourself, you will succumb in every battle." Whoever's in charge, I'm sure they would have read that.

Things will have to change. And one of these things that will have to change: People will have to change their internal world.

The below passage was published in the following issue of Rolling Stone in the article People of the year. Apparently it comes from the very same interview.

This year marked some critical moments in Bob Dylan's singular life. In February, he won an Oscar for Best Original Song for "Things Have Changed" (from Wonder Boys). In May, he turned sixty. (He didn't make much of the event – as he noted in a recent song, "Old, young, age don't carry weight/It doesn't matter in the end"). In September, he released a new album, Love and Theft, that makes most contemporary pop music seem jejune and passé by comparison. In October and November, he capped 2001 with a nationwide tour with his current band and, along the way, delivered some of his most vigorous and transfixing performances since his historic tour with the Hawks (later the Band), in 1965 and 1966. In other words, Dylan spent the better part of 2001 proving that, indeed, age doesn't necessarily matter when it comes to marking the peak points in one's creative life.

There's been a number of biographies and books about your work published in recent years. Have any of these biographers stirred resentment as they've pried into what were clearly undisclosed aspects of your life?

I don't feel that way at all. At the same time, there's a person that writes these kinds of books that has what they call a poetical lack of self. I think it's more of an elitist thing to write about me and have other people read about me. I mean, what is there to expose? We all belong to the human race, I assume. Am I that uncommon? But I don't think that anything's even come close to the truth.

I understand that next year Simon & Schuster will publish the first in a series of autobiographical volumes, to be called "Chronicles."

Columbia Records was going to release three of my old albums, and they were going to include outtakes and other songs I'd written at the same time that had never been on the albums. Seeing that I'm never really sure when I'm going to record a new record, I wasn't too excited about it, because I wouldn't have wanted them to compete with my new work. I didn't think too highly of the idea, but, just the same, I was thinking, "How would these things happen?" Of course, it would make sense if I was to write something fundamental in the historical process of what was going on at the times when I did make these records.

The records they wanted to do were Oh Mercy, Blood on the Tracks and Freewheelin'. So I blueprinted what I would want to say about these records and then I suddenly started remembering things, all triggered off these records, that I thought readers would find interesting. I got completely carried away in the process of... I guess call it novelistic writing. So what started out as just maybe notes for a record turned out to be something much more than that, where I got a handle on how to write something which could deal with the present, the past and the future, because I was writing from the future. It turned into something that felt far weightier than just notes on a CD, which are hard to read anyway.

It's not like I was writing the stuff for frivolous reasons. I was actually being led to do it, and I felt that I needed to do it. But it took so much out of me, because you need a lot of mental light. It's easy to get burned out, and I don't like getting burned out on anything. So then I kind of wrote some other stuff about things, that all sprung from records I've made.

You know, I've made so many of them that I could take any of these records, and if I wanted to go more deeper into it – and that's when I just saw that it was an endless process.

There's a whole bunch of pages piled up. It's a biography. It's biographical, in every sense of the word. But there's more to it than that, because I'm a public figure, and so I can mention all kinds of things that have been written about already, but I bring a different resonance to it. My story on myself would have to be more interesting than anybody else that could look at it from the outside. Right?

30 November 2001
George Harrison's Obituary

Source: bobdylan.com & cnn.com

He was a giant, a great, great soul, with all the humanity, all the wit and humor, all the wisdom, the spirituality, the common sense of a man and compassion for people. He inspired love and had the strength of a hundred men. He was like the sun, the flowers and the moon and we shall miss him enormously. The world is a profoundly emptier place without him.

December 2001
Bob Dylan's Telegram to Sam Lay

Text of recent telegram sent to Sam (via the Recording Academy) from Bob Dylan:

Congratulations, sam on your heroes award.
It's good you are being recognized. It's so well-deserved. Walter, wolf and muddy, they must have known it too – that you're second to none – your flawless musicianship and unsurpassed timing, maestro with the sticks and brushes. Your hats, coats, shirts, and your walking shoes. That's no small thing either. (Thanks, by the way for the striped shirt and red tie. When i play drums i wear that stuff and people are surprised and impressed that my drumming improves.)
Congratulations again sam and thanks for backing me up on what many say is the best album i've ever made. Yours truly,
Bob Dylan

September 2003
Bob Dylan's Statement on Johnny Cash

Source: The Internet

I was asked to give a statement on Johnny's passing and thought about writing a piece instead called "Cash Is King," because that is the way I really feel. In plain terms, Johnny was and is the North Star; you could guide your ship by him – the greatest of the greats then and now. I first met him in '62 or '63 and saw him a lot in those years. Not so much recently, but in some kind of way he was with me more than people I see every day.

There wasn't much music media in the early Sixties, and Sing Out! was the magazine covering all things folk in character. The editors had published a letter chastising me for the direction my music was going. Johnny wrote the magazine back an open letter telling the editors to shut up and let me sing, that I knew what I was doing. This was before I had ever met him, and the letter meant the world to me. I've kept the magazine to this day.

Of course, I knew of him before he ever heard of me. In '55 or '56, "I Walk the Line" played all summer on the radio, and it was different than anything else you had ever heard. The record sounded like a voice from the middle of the earth. It was so powerful and moving. It was profound, and so was the tone of it, every line; deep and rich, awesome and mysterious all at once. "I Walk the Line" had a monumental presence and a certain type of majesty that was humbling. Even a simple line like "I find it very, very easy to be true" can take your measure. We can remember that and see how far we fall short of it.

Johnny wrote thousands of lines like that. Truly he is what the land and country is all about, the heart and soul of it personified and what it means to be here; and he said it all in plain English. I think we can have recollections of him, but we can't define him any more than we can define a fountain of truth, light and beauty. If we want to know what it means to be mortal, we need look no further than the Man in Black. Blessed with a profound imagination, he used the gift to express all the various lost causes of the human soul. This is a miraculous and humbling thing. Listen to him, and he always brings you to your senses. He rises high above all, and he'll never die or be forgotten, even by persons not born yet – especially those persons – and that is forever.

The letter Johnny Cash sent to Sing Out! – (published on 10 March 1964, issue #38)

A LETTER FROM JOHNNY CASH
HI BROADSIDE:
I got hung, but didn't choke… Bob Dylan slung his rope.
I sat down and listened quick… Gravy from that brain is thick.
He began by startin' alright… But the place he started…
Was way ahead, out of sight!
In the night there's a light.
A lamp is burning in all our dark… But… We must open our eyes to see it…
As he listened for the wind… To hear it.
Near my shores of mental dying, Grasping straws and twigs, and drowning, Worthless I, But crying loudest, Came a Poet Troubadour, Singing fine familiar things.
Sang a hundred thousand lyrics, Right as Rain, Sweet as Sleep,
Words to thrill you… And to kill you.
Don't bad-mouth him, till you hear him,
Let him start by continuing, He's almost brand new,
SHUT UP! … AND LET HIM SING!

..... JOHNNY CASH

10 November 2003
Robert Hilburn Interview, Amsterdam, Holland

http://www.calendarlive.com/music/pop/cl-ca-dylan04apr04,0,3583678.story

SONGWRITERS SERIES
ROCK'S ENIGMATIC POET OPENS A LONG-PRIVATE DOOR

He learned from the Carter Family and Edgar Allan Poe, he confides. And he wrote "Blowin' in the Wind" in 10 minutes.
By Robert Hilburn
Times Staff Writer

April 4, 2004

First in an occasional series studying the songwriter's art.

AMSTERDAM — "No, no, no," Bob Dylan says sharply when asked if aspiring songwriters should learn their craft by studying his albums, which is precisely what thousands have done for decades.

"It's only natural to pattern yourself after someone," he says, opening a door on a subject that has long been off-limits to reporters: his songwriting process. "If I wanted to be a painter, I might think about trying to be like Van Gogh, or if I was an actor, act like Laurence Olivier. If I was an architect, there's Frank Gehry."

"But you can't just copy somebody. If you like someone's work, the important thing is to be exposed to everything that person has been exposed to. Anyone who wants to be a songwriter should listen to as much folk music as they can, study the form and structure of stuff that has been around for 100 years. I go back to Stephen Foster."

For four decades, Dylan has been a grand American paradox: an artist who revolutionized popular songwriting with his nakedly personal yet challenging work but who keeps us at such distance from his private life — and his creative technique — that he didn't have to look far for the title of his recent movie: "Masked and Anonymous."

While fans and biographers might read his hundreds of songs as a chronicle of one man's love and loss, celebration and outrage, he doesn't revisit the stories behind the songs, per se, when he talks about his art this evening. What's more comfortable, and perhaps more interesting to him, is the way craft lets him turn life, ideas, observations and strings of poetic images into songs.

As he sits in the quiet of a grand hotel overlooking one of the city's picturesque canals, he paints a very different picture of his evolution as a songwriter than you might expect of an artist who seemed to arrive on the pop scene in the '60s with his vision and skills fully intact. Dylan's lyrics to "Blowin' In The Wind" were printed in Broadside, the folk music magazine, in May 1962, the month he turned 21.

The story he tells is one of trial and error, false starts and hard work — a young man in a remote stretch of Minnesota finding such freedom in the music of folk songwriter Woody Guthrie that he felt he could spend his life just singing Guthrie songs — until he discovered his true calling through a simple twist of fate.

Dylan has often said that he never set out to change pop songwriting or society, but it's clear he was filled with the high purpose of living up to the ideals he saw in Guthrie's work. Unlike rock stars before him, his chief goal wasn't just making the charts.

"I always admired true artists who were dedicated, so I learned from them," Dylan says, rocking slowly in the hotel room chair. "Popular culture usually comes to an end very quickly. It gets thrown into the grave. I wanted to do something that stood alongside Rembrandt's paintings."

Even after all these years, his eyes still light up at the mention of Guthrie, the "Dust Bowl" poet, whose best songs, such as "This Land Is Your Land," spoke so eloquently about the gulf Guthrie saw between America's ideals and its practices.

"To me, Woody Guthrie was the be-all and end-all," says Dylan, 62, his curly hair still framing his head majestically as it did on album covers four decades ago. "Woody's songs were about everything at the same time. They were about rich and poor, black and white, the highs and lows of life, the contradictions between what they were teaching in school and what was really happening. He was saying everything in his songs that I felt but didn't know how to."

"It wasn't only the songs, though. It was his voice — it was like a stiletto — and his diction. I had never heard anybody sing like that. His guitar strumming was more intricate than it sounded. All I knew was I wanted to learn his songs."

Dylan played so much Guthrie during his early club and coffeehouse days that he was dubbed a Woody Guthrie "jukebox." So imagine the shock when someone told him another singer — Ramblin' Jack Elliott — was doing that too. "It's like being a doctor who has spent all these years discovering penicillin and suddenly [finding out] someone else had already done it," he recalls.

A less ambitious young man might have figured no big deal — there's plenty of room for two singers who admire Guthrie. But Dylan was too independent. "I knew I had something that Jack didn't have," he says, "though it took a while before I figured out what it was."

Songwriting, he finally realized, was what could set him apart. Dylan had toyed with the idea earlier, but he felt he didn't have enough vocabulary or life experience.

Scrambling to distinguish himself on the New York club scene in 1961, though, he tried again. The first song of his own that drew attention to him was "Song to Woody," which included the lines, "Hey, hey, Woody Guthrie... I know that you know / All the things that I'm a-sayin' an' a-many times more."

Within two years, he had written and recorded songs, including "Girl of the North Country" and "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall," that helped lift the heart of pop music from sheer entertainment to art.

'Songs Are the Star'

Dylan, whose work and personal life have been dissected in enough books to fill a library wall, seems to welcome the chance to talk about his craft, not his persona or history. It's as if he wants to demystify himself.

"To me, the performer is here and gone," he once said. "The songs are the star of the show, not me."

He also hates focusing on the past. "I'm always trying to stay right square in the moment. I don't want to get nostalgic or narcissistic as a writer or a person. I think successful people don't dwell in the past. I think only losers do."

Yet his sense of tradition is strong. He likes to think of himself as part of a brotherhood of writers whose roots are in the raw country, blues and folk strains of Guthrie, the Carter family, Robert Johnson and scores of Scottish and English balladeers.

Over the course of the evening, he offers glimpses into how his ear and eye put pieces of songs together using everything from Beat poetry and the daily news to lessons picked up from contemporaries.

He is so committed to talking about his craft that he has a guitar at his side in case he wants to demonstrate a point. When his road manager knocks on the door after 90 minutes to see if everything is OK, Dylan waves him off. After three hours, he volunteers to get together again after the next night's concert.

"There are so many ways you can go at something in a song," he says. "One thing is to give life to inanimate objects. Johnny Cash is good at that. He's got the line that goes, 'A freighter said, "She's been here, but she's gone, boy, she's gone."' That's great. 'A freighter says, "She's been here."' That's high art. If you do that once in a song, you usually turn it on its head right then and there."

The process he describes is more workaday than capturing lightning in a bottle. In working on "Like A Rolling Stone," he says, "I'm not thinking about what I want to say, I'm just thinking 'Is this OK for the meter?'"

But there's an undeniable element of mystery too. "It's like a ghost is writing a song like that. It gives you the song and it goes away, it goes away. You don't know what it means. Except the ghost picked me to write the song."

Some listeners over the years have complained that Dylan's songs are too ambiguous — that they seem to be simply an exercise in narcissistic wordplay. But most critics say Dylan's sometimes competing images are his greatest strength.

Few in American pop have consistently written lines as hauntingly beautiful and richly challenging as his "Just Like a Woman," a song from the mid-'60s:

She takes just like a woman, yes, she does
She makes love just like a woman, yes, she does
And she aches just like a woman
But she breaks
just like a little girl.

Dylan stares impassively at a lyric sheet for "Just Like a Woman" when it is handed to him. As is true of so many of his works, the song seems to be about many things at once.

"I'm not good at defining things," he says. "Even if I could tell you what the song was about I wouldn't. It's up to the listener to figure out what it means to him."

As he stares at the page in the quiet of the room, however, he budges a little. "This is a very broad song. A line like, 'Breaks just like a little girl' is a metaphor. It's like a lot of blues-based songs. Someone may be talking about a woman, but they're not really talking about a woman at all. You can say a lot if you use metaphors."

Nobody feels any pain
Tonight as I stand inside the rain
Ev'rybody knows
That Baby's got new clothes
But lately I see her ribbons and her bows
Have fallen from her curls.

After another pause, he adds: "It's a city song. It's like looking at something extremely powerful, say the shadow of a church or something like that. I don't think in lateral [sic] terms as a writer. That's a fault of a lot of the old Broadway writers. ... They are so lateral. There's no circular thing, nothing to be learned from the song, nothing to inspire you. I always try to turn a song on its head. Otherwise, I figure I'm wasting the listener's time."

Discovering Folk Music

Dylan's pop sensibilities were shaped long before he made his journey east in the winter of 1960-61.

Growing up in the icy isolation of Hibbing, Minn., Dylan, who was still Robert Allen Zimmerman then, found comfort in the country, blues and early rock n' roll that he heard at night on a Louisiana radio station whose signal came in strong and clear. It was worlds away from the local Hibbing station, which leaned toward mainstream pop like Perry Como, Frankie Laine and Doris Day.

Dylan has respect for many of the pre-rock songwriters, citing Cole Porter, whom he describes as a "fearless" rhymer, and Porter's "Don't Fence Me In" as a favorite. But he didn't feel most of the pre-rock writers were speaking to him.

"When you listened to [Porter's] songs and the Gershwins' and Rodgers and Hammerstein, who wrote some great songs, they were writing for their generation and it just didn't feel like mine," he says. "I realized at some point that the important thing isn't just how you write songs, but your subject matter, your point of view."

The music that did speak to him as a teenager in the '50s was rock n' roll — especially Elvis Presley. "When I got into rock n' roll, I didn't even think I had any other option or alternative," he says. "It showed me where my future was, just like some people know they are going to be doctors or lawyers or shortstop for the New York Yankees."

He became a student of what he heard.

"I wrote amazing songs that spun words together in a remarkably complex way," he says. "Buddy Holly's songs were much more simplified, but what I got out of Buddy was that you can take influences from anywhere. Like his 'That'll Be the Day.' I read somewhere that it was a line he heard in a movie, and I started realizing you can take things from everyday life that you hear people say."

"That I still find true. You can go anywhere in daily life and have your ears open and hear something, either something someone says to you or something you hear across the room. If it has resonance, you can use it in a song."

After rock took on a blander tone in the late '50s, Dylan looked for new inspiration. He began listening to the Kingston Trio, who helped popularize folk music with polished versions of "Tom Dooley" and "A Worried Man." Most folk purists felt the group was more "pop" than authentic, but Dylan, new to folk, responded to the messages in the songs.

He worked his way through such other folk heroes as Odetta and Leadbelly before fixating on Guthrie. Trading his electric guitar for an acoustic one, he spent months in Minneapolis, performing in clubs, preparing himself for the trip east.

Going to New York rather than rival music center Los Angeles was a given, he says, "because everything I knew came out of New York. I listened to the Yankees games on the radio, and the Giants and the Dodgers. All the radio programs, like 'The Fat Man,' the NBC chimes — would be from New York. So were all the record companies. It seemed like New York was the capital of the world."

Devouring Poetry

Dylan pursued his muse in New York with an appetite for anything he felt would help him improve his craft, whether it was learning old blues and folk songs or soaking up literature.

"I had read a lot of poetry by the time I wrote a lot of those early songs," he volunteers. "I was into the hard-core poets. I read them the way some people read Stephen King. I had also seen a lot of it growing up. Poe's stuff knocked me out in more ways than I could name. Byron and Keats and all those guys. John Donne."

"Byron's stuff goes on and on and on and you don't know half the things he's talking about or half the people he's addressing. But you could appreciate the language."

He found himself side by side with the Beat poets. "The idea that poetry was spoken in the streets and spoken publicly, you couldn't help but be excited by that," he says. "There would always be a poet in the clubs and you'd hear the rhymes, and [Allen] Ginsberg and [Gregory] Corso — those guys were highly influential."

Dylan once said he wrote songs so fast in the '60s that he didn't want to go to sleep at night because he was afraid he might miss one. Similarly, he soaked up influences so rapidly that it was hard to turn off the light at night. Why not read more?

"Someone gave me a book of Francois Villon poems and he was writing about hard-core street stuff and making it rhyme," Dylan says, still conveying the excitement of tapping into inspiration from 15th century France. "It was pretty staggering, and it made you wonder why you couldn't do the same thing in a song."

"I'd see Villon talking about visiting a prostitute and I would turn it around. I won't visit a prostitute, I'll talk about rescuing a prostitute. Again, it's turning stuff on its head, like 'vice is salvation and virtue will lead to ruin.'"

When you hear Dylan still marveling at lines such as the one above from Machiavelli or Shakespeare's "fair is foul and foul is fair," you can see why he would pepper his own songs with phrases that forever ask us to question our assumptions — classic lines such as "There's no success like failure and failure's no success at all," from 1965's "Love Minus Zero/No Limit."

As always, he's quick to give credit to the tradition.

"I didn't invent this, you know," he stresses. "Robert Johnson would sing some song and out of nowhere there would be some kind of Confucius saying that would make you go, 'Wow, where did that come from?' It's important to always turn things around in some fashion."

Exploring His Themes

Some writers sit down every day for two or three hours, at least, to write, whether they are in the mood or not. Others wait for inspiration. Dylan scoffs at the discipline of daily writing.

"Oh, I'm not that serious a songwriter," he says, a smile on his lips. "Songs don't just come to me. They'll usually brew for a while, and you'll learn that it's important to keep the pieces until they are completely formed and glued together."

He sometimes writes on a typewriter but usually picks up a pen because he says he can write faster than he can type. "I don't spend a lot of time going over songs," Dylan says. "I'll sometimes make changes, but the early songs, for instance, were mostly all first drafts."

He doesn't insist that his rhymes be perfect. "What I do that a lot of other writers don't do is take a concept and line I really want to get into a song and if I can't figure out for the life of me how to simplify it, I'll just take it all — lock, stock and barrel — and figure out how to sing it so it fits the rhyming scheme. I would prefer to do that rather than bust it down or lose it because I can't rhyme it."

Themes, he says, have never been a problem. When he started out, the Korean War had just ended. "That was a heavy cloud over everyone's head," he says. "The communist thing was still big, and the civil rights movement was coming on. So there was lots to write about."

"But I never set out to write politics. I didn't want to be a political moralist. There were people who just did that. Phil Ochs focused on political things, but there are many sides to us, and I wanted to follow them all. We can feel very generous one day and very selfish the next hour."

Dylan found subject matter in newspapers. He points to 1964's "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll," the story of a wealthy Baltimore man who was given only a six-month sentence for killing a maid with a cane. "I just let the story tell itself in that song," he says. "Who wouldn't be offended by some guy beating an old woman to death and just getting a slap on the wrist?"

Other times, he was reacting to his own anxieties.

"A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" helped define his place in pop with an apocalyptic tale of a society being torn apart on many levels.

I heard the sound of a thunder, it roared out a warnin'
Heard the roar of a wave that could drown the whole world.
Heard one hundred drummers whose hands were a-blazin'
Heard ten thousand whisperin' and nobody listenin'...
And it's a hard rain's a-gonna fall.

The song has captured the imagination of listeners for generations, and like most of Dylan's songs, it has lyrics rich and poetic enough to defy age. Dylan scholars have often said the song was inspired by the Cuban missile crisis.

"All I remember about the missile crisis is there were bulletins coming across on the radio, people listening in bars and cafés, and the scariest thing was that cities, like Houston and Atlanta, would have to be evacuated. That was pretty heavy."

"Someone pointed out it was written before the missile crisis, but it doesn't really matter where a song comes from. It just matters where it takes you."

His Constant Changes

Dylan's career path hasn't been smooth. During an unprecedented creative spree that resulted in three landmark albums ("Bringing It All Back Home," "Highway 61 Revisited" and "Blonde on Blonde") being released in 15 months, Dylan reconnected with the rock n' roll of his youth. Impressed by the energy he felt in the Beatles and desiring to speak in the musical language of his generation, he declared his independence from folk by going electric at the Newport Folk Festival in 1965.

His music soon became a new standard of rock achievement, influencing not only his contemporaries, including the Beatles, but almost everyone to follow.

The pressure on him was soon so intense that he went underground for a while in 1966, not fully resuming his career until the mid-'70s when he did a celebrated tour with the Band and then recorded one of his most hailed albums, "Blood on the Tracks." By the end of the decade, he confused some old fans by turning to brimstone gospel music.

There were gems throughout the '70s and '80s, but Dylan seemed for much of the '90s to be tired of songwriting, or, maybe, just tired of always being measured against the standards he set in the '60s.

In the early '90s he seemed to find comfort only in the rhythm of the road, losing himself in the troubadour tradition, not even wanting to talk about songwriting or his future. "Maybe I've written enough songs," he said then. "Maybe it's someone else's turn."

Somehow, however, all those shows reignited the songwriting spark — as demonstrated in his Grammy-winning "Time Out of Mind" album in 1997; the bittersweet song from the movie "Wonder Boys," "Things Have Changed," that won an Oscar in 2001 for best original song; and his heralded 2001 album, "Love and Theft." He spent much of last year working on a series of autobiographical chronicles. The first installment is due this fall from Simon & Schuster.

But nowhere, perhaps, is Dylan's regained passion more evident than in his live show, where he has switched primarily from guitar to electric keyboard and now leads his four-piece band with the intensity of a young punk auteur.

Dylan — who has lived in Southern California since he and ex-wife Sara Lowndes moved to Malibu in the mid-'70s with their five children — was in Amsterdam to headline two sold-out concerts at a 6,000-seat hall. He does more than 100 shows a year.

The audience on the chilly winter night after our first conversation is divided among people Dylan's age who have been following his career since the '60s and young people drawn to him by his classic body of work, and they call out for new songs, not just the classics.

Refiguring the Melodies

Back at the hotel afterward, Dylan looks about as satisfied as a man with his restless creative spirit can be.

It's nearly 2 a.m. by now and another pot of coffee cools. He rubs his hand through his curly hair. After all these hours, I realize I haven't asked the most obvious question: Which comes first, the words or the music?

Dylan leans over and picks up the acoustic guitar.

"Well, you have to understand that I'm not a melodist," he says. "My songs are either based on old Protestant hymns or Carter family songs or variations of the blues form."

"What happens is, I'll take a song I know and simply start playing it in my head. That's the way I meditate. A lot of people will look at a crack on the wall and meditate, or count sheep or angels or money or something, and it's a proven fact that it'll help them relax. I don't meditate on any of that stuff. I meditate on a song."

"I'll be playing Bob Nolan's 'Tumbling Tumbleweeds,' for instance, in my head constantly — while I'm driving a car or talking to a person or sitting around or whatever. People will think they are talking to me and I'm talking back, but I'm not. I'm listening to the song in my head. At a certain point, some of the words will change and I'll start writing a song."

He's slowly strumming the guitar, but it's hard to pick out the tune.

"I wrote 'Blowin' in the Wind' in 10 minutes, just put words to an old spiritual, probably something I learned from Carter Family records. That's the folk music tradition. You use what's been handed down. 'The Times They Are A-Changin'' is probably from an old Scottish folk song."

As he keeps playing, the song starts sounding vaguely familiar.

I want to know about "Subterranean Homesick Blues," one of his most radical songs. The 1965 number fused folk and blues in a way that made everyone who heard it listen to it over and over. John Lennon once said the song was so captivating on every level that it made him wonder how he could ever compete with it.

The lyrics, again, were about a society in revolution, a tale of drugs and misuse of authority and trying to figure out everything when little seemed to make sense:

Johnny's in the basement
Mixing up the medicine
I'm on the pavement
Thinking about the government

The music too reflected the paranoia of the time — roaring out of the speakers at the time with a cannonball force.

Where did that come from?

Without pause, Dylan says, almost with a wink, that the inspiration dates to his teens. "It's from Chuck Berry, a bit of "Too Much Monkey Business" and some of the scat songs of the '40s."

As the music from the guitar gets louder, you realize Dylan is playing one of the most famous songs of the 20th century, Irving Berlin's "Blue Skies."

You look into his eyes for a sign.

Is he writing a new song as we speak?

"No," he says with a smile. "I'm just showing you what I do."

Robert Hilburn, the Times pop music critic, can be reached at Robert.hilburn@latimes.com

26 September 2004
Dylan's Minnesota Farm,
John Preston Interview for Sunday Telegraph

Source: The Sunday Telegraph, pp. 18-19.

'I wasn't the toastmaster of any generation and that notion has to be pulled up by the roots'
Bob Dylan has spent his life hiding behind carefully erected smokescreens. But now the most enigmatic of rock legends is ready to talk. JOHN PRESTON caught up with him, at his Minnesota ranch, for the first interview he has given to a British newspapers in 20 years.

When it was announced two years ago that Bob Dylan was writing his autobiography, there was general astonishment among his legions of obsessive fans. Here, after all, was a man who has spent his life hiding behind carefully erected smokescreens of privacy and elusiveness. While other rock stars may have spilled details of their albums, their affairs and their addictions with delirious abandon, Dylan has always kept his public utterances to a gnomic few. All across the Internet questions flew back and forth. Would Dylan ever complete the book? How were his powers of recall? And perhaps most critically – particularly for anyone who has attempted to read Dylan's only other published work, his 1971 novel, Tarantula – would it make any sense?

But Dylan hasn't spent more than 40 years wrong footing people for nothing. Not only did he deliver Chronicles Volume One on time, but it turns out to be a remarkable book, richly atmospheric and full of insights into his work, along with vivid impressions from his life.

Then came another surprise: Dylan was prepared to talk, to give his first interview to a British newspaper in 20 years. And there was one more shock in store. Normally interviews with Bob Dylan tend to be tortuous affairs, full of yawning silences and mumbling evasions. But when I spoke to him at his farm in Minnesota where Dylan has been taking a rare break from performing, he confounded expectations by being friendly, relaxed and only too happy to chew the fat and reminisce.

He was quick to point out that it wasn't actually his idea to write the book. Rather, his publisher suggested it and despite a few misgivings he decided to have a try. "In part, I guess I wanted to set the record straight," he says in his light, mid-western accent, "I knew there had been other books about me and I'd even read a couple of them – although – frankly you can't spend time reading books about yourself, no matter who you are."

"Some of the books were more accurate than others, but no one knew the full story, apart from me. So I sat down and started tapping away on my old manual typewriter. Initially the book was going to be about the background to some of my albums, but then it took on a life of its own. The chapters about my early days in New York were supposed to be about how I recorded my second album, The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan. But somehow I never quite got there. Every few weeks I'd send off some pages to my publisher and ask if they thought they were usable. They seemed happy and so I just kept on going."

Dylan found writing Chronicles a very strange experience. "For a start I'm used to writing songs and I use a lot of symbol and metaphor. People can misinterpret that. But here I was determined to write a book that no one could misinterpret. It was difficult, though. Writing a song is a more straightforward process: you go verse, chorus, verse, chorus, and pretty soon you're done. With a book you can't use the same dynamics."

But Dylan's main problem – at least to begin with – was that he wasn't sure how reliable his memory would prove to be. "However, as I wrote, my memory seemed to unlock. I surprised myself with how much came back. I found I could visualise what people looked like and what they were wearing and even how particular rooms were furnished."

The book starts with Dylan freshly arrived in New York from Minnesota, and being signed up by Columbia records. At Columbia, he was taken under the wing of one of the label's most respected producers, John Hammond, who had only heard two of Dylan's original songs, "but he had a premonition there would be more".

From the word go, Dylan hung up a large mask between himself and the world. He changed his name, partly in tribute to the Welsh poet Dylan Thomas – in the past Dylan has always denied naming himself after Thomas, but now he seems happy to acknowledge his influence. He also changed his background. When people asked him where he'd come from and how he'd arrived, he claimed to have ridden into New York City on a freight train.

In fact, as he admits with a chuckle, he had driven in from the Midwest in a four-door 1957 sedan. But there could be no doubting his determination to succeed. Apart from anything else, he felt he had been singled out by destiny.

"I did have that feeling; I'd had it since I was a kid, you know. I grew up in a very isolated place and throughout my boyhood years I felt like I was like a dog hunting in dreams, always looking for something, although I wasn't sure what exactly. But from the start I had this absolute confidence. While I didn't know how I was going to get there, it didn't surprise me when I did. If I hadn't have had that confidence, I would have gone off and done something else."

Dylan was born in 1941 and brought up in the iron-ore mining town of Hibbing. When he was a boy his heroes, he recalls, were Robin Hood and St George, the Dragon Slayer. His Jewish seamstress grandmother, whom he plainly adored, had emigrated from Odessa in Russia, losing a leg along the way. Originally his father, Abe, who worked for the Standard Oil Company, wanted his son to become a mechanical engineer. Dylan, however, had, other ideas. At one stage, he insists he thought seriously about enrolling in the army and going to West Point. "Yeah, that was something I'd forgotten all about, but then it came back to me as I was writing."

Instead of West Point, Dylan headed south for New York City. As he describes it, the New York of the early 1960s sounds like a Greenwich Village version of La Boheme, full of blazingly intense intellectuals hanging about in book-lined lofts and smoky folk clubs.

It was a world apart from anything he'd been used to in Hibbing, and Dylan plunged into it with ravenous zeal. At a friend's apartment, he devoured books – Rousseau's Social Contract, Machiavelli's The Prince, even the 19th-century Prussian General, Karl Clausewift's treatise on military strategy – cramming his head full of anything he could pick up. "A lot of these books were too big to read," he recalls, "like giant shoes fitted for large-footed people."

Soon Dylan was performing in the folk clubs, modelling himself on his great idol, Woody Guthrie. At the time Guthrie was dying with Huntingdon's chorea in Greystone Hospital, a sanatorium in New Jersey. Eager to meet his hero, Dylan went to see him. "He had no idea who I was when I first turned up. But very few people were going to see him then. Hardly anyone even knew who he was, certainly not in the sanatorium. I never saw any other visitors there. I don't think he was lonely necessarily, but he seemed to like my company. I must have gone to see him about a dozen times. I'd bring him cigarettes, play songs and we'd just talk about this and that. It was a terrible place; like an asylum really. I always found it very draining psychologically going there."

Meanwhile, the Greenwich Village folk devotees weren't too sure what to make of Dylan. "Basically, folk performers fell into one of two categories. Either they were commercial and had highly stylised nightclub acts, or else they did southern mountain music. But I didn't do either of those things. I came from a rock n' roll background, although I did my best to hide that because I knew they'd be disapproving."

Under Guthrie's influence, Dylan began writing his own songs. "I had a similar sense of destiny there. In one sense, writing songs was a gradual process and yet in another it seemed to happen very quickly. Over the course of a year I started writing a lot, but the experience I'd already had stood me in good stead. I'd learned a lot by the time I started writing my first songs."

In September 1961, the critic Robert Shelton, writing in the New York Times reviewed a concert that Dylan had given at Gerde's Folk City. "His clothes may need a bit of tailoring, but when he works his guitar, harmonica, or piano and composes new songs faster than he can remember them, there is no doubt that he is bursting at the seams with talent."

A year later Dylan had written his great anti-war anthem, Blowin' in the Wind. It was the first in what was to be an extraordinarily long line of classic songs. But as soon as he'd mastered one form, Dylan was keen to move on, to experiment with new structures and instrumentation. Within four years he appeared to have left folk music behind. At the 1965 Newport Folk Festival he played the electric guitar while outraged folk fans in the audience tried to boo him offstage.

"In retrospect," he says, "I think it was very hard to domesticate and tame my talent. However, some people seemed to think that listening to songs should be like listening to dull sermons. I didn't want anything like that. But at the same time I felt very much a part of the folk music tradition. All the lyrics I wrote came out of that idiom."

It was a tradition that Dylan insists he never wanted to break with, even when he went electric, and as he puts it wryly, "gathered some notoriety I always kept in touch with older musicians, people in their fifties and sixties, like Mississippi John Hurt. Hard-core rural folksingers. They understood the complexity of my language and what I was trying to do. They didn't have any problem with it."

Throughout the 1960s, Dylan's fame and reputation continued to escalate, to the point where he was constantly being referred to as "the spokesman of his generation". It was a label he detested; he'd never sought such a role and he found the pressure of people's expectations increasingly hard to bear.

"Not only did I not want it, but I didn't need it. I couldn't understand it either. None of us like to be defined by what other people think of us. I wasn't the toastmaster of any generation and that notion had to be pulled up by the roots."

All he wanted, he says, was to be left alone with his wife and children enjoying "a nine-to-five existence with a white picket fence and pink roses in the backyard. That would have been nice".

Following a motorcycle accident in July 1966, he fled to Woodstock in upstate New York in an effort to put some distance between himself and his would-be disciples. But the fans, along with the mayhem, quickly followed. Soon, maps were being sold showing where Dylan's home was. Whenever he went out to a restaurant, the whole place would fall silent and everyone would start staring at him.

"It all turned into a nightmare," he remembers. In the end things got so bad that Dylan – ostensibly the great pacifist – was reduced to keeping guns in his house in case he and his family were attacked.

I wondered if he'd actually come close to having a nervous breakdown at the time. "I guess I did. None the less, you have to try to get on with your life and do the best you can. But it was terrible and also very disorientating. In the early years everything had been like a magic carpet ride for me – and then all at once it was over. Here was this thing that I'd wanted to do all my life, but suddenly I didn't feel I could do it anymore."

"Also, I was changing too. Now I had a wife and kids and different responsibilities. I realised I had to try to settle for another type of life; to take enjoyment out of little things. A lot about fame tastes good, or can do. Apart from anything else, you can use it to do a lot of good. But I wasn't seeing any of that back then."

For several years Dylan took himself out of the limelight. His marriage to Sara Lowndes fell apart and he concentrated on trying to bring up his four children. "I remember thinking that art was sublime excrement, and I decided to turn my back on it for a while."

Creatively, he foundered. He describes the experience as like being in a long dark tunnel. When I asked him how long it took him to emerge from the tunnel, he sighs and says, "Oh, a long time... But I got there in the end."

It was in the 1980s that Dylan hit his lowest ebb. His record sales plummeted and so did the quality of his live shows. Audiences stayed away, put off by Dylan's ramblingly atonal delivery and his apparent indifference to his own material. "In reality," he says, "I was just above a club act."

Unsure what direction to follow and unable to write any new songs, he found his old ones hanging heavy round his neck. "I was carrying a package of rotting meat... The glow was gone and the match had burned right to the end. I was going through the motions. The whisky had gone out of the bottle."

For a he thought seriously about quitting, never recording or performing again. Then one evening in a bar he saw an old jazz singer whose style of performing came as a revelation to him. "Suddenly, it was like this guy had an open window to my soul." All at once he saw how he could sing with his voice "bypassing" his brain, and "blasting up from the bottom of my lower self".

From then on, things began to improve – slowly at first, and then with gathering momentum. His 1989 album, Oh Mercy, was hailed as his best in years. His next, Time Out Of Mind won him a Grammy for album of the year in 1997, and Things Have Changed, the song he wrote for the 2000 film Wonderboys won him as Oscar. Dylan was so delighted with his Oscar that lie took to carrying it on stage with him and displaying it to his audience.

It was in the late 1980s that Dylan embarked on what soon became known as The Never Ending Tour – and he's been more or less on it ever since, criss-crossing the globe, playing about 150 concerts a year and seldom stopping for more than a month at a time.

I asked him if he thought he could ever have felt fulfilled if he had retired. "I'm not really sure. I think I would have missed the performing. I feel I need to perform more than I need to write. Having said that, though, I do get caught up in writing. Every time I come up with a new song it's like the first rose of May."

A few years ago after he had been hospitalised for a heart condition Dylan said that "any day above ground was a good day" as far as he was concerned. But life has looked up a good deal since then. His last album, Love and Theft, released in 2001, was hailed as one of the best things he has ever done. Now here he is, aged 63, a grandfather several times over, trawling through his back pages for what he says will eventually be a three-volume autobiography.

"I found writing the first volume quite an emotional experience in places. But then I'd put it aside and not look at it for a while. To be honest, I also found it quite a tedious process. I'm not a professional writer and I just didn't get that sense of exhilaration that some writers feel. But I guess I'll keep on going. I've certainly got a lot more things to write about."

There was one other question I wanted to ask. However much Dylan may hate being labelled as a spokesman of any kind, it's something he can never shake off completely. So did he think that the United States and Britain should have invaded Iraq?

Dylan barks with loud wheezy laughter. "Maybe I'll tackle that in the next book."

October 2004
Steve Inskeep interview for National Public Radio

Source: Circulating tape

What follows is a transcription of the radio program broadcast on NPR on October 12th, 2004:

One of Bob Dylan's most famous songs includes the singer asking his recording engineer if the tape is on.

Is it rolling, Bob?

A few days ago Bob Dylan began what is believed to be his first broadcast interview in nineteen years. The conversation started about the same way.

BD: Is the tape on?

SI: Tape's on.

This most private of musicians spent most of the 1960s fleeing his rabid fans. Now, at the age of 63, he's writer a memoir. It's called "Chronicles, Vol. 1".

Dylan started by writing about his old recording sessions.

BD: As you can see by the way it is written, you can say just about anything you want… um… or I can anyway if I put it in the context of what was happening when I was making these records.

In the course of writing about recording sessions, Bob Dylan ended up telling a good chuck of his life story, flipping back and forth in time. On one page it's the winter of 1961. He's a young man, in New York City, making demo tapes, and waiting for a shot at fame.

He went on to become one of the most influential songwriters of the 1960s. On another page, Dylan is a burnt-out rock star who can no longer feel the power of his own songs.

I'm going back to New York City, I do believe I've had enough…

That moment came in the mid 1980's.

BD: I did some tours with the Tom Petty Band, and then I did a short tour with The Grateful Dead and as you could probably expect I really didn't feel like my heart was in it much any more.

SI: You seem to suggest that even some of your own best songs were alien to you, hard to play.

BD: That's true. If you talk to any of the people who were around me at that time, I couldn't quite reach the meaning in the whole pantheon of the songs which I'd written. I thought maybe they didn't hold up conceptually or something like that. Or maybe the music scene had passed me by.

SI: And so what happened when you had the sessions with members of The Grateful Dead and they were urging you to play songs that you hadn't played in a while?

BD: They always had seemed to have known my stuff in a lotta ways deeper than me. They found great meaning in those songs, they could play them pretty accurately, but I couldn't do that.

Bob Dylan says that he'd fled the room rather than talk about playing the songs he couldn't relate to any more. He might not have ever gone back, might even have ended his career, except, he says, that he walked into a bar and he was inspired by a jazz group playing inside.

BD: You know, a lot happened for me when I walked in and heard them. I felt like I could do something again. I fixed on something that I hadn't had for many, many years.
SI: You just heard this little combo playing
BD: Uh-ha. It was the singer who got to me there. I mean those thing happen sometimes mostly tho… but when they do happen they happen to a person when they're much younger.
Bob Dylan was in his 40's. He returned to playing his old music. Restored his confidence, and went on to record 'Oh Mercy', an acclaimed album that was seen as a comeback.
Why have you continued for years now playing… well, probably more than a hundred dates a year, right?
A-ha. Well, because, you know, I don't really feel like anybody else's doing what I do. That's probably the longest short of it right there.
In his memoir, Bob Dylan adds another detail. He says he wanted to start touring constantly in hope that he would be discovered by a new audience. Of the fans who'd followed him since the 1960s, declaring that his every word was Shakespearean poetry, Bob Dylan writes, "In many ways, this audience was past its prime, and its reflexes were shot."
Why does it bother you when people sometimes refer to you as a "voice of your generation"?
I think that was just a term that could create problems for somebody, especially if someone just wants to keep it simple, write songs and play them. Having these colossal accolades and titles, they get in the way.

You say that it made it harder for you to just do your job?

Oh yeah, absolutely.

I guess it's your fault 'cause you went and wrote all those lyrics that a lot of people think speak to them

BD: [laughs] Yeah, but… and that's okay. When it becomes a problem it's like… when we're getting known outside of our field, then we are known by people who don't really know… who never had any experience with what we do or… we're just names. You know, sometimes a person's reputation can be far more colossal than the influence of that person. I don't pay any attention to it anymore, so I was trying to reconstruct the theory of what it does feel like to… to have anything like thrown at you when you expected to be something that you know you're not.

Have you come to some places in your career when you considered quitting?

BD: [laughs]
SI: You've worked through them…
BD: Every day.
SI: Every day, really?
BD: Yeah… oh, why not? You know… [laughs] I don't know
SI: Well, do you think you might just quit? Or take up painting? Joni Mitchell…
BD: Yeah…

A couple of years ago said I'm gonna take up painting and give up music.

BD: I understand her. I know why she would do that. I know why I would do it. If I could find something that somebody mighta interested me to do, I mean I think I've pretty much done what I, you know,

SI: Well, you know people will be listening to this interview, you got any marketable skills you wanna tell people about

BD: Well, I can sail a boat and fly a plane [laughs]

SI: Bob Dylan is the author of Chronicles, Vol. One. it's been a lot of fun talking to you, thanks very much.

BD: Okay, thank you.

4 October 2004
Edna Gundersen Interview for USA Today

DYLAN CHRONICLES HIS JOURNEY
Memoir of folk's troubadour doesn't get tangled up in personal details.
By Edna Gundersen,
USA TODAY

For more than four decades, fans have searched for the man behind the myth and the music.

They scrutinized enigmatic lyrics on his 43 albums and puzzled over evasive comments in rare interviews. His abstract poetry in Tarantula and sketches in Drawn Blank only enhanced the riddle, while a vast library of unauthorized biographies tended to blur his identity with conflicting theories and agendas. He remained a closed book.

Until now. Another side of Bob Dylan emerges today in Chronicles: Volume One (Simon & Schuster, $24), a candid memoir that pulls the veil of mystique from pop culture's reluctant icon to reveal a creative giant unlocking his destiny. He tells his story, but he's not calling it an autobiography.

"I don't exactly know what that word means anyway, so I don't think I'd be up to that task," Dylan, 63, says in a phone interview.

After reviewing Dylan's unpublished notes on early albums, Simon & Schuster publisher David Rosenthal suggested he write about specific periods rather than undertake a life story.

"I understood that strategy," says Dylan, who says he wrote Chronicles to share key recollections, not to amend errors by other authors. "I didn't feel like I had to counteract anything. I maybe had to put to rest a lot of superstitions, but it wasn't like it troubled me to write the book. I didn't have to write an apology. I wasn't trying to explain anything to anybody. I was intrigued by the whole process with words and how they would flow and with how certain people would light up my memory. I was just trying to charm my way through it, really."

Dylan's memory yielded richly detailed anecdotes, events and conversations. Using a vintage Remington typewriter, he wrote off and on for the past three years, completing entire sections in single sittings "because if I stopped, I didn't want to have to go back and read it."

The articulate, well-read but private singer found Chronicles far more challenging than songwriting.

"Writing a song is what I can do and know how to do and need to do," he says. "I'm surprised anybody gets a book out. I use a lot of metaphors and symbolism in songs, and they're based on rhythmic value. Obviously, you can't do that when you're writing a manuscript, which has to make literal sense. I had to regulate my imagination; I couldn't just wander all over the place."

"I can't say I liked the process. When I write a song, it stays in my mind for a brief period, and I don't have to connect it to the next song. When I'm writing a song, I feel like I'm still living life. With a book like this, it occurs to you after a while that you're really not living life. You're trying to put it on pages in a typewriter. I don't mean to sound like I wrote the book by an oil lamp, but I did feel like I was closing myself off."

In 293 pages, Dylan recounts his youth in Minnesota, his early days as a performer on the folk circuit in Greenwich Village and the creation of 1970's New Morning and 1989's Oh Mercy.

Salient details emerge. As a teen captivated by military history, he briefly yearned to attend West Point. Born Robert Allen Zimmerman, he tried on stage names, including Elston Gunn. After discovering poet Dylan Thomas, he considered Bobby Dylan (rejected because of other Bobbys — Vee, Darin, Rydell). He thought Bob Allyn sounded like a used-car salesman, so he settled on Bob Dylan.

In New York, Dylan's talent flowered as he hungrily explored the city's arts and colorful characters, from boxer Jack Dempsey to folkie Dave Van Ronk.

"Everything had a different gratification and delight back then," he says, reflecting on gigs at Café Wha? and the Gaslight. "That's when I was coming up as a performer. My life hadn't been filled with too many mistakes leading up to that. As time went on, things began to scratch and sting. All of a sudden, the magic carpet got yanked away."

Dylan's stardom brought media scrutiny and unwelcome canonization as a protest prophet. He retreated to Woodstock to raise a family, dodge his stalkers and shed the millstone of '60s messiah.

"When I was in Woodstock, it became very clear to me that the whole counterculture was one big scarecrow wearing dead leaves," he says. "It had no purpose in my life. It's been true ever since, actually."

While Dylan insists no topic was off limits in Chronicles, he barely acknowledges his 1966 motorcycle accident and avoids mention of his divorce and conversion to Christianity in the late '70s.

"That would fall under the category of what doesn't matter," he says. "If somebody wanted me to write an article about my motorcycle accident, I'm sure I could come up with one, but what's the point? In no way is the book an open confession. It was never intended to be. The confessional stuff is OK if you do the penance along with it, but that was never my intention."

"Confessional stuff" apparently includes naming wives and children, which he studiously avoids.

"Personal details are important if they move the story along, but these chronicles are nothing more than shaking down the tree of life and seeing what comes out," Dylan says. "Those things didn't come out. I'm in possession of those things, but I don't think that's enough to really excite a reader. I could have been more nasty and sultry if I wanted to be, but there wasn't any reason."

Dylan expounds with gusto on his musical odyssey, outlining his influences, his growth as a performer and songwriter, his models and collaborators. Folk music was the fulcrum, but Dylan also found inspiration in jazz and blues, train whistles and church bells, in newspapers and literature. He read Balzac, Faulkner, Byron, Pushkin, Milton, Shelley, Poe and Dickens.

"I went to it on my own," he says. "I was into the folk-song language, and intuitively I knew all these books would enrich the human mind. People I was meeting in the late '50s and early '60s were much older than me. They all had books on their shelves. Up till that time I'd probably just seen comic books. In high school, I'd read Sir Walter Scott, and my favorite books were Uncle Tom's Cabin and Ben-Hur. The folk songs were all beer and Bibles and rum. It seemed to me that all those words on the shelf led to a different kind of glory."

Chronicles' happiest passages dwell on exploring and sharing music. The tone sours when fame and battle fatigue set in. After a serious hand injury and while on tour in the mid-'80s, Dylan writes, "I felt done for, an empty burned-out wreck ... I'm a '60s troubadour, a folk-rock relic ... I'm in the bottomless pit of cultural oblivion."

Spent and uninspired, Dylan pondered retirement.

"It was just a misdirection of my talent," Dylan says. "It burned itself out at that time. I would not have called it a creative slump. I had horse-whipped myself so bad, and I was critically hurt in so many ways, I really didn't have much more to say at that point."

As it turns out, Dylan had plenty left to say. His latest albums, 2001's Love and Theft and 1997's Time Out of Mind, rank among his classics. He has written songs for his next studio album, which he'll tackle after completing a U.S. tour in November. A restless troubadour, Dylan keeps his songs alive on stage. When he takes his final bow, those tunes won't leave the spotlight.

"They're not worth much if they don't have permanence," he says. "A lot of them will last. A lot of them won't. I came to terms with that a long time back. What made my songs different, and still does, is I can create several orbits that travel and intersect each other and are set up in a metaphysical way. They all came out of the folk music pantheon, and those songs have lasted. So if my songs were written correctly and eloquently, there's no reason they wouldn't last."

Whether Chronicles has a long shelf life is less certain.

"I was just happy when I turned it all in and they agreed it was good enough to put out and I wouldn't have to do any more," Dylan says, laughing. He's in no rush to plunge into a second volume. He's quick to add that he didn't approach Chronicles as a vanity project.

"In a lot of ways, this is written like I play," he says. "There's a certain section of my mind that is playing for people who've never heard of me or never heard my songs. In the same way, I don't have to trade on my reputation to write a book. It can't stand if it's only written for people who know about me or are familiar with my work. This book has to reach people who might not have heard my name before."

4 October 2004
David Gates Interview for Newsweek

BOB DYLAN OPENS UP

EXCLUSIVE EXCERPT: In a Startling Memoir, The Reclusive Legend Reveals His Real Feelings About the '60s

Cover Story
He is the emblem of an era, the voice of a generation. But in a revealing new memoir, Bob Dylan says nobody ever asked him if he wanted to play those roles. In an exclusive interview with NEWSWEEK and excerpt from the book, the musician talks candidly about fame, family, art, the 60s and his journeys through modern celebrity.

THE BOOK OF BOB

Bob Dylan is about to publish a remarkably candid, long-awaited memoir. He gave us the first excerpt, and we sat down for an extraordinarily wide-ranging talk.
BY DAVID GATES

WHEN I TELL BOB DYLAN he's the last person I'd have expected to turn autobiographer, he laughs and says, "Yeah, me too." It's not just that he guards his privacy so carefully that he's arranged to meet in a motel room someplace in the Midwest—which is all he'd like us to specify—to talk about his forthcoming book, "Chronicles, Volume One." (Dylan supposedly got in without being spotted, but there's a funny vibe here. Why is our pot of coffee on the house?) His early public persona was built on self-protectively enigmatic statements and artful misdirection, like the yarns he used to tell about being a traveling carny; even Robert Zimmerman's stage name was an invention. And the songs that made Dylan so burdensomely famous—exhibit A, "Like a Rolling Stone" with Miss Lonely, her diplomat and the Siamese cat on his shoulder—seemed to tell his personal truth, and a lot of other people's, by means of surreal evasion. "I'm used to writing songs," he says, "and songs—I can fill 'em up with symbolism and metaphors. When you write a book like this, you gotta tell the truth, and it can't be misinterpreted." He's clearly proud of the book, but he didn't enjoy writing the thing. At all. "Lest we forget, while you're writing, you're not living. What do they call it? Splendid isolation? I don't find it that splendid."

Dylan, 63, looks younger and healthier than he did when I spoke with him in 1997, the year his spooky, world-weary album "Time Out of Mind" re-established him as a vital contemporary—after what he claims was a quarter century of artistic "downward spiral"—and introduced him to a new generation of listeners. Back then, he was just recovering from a near-fatal infection of the tissues around his heart. Now, sitting at a small table with a view of the parking lot, sad little suburban trees and a lowering sky, he seems like a wiry kid eager to get outdoors—but he's also perfectly happy, as before, to shoot the breeze about music. "When I was talking to you earlier" he begins—as if it had been a couple of hours ago, rather than seven years. He gives a shout-out to Elvis Costello ("'Everyday I Write the Book'—I just did that") and to Carole King: "'You've Got a Friend' on some level means more to me than a lot of my songs do." He testifies to his admiration for Bing Crosby and for Willie Nelson, his informed skepticism about hip-hop ("There's a lot of clever minds behind that, no question about it. But you know, less is more"), and his overall pessimism about the present-day scene: "I don't think music is ever going to be the same as what it meant to us. You hear it, but you don't hear it." Like all modernists, he's a nostalgic—what else would you be modernist about?— but he's clearly excited about his own recent music. These days, he says, with that familiar rising inflection, "I'm sort of doing what I want to do? I mean not sort of what I want to do, I am doing what I want to do. Or what I believe I was put here to do." He's got six or eight songs toward a new album, and he hopes to finish more before he goes back on the road next month. Then he wants to start re-recording many of his old songs, this time "with the proper structures. A lot of these songs can have, like, a dozen different structures to them. I can't hope to do all that. But I can provide a few things for future generations." He takes another sip from his Styrofoam cup.

"Chronicles" which will be in stores Oct 5, may have been a detour from Dylan's real work: it occupied him on and off for three years, writing on a manual typewriter in capital letters, to make it easier for an assistant to read and retype. But it's hardly an arty curiosity like his post-Beat, all-lowercase 1966 novel "Tarantula." It's an attempt by the most influential cultural figure now alive—no? who else?—to give us a straightforward look at his life. It comes along, coincidentally, at a moment when mainstream literary writers are busy arguing for Dylan's importance: in the British critic Christopher Ricks's study "Dylan's Visions of Sin," and soon in "Studio A" a collection of pieces on Dylan by the likes of Jonathan Lethem, Rick Moody and Sam Shepard, as well as Dylan himself. (Simon & Schuster has also issued an updated collection of Dylan's lyrics—and Scribner has reprinted "Tarantula.") "Chronicles," written at the urging of Simon & Schuster publisher David Rosenthal, is neither a cradle-to-one-foot-in-the-grave autobiography nor a true memoir, tightly focused on a single crucial period. Instead, as Dylan puts it, "It's like I had a full deck, and I cut the cards and whatever you see you go with that. I realize there's a great gap in it." What he saw ended up as an evocation of his early days in Greenwich Village, chapters on the genesis of two lesser-known albums, "New Morning" (1970) and "Oh Mercy" (1989), and a section on his forced retreat from his own celebrity. (It's the subject of the exclusive excerpt that follows this piece.) The Biblical title Rosenthal suggested made intuitive sense to Dylan.

"'Chronicles' just means—I'm not sure what it means"—he laughs—"but it would seem to be some kind of thing where you can make right use of the past."

Critics may complain that the book doesn't include the back pages they want most: his famous 1966 motorcycle accident gets a single sentence, and there's nothing about his 1977 divorce, his 1978 conversion to evangelical Christianity or the origin and the making of such master-works as "Blood on the Tracks" (1975), "Slow Train Coming" (1979), "Infidels" (1983) or "Time Out of Mind." (He did write about "Blood on the Tracks"; that chapter, and much more that he's written, may appear in subsequent volumes—"When I slink into the corner, maybe") But Dylan has a different sense of priorities. "I mean, I'm in possession of what really matters." And one thing that seems to matter overwhelmingly is other people. He's written sharp-eyed portraits of everyone from the poet Archibald MacLeish— who wanted Dylan to collaborate on a musical play—to the opium-smoking bohemian couple who put him up in the Village. Jack Dempsey even gets a cameo on the first page. "You know how I would remember stuff? I would remember people," he says. "Once I figured out who was there, I could make something of it. I didn't go strong on anybody, you know? I think I went rather light. But in saying that, I'm not a big fan of polite literature, so there would have to be an edge to it." Dylan's songs have always teemed with people, from the real-life Hattie Carroll and Hurricane Carter to such indelible figures as the clueless Mr. Jones in "Ballad of a Thin Man" and the back-stabbing wanna-be in "Positively Fourth Street." But "Chronicles" should dispel any notion that Dylan spends his real life exclusively absorbed in the splendid isolation of his private visions. While everybody was obsessively watching Dylan, he was watching them.

There's always been something uniquely strange about Dylan's fame, the often-creepy intensity with which people have been drawn to him—or rather, to his mystique. "The songs definitely had a lot to do with it," he says. Well, yeah. It went dangerously past ordinary adulation. At its worst, in the late 1960s and early '70s, Dylan experienced a disorienting, terrifying and downright infuriating combination of stalking and deification. As he writes in "Chronicles" "It would have driven anybody mad"—and it goes a long way toward explaining why arranging for an interview with him still feels like setting up a meeting to pass nuclear secrets.

As Dylan sees it, his fame distorted not only his life but his art; he reacted to it with new music calculated to baffle expectations, and he ended up baffling himself. "I didn't know what it was I was really doing. I was going on reputation. Which buys you a certain sum, but you're not in control. And until you gain control, you're never quite sure you're doing the right thing? In my case anyway? So I went for a long time precisely on that fame that we're talking about. But—it was like a bag of wind. I didn't realize it was slipping away until it had slipped away." And how long did this go on? "Artistically speaking, it would have to have begun sometime in Woodstock—not personally, but in a public way—till maybe when that 'Time Out of Mind' record came out." I command myself to keep my mouth shut. He's talking about the 25 years that produced "Blood on the Tracks," "Slow Train Coming," "Shot of Love," "Infidels" and its sublime outtakes, and—no. Let's not argue with the man who's in possession of what really matters. I take another sip from my cup. A china cup. Not being Bob Dylan, I had no problem making a run to the restaurant down the hall, though the coffee was still on the house.

Outside the window, rain's now falling on the parking lot. Dylan must have seen so many of these gloomy Midwestern days when he was growing up in northern Minnesota. The photo on the cover of "Chronicles" shows Times Square in 1961, the year he came to New York, but as a kid, he says, "I had no idea of what a city was like. And I think it probably made me who I am today. The country where I came from—it's pretty bleak. And it's cold. And there's a lot of water. So you could dream a lot. The difference between me now and then is that back then, I could see visions. The me now can dream dreams." His early songs, he says, were visionary, however much they drew on his meticulous observation of the real world around him. "What you see in 'Chronicles' is a dream," he says. "It's already happened."

You would have to be Bob Dylan—which is what all those stalkers must ultimately have wanted from him—to grasp fully what he's trying to tell you. But it must have to do with his having to accept the loss of his original mode of creation, in which the songs seemed to come to him without his knowing what he was doing. Does he still have that same access to—I don't know how to put the question. He helps me out. "No, not in the same way," he says. "Not in the same way at all. But I can get there, by following certain forms and structures. It's not luck. Luck's in the early years. In the early years, I was trying to write and perform the sun and the moon. At a certain point, you just realize that nobody can do that." In the myth that he's structured to explain himself to himself—and he really is the one in possession of that truth—"Time Out of Mind" must mark the point of that acceptance. "Chronicles," the "dream" in which he found himself constrained to tell the literal truth, is his attempt, at long last, to explain himself to us.

'ON THE RUN'

By the late '60s, Dylan had been anointed—by whom and as what, he didn't know. An exclusive excerpt on the infuriating, dizzying wind tunnel of fame.

From "Chronicles, Volume One" by Bob Dylan. To be published by Simon & Schuster, Inc. © 2004 by Bob Dylan.

I HAD BEEN IN A MOTORCYCLE accident and I'd been hurt, but I recovered. Truth was that I wanted to get out of the rat race. Having children changed my life and segregated me from just about everybody and everything that was going on. Outside of my family, nothing held any real interest for me and I was seeing everything through different glasses. Even the horrifying news items of the day, the gunning down of the Kennedys, King, Malcolm X... I didn't see them as leaders being shot down, but rather as fathers whose families had been left wounded. Being born and raised in America, the country of freedom and independence, I had always cherished the values and ideals of equality and liberty. I was determined to raise my children with those ideals.

A few years earlier Ronnie Gilbert, one of The Weavers, had introduced me at one of the Newport Folk Festivals saying, "And here he is... take him, you know him, he's yours." I had failed to sense the ominous forebodings in the introduction. Elvis had never even been introduced like that. "Take him, he's yours!" What a crazy thing to say! Screw that. As far as I knew, I didn't belong to anybody then or now. I had a wife and children whom I loved more than anything else in the world. I was trying to provide for them, keep out of trouble, but the big bugs in the press kept promoting me as the mouthpiece, spokesman, or even conscience of a generation. That was funny. All I'd ever done was sing songs that were dead straight and expressed powerful new realities. I had very little in common with and knew even less about a generation that I was supposed to be the voice of. I'd left my hometown only ten years earlier, wasn't vociferating the opinions of anybody. My destiny lay down the road with whatever life invited, had nothing to do with representing any kind of civilization. Being true to yourself, that was the thing. I was more a cowpuncher than a Pied Piper.

People think that fame and riches translate into power, that it brings glory and honor and happiness. Maybe it does, but sometimes it doesn't. I found myself stuck in Woodstock, vulnerable and with a family to protect. If you looked in the press, though, you saw me being portrayed as anything but that. It was surprising how thick the smoke had become. It seems like the world has always needed a scapegoat—someone to lead the charge against the Roman Empire. But America wasn't the Roman Empire and someone else would have to step up and volunteer. I really was never any more than what I was—a folk musician who gazed into the gray mist with tear-blinded eyes and made up songs that floated in a luminous haze. Now it had blown up in my face and was hanging over me. I wasn't a preacher performing miracles. It would have driven anybody mad.

Early on, Woodstock had been very hospitable to us. I had actually discovered the place long before moving there. Once, at night, driving down from Syracuse after playing a show, I told my manager about the town. We were going to be driving right by it. He said he was looking for a place to buy a country house. We drove through the town, he spied a house he liked and bought it there and then. I had bought one later on, and it was in this same house that intruders started to break in day and night. Tensions mounted almost immediately and peace was hard to come by. At one time the place had been a quiet refuge, but now, no more. Roadmaps to our homestead must have been posted in all fifty states for gangs of dropouts and druggies. Moochers showed up from as far away as California on pilgrimages. Goons were breaking into our place all hours of the night. At first, it was merely the nomadic homeless making illegal entry—seemed harmless enough, but then rogue radicals looking for the Prince of Protest began to arrive—unaccountable-looking characters, gargoyle-looking gals, scarecrows, stragglers looking to party, raid the pantry. Peter LaFarge, a folksinger friend of mine, had given me a couple of Colt single-shot repeater pistols, and I also had a clip-fed Winchester blasting rifle around, but it was awful to think about what could be done with those things. The authorities, the chief of police (Woodstock had about three cops) had told me that if anyone was shot accidentally or even shot at as a warning, it would be me that would be going to the lockup. Not only that, but creeps thumping their boots across our roof could even take me to court if any of them fell off. This was so unsettling. I wanted to set fire to these people. These gate-crashers, spooks, trespassers, demagogues were all disrupting my home life and the fact that I was not to piss them off or they could press charges really didn't appeal to me. Each day and night was fraught with difficulties. Everything was wrong, the world was absurd. It was backing me into a corner. Even persons near and dear offered no relief.

Once in the midsummer madness I was riding in a car with Robbie Robertson, the guitar player in what later was to be called The Band. I felt like I might as well have been living in another part of the solar system. He says to me, "Where do you think you're gonna take it?"

I said, "Take what?"

"You know, the whole music scene." The whole music scene! The car window was rolled down about an inch. I rolled it clown the rest of the way, felt a gust of wind blow into my face and waited for what he said to die away—it was like dealing with a conspiracy. No place was far enough away. I don't know what everybody else was fantasizing about but what I was fantasizing about was a nine-to-five existence, a house on a tree-lined block with a white picket fence, pink roses in the backyard. That would have been nice. That was my deepest dream. After a while you learn that privacy is something you can sell, but you can't buy it back. Woodstock had turned into a nightmare, a place of chaos. Now it was time to scramble out of there in search of some new silver lining and that's what we did. We moved to New York City for a while in hopes to demolish my identity, but it wasn't any better there. It was even worse. Demonstrators found our house and paraded up and down in front of it chanting and shouting, demanding for me to come out and lead them somewhere—stop shirking my duties as the conscience of a generation. Once the street was blocked off and our house was picketed by firebrands with city permits, demonstrators roaring and snorting. The neighbors hated us. To them it must have seemed like I was something out of a carnival show—some exhibition in the Palace of Wonders. They would stare at me when they saw me, like they'd stare at a shrunken head or a giant jungle rat. I pretended that I didn't care.

Eventually, we tried moving West—tried a few different places, but in short time reporters would come sniffing around in hopes to gain some secret—maybe I'd confess some sin. Our address would be printed in the local press and then the same thing would start up. Even if these reporters had been allowed in the house, what would they find? A whole lotta stuff—stacking toys, push and pull toys, child-sized tables and chairs—big empty cardboard boxes—science kits, puzzles and toy drums... I wasn't going to let anybody in the house. As for house rules, we didn't have many. If the kids wanted to play basketball in the kitchen, they played basketball in the kitchen. If they got into the pots and pans, we put all the pots and pans out on the floor. My house was chaotic inside as well as out.

Joan Baez recorded a protest song about me that was getting big play, challenging me to get with it—come out and take charge, lead the masses—be an advocate, lead the crusade. The song called out to me from the radio like a public service announcement. The press never let up. Once in a while I would have to rise up and offer myself for an interview so they wouldn't beat down the door. Usually the questions would start out with something like, "Can we talk further upon things that are happening?" "Sure, like what?" Reporters would shoot questions at me and I would tell them repeatedly that I was not a spokesman for anything or anybody and that I was only a musician. They'd look into my eyes as if to find some evidence of bourbon and handfuls of amphetamines. I had no idea what they were thinking. Later an article would hit the streets with the headline "Spokesman Denies That He's a Spokesman." I felt like a piece of meat that someone had thrown to the dogs. The New York Times printed quacky interpretations of my songs. Esquire magazine put a four-faced monster on their cover, my face along with Malcolm X's, Kennedy's and Castro's. What the hell was that supposed to mean? It was like I was on the edge of the earth. If anybody had any sound guidance or advice to offer, it wasn't forthcoming. My wife, when she married me, had no idea of what she was getting into. Me neither, actually, and now we were in a no win situation.

For sure my lyrics had struck nerves that had never been struck before, but if my songs were just about the words, then what was Duane Eddy, the great rock-and-roll guitarist, doing recording an album full of instrumental melodies of my songs? Musicians have always known that my songs were about more than just words, but most people are not musicians. What I had to do was recondition my mind and stop putting the blame on external forces. I had to educate myself, get rid of some baggage. The solitude of time was what I didn't have. Whatever the counterculture was, I'd seen enough of it. I was sick of the way my lyrics had been extrapolated, their meanings subverted into polemics and that I had been anointed as the Big Bubba of Rebellion, High Priest of Protest, the Czar of Dissent, the Duke of Disobedience, Leader of the Freeloaders, Kaiser of Apostasy, Archbishop of Anarchy, the Big Cheese. What the hell are we talking about? Horrible tides any way you want to look at it. All code words for Outlaw.

It was tough moving around—like the Merle Haggard song, "...I'm on the run, the highway is my home." I don't know if Haggard ever had to get his family out with him, but I know I did. It's a little different when you have to do that. The landscape burned behind us. The press was in no hurry to retract their judgment and I couldn't just lie there, had to take the bull by the horns myself and remodel the image of me, change the perception of it anyway. There aren't any rules to cover an emergency of this kind. This was a new thing for me and I wasn't used to thinking this way. I'd have to send out deviating signals, crank up the wrecking train—create some different impressions.

At first I was only able to do little things, local things. Tactics, really. Unexpected things like pouring a bottle of whiskey over my head and walking into a department store and act pie-eyed, knowing that everyone would be talking amongst themselves when I left. I was hoping that the news would spread. What mattered to me most was getting breathing room for my family. The whole spectral world could go to hell. My outer image would have to be something a bit more confusing, a bit more humdrum. It's hard to live like this. It takes all your effort. The first thing that has to go is any form of artistic self-expression that's dear to you. Art is unimportant next to life, and you have no choice. I had no hunger for it anymore, anyway. Creativity has much to do with experience, observation and imagination, and if any one of those key elements is missing, it doesn't work. It was impossible now for me to observe anything without being observed. Even when I walked to the corner store someone would spot me and sneak away to find a phone. In Woodstock I'd be out in the yard and a car would come rolling up, some guy would jump out of the passenger side, point in my direction and then walk away—and a bunch of sightseers would then come down the hill. Citizens would see me coming down the street and cross it, didn't want to get caught—guilt by association. Sometimes in a restaurant (my name was widely known but my face not so at the time) one of the eaters who recognized me would go up to the cashier, point in my direction and whisper, "That's him over there." The cashier would tell someone and the news would go from table to table. It was like lightning struck the place. Necks would stretch. Folks chewing their food would spit it out, look at one another and say, "That him?" "You mean that guy that was sitting over there at that table with the bunch of kids?" It was like moving a mountain. My house was being battered, ravens constantly croaking ill omens at our door. What kind of alchemy, I wondered, could create a perfume that would make reaction to a person lukewarm, indifferent and apathetic? I wanted to get some. I had never intended to be on the road of heavy consequences and I didn't like it. I wasn't the toastmaster of any generation, and that notion needed to be pulled up by its roots. Liberty for myself and my loved ones had to be secured. I had no time to kill and I didn't like what was being thrown at me. This main meal of garbage had to be mixed up with some butter and mushrooms and I'd have to go great lengths to do it. You gotta start somewhere.

I went to Jerusalem, got myself photographed at the Western Wall wearing a skullcap. The image was transmitted worldwide instantly and quickly all the great rags changed me overnight into a Zionist. This helped a little. Coming back I quickly recorded what appeared to be a country-western record and made sure it sounded pretty bridled and housebroken. The music press didn't know what to make of it. I used a different voice, too. People scratched their heads. I started a rumor with my record company that I would be quitting music and going to college, the Rhode Island School of Design—which eventually leaked out to the columnists. "He won't last a month," some people said. Journalists began asking in print, "Whatever happened to the old him?" They could go to hell, too. Stories were printed about me trying to find myself, that I was on some eternal search, that I was suffering some kind of internal torment. It all sounded good to me. 1 released one album (a double one) where I just threw everything I could think of at the wall and whatever stuck, released it, and then went back and scooped up everything that didn't stick and released that, too. I missed out on Woodstock—just wasn't there. Altamont—sympathy for the devil—missed that, too. Eventually I would even record an entire album based on Chekhov short stories—critics thought it was autobiographical—that was fine. I played a part in a movie, wore cowboy duds and galloped down the road. Not much required there. I guess I was naïve.

The novelist Herman Melville's work went largely unnoticed after Moby-Dick. Critics thought that he crossed the literary line and recommended burning Moby-Dick. By the time of his death he was largely forgotten.

I had assumed that when critics dismissed my work, the same thing would happen to me, that the public would forget about me. How mad is that? Eventually, I would have to face the music—go back to performing—the long-awaited ballyhooed reunion tour—gypsy tours—changing ideologies like tires, like shoes, like guitar strings. What's the difference? As long as my own form of certainty stayed intact, I owed nobody nothing. I wasn't going to go deeper into the darkness for anybody. I was already living in the darkness. My family was my light and I was going to protect that light at all cost. That was where my dedication was, first, last and everything in-between. What did I owe the rest of the world? Nothing. Not a damn thing. The press? I figured you lie to it. For the public eye, I went into the bucolic and mundane as far as possible. In my real life I got to do the things that I loved the best and that was all that mattered—the Little League games, birthday parties, taking my kids to school, camping trips, boating, rafting, canoeing, fishing... I was living on record royalties. In reality I was imperceptible, my image, that is. Sometime in the past I had written and performed songs that were most original and most influential, and I didn't know if I ever would again and I didn't care.

The actor Tony Curtis once told me that fame is an occupation in itself, that it is a separate thing. And Tony couldn't be more right. The old image slowly faded and in time I found myself no longer under the canopy of some malignant influence. Eventually different anachronisms were thrust upon me—anachronisms of lesser dilemma—though they might seem bigger. Legend, Icon, Enigma (Buddha in European Clothes was my favorite)—stuff like that, but that was all right. These tides were placid and harmless, threadbare, easy to get around with them. Prophet, Messiah, Savior—those are tough ones.

26 October 2004
Austin Scaggs interview for Rolling Stone, Manhattan, Kansas

Source: Rolling Stone online edition, Q&A: Bob Dylan, posted 17 November 2004, 12:00am

Q&A: Bob Dylan

He's not sorry about the Victoria's Secret ad and not sure you should call Chronicles a book
AUSTIN SCAGGS

Bob Dylan has proved that his prose can be as elegant as his poetry. In his new memoir, Chronicles: Volume One, Dylan takes us on a circular ride through the most intense periods of his professional life, from Greenwich Village in 1961 to his retreat to Woodstock in 1968 and his regeneration in the late Eighties. It's less an autobiography than a historical document – a philosophical and personal analysis of life in America – and it will make your head spin. Ladies and gentlemen, Columbia recording artist Bob Dylan, checking in from a tour stop in Manhattan, Kansas.

AS: In Chronicles you write about the guitar technique that Lonnie Johnson taught you. Only a serious musician could comprehend the language you use. Why'd you choose to go into such great detail?

BD: I think it might be helpful for people to understand that my style has got a structure to it. Maybe I wrote that for people who play. Some people might pick it up. Why? Do you find it irrelevant in some way?

AS: On the contrary.

BD: I can't say whether a bus driver would find it interesting. To me it was important.

AS: You also describe watching La Dolce Vita "intently, thinking that I might not see it again." Do you have a photographic memory?

BD: I leave my mind open. I don't fill it up with a lot of things. I'm very careful as to what I get distracted by. With the book, what I try and do is put a feeling across. It's not the kind of book where it's a short life and a merry one. It's more abstract, drawn out over long periods of time. I worked the book, if you want to call it that, in patterns. I portray life as a game of chance. It works on a variety of levels, like some of the best songs do.

AS: You write about the night Woody Guthrie sent you to his house in Coney Island to get a box of his lyrics. What would have happened if you'd found them?

BD: I don't know if I would have been capable of doing much with them at all, really, though I suppose I would have. I don't think I would have made a record of that stuff, like the record that eventually came out [Billy Bragg and Wilco's Mermaid Avenue Vols. I and II]. Who'd really heard of me?

AS: You downplay a chunk of your career in Chronicles. Am I crazy to love Street Legal, Slow Train Coming and Infidels?

BD: Not at all. I can play those songs, but I probably can't listen to those records. I'll hear too many faults. I was just being swept along with the current when I was making those records. I don't think my talent was under control. But there's probably good stuff on all of them. Shelley said the point was to make unpremeditated art. I don't think those records fall into that category.

AS: Lyrically, does it get any better than "It's Alright, Ma"?

BD: It's hard to live up to that kind of thing. You can't try to top it – that's not the point. Lyrically you can't top it, no. I still can play that song, and I know what it can do. That song was written with a hunger that can break down stone walls. That was the motivation.

AS: Have you ever hung with Little Richard?

BD: Yeah!

AS: What was that like? Did you tell him that in your high school yearbook you wrote your ambition was to be in his band?

BD: He's a fantastic person. Very exciting guy to be around, as you can imagine. I don't think I told him about the yearbook – I don't think I needed to. He knows I've been a fan of his from way back.

AS: In the book you don't talk too much about playing harp. What harmonica performances of your own are you most proud of?

BD: A lot of them, really. I don't know if proud is the word... I play the harmonica like I play the piano. I don't really need to listen to what I'm playing. Of course, I can tell if I'm playing it wrong, when it's not going to appeal to anybody. It might on a technological level, but it won't on a gut level. If I put it into the beat, right on the one or the three, that's really basically all I have to do to get the point across. It will form a melodic structure on its own. Someone can always play it better, but you've heard a lot of great musicians where it sounds great at the time, but you forget about it two minutes later. I stay away from that showoff thing.

AS: This is how I see it: You fly to Italy, hang out with beautiful women, make a little scratch and next thing you're in a Victoria's Secret commercial.

BD: Yeah. Was I not supposed to do that?

AS: I enjoyed it.

BD: I wish I would have seen it. Maybe I'd have something to say about it. I don't see that kind of stuff. That's all for other people to see and make up what they will.

AS: Why do you leave your Oscar on your guitar amp?

BD: I think it's welded to it now. The guys who work with me backstage are so thrilled about seeing it that they keep putting it up there.

AS: What's the last song you'd like to hear before you die?

BD: How 'bout "Rock of Ages"?

AS: I heard you've written songs for a new album.

BD: I have a bunch of them. I do.

AS: When will you crank 'em out?

BD: Maybe in the beginning of the year. I'm not sure where and when.

AS: Can you tell me about them?

BD: No, I couldn't explain them to you. After you listen to them, call me back. It's difficult to paraphrase them or tell you what kind of style they're in. You won't be surprised.

AS: Why not?

BD: The musical structure you're used to hearing – it might be rearranged a bit. The songs themselves will speak to you.

AS: I saw you play at the Newport Folk Festival a couple of years ago. What was up with the wig and fake beard?

BD: Is that me who you saw up there?

19 November 2004
Ed Bradley interview for CBS "60 Minutes" special, Northampton, MA

Source: circulating tape and this link. Originally broadcast on December 5th, 2004

When we sat down with him, it was the first television interview Bob Dylan had done in nearly twenty years. And as you'll see, he had a lot to say about his life and about the songs that made him so famous.

BD: I don't know how I got to write those songs.
EB: What do you mean you don't know how?
BD: All those early songs were almost magically written. Ah… "Darkness at the break of noon, shadows even the silver spoon, a handmade blade, the child's balloon…" Well, try to sit down and write something like that.

EB: For as long as I have been here with "60 Minutes" I've wanted to interview Bob Dylan. Over his 43-year career, there is no musician alive who has been more influential. His distinctive twang and poetic lyrics have produced some of the most memorable songs ever written. In the '60s, his songs of protest and turmoil spoke to an entire generation.
While his life has been the subject of endless interpretation, he has been largely silent. Now at age 63, he's written a memoir called "Chronicles, Volume One."
I finally got to sit down with him in his first television interview in nearly 20 years. What you will see is pure Dylan – mysterious, allusive, fascinating – just like his music.

EB: I'd read somewhere that you wrote "Blowin' in the Wind" in ten minutes, is that right?
BD: Probably.
EB: Just like that?
BD: Yeah.
EB: Where did it come from?
BD: It just came. It came from… was like a… right out of that wellspring of creativity, I would think, you know.

That wellspring of creativity has sustained Bob Dylan for more than four decades, and produced 500 songs and more than 40 albums.

EB: Do you ever look back at the music that you've written and look back at it and say "Wow! That surprise me!"?
BD: I used to. I don't do that anymore. I don't know how I got to write those songs.
EB: What do you mean you don't know how?
BD: All those early songs were almost magically written. Ah… "Darkness at the break of noon, shadows even the silver spoon, a handmade blade, the child's balloon…"

This Dylan classic, "It's Alright, Ma," was written in 1964.

BD: Well, try to sit down and write something like that. There's a magic to that, and it's not Siegfried and Roy kind of magic, you know? It's a different kind of a penetrating magic. And, you know, I did it. I did it at one time.
EB: Do you think you can do it again today?
BD: Uh-uh.

EB: Does that disappoint you, or…?
BD: Well, you can't do something forever. I did it once, and I can do other things now. But, I can't do that.

Dylan has been writing music since he was a teenager in the remote town of Hibbing, Minnesota. The eldest of two sons of Abraham and Beatty Zimmerman.

EB: Did you have a good life, a good… happy childhood growing up?
BD: I really didn't consider myself happy or unhappy. I always knew that there was something out there that I needed to get to. And it wasn't where I was at that particular moment.
EB: It wasn't in Minnesota.
BD: No.

It was in New York City. As he writes in his book, he came alive when at age 19, he moved to Greenwich Village which at the time was the frenetic center of the '60s counterculture. Within months, he had signed a recording contract with Columbia Records.

EB: You refer to New York as the capital of the world. But when you told your father that, he thought that it was a joke. Did your parents approve of you being a singer-songwriter? Going to New York?
BD: No. They wouldn't have wanted that for me. But my parents never went anywhere. My father probably thought the capital of the world was wherever he was at the time. It couldn't possibly be anyplace else. Where he and his wife were in their own home, that, for them, was the capital of the world.
EB: What made you different? What pushed you out of there?
BD: Well, I listened to the radio a lot. I hung out in the record stores. And I slam-banged around on the guitar and played the piano and learned songs from a world which didn't exist around me.

He says that he knew even then that he was destined to become a music legend. "I was heading for the fantastic lights," he writes. "Destiny was looking right at me and nobody else."

EB: You use the word "destiny" over and over throughout the book. What does it mean to you?
BD: It's a feeling you have that you know something about yourself that nobody else does – the picture you have in your mind of what you're about will come true. It's kind of a thing you kind of have to keep to your own self, because it's a fragile feeling. And if you put it out there, somebody will kill it. So, it's best to keep that all inside.

When we ask him why he changed his name, he said, "that was destiny, too."

EB: So you didn't see yourself as Robert Zimmerman.
BD: For some reason, you know, I never did.
EB: Even before you started performing?
BD: Nah, even then. Some people get born, you know, with the wrong names, wrong parents. I mean, that happens.
EB: Tell me how you decided on Bob Dylan?
BD: You call yourself what you want to call yourself. This is the land of the free.

Bob Dylan created a world inspired by old folk music, with piercing and poetic lyrics, as in songs like "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall." Songs that reflected the tension and unrest of the civil rights and anti-war movements of the '60s.

It was an explosive mixture that turned Dylan, by age 25, into a cultural and political icon – playing to sold out concert halls around the world, and followed by people wherever he went. He was called the voice of his generation – and was actually referred to as a prophet, a messiah. Yet he saw himself simply as a musician:

BD: You feel like an impostor when you're... when someone thinks you're something and you're not.
EB: What was the image that people had of you? And what was the reality?
BD: The image of me was certainly not a songwriter or a singer. It was more like some kind of a threat to society in some kind of way.
EB: What was the toughest part for you personally?
BD: It was like being in an Edgar Allan Poe story. And you're just not that person everybody thinks you are, though they call you that all the time. 'You're the prophet.' 'You're the savior.' I never wanted to be a prophet or savior. Elvis maybe. I could easily see myself becoming him. But prophet? No.
EB: I know that, and I accept, you don't see yourself as the voice of that generation, but some of your songs did stop people cold. And they saw them as anthems, and they saw them as protest songs. It was important it their life, it sparked the movement. You may not have seen it that way, but that's the way it was for them. How do you reconcile those two things?
BD: My stuff were songs, you know? They weren't sermons. If you examine the songs, I don't believe you're gonna find anything in there that says that I'm a spokesman for anybody or anything really.
EB: But they saw it.
BD: Yeah, but they must not have heard the songs.
EB: It's ironic, you know, that the way that people viewed you was just the polar opposite of the way you viewed yourself.
BD: Ain't that something?

Dylan did almost anything to shatter the lofty image many people had of him. He writes that he intentionally made bad records; once poured whiskey over his head in public, and as a stunt, he went to Israel and made a point of having his picture taken at the Wailing Wall wearing a skullcap.

EB: When you went to Israel, you wrote that "the newspapers changed me overnight into a Zionist and this helped a lot." How did it help?
BD: Look, if the common perception of me out there in the public was that I was either a drunk, or I was a sicko, or a Zionist, or a Buddhist, or a Catholic, or a Mormon – all of this was better than "Archbishop of Anarchy".
EB: …and the Spokesman for the Generation…
BD: Yeah.
EB: …opposed everything.
BD: Mm-hmm.

He was especially opposed to the media, which he says was always trying to pin him down.

EB: Let me talk a little bit about your relationship with the media. You wrote, "The press, I figured, you lied to it." Why?
BD: I realized at the time that the press, the media, they're not the judge – God's the judge. The only person you have to think about lying twice to is either yourself or to God. The press isn't either of them. And I just figured they're irrelevant.

Bob Dylan tried to run away from all of that. In the mid '60s, he retreated with his wife and three young children to Woodstock, N.Y. But even there, he couldn't escape the legions of fans who descended on his home, begging for an audience with the legend himself.

EB: So the people would actually come to the house?
BD: Mm-hmm.
EB: And do what?
BD: They wanted discuss things with me, politics and philosophy and organic farming and things, you know.
EB: What did you know about organic farming?
BD: Nothing. Not a thing.
EB: What did you mean when you wrote that "the funny thing about fame is that nobody believes it's you"?
BD: People, they'll say, 'Are you who I think you are?' And you'll say, 'I don't know.' Then, they'll say, 'You're him.' And you'll say, 'OK,' you know, that 'yes' and then, the next thing they'll say, 'Well, no,' you know? Like 'Are you really him?' 'You're not him.' And, you know, that can go on and on.
EB: Do you go out to restaurants now?
BD: I don't like to eat in restaurants.
EB: Because people come up and say, 'Are you him?'
BD: That's always is gonna happen, yeah.
EB: Do you ever get used to it?
BD: No.

At his peak, fame was taking its toll on Bob Dylan. He was heading toward a divorce from his wife, Sara. And in concerts, he wore white makeup to mask himself. But his songs revealed the pain.

EB: You said, "My wife when she married me had no idea of what she was getting into."
BD: Well, she was with me back then, through thick and thin, you know? And it just wasn't the kind of life that she had ever envisioned for herself, any more the than the kind of life that I was living, that I had envisioned for mine.

By the mid-1980s, Dylan felt he was burned out and over the hill.

EB: And you also wrote that: "I'm a '60s troubadour, a folk-rock relic. A wordsmith from bygone days. I'm in the bottomless pit of cultural oblivion." Those were pretty harsh words.
BD: Oh, I'd seen all these titles written about me. You know.
EB: And you started to believe it?
BD: Well, I believed it, anyway, you know. I wasn't getting any thrill out of performing. I sorted it might be time to close it up, you know.
EB: You really thought about quitting, folding up the tent?
BD: I had thought I'd just put it away for a while. But then I started thinking, 'That's enough,' you know?

But within a few years, Dylan told us he'd recaptured his creative spark, and he went back on the road. Performing more than 100 concerts a year. In 1998 he won three Grammy awards. At age 63, Bob Dylan remains a voice as unique and powerful as any there has ever been in American music. His fellow musicians paid tribute to him when he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, joining him in a rousing rendition of his most famous song, "Like a Rolling Stone."

EB: As you probably know, Rolling Stone magazine just named your song, "Like A Rolling Stone," the number one song of all time. 12 your other songs are on their list of the Top 500. That must be good to have as part of your legacy.

BD: Oh, maybe this week. But you know, the list, they change names, and you know, quite frequently, really. I don't really pay much attention to that.

EB: But it's a pat on the back?

BD: This week it is. But who's to say how long that's gonna last?

EB: Well, it's lasted a long time for you. I mean you're still out here doing these songs, you know. You're still on tour.

BD: I do, but I don't take it for granted.

EB: Why do you still do it? Why are you still out here?

BD: Well, it goes back to that destiny thing. I made a bargain with it, you know, long time ago. And I'm holding up my end…

EB: What was your bargain?

BD: …to get where I am now.

EB: Should I ask who you made that bargain with?

BD: [laughs] With the chief commander.

EB: On this earth?

BD: [laughs] In this earth and in the world we can't see.

Bob Dylan has been nominated this year for the Nobel Prize in literature for his songwriting. His new book has been a bestseller for the past seven weeks. It was published by Simon & Schuster, which is owned by Viacom, the parent company of CBS. Dylan is planning to write two more volumes of his memoirs.

2005
Jeff Rosen interviews for No Direction Home

Source: Official DVD release

Excerpts of 10 hour's worth of interviews that Jeff Rosen bestowed on Martin Scorsese who selected them for the film.

I had ambitions to set out and find like an odyssey of going home somewhere. I set out to find this home that I'd left a while back and I couldn't remember exactly where it was, but I was on my way there. And encountering what I encountered on the way, was how I envisioned it all. I didn't really have any ambition at all. I was born very far from where I'm supposed to be and so I'm on my way home, you know.

Time... You can do a lot of things that seem to make time stand still but of course, you know, no one can do that.

Maybe when I was about 10, I started playing the guitar. I found a guitar in the house that my father bought, actually. I found something else in there. This kind of mystical overtones. There was a great big mahogany radio. It had a 78 turntable when you opened up the top. And I opened it up one day and there was a record on, a country record, this song called, 'Drifting Too Far From (The) Shore.' The sound of the record made me feel like I was somebody else and that, you know, I was maybe not even born to the right parents, or something.

It looked like any other town out of the '40s or '50s. Just some rural town. It was on the way to nowhere. And you probably couldn't find it on a map.

Maybe three blocks one way, and maybe three blocks the other way and that was like a main street where all the department stores were the drugstores, the… That's about it, you know.

What happens to a town after the livelihood is gone? ll right, it just sort of decays and blows away, doesn't it? That's the way it goes. Most of the land was either farmland or just completely scavenged by the mining companies. Very hot in the summertime; in the winter, it was just rightly cold, you know. All winter, it was just, I mean… We didn't have the clothes they have now, so I mean, you just wore two or three shirts at a time. Slept in your clothes.

The pit was on the outer limits of the town. That's where everybody worked. You couldn't be a rebel. It was so cold that you couldn't be bad. The weather equalizes everything very quickly. And nobody was gonna really pull a stickup. There really wasn't any philosophy, any idiom... any ideology to really go against.

My father and his brothers, they had an electrical store. 'Bout the first job I ever had was sweeping up the store and I was supposed to learn the discipline of hard work or something, you know, and the merits of employment.

Circuses came through. There were tent shows at the carny midways. And they had barkers.

It was just more rural back then. That's what people did. You could see guys in blackface. George Washington in blackface or Napoleon wearing blackface. Like, weird Shakespearean things. Stuff that didn't really make any sense at the time. And people had other jobs in the carny team. I saw somebody putting makeup on getting back from running the Ferris wheel once. And I thought that was pretty interesting. Guy's got, you know... He does two things, you know, or something like that.

We'd have to listen late at night for other stations to come in from other parts of the country, places that were far away. Fifty-thousand watt stations coming out through the atmosphere.

Johnnie Ray. He had some kind of strange incantation in his voice like he'd been voodooed and he cried, kind of, when he sang.

It was the sound that got to me. It wasn't who it was, or... It was the sound of it.

I began listening to the radio, I began to get bored being there. I thought about going to military school, but the military school that I envisioned myself going to I couldn't get in which was West Point. You know, I could always envision myself dying in some heroic battle somewhere. So I mean, maybe that era has gone.

First time I heard rock 'n' roll on the radio I felt it was pretty similar to the country music which I'd been listening to. I formed a couple of groups, growing up, and we rehearsed and played where we could play. There wasn't much opportunity to really break out of that area.

Nobody liked country music, or rock 'n' roll, or rhythm and blues. That kind of music wasn't what was happening up there. The music that was popular was 'How Much is that Doggie in the Window?' That wasn't our reality. Our reality was bleak to begin with. Our reality was fear that at any moment this black cloud would explode, where everybody would be dead. They would show you in school, how to dive for cover under your desk. We grew up with all that, so it created a sense of paranoia that, I don't know, was probably unforeseen.

I really can't say if the girls took a liking to me or not from playing around town. The first girl that ever took a liking to me, her name was Gloria Story. Gloria Story, I mean, that was her real name. Second girlfriend was named Echo. Now, that's pretty strange. I've never met anybody named Echo. I serenaded her underneath the ladder that went up to her window. And both these girls, by the way, brought out the poet in me.

James Dean, Brando, 'The Wild One.' It didn't kill all the entire past. It's not like they just appeared and there's a new scene happening now. Time, you know, time kind of obliterated the past that was around when I was growing up. Just time and progress, really.

Got out of high school and left the very next day. I'd gone as far as I could in my particular environment. I was gonna try to join some other band.

There was only one guy that ever came out of there, and he was out of Fargo. And I'd actually gone there to play with him. He had a regional hit called 'Suzie Baby.' At that point, I was just playing triplets on the piano. I didn't have my own piano, so they weren't gonna buy a piano. But I did play some shows with them. Nothing much came of it.

I was a musical expeditionary. I had no past, really, to speak of, nothing to go back to, nobody to lean on. I came down to Minneapolis. I didn't go to classes. I was enrolled but I didn't go to classes. I just didn't feel like it. We were singing and playing all night. Sleeping most of, you know, the morning. I didn't really have any time for studying.

I fell into that atmosphere of everything Kerouac was saying about the world being completely mad. And the only people for him that were interesting were the mad people, the mad ones, the ones who were, you know, mad to live and mad to talk, mad to be saved, desirous of everything at the same time the ones who never yawn, all those mad ones. And I felt like I fit right into that bunch.

I had heard folk music before leaving the Iron Range. I'd heard John Jacob Niles somewhere, strangely enough. I don't know, folk music was delivering me something, you know which was the way I always felt about life, you know, and people and, you know, institutions, and ideology and it was just, you know, uncovering it all.

[on Odetta:] She played that upstroke-downstroke kind of rhythm where you don't need the drum. It's kind of like a Tex-Mex rhythm. I heard that rhythm and I thought, well, I could use that rhythm for all kinds of things.

I don't even remember, you know, buying any records. If went into the booth. I had a very agile mind. I could learn a song by maybe hearing it once or twice.

I traded my electric equipment for an acoustic guitar. Started playing almost immediately.

Why it became that particular name, I really can't say.

The name just popped into my head one day. But it didn't really happen any of the ways that I've read about it. I mean, I just don't feel like I had had a past and, you know, I couldn't relate to anything other than what I was doing at the present time and I don't, you know, didn't matter to me what I said, you know. It still doesn't, really.

Right then and there I had no goal except learning all the songs I could.

I'd forgotten all about the Iron Range, where I grew up. I'd forgotten about it all. It didn't even enter my mind.

Woody Guthrie, he had a particular sound. And besides that, he said something to go along with his sound. That was highly unusual, to my ears.

He was a radical, his songs had a radical slant. I thought, "ooh," you know, like... "That's what I want to sing. I want to sing that."

I couldn't believe that I'd never heard of this man. You could listen to his songs, and actually learn how to live. One guy said, "You're singing a Woody Guthrie song." He gave me a book that he wrote, called Bound for Glory, and I read it. I identified with that Bound for Glory book more than I even did with On the Road.

These songs sounded archaic to most people. I don't know why they didn't sound archaic to me. They sounded like these songs were happening at the moment, to me.

I was just learning songs and playing them and trying to find out who Woody Guthrie was. Woody's records were almost impossible to find. They didn't have any of his records in the record stores. Paul was a folk music scholar. He didn't play at all. He had a whole lot of records which probably couldn't be found anywhere else in the Midwest except at Paul's house, and he lived there with somebody else. You know, I was listening to records at his house once. I knew they'd be away for the weekend so I went over there and helped myself to a bunch of old records.

Those records were extremely hard to find. They were like hen's teeth. If you came across them, somebody like myself who was a musical expeditionary, you know, you just would have to immerse yourself in them.

I wanted to get to the East Coast to visit Woody Guthrie. When I first heard him, I didn't know if he was dead or alive, really. But then I discovered that he was definitely alive and he was in a hospital with some kind of ailment. So I thought it'd be a nice gesture to go visit him.

Hitchhiking back then was very acceptable. I had a suitcase and a guitar. And I don't know, maybe I had $ 10 in my pocket.

Joan Baez, she was staggering. Kind of like hit my world from a different angle. She was completely about folk music. She was an excellent, really excellent guitar player. When I saw her on television, I thought, you know, like. "That girl looks like she might need a singing partner." I'd say she was someplace in the back of my mind, you know.

Got out of the car on George Washington Bridge. Took the subway down to the Village. Went to the Café Wha? I looked out at the crowd. I most likely asked from the stage, "Does anybody know where a couple of people could stay tonight?"

I was ready for New York. I started playing immediately and I realized right away that I'd come to the right place, because there were many places to play. I played with Freddy Neil. He was a big star down there. I did that until about 8.00, he would give me what he could. The place was usually packed from 12.00 to 8.00 with tourists and lunch-hour secretaries. And then at 8:00 all the rest of the houses would open where you'd pass the basket and play.

There'd be a carny on the street bringing people down. "You know, you gotta come down here and see this." "There's so much weirdness you've never seen in your life." Just always, there'd be people coming and going.

Sawdust on the floor, tourist traps like, a poet, somebody singing a song with a parrot on a shoulder. Tiny Tim-type characters. No one who had any recordings out ever played them. You only played those if you had to.

You would have to make an impression on somebody. There were many, many singers who were good, but they couldn't focus their attention on anybody. They couldn't really get inside somebody's head. You gotta be able to pin somebody down.

So I found out where Woody Guthrie was and I took a bus out to Morristown. Basically, I think it was an insane asylum. I thought about it later, it was a sad thing, they put him in a mental home, because he just had the jitters. He asked for certain songs and I'd play them. I was young and impressionable and I think I must have been shocked in some kind of way to find him where I found him.

Brother John Sellers, he was the master of ceremonies at Gerde's Folk City. And there was one night called Hootenanny Night where anybody could play.

We just watched and we picked out the performers that were doing it for real and tried to pick up what the essence of what they were doing was.

Dave Van Ronk, he had that big gruff thing, but he had this very sweet, sensitive thing going on at the same time. He was a dichotomy of a performer. He could take the essence of the song and only go after that, not go after the frills.

Liam was profound. Besides all of his rebel songs and his acting career, he would have these incredible sayings. Like once he said to me after about 30 pints of Guinness he was saying, "Remember, Bob, no fear, no envy, no meanness." I said, "Right."

What I heard in the Clancy Brothers was rousing, rebel songs. Napoleonic in scope. And they were just these Musketeer-type characters. And then on the other level you had the romantic ballads that would just slay you right in your tracks, the sweetness of Tommy Makem and Liam. It was just like, take a sword, cut off your head, and then weep. That's sort of what they were about.

All the great performers that I'd seen who I wanted to be like were those kind of performers they all had one thing in common. It was in their eyes. Now, there was something in their eyes that would say: "I know something you don't know," and I wanted to be that kind of performer.

That's when I went to the crossroads and made a big deal. You know, like... One night and then went back to Minneapolis and it was like, "Hey, where's this guy been?" "You've been to the crossroads."

I wasn't seeing Woody Guthrie anymore. I was still singing a lot of his songs, but I'd replaced them with a lot of the other songs, all of a sudden. I kind of went through Woody Guthrie in a kind of way. But I didn't really want to go through Woody Guthrie. I didn't want to feel that it was something just negligible.

But I really cared, I really wanted to portray my gratitude in some kind of way. But I knew that I was not gonna be going back to Greystone anymore. I felt like I had to write that song. I did not consider myself a songwriter at all. But I needed to write that and I needed to sing it. So that's why I needed to write it. 'Cause it hadn't been written and that's what I needed to say, I needed to say that.

The owner of the place finally gave me a two-week run. He had me open for John Lee Hooker.

I didn't really feel like I was making a step forward anywhere. Things were taking its natural course.

I didn't start to have any ambition until I started working more and more. I wondered how people recorded. I wondered how you get to do that. There were always talent scouts in the clubs. No one had ever spoken to me directly about making any records so I just assumed they'd passed on me.

That was the sound of the day. People would want to hear a beautiful voice sing a melodic song.

The folksinging scene was either commercial folksinging for like a college kind of crowd: Harry Belafonte, Brothers Four... that commercial... They had records that were on the pop charts. And then there was the other side, which was intellectual. People would just sit there, you know, I think and playing in the environment that I was playing in was neither of those.

Yeah, he was kind of like a Damon Runyon character. Is that the word? One of these old Broadway guys, buzz-cut haircut. He was very special in a lot of ways. He was very enthusiastic. He had great love of music, and it just radiated out of him. When I met him, a review had just come out of The New York Times of the set I'd played at Gerde's the previous night. Hammond had seen the article and asked me right then and there whether I wanted to record for Columbia Records. I thought it was almost unreal. I mean, no one would think that this kind of folk music would be recorded on Columbia Records.

They recorded the popular hits of the day of people usually with beautiful tones of voices and great arrangements. I don't know what they thought of my stuff up there.

I didn't tell anybody for a bit because I almost wasn't sure it was happening myself. I don't think I really told anybody until I actually went through with the sessions.

I have a habit I picked up someplace along the way. Whatever works for me, not to give that away so easily, you know.

When I did make that first record, I used songs which I just knew but I hadn't really performed them a lot. I wanted just to record stuff that was off the top of my head and see what would happen.

The House of the Rising Sun is on that record. I'd never done that song before, but I heard it every night 'cause Van Ronk would do it. So I thought he was really on to something with the song, so I just recorded it.

The mystery of being in a recording studio did something to me and those are the songs that came out.

When I got the disk, I played it and I was highly disturbed. I just wanted to cross this record out and make another record immediately. I thought I'd recorded the wrong songs and I'd already written a few of my own, that I thought maybe I should have stuck on there. I was way past that record. Or part of me was just saying that I didn't want to record that record anyway, that I just did it I didn't want to give away anything that was really dear to me or something.

I wrote them anywhere I was. You could write them on the subway or in a café or wherever. You could write them talking to somebody else and be scribbling down a song.

I didn't really know if that song was good or bad or... It felt right. But I didn't really know that it had any kind of anthemic quality or anything.

I wrote the songs to perform the songs. And I needed to sing, like, in that language. Which is a language that I hadn't heard before.

Everything was meshed up at that time. Everything was like just all in like a blender. Everyone was interested in whatever was going on. I stayed at a lot of people's houses which had poetry books and poetry volumes and I'd read what I found... I found Verlaine poems or Rimbaud, you know, "Drunken Boat," Illuminations.

The folk idiom is so widespread that you could take any part of it and rework a song. I never thought I was breaking through anything. I was just working with an existing form that was there. I was definitely not inventing anything that hadn't been tried before, some part of the picture, you know.

On my second album, all of a sudden people started to take notice that never noticed before. Grossman came into the picture around there. He was kind of like a Col. Tom Parker figure... all immaculately dressed, every time you see him. You could smell him coming.

Pete Seeger, very tall, like a towering figure. I didn't realize he was a communist. I really wasn't sure even what a communist was. If he was, it wouldn't have mattered to me anyway. I really didn't think about people in those terms.

To be on the side of people who are struggling for something doesn't necessarily mean you are being political.

Everyone was there who played folk music. Old and new. Sort of younger people, too.

I was the only singer there probably singing the songs that he'd written. And most likely, two years earlier to that, I wouldn't have been able to get into Newport.

I wrote a lot of songs in a quick amount of time. I could do that then, because the process was new to me. I felt like I'd discovered something no one else had ever discovered and I was in a sort of an arena artistically that no one else had ever been in before ever, although I might have been wrong about that.

In taking all the elements that I've ever known to make wide-sweeping statements which conveyed a feeling that was in the general essence of the spirit of the times. I think I managed to do that. I thought that I needed to press on and get as far into it as I could.

I was up close when King was giving that speech. To this day it still affects me in a profound way.

I looked out the podium, I looked out at the crowd and I remember thinking to myself. "Man, I've never seen such a large crowd."

You know, they were trying to build me up as a topical songwriter. I was never a topical songwriter to begin with. For whatever reason they were doing it was reasons not, really... That didn't really apply to me.

I was like an outsider, anyway. I'd come to town as an outsider, and still, in a lot of ways I was still more outside than I ever was, really. They were trying to make me an insider to some kind of trip they were on. I don't think so.

Johnny Cash was more like a religious figure to me. And there he was at Newport, you know, standing side by side. Meeting him was the high thrill of a lifetime. And, just the fact that he had sung one of my songs was just unthinkable.

An artist has got to be careful never really to arrive at a place where he thinks he's "at" somewhere. You always have to realize that you're constantly in the state of becoming, you know? And, as long as you can stay in that realm, you'll sort of be all right. I can't self-analyze my own work, and I wasn't going to cater to the crowd, because I knew certain people would like it, and certain people didn't like it. I had gotten in the door when no one was looking. I was in there now, and there was nothing anybody from then on, could ever do about it.

I felt it all over America. You know, wherever in America you went, you felt that things were happening in an Olympian type of way in which children were beyond their parents' command.

The ideal performances of the songs would then come on stages throughout the world. Very few could be found on any of my records. Every second, every... You know... Reaching the audience is what it's all about.

Words have their own meaning, or they have different meanings and words change their meaning. Words that meant something 10 years ago don't mean that now. They mean something else.

Subterranean Homesick Blues. I mean... I don't think I would have wanted to do it all by myself. I thought I'd get more power out of it, you know, with a small group in back of me. It was electric, but doesn't necessarily mean that it's modernized just because it's electric, you know? It was, you know, like a... Country music was electric, too.

They didn't light places, they didn't have to stop filming. If you ran, they ran. If you went in a room, they went into the room. And you know, at a certain point, you just became oblivious to that.

You know, it was probably a stupid thing to do not letting her play, but you can't be wise and in love at the same time, so... I hope she'd see the light sooner or later on that.

A lot of my songs, they were becoming hits for other people. There was, the Byrds had a big hit. Some group called the Turtles had some hit. Sonny and Cher had a hit with a song of mine. People were sort of writing a jingly-jangly kind of song... which seemed to have something to do with me, I, you know, like, "okay..." You know, 'I Got You, Babe', is some kind of take-off of me, something I wrote. Well, I don't know what it was a take-off on that I wrote, you know? I didn't really like that sound... or folk-rock, whatever that was, I didn't feel that had anything to do with me. It got me thinking about the Billboard charts and the songs which become popular, which I hadn't thought of that before.

Mike Bloomfield said he had heard my first record and said he wanted to show me how the blues were played and I didn't feel much competitive. I didn't feel much competitive with him, he could outplay anybody, even at that at that point, you know. But when it was time to bring in a guitar player on my record I couldn't think of anybody but him. I mean, he just was the best guitar player I ever heard.

Like a Rolling Stone definitely broke through somewhere. I didn't feel like radio had ever played a song like that before. I know I'd never heard a song like that before. So... And everything I'd done up to that point had led up to writing a song like that, just effortlessly.

I've never been that kind of performer that wants to be one of them, you know, like one of the crowd. I don't try to endear myself that way.

Now, do performers look for applause?

Yeah, yes and no. It really depends what kind of performer you are. Like the story of Billie Holiday, you know when she sang Strange Fruit for the first time, nobody applauded. You know, you could leave somebody kind of in a spellbound way and... I don't know. There's a lot of things going on when there's a performer on stage and there's an audience out there.

I was thinking that somebody was shouting, "Are you with us? Are you with us?" And, you know, I don't know what that, you know, like... What was that supposed to mean? I had no idea why they were booing. I don't think anybody was there having a negative response to those songs, though. I mean, whatever it was about, it wasn't about anything that they were hearing.

I'd heard a rumor that Pete was going to cut the cable. And I heard it later, you know. And it was like, it didn't make sense to me. Like, Pete Seeger, like someone whose music I cherish, you know. Like someone who I highly respect is going to cut the cable. It was like, "Oh, God." It was like... It was like a dagger, you know, it was... Just the thought of it was, you know... made me go out and get drunk.

The booing didn't really, you know... I had a perspective on the booing, because you got to realize you can kill somebody with kindness, too.

Things had gotten out of hand. You know, it fell into the... You know, you ask me why I write surreal songs or whatever, I mean that type of activity is surreal. I had no answers to any of those questions any more than any other performer did, really. But, you know, that didn't stop the press or people or whoever they were from asking these questions. They, for some reason the press thought that performers had the answers to all these problems in the society and you know, like what can... What can you say to something like that? I mean, it's just kind of absurd.

At a certain point, people seemed to have a distorted, warped view of me for some reason, and those people were usually outside of the musical community. "The spokesman of the generation." "The conscience of a..." This, and that and the other. That I could not relate to. I just couldn't relate to it. As long as I could continue doing what it is that I loved to do I didn't care what kinds of labels were put on me or how I was perceived in the press, because I was playing to people every night.

The guys that were with me on that tour, which later became The Band, you know, we were all in it together. We were putting our heads in the lion's mouth and... I had to admire them for sticking it out with me. Just for doing it, in my book, they were, you know, gallant knights for even, you know, standing behind me.

These stages were created for people who stood on stage and recited Shakespearean plays. They weren't made for this kind of music we were playing. The sound was pretty archaic, really. The sound really hadn't been perfected. The sound quality hadn't been perfected many years after that.

And I'd just about had it, though. I'd had it with the with the whole scene. And I was... Whether I knew it or didn't know it, I was looking to just quit for a while.

What about the scene? What had you had it with? What about the scene were you sick of?

Well, you know, people like you. People like, you know, like, just, you know, like just being pressed and hammered and, you know, expected to answer questions. You know... What can I... You know, like... It was enough to make anybody sick, really.

March 2006
Bob Dylan's promotional spot for XM's Theme Time Radio Hour

source: official XM Radio website, available for online listening since mid-April 2006

The spot includes music by The Byrds, Jimi Hendrix, Duke Ellington, Stevie Wonder, Peter, Paul & Mary, Johnny Cash, The Rolling Stones, Coldplay and Bob Dylan (Blowin' in the Wind, The Times They Are A-Changin', Rainy Day Women #12&35, All Along The Watchtower, I'll Be Your Baby Tonight – with overdubbed harmonica solo/outro!), and spoken word by Paul McCartney, Coldplay, and more.

Bob Dylan spoken parts:

A, B – XM radio speakers

A: From early on his career, we knew that something very different and something very important was beginning to happen.

B: He saw was happening all around him and everybody else saw what was happening all around them, but he voiced that for the first time.

BD: A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall means something is gonna happen. (1965)

A: He didn't seek a lot of this attention he received, so what was Bob Dylan's reaction to all this attention he was getting?

BD: I ain't got no answers to any of those questions any more than any other performer did, really. For some reason the press thought that performers had all answers to all these problems in the society and it's kinda absurd.

BD: Join me, Bob Dylan, for Theme Time Radio Hour. The finest hour in American broadcasting. The hour of themes, dreams, and schemes. We make 'em rules and we break 'em rules. Join us and see how we do that. Right here, on XM.

August 2006
Jonathan Lethem interview for Rolling Stone

Source: Internet, Posted Aug 21, 2006 12:45 PM

THE GENIUS OF BOB DYLAN
The legend comes to grips with his iconic status; an intimate conversation prior to the release of the new ''Modern Times''
JONATHAN LETHEM

"I don't really have a herd of astrologers telling me what's going to happen. I just make one move after the other, this leads to that." Is the voice familiar? I'm sitting in a Santa Monica seaside hotel suite, ignoring a tray of sliced pineapple and sugar-dusty cookies, while Bob Dylan sits across from my tape recorder, giving his best to my questions. The man before me is fitful in his chair, not impatient, but keenly alive to the moment, and ready on a dime to make me laugh and to laugh himself. The expressions on Dylan's face, in person, seem to compress and encompass versions of his persona across time, a sixty-five-year-old with a nineteen-year-old cavorting somewhere inside. Above all, though, it is the tones of his speaking voice that seem to kaleidoscope through time: here the yelp of the folk pup or the sarcastic rimshot timing of the hounded hipster-idol, there the beguilement of the Seventies sex symbol, then again—and always—the gravel of the elder statesman, that antediluvian bluesman's voice the young aspirant so legendarily invoked at the very outset of his work and then ever so gradually aged into.

It's that voice, the voice of a rogue ageless in decrepitude, that grounds the paradox of the achievement of Modern Times, his thirty-first studio album. Are these our "modern times," or some ancient, silent-movie dream, a fugue in black-and-white? Modern Times, like Love and Theft and Time Out of Mind before it, seems to survey a broken world through the prism of a heart that's worn and worldly, yet decidedly unbroken itself. "I been sitting down studying the art of love/I think it will fit me like a glove," he states in "Thunder on the Mountain," the opening song, a rollicking blues you've heard a million times before and yet which magically seems to announce yet another "new" Dylan. "I feel like my soul is beginning to expand," the song declares. "Look into my heart and you will sort of understand."

What we do understand, if we're listening, is that we're three albums into a Dylan renaissance that's sounding more and more like a period to put beside any in his work. If, beginning with Bringing It All Back Home, Dylan garbed his amphetamine visions in the gloriously grungy clothes of the electric blues and early rock & roll, the musical glories of these three records are grounded in a knowledge of the blues built from the inside out—a knowledge that includes the fact that the early blues and its players were stranger than any purist would have you know, hardly restricting themselves to twelve-bar laments but featuring narrative recitations, spirituals, X-rated ditties, popular ballads and more. Dylan offers us nourishment from the root cellar of American cultural life. For an amnesiac society, that's arguably as mind-expanding an offering as anything in his Sixties work. And with each succeeding record, Dylan's convergence with his muses grows more effortlessly natural.

How does he summon such an eternal authority? "I'd make this record no matter what was going on in the world," Dylan tells me. "I wrote these songs in not a meditative state at all, but more like in a trancelike, hypnotic state. This is how I feel? Why do I feel like that? And who's the me that feels this way? I couldn't tell you that, either. But I know that those songs are just in my genes and I couldn't stop them comin' out." This isn't to say Modern Times, or Dylan, seems oblivious to the present moment. The record is littered—or should I say baited?—with glinting references to world events like 9/11 and Hurricane Katrina, though anyone seeking a moral, to paraphrase Mark Twain, should be shot. And, as if to startle the contemporary listener out of any delusion that Dylan's musical drift into pre-rock forms—blues, ragtime, rockabilly—is the mark of a nostalgist, "Thunder on the Mountain" also name-checks a certain contemporary singer: "I was thinking 'bout Alicia Keys, I couldn't keep from crying/While she was born in Hell's Kitchen, I was livin' down the line." When I ask Dylan what Keys did "to get into your pantheon," he only chuckles at my precious question. "I remember seeing her on the Grammys. I think I was on the show with her, I didn't meet her or anything. But I said to myself, 'There's nothing about that girl I don't like.' "

Rather than analyzing lyrics, Dylan prefers to linger over the songs as artifacts of music and describes the process of their making. As in other instances, stretching back to 1974's Planet Waves, 1978's Street Legal and 2001's Love and Theft, the singer and performer known for his love-hate affair with the recording studio—"I don't like to make records," he tells me simply. "I do it reluctantly"—has cut his new album with his touring band. And Dylan himself is the record's producer, credited under the nom-de-studio Jack Frost. "I didn't feel like I wanted to be overproduced any more," he tells me. "I felt like I've always produced my own records anyway, except I just had someone there in the way. I feel like nobody's gonna know how I should sound except me anyway, nobody knows what they want out of players except me, nobody can tell a player what he's doing wrong, nobody can find a player who can play but he's not playing, like I can. I can do that in my sleep."

As ever, Dylan is circling, defining what he is first by what he isn't, by what he doesn't want, doesn't like, doesn't need, locating meaning by a process of elimination. This rhetorical strategy goes back at least as far as "It Ain't Me, Babe" and "All I Really Want to Do" ("I ain't looking to compete with you," etc.), and it still has plenty of real juice in it. When Dylan arrives at a positive assertion out of the wilderness of so much doubt, it takes on the force of a jubilant boast. "This is the best band I've ever been in, I've ever had, man for man. When you play with guys a hundred times a year, you know what you can and can't do, what they're good at, whether you want 'em there. It takes a long time to find a band of individual players. Most bands are gangs. Whether it's a metal group or pop rock, whatever, you get that gang mentality. But for those of us who went back further, gangs were the mob. The gang was not what anybody aspired to. On this record I didn't have anybody to teach. I got guys now in my band, they can whip up anything, they surprise even me." Dylan's cadences take on the quality of an impromptu recitation, replete with internal rhyme schemes, such that when I later transcribe this tape I'll find myself tempted to set the words on the page in the form of a lyric. "I knew this time it wouldn't be futile writing something I really love and thought dearly of, and then gettin' in the studio and having it be beaten up and whacked around and come out with some kind of incoherent thing which didn't have any resonance. With that, I was awake. I felt freed up to do just about anything I pleased."

But getting the band of his dreams into the studio was only half the battle. "The records I used to listen to and still love, you can't make a record that sounds that way," he explains. It is as if having taken his new material down to the crossroads of the recording studio Dylan isn't wholly sure the deal struck with the devil there was worth it. "Brian Wilson, he made all his records with four tracks, but you couldn't make his records if you had a hundred tracks today. We all like records that are played on record players, but let's face it, those days are gon-n-n-e. You do the best you can, you fight that technology in all kinds of ways, but I don't know anybody who's made a record that sounds decent in the past twenty years, really. You listen to these modern records, they're atrocious, they have sound all over them. There's no definition of nothing, no vocal, no nothing, just like—static. Even these songs probably sounded ten times better in the studio when we recorded 'em. CDs are small. There's no stature to it. I remember when that Napster guy came up across, it was like, 'Everybody's gettin' music for free.' I was like, 'Well, why not? It ain't worth nothing anyway.' ". . .

Hearing the word "napster" come from Bob Dylan's mouth, I venture a question about bootleg recordings. In my own wishful thinking, The Bootleg Series, a sequence of superb archival retrospectives, sanctioned by Dylan and released by Columbia, represents a kind of unspoken consent to the tradition of pirate scholarship—an acknowledgment that Dylan's outtakes, alternate takes, rejected album tracks and live performances are themselves a towering body of work that faithful listeners deserve to hear. As Michael Gray says in The Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, the first three-disc release of outtakes "could, of itself, establish Dylan's place as the pre-eminent songwriter and performer of the age and as one of the great artists of the twentieth century." On Love and Theft's "Sugar Baby," the line "Some of these bootleggers, they make pretty good stuff" was taken by some as a shout-out to this viewpoint. Today, at least, that line seems to have had only moonshine whiskey as its subject. "I still don't like bootleg records. There was a period of time when people were just bootlegging anything on me, because there was nobody ever in charge of the recording sessions. All my stuff was being bootlegged high and low, far and wide. They were never intended to be released, but everybody was buying them. So my record company said, 'Well, everybody else is buying these records, we might as well put them out.' " But Dylan can't possibly be sorry that the world has had the benefit of hearing, for instance, "Blind Willie McTell"—an outtake from 1983's Infidels that has subsequently risen as high in most people's Dylan pantheon as a song can rise, and that he himself has played live since. Can he? "I started playing it live because I heard the Band doing it. Most likely it was a demo, probably showing the musicians how it should go. It was never developed fully, I never got around to completing it. There wouldn't have been any other reason for leaving it off the record. It's like taking a painting by Manet or Picasso—goin' to his house and lookin' at a half-finished painting and grabbing it and selling it to people who are 'Picasso fans.' The only fans I know I have are the people who I'm looking at when I play, night after night."

Dylan and his favorite-band-ever are just a few days from undertaking another tour, one that will be well under way by the time Modern Times is released in late August. I've always wanted to ask: When a song suddenly appears on a given evening's set list, retrieved from among the hundreds in his back catalog, is it because Dylan's been listening to his old records? "I don't listen to any of my records. When you're inside of it, all you're listening to is a replica. I don't know why somebody would look at the movies they make—you don't read your books, do you?" Point taken. He expands on the explanation he offered for "Blind Willie McTell": "Strangely enough, sometimes we'll hear a cover of a song and figure we can do it just as well. If somebody else thought so highly of it, why don't I? Some of these arrangements I just take. The Dead did a lot of my songs, and we'd just take the whole arrangement, because they did it better than me. Jerry Garcia could hear the song in all my bad recordings, the song that was buried there. So if I want to sing something different, I just bring out one of them Dead records and see which one I wanna do. I never do that with my records." Speaking of which: "I've heard it said, you've probably heard it said, that all the arrangements change night after night. Well, that's a bunch of bullshit, they don't know what they're talkin' about. The arrangements don't change night after night. The rhythmic structures are different, that's all. You can't change the arrangement night after night—it's impossible."

Dylan points out that whether a song comes across for a given listener on a given night depends on where exactly they're sitting. "I can't stand to play arenas, but I do play 'em. But I know that's not where music's supposed to be. It's not meant to be heard in football stadiums, it's not 'Hey, how are you doin' tonight, Cleveland?' Nobody gives a shit how you're doin' tonight in Cleveland." He grins and rolls his eyes, to let me know he knows he's teasing at Spinal Tap heresy. Then he plunges deeper. "They say, 'Dylan never talks'. What the hell is there to say? That's not the reason an artist is in front of people." The words seem brash, but his tone is nearly pleading. "An artist has come for a different purpose. Maybe a self-help group—maybe a Dr. Phil—would say, 'How you doin'?' I don't want to get harsh and say I don't care. You do care, you care in a big way, otherwise you wouldn't be there. But it's a different kind of connection. It's not a light thing." He considers further. "It's alive every night, or it feels alive every night." Pause. "It becomes risky. I mean, you risk your life to play music, if you're doing it in the right way." I ask about the minor-league baseball* stadiums he's playing in the new tour's first swing: Do they provide the sound he's looking for? "Not really, not in the open air. The best sound you can get is an intimate club room, where you've got four walls and the sound just bounces. That's the way this music is meant to be heard." Then

Dylan turns comedian again, the guy newly familiar to listeners of his XM satellite radio show, whose casual verbal riffs culminate in vaudeville one-liners. "I wouldn't want to play a really small room, like ten people. Unless it was, you know, $50,000 a ticket or something."

Let me take a moment and reintroduce myself, your interviewer and guide here. I'm a forty-two-year-old moonlighting novelist, and a lifelong Dylan fan, but one who, it must be emphasized, doesn't remember the Sixties. I'm no longer a young man, but I am young for the job I'm doing here. My parents were Dylan fans, and my first taste of his music came through their LPs—I settled on Nashville Skyline, because it looked friendly. The first Dylan record I was able to respond to as new—to witness its arrival in stores and reception in magazines, and therefore to make my own—was 1979's Slow Train Coming. As a fan in my early twenties, I digested Dylan's catalog to that point and concluded that its panoply of styles and stances was itself the truest measure of his genius—call us the Biograph generation, if you like. In other words, the struggle to capture Dylan and his art like smoke in one particular bottle or another seemed laughable to me, a mistaken skirmish fought before it had become clear that mercurial responsiveness—anchored only by the existential commitment to the act of connection in the present moment—was the gift of freedom his songs had promised all along. To deny it to the man himself would be absurd.

By the time I required anything of Bob Dylan, it was the mid-Eighties, and I merely required him to be good. Which, in the mid-Eighties, Dylan kind of wasn't. I recall taking home Empire Burlesque and struggling to discern songwriting greatness under the glittery murk of Arthur Baker's production, a struggle I lost. The first time I saw Dylan in concert, it was, yes, in a football stadium in Oakland, with the Grateful Dead. By the time of 1988's Down in the Groove, the album's worst song might have seemed to describe my plight as fan: I was in love with the ugliest girl in the world.

Nevertheless, Eighties Dylan was my Dylan, and I bore down hard on what was there. Contrary to what you may have heard (in Chronicles, Volume One, among other detractors), there was water in that desert. From scattered tracks like "Rank Strangers to Me," "The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar" and "Brownsville Girl," to cassette-tape miracles like "Lord Protect My Child" and "Foot of Pride" (both later to surface on The Bootleg Series), to a version of "San Francisco Bay Blues" I was lucky enough to catch live in Berkeley, to a blistering take on Sonny Boy Williamson's "Don't Start Me to Talkin' " on Late Night With David Letterman, the irony is not only that "bad" Dylan was often astonishingly good. It is that his then-seemingly-rudderless exploration of roots-music sources can now be seen to point unerringly to the triumphs to come—I mean the triumphs of now. Not that Dylan himself would care to retrace those steps. When I gushed about the Sonny Boy Williamson moment on Letterman, he gaped, plainly amazed, and said, "I played that?"

So, the drama of my projected relationship to my hero, thin as it may seem to those steeped in the Sixties or Seventies listeners' sense of multiple betrayals—he's gone Electric! Country-Domestic-Unavailable! Christian!—was the one Dylan described to David Gates of Newsweek in 1997, and in the "Oh Mercy" chapter of his memoir, Chronicles—the relocation and repossession of his voice and of his will to compose and perform, as enacted gradually through the Nineties. Early in that decade it might have seemed he'd quit, or at least taken refuge or solace in the solo acoustic folk records he'd begun making in his garage: Good As I Been to You and World Gone Wrong. Live shows in what had become "The Never Ending Tour" were stronger and stronger in those years, but new songs were scarce. Then came Time Out of Mind, an album as cohesive—and ample—as any he'd ever recorded. When that was followed by Love and Theft, and then Chronicles, a reasonable Dylan fan might conclude he was living in the best of all possible worlds. In fact, with the satellite radio show beaming into our homes—Dylan's promised to do fifty of the things!—Dylan can be said to have delivered more of his voice and his heart to his audience in the past decade than ever before, and more than anyone might have reasonably dared to hope. "Well, isn't that funny," Dylan snorts when I mention "the myth of inaccessibility." "I've just seen that Wenner Books published a book of interviews with me that's that big." He stretches out his hands to show me. "What happened to this inaccessibility? Isn't there a dichotomy there?

Yet it's awfully easy, taking the role of Dylan's interviewer, to feel oneself playing surrogate for an audience that has never quit holding its hero to an impossible standard: The more he offers, the more we want. The greatest artist of my lifetime has given me anything I could ever have thought to ask, and yet here I sit, somehow brokering between him and the expectations neither of us can pretend don't exist. "If I've got any kind of attitude about me—or about what I do, what I perform, what I sing, on any level, my attitude is, compare it to somebody else! Don't compare it to me. Are you going to compare Neil Young to Neil Young? Compare it to somebody else, compare it to Beck—which I like—or whoever else is on his level. This record should be compared to the artists who are working on the same ground. I'll take it any way it comes, but compare it to that. That's what everybody's record should be, if they're really serious about what they're doing. Let's face it, you're either serious about what you're doing or you're not serious about what you're doing. And you can't mix the two. And life is short."

I can't help but wonder if he's lately been reconditioned by the success of the Martin Scorsese No Direction Home documentary, to feel again the vivid discomfort of his unwanted savior's role. "You know, everybody makes a big deal about the Sixties. The Sixties, it's like the Civil War days. But, I mean, you're talking to a person who owns the Sixties. Did I ever want to acquire the Sixties? No. But I own the Sixties—who's going to argue with me?" He charms me with another joke: "I'll give 'em to you if you want 'em. You can have 'em." For Dylan, as ever, what matters is the work, not in some archival sense, but in its present life. "My old songs, they've got something—I agree, they've got something! I think my songs have been covered—maybe not as much as 'White Christmas' or 'Stardust,' but there's a list of over 5,000 recordings. That's a lot of people covering your songs, they must have something. If I was me, I'd cover my songs too. A lot of these songs I wrote in 1961 and '62 and '64, and 1973, and 1985, I can still play a lot of those songs—well, how many other artists made songs during that time? How many do you hear today? I love Marvin Gaye, I love all that stuff. But how often are you gonna hear 'What's Going On'? I mean, who sings it? Who sings 'Tracks of My Tears'? Where is that being sung tonight?"

He's still working to plumb the fullest truth in the matter of his adventures in the recording studio. "I've had a rough time recording. I've managed to come up with songs, but I've had a rough time recording. But maybe it should be that way. Because other stuff which sounds incredible, that can move you to tears—for all those who were knocked off our feet by listening to music from yesteryear, how many of those songs are really good? Or was it just the record that was great? Well, the record was great. The record was an art form. And you know, when all's said and done, maybe I was never part of that art form, because my records really weren't artistic at all. They were just documentation. Maybe bad players playing bad changes, but still something coming through. And the something that's coming through, for me today, was to make it just as real. To show you how it's real." Dylan muses on the fate of art in posterity. "How many people can look at the Mona Lisa? You ever been there? I mean, maybe, like, three people can see it at once. And yet, how long has that painting been around? More people have seen that painting than have ever listened to, let's name somebody—I don't want to say Alicia Keys—say, Michael Jackson. More people have ever seen the Mona Lisa than ever listened to Michael Jackson. And only three people can see it at once. Talk about impact."

Conversation about painting leads to conversation about other forms. "That's what I like about books, there's no noise in it. Whatever you put on the page, it's like making a painting. Nobody can change it. Writing a book is the same way, it's written in stone—it might as well be! It's never gonna change. One's not gonna be different in tone than another, you're not gonna have to turn this one up louder to read it." Dylan savored the reception of Chronicles. "Most people who write about music, they have no idea what it feels like to play it. But with the book I wrote, I thought, 'The people who are writing reviews of this book, man, they know what the hell they're talking about.' It spoils you. They know how to write a book, they know more about it than me. The reviews of this book, some of 'em almost made me cry—in a good way. I'd never felt that from a music critic, ever."

While my private guess would have been that Dylan had satisfied the scribbling impulse (or as he says on Modern Times, "I've already confessed/No need to confess again"), in fact he seems to be deep into planning for a Chronicles, Volume Two. "I think I can go back to the Blonde on Blonde album—that's probably about as far back as I can go on the next book. Then I'll probably go forward. I thought of an interesting time. I made this record, Under the Red Sky, with Don Was, but at the same time I was also doing the Wilburys record. I don't know how it happened that I got into both albums at the same time. I worked with George [Harrison] and Jeff [Lynne] during the day—everything had to be done in one day, the track and the song had to be written in one day, and then I'd go down and see Don Was, and I felt like I was walking into a wall. He'd have a different band for me to play with every day, a lot of all-stars, for no particular purpose. Back then I wasn't bringing anything at all into the studio, I was completely disillusioned. I'd let someone else take control of it all and just come up with lyrics to the melody of the song. He'd say, 'What do you want to cut?'—well, I wouldn't have anything to cut, but I'd be so beat down from being up with the Wilburys that I'd just come up with some track, and everybody would fall in behind that track, oh, my God." He laughs. "It was sort of contrary to the Wilburys scene, which was being done in a mansion up in the hills. Then I'd go down to these other sessions, and they were in this cavelike studio down in Hollywood, where I'd spend the rest of the night, and then try to get some sleep. Both projects suffered some. Too many people in the room, too many musicians, too many egos, ego-driven musicians that just wanted to play their thing, and it definitely wasn't my cup of tea, but that's the record I'm going to feature."

Now, this may be the place for me to mention that I find Side Two of Under the Red Sky one of the hidden treasures of Dylan's catalog. The album's closer, a garrulous but mysterious jump-blues called "Cat's in the Well," in particular, wouldn't be at all out of place on Love and Theft or Modern Times. But as he's told me, Dylan doesn't listen to the records. And unlike me, he claims no familiarity with The Bob Dylan Encyclopedia. ("Those are not the circles I really move around in," he chuckles when I ask. "That's not something that would overlap with my life.") But just as when he praises his current band as his absolute best—an evaluation supporters of Mike Bloomfield and Al Kooper, not to mention Garth Hudson and Rick Danko, et al., might take issue with—I've come to feel that Dylan's sweeping simplifications of his own journey's story are outstandingly healthy ones. Puncturing myths, boycotting analysis and ignoring chronology are likely part of a long and lately quite successful campaign not to be incarcerated within his own legend. Dylan's greatest accomplishment since his Sixties apotheosis may simply be that he has claimed his story as his own. (Think of him howling the first line of "Most Likely You'll Go Your Way and I'll Go Mine" upon his return to the stage during the 1974 tour: "You say you love me and you're thinkin' of me/But you know you could be wroooonngg!"). I take our conversation today the way I took Chronicles, and the long journal-song "Highlands": as vivid and generous reports on the state of Bob Dylan and his feelings in the present moment.

In other words, never mind that I think Under the Red Sky is pretty good. After that early-Nineties disillusionment, how did he decide to record Time Out of Mind? "They gave me another contract, which I didn't really want. I didn't want to record anymore, I didn't see any point to it, but lo and behold they made me an offer and it was hard to refuse. I'd worked with [Daniel] Lanois before, and I thought he might be able to bring that magic to this record. I thought, 'Well, I'll give it a try.' There must have been twelve, fifteen musicians in that room—four drummers notwithstanding. I really don't know how we got anything out of that." He pauses to consider the record's reception. Released just after a much-publicized health scare, the album's doomy lyrics were widely taken as a musical wrestling match with the angel of death. "I mean, it was perceived as me being some chronic invalid, or crawling on bleeding knees. But that was never the case." I mention that some are already describing the new album as the third in a trilogy, beginning with Time Out of Mind. Dylan demurs: "Time Out of Mind was me getting back in and fighting my way out of the corner. But by the time I made Love and Theft, I was out of the corner. On this record, I ain't nowhere, you can't find me anywhere, because I'm way gone from the corner." He still toys with the notion I've put before him. "I would think more of Love and Theft as the beginning of a trilogy, if there's going to be a trilogy." Then swiftly gives himself an out: "If I decide I want to go back into the studio."

In a day of circular talk we've circled back to the new record, and I venture to ask him again about certain motifs. Modern Times shades Love and Theft's jocular, affectionate vibe into more ominous territory, the language of murder ballads and Edgar Allan Poe: foes and slaughter, haunted gardens and ghosts. Old blues and ballads are quoted liberally, like second nature. "I didn't feel limited this time, or I felt limited in the way that you want to narrow your scope down, you don't want to muddle things up, you want every line to be clear and every line to be purposeful. This is the way I feel someplace in me, in my genealogy—a lot of us don't have the murderous instinct, but we wouldn't mind having the license to kill. I just let the lyrics go, and when I was singing them, they seemed to have an ancient presence." Dylan seems to feel he dwells in a body haunted like a house by his bardlike musical precursors. "Those songs are just in my genes, and I couldn't stop them comin' out. In a reincarnative kind of way, maybe. The songs have got some kind of a pedigree to them. But that pedigree stuff, that only works so far. You can go back to the ten-hundreds, and people only had one name. Nobody's gonna tell you they're going to go back further than when people had one name." This reply puts an effective end to my connect-the-dots queries about his musical influences. I tell him that despite the talk of enemies, I found in the new record a generosity of spirit, even a sense of acceptance. He consents, barely. "Yeah. You got to accept it yourself before you can expect anybody else to accept it. And in the long run, it's merely a record. Lyrics go by quick."

When all is said and done, Bob Dylan is keen that I understand where he's coming from, and for me to understand that, I have to grasp what he saw in the artists who went before him. "If you think about all the artists that recorded in the Forties and the Thirties, and in the Fifties, you had big bands, sure, but they were the vision of one man—I mean, the Duke Ellington band was the vision of one man, the Louis Armstrong band, it was the individual voice of Louis Armstrong. And going into all the rhythm & blues stuff, and the rockabilly stuff, the stuff that trained me to do what I do, that was all individually based. That was what you heard—the individual crying in the wilderness. So that's kind of lost too. I mean, who's the last individual performer that you can think of—Elton John, maybe? I'm talking about artists with the willpower not to conform to anybody's reality but their own. Patsy Cline and Billy Lee Riley. Plato and Socrates, Whitman and Emerson. Slim Harpo and Donald Trump. It's a lost art form. I don't know who else does it beside myself, to tell you the truth." Is he satisfied? "I always wanted to stop when I was on top. I didn't want to fade away. I didn't want to be a has-been, I wanted to be somebody who'd never be forgotten. I feel that, one way or another, it's OK now, I've done what I wanted for myself."

These remarks, it should be noted, are yet another occasion for laughter. "I see that I could stop touring at any time, but then, I don't really feel like it right now." Short of promising the third part of the trilogy-in-progress, this is good enough news for me. May the Never Ending Tour never end. "I think I'm in my middle years now," Bob Dylan tells me. "I've got no retirement plans."

*FOOTNOTE: So what's Bob Dylan's favorite baseball team, anyway? "The problem with baseball teams is all the players get traded, and what your favorite team used to be—a couple of guys you really liked on the team, they're not on the team now—and you can't possibly make that team your favorite team. It's like your favorite uniform. I mean . . . yeah . . . I like Detroit. Though I like Ozzie [Guillen] as a manager. And I don't know how anybody can't like Derek [Jeter]. I'd rather have him on my team than anybody."

August 2006
Edna Gundersen interview for USA Today

Source: USA Today online

DYLAN'S ART IS FOREVER A-CHANGIN'
Posted 8/28/2006 10:36 PM ET
By Edna Gundersen, USA TODAY

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — Bob Dylan is not in the mood to reminisce.

"There's no nostalgia on this record," Dylan insists, disputing critics who hear bygone times on Modern Times, which arrives today. "Pining for the past doesn't interest me."

Mining his past, however, is a boomer preoccupation. Last year, Martin Scorsese's No Direction Home, accompanied by a soundtrack and companion scrapbook of memorabilia, traced Dylan's early rise. It followed 2004's autobiography, Chronicles: Volume 1, and the sixth edition of Dylan's Bootleg series. An upcoming biopic and Broadway musical also raid Dylan's back pages.

Yet Dylan did not sew up 20th-century glory to sit in the grandstands now. The '60s trailblazer who reinvented pop music and revolutionized songwriting is still a groundbreaking artist at 65, according to critics dazzled by Modern Times, Dylan's 31st studio album and third in a career renaissance launched by 1997's Time Out of Mind. Asserts Rolling Stone: "There is no precedent in rock 'n' roll for the territory Dylan is opening."

In earthy blues, ragtime and rockabilly, the language shifts from mischievous to mysterious and romantic to rueful as Dylan surveys a crumbling world in doubt-shrouded songs about love and vengeance, faith and fate.

The 10 songs, recorded with his touring band in January in New York, "are in my genealogy," he says. "I had no doubts about them. I tend to overwrite stuff, and in the past I probably would have left it all in. On this, I tried my best to edit myself, and let the facts speak. You can easily get a song convoluted. That didn't happen. Maybe I've had records like this before, but I can't remember when."

Perched on a chair in a beachside hotel suite, Dylan fervently discusses his new music, smoothly evades unwelcome topics (politics) and dispenses disdain slyly. Asked to elaborate on today's hit-driven environment, he cracks a broad grin and says: "I don't want to disparage anyone in pop music. I'm sure it's all good. I'm sure people are thriving."

Modern's pared lyrics and spirited music evolved naturally, with Dylan never in fevered pursuit.

"The obsessiveness about songwriting is far away from me," he says. "I can let it go for long periods. I don't need the songs. When you're younger, you keep writing so you have them to play. After a certain point, you can't play it all, anyway. It gets harder to find a purpose to do something different.

"What I have to do is space out and almost hypnotize myself, without drugs, of course," he says with a laugh. "Those are my best songs, when I'm not really conscious. Once my motive is established, it's up to me to find the ideal terminology, vocabulary, rhythms to work it out. I don't like writing songs where I have to come up with a far-fetched poetic thing and find a melody later. I've done that, and it doesn't work that well for me."

He completed 14 or 15 songs last September, shelved those he considered "lukewarm" and pruned others. Tattered hymn Workingman Blues #2 pays homage to Merle Haggard, who has pledged to write a Blowin' in the Wind sequel, Dylan says.

Writing poignant waltz When the Deal Goes Down "demands all your attention," he says. "There's no song you're listening to that's influencing it. The song you wrote before is irrelevant. All you can do is hang on and hope you do it justice."

The initially nettlesome Nettie Moore "troubled me the most, because I wasn't sure I was getting it right," Dylan says. "Finally, I could see what the song is about. This is coherent, not just a bunch of random verses. I knew I wanted to record this. I was pretty hyped up on the melodic line."

Shifting from playful romps to haunted ballads, Dylan encounters angels and lazy sluts, floods and the plague, a blind horse, a sick mule and Alicia Keys, his quest in Thunder on the Mountain. He never met the R&B ingénue but admired her performance at the 2001 Grammys. He says: "I liked her a whole lot. People stay in your mind for one reason or another."

The unusually accessible Modern still leads into dark mazes, and Dylan isn't handing out flashlights.

"Words go by awfully quick," he says. "Maybe it's hard for a listener to comprehend them all. Maybe they don't want to. I couldn't say what these songs add up to, any more than I can say what the rest of my songs add up to. They mean what they say they mean. They strike you where you can feel it, and you can feel what they mean. With this kind of music, you want to move somebody, and you have to move yourself first."

Still making planet waves

Dylan's undiminished authority springs from supernatural talent, says friend and admirer Tom Petty, stating simply: "He's better than all of us. Backing him in the '80s had a huge effect on our band. Bob has a spontaneity that comes from folk or even the best jazz artists. It's very fresh and alive. We learned if the song is durable and good, you can approach it a lot of ways. He gets better and better. He's had his patchy periods, but we all hang with him because we know any day he might write the best thing he's ever done."

Dylan's evolution runs counter to the industry's growing reliance on forged images, synthetic sounds and boundless technology. When recording spare folk albums Good as I Been to You (1992) and World Gone Wrong (1993) in his garage, an engineer suggested he pin a microphone to each guitar string.

"It was the height of insanity," Dylan says. "There are so many layers on records today. There are so many tracks in studios, and producers think they have to use them. This is no art form. It's just corporate sound. Because there's very little there, you have to dress it up with all these tracks. For me, everything has to have a purpose or it should get lost.

"The beat stuff people play, that's as far away from real rhythm as the sun is from the moon. Those beats make people pose, but they don't make people move or change their lives. They're low-key and laid-back, and that's what popular music has come to. Even metal is ponderous."

He stops himself and chuckles.

"I hate to go on my soapbox about the recording industry. I'm sure there's a lot of good songs getting recorded today, but I can't hear them. I'm just hearing buzz. There's a superficiality to it which might be successful, but people forget about it real quick and go on to the next one instantly. I don't want to be a performer like that."

Dylan aims to tell a truthful story and nourish it on stage. Keeping it real doesn't mean copping ideas from CNN or responding to the conflict du jour, which is why you won't find an updated Masters of War on Modern Times.

"Didn't Neil Young do that?" he jokes, referring to the rocker's recent anti-war disc. "What more is there to say? What's funny about the Neil record, when I heard Let's Impeach the President, I thought it was something old that had been lying around. I said, 'That's crazy, he's doing a song about Clinton?' "

Topical songs "are not my thing. I'm not good at it. Stuff you read in papers is secondhand information. My stuff is my own experience."

Contradicting a label report, he doesn't regard Modern as the last in a trilogy, because Grammy-winning Time Out of Mind, produced by Daniel Lanois, is an odd fit.

"I had no band," Dylan says. "I didn't pick half the musicians. It was a mystery to me how I was going to get anything out of those sessions. It was just a mess. There was hardly any communication."

Under the pseudonym Jack Frost, Dylan reluctantly produced 2001's Love and Theft and Modern. He says the only producer he ever felt comfortable with was "Bumps" Blackwell, who guided early Little Richard and Sam Cooke records and co-produced 1981's Shot of Love.

"He made simple records and understood my stuff inside out. A producer should be raised on the same kind of music. When I bring in a song, it's not that well known — to me or anyone else. How can I expect to show someone the intricacies and nuances?"

A freewheeling free agent

Dylan waxes ecstatic about his current sidemen, yet he's a defiant solo artist who dismisses the concept of bands as little gangs.

"The performers who changed my life were individuals," he says. "They didn't conform to any sense of reality but their own. The last performer who stood up to be counted as an original is Bruce Springsteen, I think. Individuals move me, not mobs. People with originality, whether it's Hector, Achilles, Ted Turner or Jerry Lee Lewis or Hank Williams."

That explains why he has been drawn to boxing since high school.

"Almost everyone else played a team sport," he says. "I liked boxing because it was just you and you alone. And you didn't get hurt. It seemed like you got mangled in football and hit in the head with baseballs. Team sports were not my cup of tea.

"I took a professional opponent on the road with me, and I'd box in the afternoons to focus my mind. This guy could walk across a football field on his hands. I kept it up. Still do, as much as I can. I'd like to race a car around a track. Those guys are really alone too."

Dylan is a busy loner. As he wraps up his third tour of minor-league baseball parks, he's planning a fall arena tour that starts Oct. 11 and enjoying his weekly DJ stint on XM satellite radio. He has yet to carve out time to write the second Chronicles book.

He's only peripherally entangled in other enterprises. Todd Haynes is directing I'm Not There, a Dylan biopic with a half dozen actors portraying the bard at various stages. Twyla Tharp plumbed his catalog for Broadway-bound dance musical The Times They Are A-Changin'. He consented to both projects without much hand-wringing.

"A lot of people are very protective of what they've got and rightfully so," he says. "But so much has been done to me and to my work, and it's been exploited on such grandiose levels with no thought of me, that you get to a point where you don't care anymore. Anything that comes your way is better than somebody taking it their way.

"I don't care about image. I don't have any image problem. It matters not to me which commercials or movies or TV shows they're in or not in or how many are being sung in clubs or school plays."

No ranking of best artists, songs or songwriters fails to name him. He topped Paste magazine's list of greatest living songwriters in June, then led the August issue's roster of greatest dead songwriters, because he'd obviously be there eventually, anyway. Always ahead of his time. Dylan laughs at this news. Once hungry for immortality, he no longer sweats his place in the pantheon. He doesn't need to.

"I got past that," he says. "Posterity has to take care of itself. All that's important in the present time is: Do the songs work for me when I play? I can't get away with singing cover songs like Rod Stewart. Nobody's going to buy it, first of all. I love those songs, but I have to play my songs, and they have to work in a crash-and-burn kind of way. There's more to my music than the lyrics. You would only know that if you have open ears and an open mind, and you give me a clear channel."

He laughs. "Give me an unpaved road to your heart."

Missing interviews

here's a list of items i have been successful in finding traces of, albeit not the interviews themselves.

1. 1962-04-00 WYNC-Radio, New York, Interviewer: Henrietta Yurchenko.
2. 1962-10-00 New York Interviewer : Billy Faier
   Broadcast by WBAI radio Oct 1962; tape available
3. 1962-10-00 Interviewer: Rachel Price
   For FM-Stereo Guide (or was it "FM-Listeners' Guide")
4. 1963-03-00 Bob Fass Show Tape available
5. 1963-06-00 Interviewer: Nat Hentoff
   For Playboy magazine.
6. 1963-08-22 Interviewer: Jack Smith
   Printed in The National Guardian
7. 1963-10-20 Interviewer: Michael Iachetta
   Printed in Daily News
8. 1964-02-00 early Feb 1964 Toronto Interviewer : Helen McNamara
   Printed in Toronto Telegram 3 Feb 1964 Also interview in Gargoyle Interviews Bob Dylan in Gargoyle magazine Feb 1964 Both referred to in Steppin' Out by Brian and Val Lawlan
9. 1964-10-00 Brown University Daily Herald
10. 1964-12-07 University of Santa Barbara Interviewer : Bob Blackmar
    Broadcast by KCSB radio 13 minute tape available
11. 1965-01-12 New York Post
12. 1965-04-00 London Interviewer : Sarah Ward
    Broadcast 25 June 1965; see Steppin' Out by Brian and Val Lawlan
13. 1965-04-28 Daily Sketch by Michael Hellicar
14. 1965-09-18 Toronto Star by Robert Fulford
15. 1965-10-24 Detroit 24 Oct 1965 Interviewer : Allen Stone
    Broadcast by WDTM radio 15 minute tape available
16. 1966-03-00 March 1966? Beverley Hills Hotel Los Angeles Press Conference
    Published in Teenset magazine as An Interview with the controversial Bob Dylan in Nov 1966
17. 1966-03-08 Look Magazine by Sam Castan & Daniel Kramer, 76-82.
18. 1966-04-00 in Sound and Fury by Henrietta Yurchenco
19. 1966-06-00 Music Maker Australia
20. 1969-06-00 Nashville Banner, Jun 1969 (Red O'Donnell).
21. 1969-08-27 Daily Sketch (Chris White).
22. 1969-09-00 Top Pop (Ian Brady).
23. 1971-04-17, place unknown Interviewer unknown
    From Record Mirror 17 April 1971
24. 1971-05-00, place unknown Interviewer: Yediot Acronot
25. 1973-03-15 Rolling Stone (Chet Flippo).
26. 1974-01-16, place unknown Interviewer: Tom Zito
    For the Washington Post
27. 1975-10-00, place unknown Interviewer: Larry Sloman
    For Rolling Stone
28. 1978-01-00 John Austin interview, ?
29. 1978-02-00, Australia Interviewer : Julia Orange
    Tape available
30. 1978-02-03 Minneapolis Star interview by Jon Bream
31. 1978-02-06 New Times interview
32. 1978-02-12 Houston Post interview by Mary Campbell
33. 1978-02-00 Philip Fleishman Interview published in the March 20th 1978 edition of Maclean's

34. 1978-10-07 Toronto Sun interview by Peter Goddard
35. 1978-11-12 John Mankiewicz interview for Sound
36. 1978-11-00 various stops along 1978 tour Interviewer : Pete Oppel
    Published in Dallas Morning News in six parts 18-23 Nov 1978
37. 1980-05-00 Interviewer : Karen Hughes
    Published in The Village Voice 2 May 1980
38. 1980-11-21 San Francisco/San Diego, Interviewer : Ernesto Bladden
    Broadcast by KPRI FM 21 Nov 1980 12 minute tape available
39. 1980-11-30 KINK Interview, Seattle, Washington Tape available 16min
40. 1981-06-27 Melody Maker interview
41. 1981-10-00 Milwaukee Journal interview (Divina Infusino)
42. 1984-01-02 Us interview, Martin Keller
43. 1984-06-00 Paris Interviewer : Pamela Andriotakis
    Printed in People 16 July 1984
44. 1985-11-13 25 Year Award Speech Whitney Museum New York Tape available
45. 1986-02-07 Auckland Interviewer : Stuart Coupe
    Published in Rip It Up (NZ) March 1986; also "The Age" 21 Feb 1986, "BAM" 9 May 1986 (Australia)
46. 1989-06-00 Elegtherotoupia, Greece
47. 1989-09-00 Dan Neer interview WNEW FM NYC Tape available
48. 1990-10-00 late October/early November – unpublished Esquire interview
    (TWM#1595,1625)
49. 1993-08-21 MTV interview Tape available
50. 1994-04-00 Akihiko Yamamoto interview for Crossbeat, Japan

do get in touch when you have anything from the list. not only me, but the whole bob dylan fan community will benefit. thank you.